PREFACE

THE present edition of Dryden's Poetical Works seeks to justify its existence by a more complete collection of Dryden's writings than has hitherto been attempted in popular form, by a careful collation of the entire text with the original editions, by the chronological arrangement of its contents, and by the reprinting in the Notes of a considerable portion of Sir Walter Scott's commentary on Dryden.

This volume includes all Dryden's undoubted poetical works, both original and translated, except his dramas; and, with the exception of some hymns (see page 919), all that have been attributed to him with any show of reason. An apology is due for giving to a book that omits so important a division of the poet's writings as his dramas the title, Dryden's Poetical Works, but the inaccuracy may be defended by tradition. About half of Dryden's critical essays also appear in the volume.

Details as to the sources of the text may be found in the notes to the different poems. For only a very few minor pieces have I been obliged to rely on copies made at the British Museum or elsewhere. The text of Dryden's verse is reproduced without any omissions whatever; from his prose only a few lines, in the commentary on Persius, are left unprinted. The labor of collation has resulted in the restoring of Dryden's own text in numerous passages, especially in the translation of Virgil and in the prose essays, that had later become corrupt. For new errors committed I make no apology, but I hope that they are not frequent. The textual notes are more extensive than in previous editions, and are generally¹ intended to include all variant readings (other than obvious misprints and insignificant differences of spelling) of all important early editions. It has seemed needless, however, to collate texts that were evidently mere publishers' reprints, such as the later editions of most of the dramas; or, except in rare instances, to consider any editions published after Dryden's death. The changes of text made in modern editions are noted, as a rule, only when adopted here.

The chronological arrangement of the contents should give the reader a clearer conception of Dryden's literary development, and of his relation to the politics of his time, than the classified arrangement hitherto followed.

Sir Walter Scott's great edition of Dryden, not the least of his claims to fame, was first published in 1808, just one hundred years ago. His sketches of the men of the seventeenth century, and his critical remarks on Dryden's genius, not only have independent literary value, but show his wide and intimate acquaintance with the society and the politics of Dryden's time. Unfortunately he was as inaccurate and diffuse as he was genial and sympathetic. In attempting to correct and condense Scott's work, I hope that I have not entirely destroyed the charm of his style.

Capitals and punctuation in this edition are made to agree with modern standards. The problem of spelling, as is always the case in a popular edition of an old author, was very difficult. No satisfactory compromise can be made between a literal reproduction of the old editions, with all their aimless inconsistencies and irregularities, and complete conformity with modern usage. In general, modern spelling has been adopted wherever the change was merely external, not affecting the pronunciation of a word: thus critick is made critic; huisy, busy; chuse, choose; boult, bolt; humane kind, humankind; suddain, sudden. In honour, honor, and similar words, the latter form has been adopted, in conformity with American usage, though the early editions usually print honour. Participles and past tenses like confessed, confess'd, confest; mixed, mix'd, mixt, are normalized to confess'd, mix'd, but an exception is made of blest and curst as participles.

On the other hand, spellings that apparently indicate peculiarities of English vocabulary or pronunciation in Dryden's time are retained: thus, reek [rick], shew, breer [briar], thrid, laund [lawn], prease [press], whether [whither], then [than]. Here also may be mentioned Dryden's variation between the forms them, 'em. By discarding such peculiarities, modern editions have altered the character of Dryden's language, disguising its kinship with Elizabethan English.

In cases that seemed in any way doubtful, the inconsistencies of the early editions have been retained, as in salvage, savage; indued, endued; desart, desert. Thus on pages 872 and 873 the spellings elfs and elves occur within a short distance of each other (lines 3 and 34). Some of these cases probably might better have been made consistent, but I preferred to err on the side of archaism.

Dryden's marks of contraction are retained, as in pou'r, wand'ring, heav'n, th' immortal; these are important as emphasizing the regular flow of English verse in Dryden's time, which so often makes it seem mechanical to modern ears. But here, also, the irregularities of the old editions are followed, and except in a few special cases power, wandering, heaven, the immortal, are reproduced wherever they occur; wandring, however, is transformed into wand'ring.

The same principles are followed for Latin names used by Dryden: thus Hyarbas, Sergesthus are not changed to Iarbas, Sergestus; but Mecænas, Cytheron, Ptolomy become Mæcenas, Cithæron, Ptolemy. In English proper names the spelling of the Dictionary of National Biography is usually adopted. The titles of French works referred to in the Biographical Sketch and the Notes are ordinarily given in the orthography of the original editions.

Any editor of a classic author must depend largely on the labors of his predecessors. Besides my use of Scott, I have taken much material from Malone and Christie, and from Professors Saintsbury, Ker, and Williams. To the last three gentlemen I am deeply grateful for their courteous permission to make full use of their work. (Professor Saintsbury has also kindly allowed me to use the text of the Scott-Saintsbury edition as a basis for collation of the Virgil and the Discourse concerning Satire.) Occasional debts to other scholars, notably Professors Collins and Firth, are acknowledged in the Notes. I hope, however, that my commentary contains original contributions that will be useful to students of Dryden.

This edition has been in preparation since the summer of 1901, during which time I have been almost continuously resident in California, distant from all large collections of Drydeniana. For this reason, and others as well, I am indebted more than most editors to the help of many friends. The authorities of the Harvard and Yale libraries have generously sent their treasures to me across the continent; Mr. T. J. Kiernan and Mr. F. B. Dexter, of those libraries, have been particularly courteous in the prompt attention that they have given to my many requests. Mr. Beverly Chew, President of the Grolier Club of New York City, and Mr. Winston H. Hagan, a member of that club, loaned me from their private libraries rare editions of Dryden that were elsewhere inaccessible to me, and the officers of the Club granted me the use of their building while collating or copying those volumes.

To Mr. E. H. Wells, Curator of Modern English Literature in the Harvard Library, I am more deeply indebted than I can well express. His zeal and skill have made the Harvard collection of Drydeniana exceptionally complete, so that Cambridge is now almost as satisfactory a place as London for the editing of Dryden's works. In my own behalf, though until my labor of collating was nearly finished I was a total stranger to him, he has taken infinite and unselfish pains, answering each of my queries with the utmost fullness, and finally sending me a card catalogue, prepared with great detail, of the Harvard Dryden collection. Largely through his aid, the bibliographical information in this volume is, I think, somewhat more complete than in previous editions.

Professors G. L. Kittredge and F. N. Robinson of Harvard University have aided me in many ways, especially by advice in regard to the text of the volume, and Professor W. A. Neilson has helped me very greatly by looking up questions that have arisen during the reading of the proof and in the preparation of the Notes. Mr. C. J. Barr, Assistant Librarian of the John Crerar Library in Chicago, has generously aided me by the gift of a copy of his valuable unpublished Bibliography of Dryden. I am indebted also to Professors E. K. Rand and W. S. Ferguson of Harvard, Professor W. T. Brewster of Columbia, Professor B. O. Foster of Stanford, and to my colleagues, Professors H. Morse Stephens, W. A. Merrill, W. M. Hart, H. W. Prescott, and T. F. Sanford of the University of California, for assistance of various kinds. Some minor obligations are acknowledged in the Notes.

Finally, all my other debts for aid in this edition of Dryden are as nothing compared to that I owe my wife, whose name, as joint editor, might well have been added to my own. She has collated, as well as I myself, every piece in this volume, and has read with me every line of the proof. She has prepared the Indexes, and has borne the larger part of the labor of making the Glossary ready for the press. She has revised the Biographical Sketch and the Notes, giving me invaluable advice in regard to them, and has coöperated with me in other ways too numerous for mention here.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

I

JOHN DRYDEN is the greatest and the most representative English man of letters of the last quarter of the seventeenth century. From the death of Milton in 1674 to his own in 1700 no other writer can compare with him in versatility and power; indeed, in the varied character of his work, as dramatist, satirist, controversialist, translator, and critic, he has few rivals in the entire history of English literature. Though he composed his most important original poems to serve some passing political purpose, he made them immortal by his literary genius. Half unconsciously he became the founder of a literary school that retained its preëminence for more than a hundred years after his death. Any account of his life should deal primarily with his writings and with the political events that gave the occasion for many of them; at the same time it should pay due heed to Dryden's own personality, which has not always been treated with the respect that it deserves. Dryden was by profession a writer, not a hero or prophet; he suffers by the inevitable comparison with his great contemporary Milton. Yet, beneath his superficial inconsistency he had a large general honesty and uprightness, and the fierce invective of his satires must not blind us to his kindness and generosity. Though not heroic, Dryden is eminently lovable.

Dryden's parents were landed gentry. His father, Erasmus Dryden, third son of Sir Erasmus Dryden, baronet, married on October 21, 1630, Mary, daughter of the Reverend Henry Pickering, rector of Aldwinckle All Saints, in Northamptonshire. John Dryden, the first of the fourteen children of this marriage, is said to have been born on August 9, 1631,¹ at the parsonage house of Aldwinckle All Saints, the residence of his mother's parents. He was brought up under strongly Puritan influences, since both the Drydens and the Pickerings took the side of the Parliament in its conflict against Charles I. He was educated first at Westminster School in London, under the famous master, Dr. Busby, to whom he later sent his own sons; and next at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he matriculated in July, 1650, and where he took his bachelor's degree in January, 1654.

The Conclusion Book of Trinity College records that in July, 1652, Dryden was disciplined for "his disobedience to the vice master, and his contumacy in taking his punishment inflicted by him." A pleasanter glimpse of the young poet is given in a letter quoted by Mr. Christie: "Dryden . . . was reckoned a man of good parts and learning while in college: he had . . . read over and very well understood all the Greek and Latin poets. He stayed to take his bachelor's degree, but his head was too roving and active, or what else you'll call it, to confine himself to a college life; and so he left it and went to London into gayer company, and set up for a poet, which he was as well qualified for as any man."²

While at school and college Dryden had made some trifling experiments in writing verse. At Westminster School he had translated, as "a Thursday-night's exercise,"³ the Third Satire of Persius, and had composed in honor of his deceased schoolmate, Lord Hastings, an elegy which is still preserved. In 1650 he prefixed a short complimentary poem to Sion and Parnassus, a collection of religious poems by his friend John Hoddesdon. In 1655 he wrote a curious letter to his cousin Honor Driden, mingling verse and prose in a strain of conventional and not too delicate gallantry. These early pieces are full of extravagant conceits of the school of Cowley, and show at the best only a boyish dexterity in copying a prevailing literary fashion.

Nothing is known of Dryden's life between 1654 and 1658. In June, 1654, his father had died, leaving to him, as the eldest son, landed property which yielded about forty pounds a year, enough at that time to support a single man in decent comfort. A year later, if the heading of the letter to Honor Driden be correct, he was still at Cambridge. From this fantastic epistle, which indicates nothing more than a college flirtation, some critics have strangely concluded that the young poet was seriously in love with his cousin. Whether he continued to reside in Cambridge, or returned to his father's estate after 1655, cannot positively be determined. If Shadwell is correct in speaking of him, "when he came first to town," as "a raw young fellow of seven and twenty,"¹ he did not remove to London and "set up for a poet" until 1658.

Dryden's life after his settlement in London may be conveniently divided into three periods: the first ending in 1681, the second in 1688, and the third with his death in 1700. In the first period, after a few occasional poems, Dryden chose the drama as the most profitable field of literary work, and by his success in it became the leading English man of letters of his time. In 1681, having from a number of causes become thoroughly dissatisfied with his occupation as a playwright, he turned to satire and controversial writing, both in prose and verse, and brought his consummate literary skill to the service of the royal power and the Tory party. By the Revolution of 1688, he was deprived of his position as a court favorite, and thrown back upon his pen for support. After some attempts, only partially successful, to recover his position as a popular dramatist, he found a congenial occupation as a translator of the Greek and Latin poets, and as a modernizer of Chaucer.

II

When Dryden settled in London, his first patron was his own cousin, Sir Gilbert Pickering, a favorite of Oliver Cromwell, and one of the peers nominated by him to his upper house. The great Protector himself was nearing his end; he died on September 3, 1658, after a short illness, but the Puritan government still seemed firmly established in England. Thus we are not surprised to find that Dryden's first important work was A Poem upon the Death of his Late Highness Oliver, Lord Protector of England, Scotland, & Ireland, which was probably written soon after Cromwell's funeral on November 23, 1658. In this elegy he adopts the four-line stanza that Davenant had brought into prominence by his Gondibert. His style, simpler and more direct than in his earlier poems, shows the influence of the study of Davenant, and also, no doubt, of Denham and Waller. As a young, ambitious literary man, Dryden began his career by copying authors of established reputation. This imitative method he followed to some extent through his whole life, modifying and developing his own numbers by the constant reading of earlier poets. The critical faculty was always a prominent element in his genius. Yet in stanzas like that which concludes the poem, he already shows that vigorous, rapid verse which remains his distinguishing characteristic among English poets: —

His ashes in a peaceful urn shall rest ;
 His name a great example stands, to show
 How strangely high endeavors may be blest,

At the Restoration of King Charles II in 1660, Dryden joined the Royalist party, and expressed his loyalty to the new government in three poems, Astræa Redux, and addresses, To his Sacred Majesty, and To my Lord Chancellor, written in the heroic couplet, and published in the years 1660, 1661, and 1662. The contrast between his earlier praise of Cromwell and the adulation of royalty in these poems is certainly offensive to a modern reader. But Dryden's change of heart, though emphasized by his ability to clothe his opinions with rhetorical, hyperbolic flourishes that pleased his contemporaries, and with a vigorous verse that still has a certain charm, merely reflected that of the majority of people about him. Nobody thinks of drawing up an indictment against the English nation for its inconstancy, and only Dryden's later eminence has caused him to be singled out for special censure. Henceforth Dryden will be, with the possible exception of a few months in 1680-81, a consistent member of the Tory party.

Dryden's change of politics had been accompanied by his forming new associations. He became intimate with the family of Thomas Howard, Earl of Berkshire, a loyalist noble, at least three of whose sons, Edward, Robert, and James, were dabblers in literature. With Sir Robert Howard, the sixth son, he began a friendship that lasted, despite an interruption caused by a quarrel on literary questions, until Sir Robert's death in 1698.¹ This alliance with a loyalist family was cemented by Dryden's marriage, on December 1, 1663, with the Lady Elizabeth, the eldest daughter of the house. Scandal, unsupported by any conclusive evidence, reports that Dryden's wife was no better than she should be, and even that the poet was forced into marriage with her by her "brawny brothers."² Though it is needless to enter into the details of this somewhat unsavory subject, a few general remarks may throw light on the situation. The numberless sneers at marriage in Dryden's writings are merely a reflection of the literary fashion of the time, and prove nothing as to his own experience. More important is the fact that in the numerous letters which have been preserved from his later years, Dryden refers only casually to his wife, and never with any expressions of affection. His own character, at least in his earlier life, was probably not different from that of the licentious young noblemen whose associate he was proud to proclaim himself. His long intrigue with the actress Anne Reeve was a never-failing subject for jest from his opponents. On the other hand, both Dryden and his wife show in their letters a charming parental tenderness for their three sons. Perhaps Dryden's marriage may be dismissed as one of convenience, good or bad, which had at all events no disastrous results. It seems to have brought Dryden some addition to his income, in the form of a small estate in Wiltshire.

At about this time Dryden gained the favor of the Duke of Monmouth (an illegitimate son of Charles II) and of his duchess, to whom in 1667 he dedicated The Indian Emperor, and to whom he gives the title, in Absalom and Achitophel (line 34), of "the charming Annabel."

Meanwhile Dryden had been doing literary hack work, writing prefaces and the like, for the bookseller Herringman, who issued his Astræa Redux in 1660 and remained his publisher until 1679. Of these minor labors no record remains.¹ Dryden was not a man with a mission; he had no new thoughts to give to the world, and no intense emotions that clamored for utterance. He merely desired, like thousands of young men of our own day, to make his way in the world by writing, for which he felt a natural inclination, and he was ready to adopt whatever literary form seemed likely to be profitable, financially and socially. Had he lived now, he would have become a journalist. In the years following the Restoration, the only branch of literature that promised steady and adequate remuneration was the drama; and to this, notwithstanding that he felt little inborn talent for it, he soon turned his almost undivided attention.

¹ Some complimentary verses, prefixed to an edition of Howard's poems published in 1660, are the first token of this friendship.

² The chief attack on the character of Dryden's wife is contained in a scurrilous tract, Satyr to his Muse, by the author of Absalom and Achitophel, published in 1682, nineteen years after the date of the marriage. On the whole subject, see Scott's Life of Dryden, and the notes to it by Saintsbury, in Scott-Saintsbury edition, i. 74-78.

Dryden's work for the stage falls into three fairly distinct divisions. After a period of apprenticeship and experiment, he won immense success as the chief writer of a new type of drama, the "heroic play;" his most famous work of this class is The Conquest of Granada, acted in 1670 (1671?). Next, dissatisfied with the plays that had brought him popularity, he developed, after a new series of experiments, a type of tragedy that imitated the methods of dramatic construction used by Corneille and Racine, but the style and character-drawing of Shakespeare. His finest production of this sort is All for Love, acted in 1677. After All for Love Dryden adopted no new dramatic methods; he merely used anew devices of which he had already tried the effect.

In 1660 there was an immediate revival of the theater, which had ceased to exist in England on the suppression of stage-plays by Parliament in 1642. The traditions of the old drama survived, and one prominent writer, Sir William Davenant, connected the old time with the new. On the other hand, upon the return of the king and his followers from their exile in France, French fashions, and to a less extent French ideas, became a potent influence in the new English drama, which, even more than that of the time of Charles I, depended on the court for support. Without attempting an elaborate analysis of the drama at the time Dryden began his career, we may distinguish in it at least five different types. (1) The English comedy of humor, descended from Ben Jonson. This deals primarily with the lower orders of society; it presents men and women marked by one predominant trait, or humor. (2) Comedy of manners, represented in the old drama, for example, by several plays of Shirley. This deals primarily with the higher ranks of society, and depends for its effect largely on the reproduction of the superficial manners of cultivated circles. This type was soon strongly affected by French models, notably the works of Molière. (3) Comedy of intrigue, depending for its effect on an involved plot, full of unexpected turns of fortune. Some comedies of Shakespeare and of Beaumont and Fletcher, such for instance as Twelfth Night, approach this type. In the Restoration period, however, the type owed much to Spanish influence, both directly and through the French drama: hence such comedies came to be known as "Spanish plots." (4) Romantic tragedy, derived from the work of Beaumont and Fletcher. (5) Tragedy of the "classic" type, obedient to the rules of the Renaissance dramatic critics. This form of drama, though it was well known to the Elizabethan dramatists, had never become really popular on the English stage before the closing of the theaters. In France, however, after the appearance of Corneille's Cid in 1636, it won a decisive victory, and through the masterpieces of Corneille and Racine it powerfully affected the practice of the Restoration playwrights.

Fully as important as the direct influence of the French drama on the English was the influence of the dramatic rules just mentioned, which had been developed by a succession of Italian and French critics, and had been adopted as guiding principles by French dramatists. Of them the most important were the famous three unities, of time, place, and action. The first prescribes that the time of action of a play shall not exceed one day; the second, that the scene of action shall remain unchanged, or at least not depart from the limits of a single city; the third, that each drama must have one central plot, to which all subordinate intrigues, if they exist, must directly contribute.

French literature made its influence felt on the drama in two more ways. In the first place, French tragedy was invariably written in rhymed verse. English dramatists, when they came to imitate this practice, could fortify themselves by occasional precedents in their own predecessors of "the former age." Again, the favorite prose fiction of the time was the French chivalrous romances of Calprenède and Mlle. de Scudéry. These vast works, extending through some dozen volumes apiece, treat of the adventures of gallant knights and faithful ladies; their scene may be in ancient Greece or Persia, or in barbarian Turkey, but the sentiments expressed in them are those of elaborate, ceremonial gallantry, akin to the artificial etiquette of the French court. Love and honor are the foundation of every plot, — in fact, the only emotions recognized by the heroes and heroines. Evidently, when such fictions were the favorite reading of English ladies and gentlemen, their spirit would soon make itself felt upon the stage.

Finally, Dryden's dramatic work will be greatly affected by the "heroic poem," or artificial epic, of which Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered is the best example. This literary form was a favorite subject of discussion in Dryden's time, and was regarded as "the greatest work which the soul of man is capable to perform."¹ The romances that have just been mentioned are, in large measure, heroic poems told in prose, so that their influence coöperates with that of the heroic poem in the strict sense.

Dryden's work as a dramatist was essentially eclectic. He himself was by temper, as we have seen, a critic rather than a creative artist, and in his criticism two currents may be distinguished. Keenly sensible to literary merit wherever he found it, he was a devoted admirer of Shakespeare, Beaumont and Fletcher, and Ben Jonson. On the other hand, through his logical, analytic, somewhat scholastic temperament, he recognized the power of the new French criticism, with its hard and fast rules of dramatic construction. Hence in his own dramatic work he constantly tried to combine elements which he had found effective in other dramatists, in a form which should not too far diverge from the dictates of the current dramatic criticism.

In The Wild Gallant (1663), his first comedy, written in prose, Dryden attempted to unite humor studies, imitated from Jonson, and wit combats, probably suggested by Fletcher, in a Spanish plot, constructed with some regard to the three unities. His next work, The Rival Ladies (1663 or 1664), he wrote mainly in blank verse, and again constructed a Spanish plot, which he decorated with a few scenes in the "new way" of the heroic couplet, introduced into the English drama principally by Roger Boyle, Earl of Orrery. He also assisted his brother-in-law, Sir Robert Howard, in the composition of The Indian Queen, a tragedy, or more strictly an "heroic play," written entirely in the rhymed couplet. Encouraged by the success of this piece, he composed independently a sequel to it, The Indian Emperor (1664 or 1665), a drama of the same species. These "heroic plays" are the one type of English drama in which Dryden excels all other writers; his succeeding works of the same sort are Tyrannic Love (1669), The Conquest of Granada (1670 or 1671), and Aureng-Zebe (1675). Briefly, they aim to reproduce on the stage the effect of an heroic poem. They are all, like The Indian Emperor, written wholly in the rhymed couplet, which was then regarded as the appropriate form for English epic poetry. Unlike other English tragedies of the time, they contain no comic underplot, and they usually have a happy ending. Their plots are frequently taken from the French romances. In character-drawing and diction they are powerfully affected both by the romances and by epic poetry. Love and chivalric honor are practically the only passions that animate their characters.¹ Their diction, high-flown, often bombastic, makes no pretense at realism; the spectators, like those at an opera in our own day, were expected to leave their common sense at home. Indeed, the plays as a whole, besprinkled with dances and songs, and decorated with scenery more elaborate than had hitherto been used for the regular drama in England, were themselves half operatic in their effect. By their tumult and bustle these plays continue the traditions of the English stage, with no regard for French decorum; in this respect they remind us of Marlowe's Tamburlaine. Their plots, however, are constructed with some outward regard for the rules of French dramatic criticism: in the two parts of The Conquest of Granada a whole series of battles is compressed within the space of two days. The heroic plays offend our twentieth-century taste by their bombast and artificiality; in their own time they pleased audiences French enough to relish artificial gallantry, English enough to love sound and fury.

By the success of The Indian Emperor Dryden became the most prominent living English dramatist, with the possible exception of the veteran Davenant, who died soon after, in 1668. Between The Indian Emperor and Tyrannic Love, he produced a tragi-comedy, Secret Love (1667), and two comedies, Sir Martin Mar-All (1667) and An Evening's Love (1668), (the former a mere adaptation of Molière's L'Étourdi), and collaborated with Davenant on a debased version of Shakespeare's Tempest (1667). Secret Love, by its mingling of a comic intrigue with a serious plot taken from Le Grand Cyrus, a famous romance, by Mlle. de Scudéry, reminds us at once of the heroic plays and of the romantic tragedies of Beaumont and Fletcher. In this play and in An Evening's Love Dryden made his first essay at the comedy of manners, attempting to depict on the stage the life of court society. — About 1668 he became a shareholder in the King's Company, one of the two licensed companies of players in London, contracting in return to write three plays a year for his associates. This arrangement gave him an income of three or four hundred pounds a year until 1672, when the profits of the company were much diminished by the burning of their playhouse. Though he did not fulfil his part of the contract, apparently writing less than one play a year, he seems to have enjoyed the benefits of it until 1678, when he deserted his partners, whose fortunes had been gradually waning, and gave his plays to their rivals, the Duke's Company. The great success of his best heroic play, The Conquest of Granada, probably reconciled the King's Company to his neglect of the letter of his agreement.

In 1668 Dryden published his most important critical work, An Essay of Dramatic Poesy, in which he attempted both to lay down the general principles of dramatic criticism and to defend his own dramatic methods. In this essay he dismisses in a few words the drama of the Greeks and Romans, with which he was but superficially acquainted, as being little adapted to delight modern audiences, or to instruct modern dramatists. The older English drama he regards as the greatest in the world. At the same time, the principles of the French dramatists, he admits, are superior to those of the English, though their performance as a whole, owing to inadequate style and character-drawing, is inferior. In but one type of construction is the English theater manifestly superior to the French, in tragi-comedy, which Dryden boldly exalts as "a more pleasant way of writing for the stage than was ever known to the ancients or moderns of any nation." This daring statement is at once a defense of Shakespeare and Beaumont and Fletcher, and a plea for Dryden's own practice in such plays as Secret Love. Further, in order to justify his beloved heroic plays, Dryden gives a long argument in favor of the use of rhyme in the drama, and of tumult on the stage, in contrast to the French theatrical decorum.

At the present time An Essay of Dramatic Poesy is less interesting for its substance than for the style in which it is written. The critical dicta are for the most part borrowed from older authors, notably Scaliger, Ben Jonson, and, above all, Corneille. The style, easy, graceful, flowing, is a model of what good critical prose should be. In its combined dignity and simplicity, Dryden's prose — his "other harmony," as he later terms it (page 741) — has never been surpassed. Though he writes only a few years after Milton and Browne, his essays are so modern in their diction that they might seem, except for an occasional quaint phrase, the work of a great artist of our own day.

Dryden's eminence was now universally recognized. In 1662 he had been elected a member of the newly founded Royal Society. His early poems give evidence of a strong, though of course a dilettante interest in science. In his critical essays he insists that a poet must not only be skilful in the use of language, but must be conversant with all arts and sciences, and must acquire polish and a knowledge of men and manners by constant association with the best society. This ideal, of the cultivated man of letters, as distinguished from the Grub Street writer, he himself strove to attain. In Annus Mirabilis, the chief work of his first period, aside from his dramas, he parades, somewhat pedantically as yet, the learning derived from his special studies. In August, 1670, he received the posts of Poet Laureate (vacant since the death of Davenant in 1668) and Historiographer Royal (vacant since the death of Howell in 1666). These two positions yielded him a salary of two hundred pounds a year, to which a further pension of one hundred pounds was subsequently added. Dryden's reputation as a writer, and his worldly prosperity, now rested apparently on secure and lasting foundations.

Soon after his triumph with The Conquest of Granada, however, Dryden's position was vigorously assailed. The high-flown style, the exaggerated character-drawing, and the complicated plots of the heroic plays made them an easy mark for ridicule. In an effort to bring contempt on the whole type, George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, aided by some other wits of the time, wrote the stinging farce of The Rehearsal, which was first acted in December, 1671. In this play, Mr. Bayes, a fashionable poet, who represents Dryden, invites two gentlemen to attend a rehearsal of his new drama, which proves to be a mess of nonsense, concocted largely of parodies of Dryden's plays, especially The Conquest of Granada. Lacy, the actor who created the part of Mr. Bayes, was costumed to imitate Dryden, and was taught to mimic his tricks of speech and his halting manner of recitation. To modern readers the wit of this clever satire seems irresistible. It naturally raised a laugh at Dryden's expense, but it did him little serious harm. Just as we can now enjoy Calverley's parodies of Browning, while still admiring their originals, so "gentlemen of wit and sense" in Dryden's time could applaud both The Rehearsal and The Conquest of Granada.

Perhaps Buckingham's attack deterred Dryden from immediately producing another heroic play. His succeeding works were Marriage à la Mode, The Assignment, and Amboyna, all apparently first acted in 1672, though Marriage à la Mode was probably written in the preceding year. Of these plays the first is a lively comedy of manners, mixed with a rather crude tragic plot, in the heroic style; the second is an inferior comedy, a poor attempt at humorous work; and the third, a still more wretched tragedy, huddled up in haste to serve a political purpose. In Amboyna, Dryden sought to inflame the English against the Dutch, with whom they were then at war, thus supporting a policy for which he later fiercely condemned Lord Shaftesbury. The play (and notably the prologue and epilogue, which are printed in this volume) is interesting as the author's first attempt at political satire.

A more serious vexation than The Rehearsal came upon Dryden in 1673, when Elkanah Settle, a young poet of twenty-five, won a startling triumph with his heroic play, The Empress of Morocco. This drama, which, though not wholly without poetic merit, is unworthy of being compared to The Conquest of Granada, was performed at court by a company of ladies and gentlemen, before being presented at the public theatre, an honor to which none of the Laureate's pieces had ever attained. To make matters worse, Lord Mulgrave, one of Dryden's patrons, wrote the prologue for the first court production, and Lord Rochester, to whom he had dedicated Marriage à la Mode, that for the second. When The Empress of Morocco was printed, it was adorned with illustrations, or "sculptures," which had never before been used in a printed drama; and to it the author prefixed a preface aimed directly at Dryden. Literary people began to compare Settle's merits with Dryden's, the younger set favoring the younger poet.

Stung to the quick, Dryden forgot his accustomed dignity, and joined Shadwell and Crowne, his friends and fellow dramatists, in writing a scurrilous pamphlet, published in 1674, under the title, Notes and Observations on The Empress of Morocco; or, Some few Erratas to be Printed instead of the Sculptures with the Second Edition of that Play (see page 905). In this he abuses Settle roundly as a foolish pretender to poetry, and holds up to contempt the plot, character-drawing, and style of his tragedy. His usual method is to quote a few lines from The Empress of Morocco, and then, in a paragraph or two of mordant criticism, to point out their defects. To such an assault Settle had no difficulty in replying. He issued a pamphlet "contumaciously entitled," as Sir Walter Scott remarks, Notes and Observations on The Empress of Morocco Revised; with some few erratas, to be Printed instead of the Postscript, with the Next Edition of The Conquest of Granada, in which he subjects Dryden's favorite play to the same sort of petulant analysis. The outcome of the whole controversy is well stated by Scott:—

"Dryden seems himself to admit that the principal difference between his heroic plays and The Empress of Morocco was that the former were good sense, that looked like nonsense, and the latter nonsense, which yet looked very like sense. A nice distinction, and which argued some regret at having opened the way to such a rival. . . . It was obvious that the weaker poet must be the winner by this contest in abuse; and Dryden gained no more by his dispute with Settle than a well-dressed man who should condescend to wrestle with a chimney-sweeper. The feud between them was carried no further, until, after the publication of Absalom and Achitophel, party animosity added spurs to literary rivalry."¹

It is, then, small wonder that Dryden undertook no new work for the theater during the years 1673 and 1674. He was not a little disenchanted with the plays that had brought him fame, and was driven to form new ideals of style. In this he was assisted by three critical works that appeared in France during 1674: Rapin's Reflexions sur la Poétique,

Boileau's Art Poétique, and Boileau's translation of the treatise of Longinus On the Sublime. The whole drift of these works, which Dryden undoubtedly read soon after their appearance in France, and for which he had a lively admiration, was against the extravagant "bladder'd greatness"¹ of the heroic plays, and in favor of chastened, refined character-drawing and diction.

To abandon entirely the heroic plays, however, would have been to confess defeat and discomfiture. Accordingly, in 1675, Dryden returned to his task and produced his Aureng-Zebe. This drama, though superficially resembling The Conquest of Granada, is in its nature more like a French tragedy than a typical heroic play. Dryden has completely altered the historic background of his story, and constructed a plot modeled on the Mithridate of Racine.² But in drawing his characters he did not submit to the restraints of French etiquette, choosing rather as his models the heroes of Shakespeare. "The personages are imperial," to use Dr. Johnson's courtly phrase, "but the dialogue is often domestic, and therefore susceptible of sentiments accommodated to familiar incidents." In the prologue Dryden admits that: — he has now another taste of wit;

And, to confess a truth, (tho' out of time,)
Grows weary of his long-lov'd mistress, Rhyme.
Passion's too fierce to be in fetters bound,
And nature flies him like enchanted ground.
What verse can do, he has perform'd in this,
Which he presumes the most correct of his;
But spite of all his pride, a secret shame
Invades his breast at Shakespeare's sacred name:
Aw'd when he hears his godlike Romans rage,
He, in a just despair, would quit the stage.

In the dedication to the play he makes more explicit his wish, at which he hints above, of retiring from dramatic writing. (See page xxvi.)

Thus we are not surprised to find that when Dryden, two years later, determined after all to resume writing for the stage, he composed a blank verse drama, in which he attempted a full synthesis of the form of the French classic drama with a character-drawing and style imitated from Shakespeare. In his All for Love he recast the old story of Antony and Cleopatra into the form of a French tragedy, laying the emphasis not on action, but on psychological analysis. He is no longer influenced by the mechanical rules of Corneille's examens, but by the spirit of Racine. On the other hand, each speech bears witness to his careful study of Shakespeare. The play is beyond doubt the finest of Dryden's dramatic works, and it contains some of his truest poetry; fresh from Shakespeare's Antony and Cleopatra, we can still read with intense pleasure Dryden's version of the story. With the possible exception of Congreve's Mourning Bride, All for Love is the happiest result of the French influence on English tragedy, an influence that continued in force, practically undisputed, until the rise of the romantic movement.

At about the same time that All for Love was first acted, there appeared an important critical work, which helped to confirm Dryden in his altered point of view. Late in 1677 Thomas Rymer published his book, The Tragedies of the Last Age, Considered and Examined by the Practice of the Ancients, and by the Common Sense of All Ages, the most ambitious piece of criticism that had been written in England since Dryden's Essay of

Dramatic Poesy, to which, despite the interval of nine years that separated them, it was in some sense a reply. Whereas Dryden, a superficial scholar but a practical dramatist, who understood the taste of the British public, had dismissed the Greek theater as worthy of only sentimental respect, and had exalted the Elizabethan drama as the greatest in all history, Rymer, a man of real though prejudiced erudition, with no sympathy whatever for popular taste, condemns the English tragedy of Shakespeare and his school as brutish, and exalts Æschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides as models to be imitated by all later playwrights. Unlike Dryden, Rymer has no independent literary taste; he does not judge of any play immediately, as it appeals to him; instead of this, he has certain fixed tests, derived from the classical school of criticism, by which he tries all the tragedies that he discusses. For him the plot is the main subject of consideration; to character-drawing and style he pays little attention. Repelled as Dryden was by many of Rymer's opinions, he could not help respecting the critic's learning, and admiring the strictly logical method — so akin to one side of his own mind — by which he reached his results. On first reading Rymer's book, Dryden made some notes for a reply to it, which a happy chance has preserved to us. "My judgment on this piece is this," he tells us, "that it is extremely learned, but that the author of it is better read in the Greek than in the English poets; that all writers ought to study this critique, as the best account I have ever seen of the ancients; that the model of tragedy he has here given is excellent, and extreme correct; but that it is not the only model of all tragedy, because it is too much circumscrib'd in plot, characters, etc.; and lastly, that we may be taught here justly to admire and imitate the ancients, without giving them the preference, with this author, in prejudice to our own country." He will not admit that the plot is of any such exclusive importance in tragedy as Rymer maintains, and makes a strong plea for English character-drawing and style.¹

In the year 1678 Dryden produced three dramas: The Kind Keeper, a comedy, the most indecent of his plays, but one not lacking in the comic spirit; Edipus, a tragedy of the French type, on which he worked in collaboration with Nathaniel Lee; and Troilus and Cressida, an adaptation of Shakespeare's tragedy of that name into a form less at variance with the French rules. With this last play he published (1679) an important essay, The Grounds of Criticism in Tragedy. In writing this treatise he borrowed much from the fashionable French critics of the time, Boileau (especially from his translation of Longinus), Rapin, and Bossu (a new French critic, whose Traité du Poëme Epique had appeared in 1675); and by the whole tenor of his argument he showed the strong influence that the ideas of the English theorist Rymer had had upon him. By a new dictum on tragi-comedy, which was in striking contrast with his previous words in An Essay of Dramatic Poesy, Dryden here made plain his conversion to the classic point of view: —

"Two different independent actions distract the attention and concernment of the audience, and consequently destroy the intention of the poet; if his business be to move terror and pity, and one of his actions be comical, the other tragical, the former will divert the people, and utterly make void his greater purpose. Therefore, as in perspective, so in tragedy, there must be a point of sight in which all the lines terminate: otherwise the eye wanders, and the work is false. This was the practice of the Grecian stage."

After this time Dryden in his critical works remains true to the classic theory of the drama, of which he never questions the validity. Yet his very next play, The Spanish

Friar (1680 or 1681), is a patent tragi-comedy. This departure from his critical tenets, however, he excuses as a concession to English taste, instead of defending it on abstract grounds, as he would have done in his earlier years. The Spanish Friar was well received in its own time, and later remained the most popular of Dryden's plays. The character of Friar Dominic, from whom the comedy derives its name, has more vitality than most of its author's creations.

To sum up, Dryden's dramas, though they are now less read than his other works, are of the greatest historic interest. More than any other writer, he represents the long conflict between the English tradition and the French influence. In comedy he did creditable work in all three of the prevailing types, — comedy of humors, comedy of intrigue, and comedy of manners. Though surpassed in comic force by Etherege and Wycherley, perhaps even by Shadwell, he is broader in his range than any of the three. In tragedy he first developed an entirely new type of drama, the heroic play: and then, abandoning his own creation, he succeeded in naturalizing in England the French classic tragedy.

In the development of his own style, Dryden's dramatic experience was of immense value. Compelled to address a popular audience, he purified his diction of the last remnants of the artificiality that is so prominent in his early work, and of which traces still remain in Annus Mirabilis. He developed, both in prose and in verse, a style marked above all by transparent clearness. In the heroic plays he often allowed his fluency to degenerate into bombast; later, while retaining his impetuous vigor, he acquired dignity and reserve. Through this constant practice in the technique of style, based on study of the Elizabethan and the French dramatists, Dryden gained the matchless skill that he afterwards showed in satire and controversy, when he turned from the description of dramatic types to portraits of living men and women; from disputes on nice points of love and honor to arguments on questions of theology.

In following Dryden's literary career we have lost sight of his personal history. During his barren year, 1674, he wrote The State of Innocence, an opera, not intended for actual production, based on Milton's Paradise Lost. Though the piece is not devoid of literary merit, it is now remembered principally from an anecdote related by Aubrey: "John Dryden, Esq., Poet Laureate, who very much admires him [Milton] . . . went to him to have leave to put his Paradise Lost into a drama in rhyme. Mr. Milton received him civilly, and told him he would give him leave to tag his verses."¹ At this meeting surely the smaller man stands forth in the better light: Dryden in his own years of old age and tribulation would scarcely have answered a polite request with such crusty condescension.

In 1678 or 1679 Dryden seems to have quarreled with his publisher Herringman, to whom he devotes a contemptuous line in Mac Flecknoe (1682); in 1679 his Troilus and Cressida was "printed for Jacob Tonson," then a young and far from prominent bookseller. Tonson printed nearly all Dryden's later works, and owes to this fact no small portion of his fame as one of the chief English publishers.

In 1673 Dryden had dedicated Marriage à la Mode in terms of fulsome flattery to Lord Rochester, a profligate young nobleman and a minor poet of the period. At some time between that date and 1678, when in the preface to All for Love he terms Rochester a "rhyming judge of the twelpenny gallery" and "a legitimate son of Sternhold," Dryden had a violent quarrel with that nobleman. It is generally stated, on quite insufficient evidence, that Rochester had deserted Dryden out of pure fickleness, and had been instrumental in having first Settle and then Crowne promoted over Dryden's head to court favor.¹ Whatever may have been the immediate causes of difference, Dryden was on intimate terms with Rochester's enemy, the Earl of Mulgrave. Mulgrave had written (according to his own account, in 1675) an Essay upon Satire, in which he ridicules Rochester unsparingly, and which became public property in November, 1679. He was supposed — falsely, if we may credit his later statement — to have been aided by Dryden in the satire on Rochester. These circumstances are mentioned in a letter written by that nobleman at the time: —

"I have sent you herewith a libel, in which my own share is not the least. . . . The author is apparently Mr. Dr[yden], his patron Lord M[ulgrave] having a panegyrick in the midst."²

To revenge himself, Rochester had Dryden set upon and beaten by hired ruffians as he was returning home from Will's Coffee-House, on the evening of December 18, 1679. Though a reward was offered for the discovery of the offenders, or their employer, no one was ever brought to justice for the crime. Rochester's guilt is, however, made practically certain by a passage in another of his letters: —

"You write me word that I'm out of favour with a certain poet, whom I have admired for the disproportion of him and his attributes. He is a rarity which I cannot but be fond of, as one would be of a hog that could fiddle, or a singing owl. If he falls on me at the blunt, which is his very good weapon in wit, I will forgive him if you please; and leave the repartee to Black Will with a cudgel."

Such was the low state of English public morals that Dryden's misfortune created amusement rather than sympathy. Even Mulgrave, who had been the occasion of this cowardly assault, referred to it with no touch of indignation in his Essay on Poetry,³ first published in 1682: —

The Laureate here [in satire] may justly claim our praise, Crown'd by Mac Flecknoe with immortal bays;
Tho' prais'd and punish'd for another's rhymes,
His own deserve as great applause sometimes.

III

Beginning dramatic work more from the pressure of circumstances than from natural inclination, Dryden had never been fully satisfied with his success in it. He felt that his talents fitted him for a higher calling than that of a mere popular playwright, exposed to insults and humiliation from unworthy antagonists. Of his disappointment and his ambition he tells us in the dedication to Aureng-Zebe, published in 1676: —

"I desire to be no longer the Sisyphus of the stage; to roll up a stone with endless labor, which, to follow the proverb, gathers no moss, and which is perpetually falling down again. I never thought myself very fit for an employment where many of my predecessors have excell'd me in all kinds; and some of my contemporaries, even in my own partial judgment, have outdone me in comedy. Some little hopes I have yet remaining, and those, too, considering my abilities, may be vain, that I may make the world some part of amends for many ill plays, by an heroic poem. Your Lordship [the Earl of Mulgrave] has been long acquainted with my design; the subject of which you know is great, the story English, and neither too far distant from the present age, nor too near approaching it. Such it is, in my opinion, that I could not have wish'd a nobler occasion to do honor by it to my king, my country, and my friends; most of our ancient nobility being concern'd in the action. . . . But the unsettledness of my condition has hitherto put a stop to my thoughts concerning it. As I am no successor to Homer in his wit, so neither do I desire to be in his poverty. I can make no rhapsodies, nor go a-begging at the Grecian doors, while I sing the praises of their ancestors. The times of Virgil please me better, because he had an Augustus for his patron; and, to draw the allegory nearer you, I am sure I shall not want a Mæcenas with him."

The subject to which Dryden refers was undoubtedly, as we know from his Discourse concerning Satire (page 291), the story of the wars of the Black Prince in Spain. The lack of adequate patronage that prevented him from carrying out his cherished plan probably caused small loss to English literature.

Of more vital importance was Dryden's ambition to become a satirist, and his willingness to engage in political controversy. At the close of The Rehearsal, Mr. Bayes exclaims, in almost tearful vexation: "The town! why, what care I for the town? I' gad, the town has us'd me as scurvily as the players have done; but I'll be reveng'd on them too: I will both lampoon and print 'em too, i' gad. Since they will not admit of my plays, they shall know what a satirist I am." Buckingham, or whoever wrote these lines, was a prophet against his will.

In 1678 England had been thrown into a ferment by the "Popish Plot." During the next three years party strife became so intense that the country seemed on the verge of civil war. On the one side stood the Whigs, led by the Earl of Shaftesbury, who, using Catholic intrigues, real and pretended, as his pretext, sought to exclude the Catholic Duke of York from the throne in favor of the Duke of Monmouth. On the other side stood the Tories, led in reality by the king himself, who, aided by secret grants of money from France, strove to secure the succession for his brother, and indirectly did all in his power to favor the Catholic cause. The king, however, concealed his real objects so far as might be, seeking above all to gain time, and waited for a revulsion of popular feeling in his favor. This occurred in March, 1681, when Charles dissolved the short Oxford parliament and appealed to the English people. Supported by the strong sentiment of the nation, outside of London, he had Shaftesbury thrown into the Tower on a charge of high treason. On November 24 the earl's case was brought before the London grand jury.

At the time when he wrote and printed The Spanish Friar, in 1680 and early in 1681, Dryden gained the reputation, whether justly or not, of being in opposition to the court party. The play shows a strongly anti-Catholic bias; and the author dedicates it as "a Protestant play" to "a Protestant patron," Lord Haughton. Perhaps Dryden, irritated by the delays in the payment of his pension, was really estranged from the court, and sought to use the anti-Catholic excitement as a means of recommending his work to a London audience. Or he may have been ignorant of the king's real objects, and thought that he was serving his master's interests. At all events, he is classed by a loyalist writer of the time as one of the adherents of the Earl of Shaftesbury.¹ A few months later he had the opportunity triumphantly to prove his own loyalty by his poem of Absalom and Achitophel, the finest of all political satires, written, it is said, at the king's own request, and published about November 17, 1681, just at the proper moment for exciting popular feeling against Shaftesbury and thereby securing his indictment.

The fashion of using a scriptural story as a vehicle for political satire had already begun in England. In 1679 there had appeared a satire in verse, entitled Naboth's Vine- yard ; or, The Innocent Traitor, which sought to make odious the condemnation of Lord Stafford, a Catholic nobleman, for his assumed complicity in the Popish Plot. In the next year a prose pamphlet was printed, Absalom's Conspiracy ; or, The Tragedy of Treason,¹ which covered, in an elementary fashion, the same ground as Dryden's poem. What Dryden did, as in the case of the heroic plays, was to take a literary form in its very infancy, and raise it to the highest level that it was capable of attaining. In his great satire the poet gives a matchless series of portraits of the politicians of the time, exalting the Tories and damning the Whigs. "The young man Absalom," weak and misguided, but full of fine qualities and good intentions, represents the Duke of Monmouth. Achitophel,

the cunning counselor who seduced Absalom into rebellion, represents Shaftesbury himself. Of the other portraits the most famous is that of Zimri, Dryden's old enemy, the Duke of Buckingham. There is little plot to the poem; Dryden describes at great length a group of conspirators, who, after many preparations, take flight at the sound of the king's speech from the throne. The author really made the best of the material at his command: the actual conspirators accomplished nothing, being defeated by a change in public opinion that, without too great abuse of poetic license, Dryden could term the result of the king's own words.

Though Absalom and Achitophel had a wide sale, and must have influenced public opinion to some extent, it failed of its immediate object, for the grand jury refused to indict Shaftesbury. The earl's adherents celebrated his release by striking and circulating a medal, which gave Dryden the occasion for a second satire, The Medal, directed against the Whigs and their leader, published in March, 1682. This poem is marked in many parts by a vigor fully equal to that of Absalom and Achitophel, though it is far inferior to its predecessor in interest and variety.

These two satires showed Dryden in a wholly new light. He had rendered important service to the government, and had a right to expect reward. In December, 1683, he was appointed Collector of the Customs in the port of London. His pension, however, seems to have been paid as irregularly as before, and he probably secured his arrears only after the accession of James II in 1685. His entry into politics, on the other hand, brought on him a host of attacks from Whig writers. Numerous answers to Absalom and Achitophel and The Medal made their appearance, of which the most important were Absalom Senior ; or, Achitophel Transpros'd, by Dryden's former rival, Settle; and The Medal of John Bayes, by Thomas Shadwell, once Dryden's friend and associate, now his enemy. Of these, Settle's poem, though coarse and stupid, is at least legitimate in its tone. By a different application of Scripture, in which Absalom is made to represent the Duke of York, Settle tries to turn the jest upon the Tory party. Lacking originality, he often avails himself of Dryden's work, parodying his lines, and applying them in a different sense. But Shadwell's piece is one long tirade against Dryden, which brands its author as unworthy of the least sympathy for the fate that soon overtook him. Among its least vulgar lines are the following, which are taken from its opening and closing pages: —

How long shall I endure, without reply,
To hear this Bayes, this hackney railer, lie ?

The fool uncudgel'd for one libel swells,
 Where not his wit, but sauciness excels,
 Whilst with foul words and names which he lets fly,
 He quite defiles the satire's dignity. . . .
 Methinks the ghost of Horace there I see,
 Lashing this cherry-cheek'd dunce of fifty-three.

Now farewell, wretched, mercenary Bayes,
 Who the king libel'd and did Cromwell praise.
 Farewell, abandon'd rascal, only fit
 To be abus'd by thy own scurrilous wit. . . .
 Pled thing! half wit! half fool! and for a knave, }
 Few men, than this, a better mixture have;
 But thou canst add to that, coward and slave. }

Dryden's reply was prompt and crushing. In his Mac Flecknoe, published in October, 1682, he held Shadwell up to scorn as a dunce and an insolent pretender to poetry. For vigorous invective and trenchant wit this short poem is equal, in its own sphere, to Absalom and Achitophel and The Medal. A poetaster named Richard Flecknoe, who had previously been the butt of Dryden's ridicule,¹ had recently died. Dryden represents Shadwell as the heir to Flecknoe's dullness; and, since Flecknoe was an Irishman, gives him the title Mac Flecknoe. One may regret that Dryden's just indignation has for once blinded his critical discernment. Shadwell's comedies do not deserve the wholesale contempt that his adversary has heaped upon them: though coarse in character-drawing and in language, they contain scenes full of real humor. On the whole, however, Shadwell's name survives in English literature only through Dryden's satire.

Finally, at about the same time, Dryden added some two hundred verses to a second part of Absalom and Achitophel, written by Nahum Tate. Among these lines, the most interesting are those devoted to his two opponents, Shadwell and Settle, whom he celebrates under the names of Og and Doeg: —

Two fools that crutch their feeble sense on verse;
 Who, by my Muse, to all succeeding times

The satirist showed his consummate command of English in this new attack upon Shadwell. Without repeating in any way the language that he had used in Mac Flecknoe, he reached the same height of vituperative eloquence.

Though he had now definitely retired from dramatic work, Dryden accepted the aid of Lee in completing for the stage The Duke of Guise, a tragedy that he had begun more than twenty years before. In its finished form, this play is a political satire, directed against the Whigs. Upon its appearance, Shadwell and a lawyer named Thomas Hunt directed pamphlets against it, and Dryden replied with a similar pamphlet, his Indication of The Duke of Guise.

In November, 1682, after his series of great satires, Dryden suddenly came forward in a new light, as the author of Religio Laici, a poem in which, imitating, as he tells us, the style of the Epistles of Horace, he sets forth in verse the doctrines of the Church of England, as they impress an unskilled layman. Being a defense of the doctrines of the Established Church against the arguments of the Catholics on the one hand and of the dissenters on the other, this poem is closely connected with the political satires that preceded it. But its easy ambling style — which Dryden modestly likens to that of Tom Shadwell — is at the other extreme from their swift, impetuous invective. By this change of tone Dryden showed his wonderful versatility, a versatility that modern readers, unused to the couplet in its classic form, are not apt fully to appreciate. On the arguments of the poem critics like Dr. Johnson and Mr. Christie, devoted to the tenets of the Anglican Church, have bestowed high praise: to the present editor Religio Laici seems inferior, both in logical consistency and in depth of feeling, to its successor The Hind and the Panther. More interesting than any theological reasoning is Dryden's refusal to believe that the heathen who die without hearing of Christ must be damned to everlasting punishment. The authorities, that "good old man" Bishop Athanasius among the number, will have it so; but the kindly, genial, albeit somewhat wayward English gentleman, who writes satires only to serve his political party, or when roused by insults from his personal enemies, cannot force his charity to accept their cruel verdict.

Deprived of his income from the theater, Dryden busied himself with various sorts of miscellaneous writings. During his dramatic period he had won a reputation as a writer of prologues and epilogues, and had turned many an honest penny by furnishing them for his friends' plays. In 1680 he had begun work as a translator, by contributions to a small volume of Ovid's Epistles. He had all his life, as is proved by his notes to Annus Mirabilis, and by numerous passages in his critical works, been an attentive reader of the Latin poets, so that this new occupation was much to his taste. His versions were sure to find a ready acceptance among a public accustomed by school training, and by the whole trend of contemporary criticism, to look on the Latin writers as the standards of literary taste. He now aided Tonson in preparing a volume of Miscellany Poems, which appeared in 1684. The book, of which Dryden was probably the editor, opened with new editions of Mac Flecknoe, Absalom and Achitophel, and The Medal, and contained very many of Dryden's prologues and epilogues, some of them apparently here printed for the first time. Of new work by Dryden it included only a few small translations from Theocritus, Ovid, and Virgil. Encouraged by the success of this volume, Tonson in the next year issued one of similar character, but devoted exclusively to new poems and poetical translations. For this Dryden wrote an important critical preface, and translated long extracts from Lucretius and Virgil, and smaller selections from Theocritus and Horace. In his attempts with the last two writers Dryden is not happy: Horace's exquisite urbanity and Theocritus's union of elegance with rusticity are both beyond his reach. With Lucretius he has better fortune: his version has much of the dogmatic force and dramatic intensity of the original. In the course of these years Dryden also produced some hack work in prose: a Life of Plutarch, prefixed to a cooperative translation of Plutarch's Lives, and a translation of Maimbourg's History of the League, executed by order of the king.

On February 6, 1685, Charles II died. Dryden lamented his dead master in Threnodia Augustalis, a poem in the irregular "Pindaric" verse made popular by Cowley. The work has some interest as Dryden's first experiment in the versification that he brought to perfection in Alexander's Feast. For the rest, few modern readers will be inclined to quarrel with Dr. Johnson's verdict: "It has neither tenderness nor dignity; it is neither magnificent nor pathetic. He seems to look round him for images which he cannot find, and what he has he distorts by endeavoring to enlarge them."

Just before the death of the king, Dryden had prepared an opera, Albion and Albanus, which was to celebrate the triumph of the brothers Charles and James over their Whig opponents. After a few changes, to suit altered circumstances, the work was produced in June, 1685; its sixth performance was interrupted by the news of Monmouth's rising in the West. Though Albion and Albanus has but slight literary merit, the preface published with it is important for the understanding of the author's critical work. Nothing could be more repugnant than opera, with its numberless conventions offending against common sense, to the principles of the French criticism with which Dryden was now in hearty agreement. But, finding that opera would serve his turn, Dryden forsook for the moment the tenets which he elsewhere had defended so stoutly, and justified opera, against reason, by the argument from authority. The inventors of opera must give law to it, as Homer did to his successors in epic poetry. Dryden's passion for logic here yields to his talent for gratifying the taste of the passing moment.

The Catholic James II was now King of England. The new monarch soon made it evident that he would do all in his power to spread his own religion among his countrymen, and that he would show most favor to its adherents. During this same year (1685) Dryden became a Catholic. For this change of faith he has been repeatedly denounced, by men like Macaulay and Christie, whose judgment commands our respect, as a hypocritical time-server. Whether this accusation be just or not it is of course impossible to determine with certainty; perhaps Dryden himself could not tell us whether he acted wholly from conviction. Nevertheless, the question is so important for our whole view of Dryden's character that we must consider it in some detail.

In none of Dryden's writings is there the least sign of the religious temperament. He was emphatically a man of this world, kind-hearted, and, as things go, honest; he had no overmastering sense of spiritual problems, and no inclination to make himself miserable by brooding upon them. In our time he would either not have meddled in religious discussion at all, or he would have written as a freethinker, unattached to any church. In his own time such indifference was impossible; a man who took sides in politics must take them in religion as well. Now Dryden, a sceptic in half his nature, had been brought up a Puritan, and had joined the Church of England only in consequence of his general conversion to the Royalist party. On the other hand, he had, as his writings plainly show, a constant and ever increasing regard for the principle of authority; the whole movement of his mind is the reverse of revolutionary. Such a man could have no clinging affection for the church of his adoption. Hence his defense of that church in Religio Laici is, as Scott points out, but half-hearted. He will not himself argue to the bitter end the question of the relative importance of Scripture and Tradition: —

I think (according to my little skill,
To my own Mother Church submitting still
That many have been sav'd, and many may,
Who never heard this question brought in play.
Th' unletter'd Christian, who believes in gross,
Plods on to heaven, and ne'er is at a loss;
For the strait gate would be made straiter yet,
Were none admitted there but men of wit.

Thus Dryden's conversion to Catholicism was, as Scott shows, not from an enthusiastic belief in the doctrines of the Church of England, but from "a state of infidelity, or rather of Pyrrhonism." He saw so clearly the difficulties of Scripture authority without an infallible interpreter that he was well prepared to accept the claims of the Catholic Church to be such. Without impulse from external circumstances, in the shape of a Catholic king and Catholic influences predominant at court, he would hardly have made the change; yet the change involved no violence to his inner nature, no sacrifice of intellectual honesty. Once he had recognized the element of the irrational in religious faith, in the doctrine of the Trinity, he could find no difficulty in accepting all the dogmas of the Catholic Church: —

Good life be now my task: my doubts are done :
 (What more could fright my faith, than three in one ?)
 Can I believe eternal God could lie
 Disguis'd in mortal mold and infancy ?
 That the great Maker of the world could die ?
 And after that trust my imperfect sense,
 Which calls in question his omnipotence ?
 Can I my reason to my faith compel,
 And shall my sight, and touch, and taste rebel ?

Dryden has sketched his own religious development in the following lines of The Hind and the Panther : —

My thoughtless youth was wing'd with vain desires,
 My manhood, long misled by wand'ring fires,
 Follow'd false lights; and, when their glimpse was gone,
 My pride struck out new sparkles of her own.
 Such was I, such by nature still I am;

Here the "thoughtless youth" apparently refers to a period of boyish indifference to religion; the "false lights" and "wand'ring fires" to a manhood of philosophic scepticism, probably of the fashionable type, based on the doctrines of Hobbes; and the "new sparkles" to the poet's attempts, of which we see something in Religio Laici, to reason himself into an acceptance of the Anglican doctrines. For these sparkles he exchanged the clear light of authority and constant tradition that he found in the Catholic Church.¹ Perhaps, without being too fantastic, we may apply the same passage to Dryden's literary development. In his early poems he followed the "false lights" of the school of Cowley; later he "struck out new sparkles of his own" in the bombastic tirades of the heroic plays; at last he adopted an ideal of chastened elegance of style, and of literary construction limited by exact rules, imposed by critical authority, which is in all essentials that of the school of Boileau. These doctrines he was unable to carry out consistently in practice, so that his later poems and plays show many departures from them. This partial failure he excused, somewhat inadequately, by the necessity of accommodating his productions to the taste of the British public; a writer to whom the new theories were fundamentally congenial would have been able to make the public taste bow to him. So the adoption of Catholicism made no change in Dryden's temperament; the sceptic peers out from beneath the robes of the convert. His later writings show little of the devout spirit that we expect in a man who has been converted to a new religion in his mature years; they are full of the same coarseness, the same sneers at priests and their office, that soil his earlier work. But Dryden's intellectual acceptance of the principle of authority, both in literature and in religion, was sincere and lasting.

Dryden gained no new offices or pensions as the price of his adoption of Catholicism: whether, without this change of faith, he would have been deprived of those he already possessed, it would be idle to discuss. His conversion bore fruit in his longest original poem, The Hind and the Panther, published in April, 1687. The plot of this work is absurd enough: the gentle and inoffensive Hind, representing the Catholic Church, and the fierce yet beautiful Panther, representing the Church of England, discuss between them questions of controversial divinity; the debate ending, of course, in the triumph of the Hind. But the poetic style of the piece places it very high among Dryden's compositions. A certain emotional fervor fills the debate, very different from the dry, intellectual, detached tone of Religio Laici. More than this, in his address to the Deity, defending his own sincerity, Dryden rises to true pathos, even to sublimity:—

What weight of ancient witness can prevail,
If private reason hold the public scale?
But, gracious God, how well dost thou provide
For erring judgments an unerring guide!
Thy throne is darkness in th' abyss of light,
A blaze of glory that forbids the sight.
O teach me to believe thee thus conceal'd,
And search no farther than thyself reveal'd;
But her alone for my director take,
Whom thou hast promis'd never to forsake!

(Pages 218, 219, lines 62-71.)

In consequence of his conversion Dryden was employed to defend, against Stillingfleet, a paper by Anne Hyde (the first wife of James II), announcing her adoption of Catholicism, which was published in 1686 by the command of the king. He also translated from the French the Life of St. Francis Xavier of the Jesuit Bouhours.

Only one more poem written by Dryden during the short reign of James II need here be mentioned. In Britannia Rediviva he celebrates the birth of a son to the king on June 10, 1688. This production, though written in the heroic couplet, is of essentially the same sort as Threnodia Augustalis: sentiments made to order, with far-fetched imagery, prevent it from having any value as literature.

IV

The Revolution of 1688 brought ruin to all Dryden's worldly prosperity. As a Catholic, he could not take the oaths required of all office-holders under William and Mary. Already an old man, he was deprived of all his positions and pensions, and thrown back on his pen for support. He accepted the situation with dignity, making no attempt to conciliate the new government, but, except for a few petulant expressions, refraining from attacks on it, and applied himself manfully to work. Had he died just before the Revolution, his name would survive as that of the greatest writer of the Restoration period, but his character would apparently have little in it to attract men's love. Twelve years of toil remained to him, years hampered by old age, by poverty, and by illness. By his performance during this period Dryden showed himself still the undisputed prince of English letters; his character, meanwhile, acquired a dignity in which it had hitherto been lacking, and commands our respect and admiration.

Dryden's first impulse was to return to the writing of plays, by which he had won his early fame. Between the years 1689 and 1693 he produced Don Sebastian, Amphitryon,

King Arthur (an opera), Cleomenes (with Southerne), and Love Triumphant. These dramas, notably Don Sebastian, contain work in no way inferior to that of the poet's earlier period, but they contribute no new elements of importance for the study of his genius, and may be dismissed without further analysis. They did not suffice to reëstablish their author's reputation as the chief English dramatist; the last of them, indeed, was a complete failure.

In his skill as a translator Dryden found a surer resource. Encouraged by his success with shorter pieces, he now undertook, aided by friends, a complete version of Juvenal and Persius, which appeared in October, 1692. He himself translated five of the sixteen satires of Juvenal, and the whole of Persius, and contributed an elaborate dedicatory preface, in which, following Casaubon, Heinsius, Dacier, and other critics, he gives an account of the rise of Roman satire and an analysis of its chief authors. In the next year, 1693, he translated three selections from Ovid's Metamorphoses and the episode of Hector and Andromache from the Iliad, and wrote a preface for a third miscellany volume, Examen Poeticum, published by Tonson. Dryden's powers of invective and of sententious moralizing fitted him to be the translator of Juvenal and Persius; though his versions are far from literal, they well reproduce in English the vigorous declamation of the Roman satire. With Ovid also, a writer of easy, rapid, somewhat rhetorical verse, Dryden had much in common.

Near the close of 1693 Dryden embarked on the greatest single task of his life, the translation of the complete works of Virgil, which occupied practically all his time for more than three years. The work was published by subscription, and was issued from Tonson's press in a handsome folio volume, early in July, 1697. To aid Dryden, Addison furnished an Essay on the Georgics, and the arguments in prose for the whole work; Dr. Knightly Chetwood wrote the Life of Virgil and the Preface to the Pastorals. The volume was illustrated with the same engravings that had once adorned the work of Ogleby, a previous translator whom Dryden heartily despised, but the plates were touched up for the occasion, and each was decorated with the arms of a subscriber to the book. In Dryden's correspondence with Tonson there are frequent references to the contract between them, but these are unfortunately so vague that we do not know precisely how much the poet received for his labors. In Spence's Anecdotes Pope is quoted as saying that the sum was about £1200, and this is not inconsistent with what we can gather from Dryden's own words. This reward, though small in comparison with the profit of about £9000 that Pope received from his Homer, was good pay for a literary man in those days. Dryden often writes to his publisher in a testy tone, once protesting, for example: "Upon trial, I find all of your trade are sharpeners, and you not more than others; therefore I have not wholly left you."

Despite many revolutions of public taste, Dryden's Virgil still remains practically without a rival as the standard translation of the greatest Roman poet; the only one that, like two or three versions of Homer, has become an English classic. It has, indeed, almost none of the grace and tenderness, or the high seriousness, of the Latin original, to which Wordsworth attained in large measure in his Laodamia. Thus the marvelous verse,

Sunt lacrimæ rerum et mentem mortalia tangunt, disappears entirely in Dryden's commonplace: —

Our known disasters fill ev'n foreign lands:
See there, where old unhappy Priam stands!
Ev'n the mute walls relate the warrior's fame,
And Trojan griefs the Tyrians' pity claim.

Wordsworth, on the other hand, catches the Virgilian spirit in the lines: —

— Yet tears to human suffering are due ;
And mortal hopes defeated and o'erthrown
Are mourned by man, and not by man alone,
As fondly he believes.

Dryden is least satisfactory in his treatment of the Pastorals and of those portions of the Georgics of which the charm, for modern readers, consists less in the subject matter than in the exquisite delicacy of the treatment, and the haunting melody of the rhythm. His Æneid, however, is a masterpiece of rapid narrative. The buoyant, flowing verse carries the reader forward with a glorious energy, and, at its best, has something of Virgil's own noble simplicity. The following passage, though deformed in one line by Dryden's fondness for antithesis, is a favorable example of his power: —

She thus replied : " The chaste and holy race
Are all forbidden this polluted place.
But Hecate, when she gave to rule the woods,
Then led me trembling thro' these dire abodes,
And taught the tortures of th' avenging gods. }
These are the realms of unrelenting fate ;
And awful Rhadamanthus rules the state.
He hears and judges each committed crime ;
Enquires into the manner, place, and time.
The conscious wretch must all his acts reveal,
(Loth to confess, unable to conceal,)
From the first moment of his vital breath,
To his last hour of unrepenting death.
Straight, o'er the guilty ghost, the Fury shakes }
The sounding whip and brandishes her snakes.

At times the veteran satirist indulges his genius. The following triplet on Drances might be the portrait of a Whig leader: —

Factionous and rich, bold at the council board,
But cautious in the field, he shunn'd the sword ; }

More than this, Dryden inserts into his translation certain sly attacks on the reigning English monarch. (He had resisted, by the way, Tonson's request that he dedicate the volume to William III, though Tonson had "prepared the book for it" by having the engraver make the portrait of Æneas resemble that of the king.) In the following lines, describing criminals scourged by the Fury, the words in italics have no warrant in the Latin:¹ —

Then they, who brothers' better claim disown,
Expel their parents, and usurp the throne.

And the portraits of the rival kings of the bees, which are much altered and expanded from the original, are obviously meant to suggest James and William: —

With ease distinguish'd is the regal race :
One monarch wears an honest open face ;

¹ The editor is here indebted to a writer in Notes and Queries, series II. vii. 168, and series II. x. 263.

Shap'd to his size, and godlike to behold,
 His royal body shines with specks of gold,
 And ruddy scales ; for empire he design'd,
 Is better born, and of a nobler kind.
 That other looks like nature in disgrace :
 Gaunt are his sides, and sullen is his face ;

A musical society in London had for some years maintained the custom of celebrating November 22, the Feast of Saint Cecilia, by a public performance of vocal and instrumental music. Dryden, in 1687, had written an ode for this occasion; he now, ten years later, furnished another and a greater one, Alexander's Feast. This fine ode, which stands at the head of English lyric poetry between Milton and Gray, is to-day by far the best known of Dryden's poems. Yet, familiar as Alexander's Feast has become by ceaseless reprinting in schoolbooks and anthologies, it may be doubted whether many readers appreciate its full excellence. Brought up on the traditions of Wordsworth, Shelley, and Keats, we instinctively expect in lyric poetry either the expression of elevated moral or philosophical ideas, of intense passion, or of a delight in sensuous beauty. Dryden gives us none of these, but a rapid series of flashlight pictures, each expressed in verse that by its music suggests the scene described. The poem is rather a narrative than a pure lyric. No English poem is more full of life and animation; few show a more youthful spirit than this ode by the weary satirist and dramatist of sixty-six.

Dryden's last years were cheered by the success of his Virgil, which reached a second edition within a few months after its first publication, and were saddened by the attacks of a few critics and rivals. To Milbourne, who assailed his Virgil, and Blackmore, who attacked his character, he paid comparatively little attention, judging correctly that their words would not affect public opinion. The case was different with Jeremy Collier, who in 1698 published his Short View of the Immorality and Profaneness of the English Stage, in which he arraigns the whole school of the Restoration dramatists, and Dryden chief among the number. To the charges Dryden manfully pleaded guilty, though he rightly accused Collier of exaggeration; and, somewhat lamely, excused his own sins in part by the general corruption of the times.

The comparatively large profits of the Virgil did not free Dryden from the need of further exertion. He thought of undertaking a translation of the Iliad, and translated the first book "as an essay to the whole work" (page 740). But, perhaps deterred by a consciousness of his defective knowledge of Greek, he turned back to translate further selections from Ovid; to put into modern English some tales from Chaucer, whom he had long loved with a truly sympathetic insight; and to clothe in heroic verse three stories from Boccaccio, to whom he was led by his study of Chaucer. The result of this work, more congenial and more desultory than the long struggle with Virgil, was a volume published in 1700, entitled Fables, Ancient and Modern. These products of the poet's old age have an enduring charm. The harshness and asperity of the great satirist are gone; there remain a clear, melodious diction, and a frank, kindly spirit, which show Dryden to be a kinsman of Chaucer and of William Morris. Sorely battered by the storms of life, conscious that he had often played a part not worthy of his great powers, he appeared just before his death as "the idle singer of an empty day."

Dryden passed away, after a short illness, on May 1, 1700. He died poor, leaving no personal property of any account, but not neglected. Vanbrugh and other friends had prepared for his benefit, in March or April, a representation of Beaumont and Fletcher's Pilgrim, for which Dryden himself wrote a prologue and epilogue and some small additions, the last of his works. He received a splendid funeral, and was laid to rest in the Poets' Corner in Westminster Abbey, near the graves of his first master, Cowley, and his last master, Chaucer.

Many letters survive from Dryden's later years and give pleasant glimpses of the old man's way of life. He was an affectionate father, and showed an honest pride in his sons' humble endeavors to emulate his own literary fame. He was a kindly critic, encouraging younger writers, and giving them suggestions for improvements; from mean literary jealousy, which so deformed Pope's character, he was comparatively free.¹ He was a welcome visitor at the country house of his good kinswoman Mrs. Steward, "at Cotterstock, near Oundle, in the county of Northampton," and gratefully acknowledges her hospitality. In one letter he praises the dainties that Mrs. Steward has sent to him: "Not to name my self or my wife, my sonn Charles is the great commender of your last receiv'd present; who being of late somewhat indispos'd, uses to send for some of the same sort, which we call heer marrow-puddings, for his suppers; but the tast of yours has so spoyl'd his markets heer, that there is not the least comparison betwixt them." But in his next letter he confesses: "As for the rarities you promise, if beggars might be choosers, a part of a chine of honest bacon wou'd please my appetite more than all the marrow puddings; for I like them better plain, having a very vulgar stomach."

When in London, Dryden wrote at home all the morning, dined with his family, then went to Will's Coffee-House, where he spent his evenings. His reign there as judge of wit is described in a well-known passage by Dr. Johnson:—

"Of the only two men whom I have found, to whom he was personally known, one told me that at the house which he frequented, called Will's Coffee-House, the appeal upon any literary dispute was made to him: and the other related that his armed chair, which in the winter had a settled and prescriptive place by the fire, was in the summer placed in the balcony, and that he called the two places his winter and his summer seat."

To this resort the boy Pope "prevailed with a friend to carry him,"² that he might see the man whom later he always revered as his master, on the occasion that he describes in Spence's Anecdotes: "I saw Mr. Dryden when I was about twelve years of age—this bust is like him.—I remember his face well; for I looked upon him, even then, with the greatest veneration, and observed him very particularly."

In person Dryden was short and plump; by the lampooners of the time he was called "little Bayes" and "the poet squab." A portrait of him in his youth shows him as very handsome.³ He retained his rosy cheeks beyond middle life. In conversation he was not brilliant, being hampered by a shy and hesitating manner, which is mimicked by Mr. Bayes in The Rehearsal. Even his reading of his own verses was far from excellent.

Dryden's character is a subject on which there can be much diversity of opinion. His prime characteristics were receptivity, kindliness, and a sort of modest honesty. His mind was so hospitable to new ideas, and so ready to adapt its utterance to the needs of the moment, that at a first impression we are apt to think him a mere hypocrite and time-server. On further acquaintance we find him a kindly gentleman, like some of our personal friends, unconcerned with superficial consistency, distinguished among his fellow men of letters not so much by elevation of spirit as by ability to express finely his passing opinions. As he advances in age, his character grows more mellow, and his opinions mold themselves into the semblance of a system, of which the central element is respect for authority and tradition, in letters, in government, and in religion. The old man wins our respect by his open confession of past errors and of his liability to fall into fresh ones. He ends his life surrounded by friends, both old and new.

This short account of the life and character of John Dryden may well close with Congreve's portrait of his friend; a portrait that is flattering, but, we may trust, not untrue in any essential respect: —

"He was of a nature exceedingly humane and compassionate, easily forgiving injuries, and capable of a prompt and sincere reconciliation with them who had offended him.

"Such a temperament is the only solid foundation of all moral virtues and sociable endowments. His friendship, where he professed it, went much beyond his professions; and I have been told of strong and generous instances of it, by the persons themselves who received them, though his hereditary income was little more than a bare competency.

"As his reading had been very extensive, so was he very happy in a memory tenacious of everything that he had read. He was not more possessed of knowledge than he was communicative of it. But then his communication of it was by no means pedantic, or imposed upon the conversation; but just such, and went so far as by the natural turns of the discourse in which he was engaged it was necessarily promoted or required. He was extreme ready and gentle in his correction of the errors of any writer who thought fit to consult him, and full as ready and patient to admit of the reprehension of others in respect of his oversight or mistakes. He was of very easy, I may say, of very pleasing access; but something slow, and as it were diffident in his advances to others. He had something in his nature that abhorred intrusion into any society whatsoever. Indeed it is to be regretted that he was rather blamable in the other extreme; for, by that means, he was personally less known, and consequently his character might become liable both to misapprehensions and misrepresentations.

"To the best of my knowledge and observation, he was, of all the men that ever I knew, one of the most modest, and the most easily to be discountenanced in his approaches, either to his superiors or his equals." (Preface to Congreve's edition of Dryden's dramas; reprinted in Scott-Saintsbury edition, ii. 17, 18.)

Dryden's reputation as a writer has been subject to great fluctuations. In his own time his commanding position was early recognized; even his assailants admitted his power. In the eighteenth century his fame even increased. Pope acknowledged him as his teacher. Gray's lines in The Progress of Poesy are almost too familiar for quotation: —

Behold, where Dryden's less presumptuous car,
Wide o'er the fields of glory bear
Two coursers of ethereal race,
With necks in thunder cloth'd, and long-resounding pace.

Dr. Johnson, in his carefully developed comparison of Dryden and Pope, accords to the older poet, "with some hesitation," the superior genius; but he quickly adds that "every other writer since Milton must give place to Pope." Thus when Sir Walter Scott wrote in 1808, at the close of his Life of Dryden, that he left in English literature "a name second only to those of Milton and of Shakespeare," he was merely recording a received literary opinion. With the rise of the romantic school, though both Byron and Wordsworth admired his genius,¹ and Keats studied carefully his versification, Dryden's reputation declined. At the present time, though no competent critic fails to pay tribute to Dryden's power, comparatively few persons read him with genuine enthusiasm.

In many of the highest qualities of a poet Dryden was certainly lacking. He expressed no great moral ideas or social aspirations; he had little intuitive knowledge of human nature, and no feeling for the beauty of the external world. He began serious work comparatively late in life, and always regarded his art as primarily a means for making a living. His original poems, except his dramas, were all occasional productions, written not from any creative impulse, but to serve some passing purpose; they were devoted to courtly panegyric or to party warfare. Unlike Spenser and Milton, Dryden found no high ideals and lofty aspirations among the men whom he served; nor was he a man, like Shelley, to revolt against the tendencies of his environment, and create ideals and aspirations for himself.

As the portraits in Absalom and Achitophel amply prove, no man could describe character, in a certain way, better than Dryden. The central defect of his dramatic works is that they too are essentially descriptive. Dryden's men and women are figures made to order, after the pattern of previous writers, rather than living beings, created by the poet from his immediate sympathy with human nature. Their speeches are eloquent, often beautiful, but rarely do we find a phrase like Cleopatra's in All for Love, —

And thus one minute's feigning has destroy'd
My whole life's truth.

which seems wrung from the speaker by real depth of feeling.

Some reservations are necessary even as to Dryden's description of character. If we contrast his figures in Absalom and Achitophel with those of Chaucer in his Prologue, we notice Dryden's insistence on abstract qualities and on abstract adjectives, in contrast to Chaucer's attention to personal appearance, even to the details of attire, as an index of character. Shaftesbury's person gave free scope for concrete description, but to it Dryden came no nearer than the following lines: —

A fiery soul, which, working out its way,
Fretted the pigmy body to decay,
And o'er-inform'd the tenement of clay.

Seldom does Dryden give details like those in regard to Oates: —

Sunk were his eyes; his voice was harsh and loud,
Sure signs he neither cholerick was nor proud:
His long chin prov'd his wit; his saintlike grace
A church vermilion, and a Moses' face.

Even here he is not content to let the details speak for themselves, but must point out the abstract qualities they denote. Contrast with this Chaucer's description of the Monk!

This tendency to the abstract rather than the concrete prepares us for the fatal weakness of all Dryden's attempts at the description of nature. Brought up in the country, he was nevertheless insensible to its beauty. Of his few passages of natural description, the following, from The Indian Emperor, is perhaps the most ambitious: —

Enter CORTEZ alone, in a nightgown.

All things are hush'd, as Nature's self lay dead;
The mountains seem to nod their drowsy head;
The little birds in dreams their songs repeat,
And sleeping flowers beneath the night dew sweat.
Even Lust and Envy sleep; yet Love denies Rest to my soul, and slumber to my eyes.

These lines Wordsworth rightly condemns as "vague, bombastic, and senseless."¹ And, in a sentence of the dedication to the same play, Dryden proclaims his insensibility to the grander aspects of nature. "High objects, it is true," he tells us, "attract the sight; but it looks up with pain on craggy rocks and barren mountains, and continues not intent on any object which is wanting in shades and greens to entertain it."

In this fondness for abstraction Dryden is partly a follower of current poetic theories, which insisted on the generalizing, philosophic nature of poetry; partly true to his own temperament, which loved reasoning, in verse and out of it, at the expense of observation. His passion for ratiocination, which shows itself throughout his original works, from the fine-spun debates on love and honor in the heroic plays to the theological discussion in The Hind and the Panther, has given Dryden the reputation of a great and vigorous intellect. This reputation, which may have been increased by the blunt coarseness of his language, really a sign of a lack of delicacy rather than an indication of strength, is only partially deserved. Dryden originated no ideas, and in his analysis of old ones he was not profound. He seems often to gnaw at the rind of thought while others have reached the kernel. His arguments never become fused into a well-developed, coherent system; he excels primarily in expressing in clear, incisive, melodious language thoughts that he has borrowed from other men.

Dryden's literary greatness then depends, in greater measure than that of almost any other of the very greatest English poets, upon his mastery of the technique of his art. Indifferent to the beauty of nature, he was keenly susceptible to beauty of style; he was a critic by instinct, an author by training. In his criticism, and in his prose style, we may discover some explanation of his power as a writer of verse.

In Dryden's criticism two elements are constantly contending for mastery. By his passion for logic, he was attracted to the contemporary French critics, who busied themselves primarily with literary theory and loved to prescribe hard and fast rules for the guidance of future authors. Through his own writings he did much to introduce their tenets, and still more their general methods of work, into England. Hence he is justly praised by Dr. Johnson in a celebrated passage: "Dryden may be properly considered as the father of English criticism, as the writer who first taught us to determine upon principles the merit of composition. Of our former poets, the greatest dramatist wrote without rules, conducted through life and nature by a genius that rarely misled and rarely deserted him. Of the rest, those who knew the laws of propriety had neglected to teach them." By criticism, Dr. Johnson here means dogmatic criticism. Yet Dryden was himself no dogmatist. Quite apart from his devotion to logical method, he had an instinctive sympathy with fine poetry wherever he found it; his appreciation was too catholic to be warped by compliance with any narrow critical creed. Hence, in contrast to Dr. Johnson, but with equal truth, Professor Ker can write: "The separate positive sentences of Dryden are of small account in his work as a critic. His virtue is that in a time when literature was pestered and cramped with formulas he found it impossible to write otherwise than freely. He is sceptical, tentative, disengaged, where most of his contemporaries, and most of his successors for a hundred years, are pledged to certain dogmas and principles."¹ Finally, though the historical point of view never became prominent in Dryden's writings, his sound common sense made him see that every author must be judged not simply by a fixed code of literary principles, but with some reference to the spirit of the times in which he lived. Thus, when he came to discuss a poet whom he understood and loved, his respect for literary theory simply saved him from waywardness and eccentricity. Though his discussion of general literary problems now seems crude and mechanical, Dryden's comments on individual writers are still full of inspiration; of Shakespeare and Chaucer he has left appreciations which in their way have never been surpassed.

Dryden clothed his critical works in a prose style that has been described once for all by Dr. Johnson, whose manner is in quaint contrast to Dryden's own:—

"Criticism, either didactic or defensive, occupies almost all his prose, except those pages which he has devoted to his patrons; but none of his prefaces were ever thought tedious. They have not the formality of a settled style, in which the first half of the sentence betrays the other. The clauses are never balanced, nor the periods modeled. every word seems to drop by chance, though it falls into its proper place. Nothing is cold or languid: the whole is airy, animated, and vigorous; what is little, is gay; what is great, is splendid. He may be thought to mention himself too frequently; but while he forces himself upon our esteem, we cannot refuse him to stand high in his own. Everything is excused by the play of images and the sprightliness of expression. Though all is easy, nothing is feeble; though all seems careless, there is nothing harsh; and though since his earlier works more than a century has passed, they have nothing yet uncouth or obsolete.

"He who writes much will not easily escape a manner—such a recurrence of particular modes as may be easily noted. Dryden is always another and the same; he does not exhibit a second time the same elegances in the same form, nor appears to have any art other than that of expressing with clearness what he thinks with vigor. His style could not easily be imitated, either seriously or ludicrously; for, being always equable and always varied, it has no prominent or discriminative characters. The beauty who is totally free from disproportion of parts and features cannot be ridiculed by an overcharged resemblance."

Perhaps we can best explain the charm of Dryden's prose by saying that it represents the ideal of cultivated literary conversation. Had he employed it for a wider range of subjects, it would probably have become less natural and artless. At least his verse, which he used for nearly all his important writing except his criticism, shows not only the author's perfect command of his material, but his careful study and deliberation. To the wonderful clearness which it shares with his prose, it adds that vigor of line and that rapidity of movement which are Dryden's distinguishing glory among all the English poets.

In his all-pervading clearness, both in his single sentences and in the general conduct of his poems, Dryden is in sharp contrast to the Elizabethan poets, and still more to the school of Cowley, whose follower he had been in his youth. With him, clearness became as natural in verse as in prose; he aimed to be understood first of all, and would not let the search for more poetic qualities of style blind him to this first necessity. His dramas in this respect are far superior to those of Congreve or Southerne; considered merely as rapid narratives, thrown into the form of dialogue, they command very high praise. And shallow though the reasoning may be in Religio Laici or in The Hind and the Panther, the reader is at least seldom left with the slightest doubt as to the poet's meaning. This remarkable clearness of diction and of construction Dryden owed primarily to his passion for logic and to his familiarity with French literature and criticism. He left it as a precious legacy to the writers who followed him, down to the rise of the romantic school. It would be wrong to say that Dryden alone made clearness the distinguishing virtue — frequently, to be sure, at the expense of higher qualities — of all English poetry in the eighteenth century; but certainly he, as the teacher of Pope, deserves that praise more than any other one man.

Clearness Dryden could teach to his successors; he could not impart to them his vigor and his rapidity. The former is seen at its best in Absalom and Achitophel and The Medal, where each phrase is like the stroke of a hammer; the latter is the greatest excellence of his translations from Ovid, Virgil, and Chaucer, and reaches its highest point in Alexander's Feast. At first, in the heroic plays, this resonant declamation and this animated narrative were apt to degenerate into bombast; later they became the unaffected, apparently simple utterance of Dryden in verse, just as his graceful, conversational style was in prose. Here, though we cannot point to any one poet as his model, Dryden showed himself a follower of the great Elizabethans, rather than the founder of the Augustan school. He was himself fully conscious of his power: "I pretend to no dictatorship among my fellow poets," he writes in his Dedication of the Æneis, "since, if I should instruct some of them to make well-running verses, they want genius to give them strength as well as sweetness" (page 512). Pope, by emphasizing the pause at the close of each line, and still more that at the close of the couplet, made his verse more fit for a succession of epigrams than for the full-mouthed invective and impetuous narrative of which Dryden was the master. Pope's poems are like a string of beads and Dryden's like a firm, well-twisted cord.

Finally, Dryden's verse at its best, as in the opening lines of The Hind and the Panther, or the translation of the Æneis, has a rare musical quality. Accustomed to the elaborately varied verse forms of nineteenth-century poets, and to the incessantly changing harmonies of blank verse, modern readers do not always appreciate Dryden's consummate mastery of his own versification. Within the apparently narrow limits of the heroic couplet, he could subtly vary his style to suit his subject; he could, as he boasted, be "unpolished" and "rugged" in Religio Laici and majestic in some portions of The Hind and the Panther; he could be "sweet" in translating Ovid, and reach severity in the nobler portions of Virgil.

In a celebrated passage, Matthew Arnold has termed Dryden "the puissant and glorious founder" of an age of prose and reason, an age whose writers are marked, above all else, by "regularity, uniformity, precision, balance." If we make certain reservations, doubtless present in Arnold's own mind, the verdict is eminently just and penetrating. Dryden lacked the higher qualities of imagination and insight, but he was regular and uniform only in his hatred of eccentricity and bad taste; he was precise in his aversion to vagueness, and to the substitution of mere harmonious sound for solid sense; he showed balance in his continual dependence on his critical judgment, in his reverent attitude — much like Arnold's own — towards the poets of former times, and towards the critical good sense of his own period. His puissance and his glory are, that despite his lack of creative originality, he made his verse so fit an image of his own active and receptive mind.

EARLY POEMS

UPON THE DEATH OF THE LORD HASTINGS

[The following poem, Dryden's first published work, is one of a number of pieces composing a small volume entitled, Lachrymæ Musarum, the Tears of the Muses, express'd in Elegies, written by divers persons of Nobility and Worth, upon the death of the most hopefull Henry, Lord Hastings, onely sonn of the Right Honourable Ferdinando, Earl of Huntingdon, Heir-gentrall of the high-born Prince George, Duke of Clarence, brother to King Edward the Fourth, collected and set forth by R. B. London, 1649. (A second issue of the book, differing very slightly from the first, is dated 1650.) The young nobleman, who seems to have been worthy of the praises heap'd upon him, was born, according to Collins's Peerage of England, on January 16, 1630, and died of the smallpox on June 24, 1649. Among the contributors to Lachrymæ Musarum were Denham, Marvell, Herrick, and Richard Brome, the last of whom is thought to have been the editor of the collection. Dryden's boyish elegy was written under the direct influence of Cowley, whom he later styles "the darling of my youth" (see p. 320, below); it is signed Johannes Dryden, Scholæ Westm. Alumnus. It was first reprinted in 1702, in the third edition of Miscellany Poems, the First Part.]

MUST noble Hastings immaturally die,
The honor of his ancient family,
Beauty and learning thus together meet,
To bring a winding for a wedding sheet?
Must Virtue prove Death's harbinger? must she,
With him expiring, feel mortality?
Is death, sin's wages, grace's now? shall
art
Make us more learned, only to depart?
If merit be disease; if virtue death;
To be good, not to be; who'd then bequeath
Himself to discipline? who'd not esteem
Labor a crime? study self-murder deem?
Our noble youth now have pretense to be Dunces securely, ign'rant healthfully.

Rare linguist, whose worth speaks itself,
whose praise,
Tho' not his own, all tongues besides do raise!
Then whom great Alexander may seem less,
Who conquer'd men, but not their languages.

In his mouth nations speak; his tongue might be

Interpreter to Greece, France, Italy. 20
His native soil was the four parts o' th' earth;
All Europe was too narrow for his birth.
A young apostle; and, (with rev'rence may I speak 'it,) inspir'd with gift of tongues, as they.

Nature gave him, a child, what men in vain
Oft strive, by art tho' further'd, to obtain.
His body was an orb, his sublime soul
Did move on virtue's and on learning's pole:
Whose reg'lar motions better to our view,
Then Archimedes' sphere, the heavens did shew. 30

Graces and virtues, languages and arts,
Beauty and learning, fill'd up all the parts.
Heav'n's gifts, which do, like falling stars, appear

Scatter'd in others; all, as in their sphere,
Were fix'd and conglobate in 's soul; and thence

Shone thro' his body, with sweet influence;
Letting their glories so on each limb fall,
The whole frame render'd was celestial.
Come, learned Ptolemy, and trial make,
If thou this hero's altitude canst take: 40
But that transcends thy skill; thrice happy
all,

Could we but prove thus astronomical.
Liv'd Tycho now, struck with this ray, which shone

More bright i' th' morn, then others' beam
at noon,

He'd take his astrolabe, and seek out here
What new star 'twas did gild our hemisphere.

Replenish'd then with such rare gifts as these,

Where was room left for such a fouldisease?

The nation's sin hath drawn that veil, which shrouds

Our dayspring in so sad benighting clouds.
Heaven would no longer trust its pledge;
but thus 51

Recall'd it; rapt its Ganymede from us.
Was there no milder way but the smallpox,
The very filth'ness of Pandora's box?
So many spots, like naves our Venus soil?
One jewel set off with so many a foil!
Blisters with pride swell'd, which thro' 's flesh did sprout,

Like rose-buds, stuck i' th' lily skin about.
Each little pimple had a tear in it,
To wail the fault its rising did commit: 60
Who, rebel-like, with their own lord at strife,

Thus made an insurrection 'gainst his life.
Or were these gems sent to adorn his skin,
The cab'net of a richer soul within?
No comet need foretell his change drew on,
Whose corpse might seem a constellation.
O, had he died of old, how great a strife
Had been, who from his death should draw their life?

Who should, by one rich draught, become whate'er

Seneca, Cato, Numa, Cæsar, were; 70 Learn'd, virtuous, pious, great; and have by this

An universal metempsuchosis.

Must all these ag'd sires in one funeral Expire? all die in one so young, so small?
Who, had he liv'd his life out, his great fame
Had swell'd 'bove any Greek or Roman
name.

But hasty winter, with one blast, hath brought

The hopes of autumn, summer, spring, to naught.

Thus fades the oak i' th' sprig, i' th' blade
the corn;

Thus without young, this Phœnix dies, newborn. 80

Must then old three-legg'd graybeards with their gout,

Catarrhs, rheums, ach's, live three ages out?
Time's offal, only fit for th' hospital,
Or t' hang an antiquary's room withal!

Must drunkards, lechers, spent with sinning,
live

With such helps as broths, possets, physick
give?

None live, but such as should die? shall we meet

With none but ghostly fathers in the street?
Grief makes me rail: sorrow will force its
way;

And show'rs of tears tempestuous sighs best
lay. 90

The tongue may fail, but overflowing eyes
Will weep out lasting streams of elegies.

But thou, O virgin-widow, left alone,
Now thy belov'd, heaven-ravish'd spouse is gone,

(Whose skilful sire in vain strove to apply Med'cines, when thy balm was no remedy.)
With greater then Platonic love, O wed
His soul, tho' not his body, to thy bed:
Let that make thee a mother; bring thou
forth! 99

Th' ideas of his virtue, knowledge, worth;
Transcribe th' original in new copies; give Hastings o' th' better part: so shall he live
In 's nobler half; and the great grandsire be
Of an heroic divine progeny;
An issue, which t' eternity shall last,
Yet but th' irradiations which he cast.
Erect no mausoleums; for his best Monument is his spouse's marble breast.

TO HIS FRIEND JOHN HODDESDON, ON HIS DIVINE EPIGRAMS

[This complimentary poem was prefixed to a little volume entitled, Sion and Iarnassus, or Epigrams on several texts of the Old and New Testament; to which are added a Poem on the Passion, a Hymn on the Resurrection, Ascension, and Feast of Pentecost, by John Hoddesdon, London, 1650; it is signed J. Dryden of Trin. C. and headed To his friend the Authour, on his divine Epigrams. A portrait of Hoddesdon as a youth of about Dryden's years forms the frontispiece to the volume. Dryden's verses distinctly show the influence of the Puritan atmosphere in which he was brought up.]

THOU hast inspir'd me with thy soul, and I
Who ne'er before could ken of poetry,
Am grown so good proficient, I can lend
A line in commendation of my friend.
Yet 't is but of the second hand; if aught
There be in this, 't is from thy fancy brought.
Good thief, who dar'st, Prometheus-like,
aspire,

And fill thy poems with celestial fire:
Enliven'd by these sparks divine, their rays
Add a bright luster to thy crown of bays. 100

Young eaglet, who thynest thus soon forsook,
So lofty and divine a course hast took
As all admire, before the down begin
To peep, as yet, upon thy smother chin;
And, making heaven thy aim, hast had the
grace

To look the Sun of Righteousness i' th' face.
What may we hope, if thou go'st on thus fast!
Scriptures at first; enthusiasms at last!
'Thou hast commenc'd, betimes, a saint, go
on,

Mingling diviner streams with Helicon. 20
That they who view what Epigrams here be,
May learn to make like, in just praise of thee.

Reader, I've done, nor longer will withhold Thy greedy eyes; looking on this pure gold Thou'lt know adulterate copper, which, like this,
Will only serve to be a foil to his.

LETTER TO MADAME HONOR DRYDEN

[This letter was written by Dryden, while a student at Cambridge, to his cousin Honor Dryden, who was then about eighteen years old. She never married, and in her later years is said to have lived with her brother, John Dryden of Chesterton, to whom our author, in 1699, addressed one of his best poetical epistles. See p. 784, below.

The letter was first printed by Malone, from the original manuscript, now lost. The transcript below follows strictly Malone's text, which very properly preserves Dryden's vagaries of spelling.]

TO THE FAIRE HANDS OF MADAME HONOR
DRYDEN THESE CRAVE ADMITTANCE

Camb. May, 23, 16[55].

MADAME,

IF you have received the lines I sent by the reverend Levite, I doubt not but they have exceedingly wrought upon you; for being so long in a clergy-man's pocket, assuredly they have acquired more sanctity than their author meant them. Alasse, Madame! for ought I know, they may become a sermon ere they could arrive at you; and believe it, having you for the text, it could scarcely prove bad, if it light upon one that could handle it indifferently. But I am so miserable a preacher, that though I have so sweet and copious a subject, I still fall short in my expressions; and instead of an use of thanksgiving, I am always making one of comfort, that I may one day again have the happiness to kiss your faire hand; but that is a message I would not so willingly do by letter, as by word of mouth.

This is a point, I must confesse, I could willingly dwell longer on; and in this case what ever I say you may confidently take for gospel. But I must hasten. And indeed, Madame, (belov'd I had almost sayd,) hee had need hasten who treats of you; for to speake fully to every part of your excellencies, requires a longer houre then most persons have allotted them. But, in a word, your selfe hath been the best expositor upon the text of your own worth, in that admirable comment you wrote upon it; I meane your incomparable letter. By all that's good, (and you, Madame, are a great part of my oath,) it hath put mee so farre besides my selfe, that I have scarce patience to write prose, and my pen is stealing into verse every time I kisse your letter. I am sure the poor paper smarts for my idolatry; which by wearing it continually neere my brest, will at last be burnt and martyrd in those flames of adoration which it hath kindled in mee. But I forgett, Madame, what rarities your letter came fraught with, besides words. You are such a deity that commands worship by providing the sacrifice. You are pleas'd, Madame, to force me to write by sending me materials, and compell me to my greatest happiness. Yet, though I highly value your magnificent presente, pardon mee, if I must tell the world they are imperfect emblems of your beauty; for the white and red of waxe and paper are but shaddowes of that vermillion and snow in your lips and forehead; and the silver of the inkehorne, if it presume to vye whitenesse with your purer skinne, must confesse it selfe blacker then the liquor it contains. What then do I more then retrieve your own gifts, and present you with that paper, adulterated with blotts, which you gave spotlesse?

For, since 't was mine, the white hath lost its hiew,

To show 't was n'ere it selfe, but whilst in
you:

The virgin waxe hath blusht it selfe to red,
Since it with mee hath lost its maydenhead.
You, fairest nymph, are waxe: oh! may you bee

As well in softnesse, as in purity!
Till fate and your own happy choice reveale, Whom you so farre shall blesse, to make your seale.

Fairest Valentine, the unfeigned wishe of your humble votary.

JO. DRYDEN.

HEROIC STANZAS

CONSECRATED TO THE GLORIOUS MEMORY OF HIS MOST SERENE AND RENOWN'D HIGHNESS OLIVER, LATE LORD PROTECTOR OF THIS COMMON-WEALTH, &c. WRITTEN AFTER THE CELEBRATION OF HIS FUNERAL

[Cromwell died on September 3, 1658, and was buried with great pomp on November 23. Dryden therefore wrote the following poem, his first important work, at the close of 1658, when he was already in his twenty-eighth year. By his choice of stanza, and by his comparatively simple style, he shows that he is now influenced by Davenant quite as much as by Cowley.

This poem was published twice in 1659: separately, with a title-page reading, A Poem upon the Death of his Late Highness Oliver, Lord Protector of England, Scotland, & Ireland, written by Mr. Dryden. London, Printed for William Wilson; and, with poems by Waller and Sprat, in a volume entitled, Three Poems upon the Death of his late Highnesse Oliver, Lord Protector of England, Scotland, and Ireland, printed by the same publisher. General probability, confirmed by one significant variation in text (see note on line 56), points to the separate edition as the original one; the poem would be likely to appear first by itself rather than together with work by other authors. In 1682 some enemies of Dryden reprinted the Three Poems volume, with a title-page reading, Three Poems upon the Death of the Late Usurper Oliver Cromwel.

The above heading is taken from the original Three Poems volume, the text of which was probably revised by Dryden from the earlier edition.]

I

AND now 't is time; for their officious haste, Who would before have borne him to the sky,
Like eager Romans, ere all rites were past,
Did let too soon the sacred eagle fly.

II

Tho' our best notes are treason to his
fame,
Join'd with the loud applause of public
voice;
Since Heav'n, what praise we offer to his
name,
Hath render'd too authentic by its choice.

III

Tho' in his praise no arts can liberal be,
Since they, whose Muses have the highest flown,
Add not to his immortal memory,
But do an act of friendship to their own.

IV

Yet 't is our duty, and our interest too,
Such monuments as we can build, to raise;
Lest all the world prevent what we should
do,
And claim a title in him by their praise.

V

How shall I then begin, or where conclude,
To draw a fame so truly circular?
For in a round what order can be shew'd,
Where all the parts so equal-perfect are?

VI

His grandeur he deriv'd from heav'n alone;
For he was great ere fortune made him
so:
And wars, like mists that rise against the
sun,
Made him but greater seem, not greater glow.

No borrow'd bays his temples did adorn,
But to our crown he did fresh jewels
bring;
Nor was his virtue poison'd, soon as born,
With the too early thoughts of being king.

VIII

Fortune (that easy mistress of the young,
But to her ancient servants coy and hard)
Him, at that age, her favorites rank'd
among,
When she her best-lov'd Pompey did discard.

IX

He, private, mark'd the faults of others' sway,
 And set as sea-marks for himself to shun:
 Not like rash monarchs, who their youth betray
 By acts their age too late would wish undone.

And yet dominion was not his design;
 We owe that blessing not to him, but Heaven,
 Which to fair acts unsought rewards did join;
 Rewards that less to him than us were given. 40

XI

Our former chiefs, like sticklers of the war,
 First sought t' inflame the parties, then to poise:
 The quarrel lov'd, but did the cause abhor;
 And did not strike to hurt, but make a noise.

XII

War, our consumption, was their gainful trade:
 We inward bled, whilst they prolong'd our pain;
 He fought to end our fighting, and assay'd
 To stanch the blood by breathing of the vein.

XIII

Swift and resistless thro' the land he pass'd,
 Like that bold Greek who did the East subdue, 50
 And made to battles such heroic haste,
 As if on wings of victory he flew.

XIV

He fought secure of fortune as of fame;
 Till, by new maps, the island might be shown,
 Of conquests, which he strew'd where'er he came,
 Thick as the galaxy with stars is sown.

XV

His palms, tho' under weights they did not stand, Still thriv'd; no winter could his laurels fade:

Heav'n in his portrait shew'd a workman's hand,
 And drew it perfect, yet without a shade. 59

XVI

Peace was the prize of all his toils and care,
 Which war had banish'd, and did now restore:
 Bologna's walls thus mounted in the air,
 To seat themselves more surely then before.

XVII

Her safety, rescued Ireland to him owes;
 And treacherous Scotland, to no int'rest true,
 Yet bless'd that fate which did his arms dispose
 Her land to civilize, as to subdue.

XVIII

Nor was he like those stars which only shine
 When to pale mariners they storms portend: 70
 He had his calmer influence, and his mien
 Did love and majesty together blend.

XIX

'T is true, his count'nance did imprint an awe;
 And naturally all souls to his did bow,
 As wands of divination downward draw,
 And point to beds where sov'reign gold doth grow.

XX

When past all offerings to Feretrian Jove,
 He Mars depos'd, and arms to gowns made yield;
 Successful counsels did him soon approve
 As fit for close intrigues, as open field. 80

XXI

To suppliant Holland he vouchsaf'd a peace,
 Our once bold rival in the British main,
 Now tamely glad her unjust claim to cease,
 And buy our friendship with her idol, gain.

XXII

Fame of th' asserted sea, thro' Europe blown,
 Made France and Spain ambitious of his love;

Each knew that side must conquer he would
own;
And for him fiercely, as for empire,
strove.

XXIII

No sooner was the Frenchman's cause embrac'd, Than the light Mounsire the grave Don outweigh'd: 90
His fortune turn'd the scale where it was cast;
Tho' Indian mines were in the other laid.

XXIV

When absent, yet we conquer'd in his right:
For tho' some meaner artist's skill were shown
In mingling colors, or in placing light;
Yet still the fair designment was his own.

XXV

For from all tempers he could service draw;
The worth of each with its alloy he knew,
And, as the confidant of Nature, saw How she complexions did divide and brew. 100

XXVI

Or he their single virtues did survey,
By intuition, in his own large breast,
Where all the rich ideas of them lay,
That were the rule and measure to the rest.

XXVII

When such heroic virtue Heav'n sets out,
The stars, like commons, sullenly obey;
Because it drains them, when it comes about,
And therefore is a tax they seldom pay.

XXVIII

From this high spring our foreign conquests
flow,
Which yet more glorious triumphs do portend; 110
Since their commencement to his arms they owe,
If springs as high as fountains may ascend.

XXIX

He made us freemen of the continent,
Whom Nature did like captives treat before;

To nobler preys the English lion sent,
And taught him first in Belgian walks to roar.

XXX

That old unquestion'd pirate of the land, Proud Rome, with dread, the fate of Dunkirk heard;
And trembling, wish'd behind more Alps to
stand,
Altho' an Alexander were her guard. 120

XXXI

By his command we boldly cross'd the line,
And bravely fought where southern stars
arise;
We trac'd the far-fetch'd gold unto the
mine,
And that which brib'd our fathers made our prize.

XXXII

Such was our prince; yet own'd a soul
above
The highest acts it could produce to
show:
Thus poor mechanic arts in public move,
Whilst the deep secrets beyond practice
go.

XXXIII

Nor died he when his ebbing fame went
less,
But when fresh laurels courted him to
live: 130
He seem'd but to prevent some new success,
As if above what triumphs earth could give.

XXXIV

His latest victories still thickest came,
As near the center motion does increase;
Till he, press'd down by his own weighty
name,
Did, like the vestal, under spoils de cease.

XXXV

But first the ocean, as a tribute, sent
That giant prince of all her watery herd;
And th' isle, when her protecting genius
went, 139
Upon his obsequies loud sighs conferr'd.

XXXVI

No civil broils have since his death arose,
But faction now by habit does obey;
And wars have that respect for his repose,
As winds for halcyons, when they breed at sea.

XXXVII

His ashes in a peaceful urn shall rest;
His name a great example stands, to
show
How strangely high endeavors may be blest,
Where piety and valor jointly go.

ASTRÆA REDUX

A POEM ON THE HAPPY RESTORATION AND RETURN OF HIS SACRED MAJESTY CHARLES THE SECOND

Jam redit et Virgo, redeunt Saturnia regna. — VIRGIL.

[Charles landed at Dover on May 25, 1660, and Dryden's poem must have been composed soon after that date. It was published in the same year by Herringman, who remained Dryden's publisher until 1679. In 1688 this poem was reprinted for Herringman, in a quarto volume, together with To his Sacred Majesty, To my Lord Chancellor, and Annus Mirabilis. There are no significant variant readings. The present edition follows the text of 1660.]

Now with a general peace the world was blest,
While ours, a world divided from the rest,
A dreadful quiet felt, and worser far
Then arms, a sullen interval of war:
Thus when black clouds draw down the lab'ring skies,
Ere yet abroad the winged thunder flies,
An horrid stillness first invades the ear,
And in that silence we the tempest fear.
Th' ambitious Swede, like restless billows
toss'd,
On this hand gaining what on that he
lost,
Tho' in his life he blood and ruin breath'd,
To his now guideless kingdom peace be-queath'd.
And Heaven, that seem'd regardless of our
fate,
For France and Spain did miracles create:
Such mortal quarrels to compose in peace,
As nature bred, and int'rest did encrease.
We sigh'd to hear the fair Iberian bride
Must grow a lily to the lily's side, While our cross stars denied us Charles his bed,
Whom our first flames and virgin love did wed.
For his long absence Church and State did groun;
Madness the pulpit, faction seiz'd the
throne:
Experienc'd age in deep despair was lost,
To see the rebel thrive, the loyal cross'd:

Youth, that with joys had unacquainted
been,
Envied gray hairs that once good days had
seen;
We thought our sires, not with their own content,
Had, ere we came to age, our portion spent.
Nor could our nobles hope their bold attempt,
Who ruin'd crowns, would coronets exempt:
For when by their designing leaders taught
To strike at pow'r which for themselves
they sought,
The vulgar, gull'd into rebellion, arm'd;
Their blood to action by the prize was warm'd.
The sacred purple then and scarlet gown,
Like sanguine dye, to elephants was shown.
Thus when the bold Typhoeus scal'd the
sky,
And forc'd great Jove from his own heaven
to fly,
(What king, what crown from treason's reach is free,
If Jove and heaven can violated be?) The lesser gods, that shar'd his prosp'rous
state,
All suffer'd in the exil'd Thund'r'er's fate.
The rabble now such freedom did enjoy,
As winds at sea, that use it to destroy:
Blind as the Cyclops, and as wild as he,
They own'd a lawless salvage liberty,
Like that our painted ancestors so priz'd

Ere empire's arts their breasts had civiliz'd.
How great were then our Charles his woes, who thus

Was forc'd to suffer for himself and us ! 50
He, toss'd by fate, and hurried up and
down,

Heir to his father's sorrows, with his
crown,

Could taste no sweets of youth's desired
age;

But found his life too true a pilgrimage.

Unconquer'd yet in that forlorn estate,

His manly courage overcame his fate.

His wounds he took, like Romans, on his
breast,

Which by his virtue were with laurels
dress'd.

As souls reach heav'n while yet in bodies
pent,

So did he live above his banishment. 60

That sun, which we beheld with cozen'd eyes
Within the water, mov'd along the skies.

How easy 't is, when Destiny proves kind,
With full-spread sails to run before the
wind !

But those that 'gainst stiff gales laveering
go,

Must be at once resolv'd and skilful too.

He would not, like soft Otho, hope prevent,

But stay'd and suffer'd Fortune to repent.

These virtues Galba in a stranger sought,

And Piso to adopted empire brought. 70

How shall I then my doubtful thoughts
express,

That must his suff'rings both regret and bless !

For when his early valor Heav'n had cross'd,

And all at Worc'ster but the honor lost,
Fore'd into exile from his rightful throne,

He made all countries where he came his
own;

And viewing monarchs' secret arts of sway,
A royal factor for their kingdoms lay.

Thus banish'd David spent abroad his time,

When to be God's anointed was his crime ; 80

And, when restor'd, made his proud neighbors rue

Those choice remarks he from his travels drew.

Nor is he only by afflictions shown

To conquer others' realms, but rule his own:

Recov'ring hardly what he lost before,

His right indears it much; his purchase
more.

Inur'd to suffer ere he came to reign,
No rash procedure will his actions stain.

To bus'ness ripen'd by digestive thought,
His future rule is into method brought; 90

As they who first proportion understand,
With easy practice reach a master's hand.

Well might the ancient poets then confer

On Night the honor'd name of Counselor,

Since struck with rays of prosp'rous fortune
blind,

We light alone in dark afflictions find.

In such adversities to scepters train'd,

The name of Great his famous grandsire
gain'd;

Who yet a king alone in name and right,

With hunger, cold, and angry Jove did
fight; 100

Shock'd by a Covenanting League's vast
pow'rs,

As holy and as catholic as ours:

Till Fortune's fruitless spite had made it
known,

Her blows not shook but riveted his throne.

Some lazy ages, lost in sleep and ease,

No action leave to busy chronicles:

Such, whose supine felicity but makes

In story chasms, in epochs mistakes:

O'er whom Time gently shakes his wings of
down, 109

Till with his silent sickle they are mown.

Such is not Charles his too too active age,

Which, govern'd by the wild distemper'd
rage

Of some black star infecting all the skies,

Made him at his own cost like Adam wise.

Tremble, ye nations, who, secure before,

Laugh'd at those arms that 'gainst ourselves we bore:

Rous'd by the lash of his own stubborn
tail,

Our lion now will foreign foes assail.

With alga who the sacred altar strows ?

To all the sea-gods Charles an off'ring owes: 120

A bull to thee, Portunus, shall be slain,

A lamb to you, the tempests of the main:

For those loud storms that did against him
roar

Have cast his shipwreck'd vessel on the shore.

Yet as wise artists mix their colors so,

That by degrees they from each other go:

Black steals unheeded from the neighb'ring
white,

Without offending the well-cozen'd sight:

So on us stole our blessed change, while we
 Th' effect did feel, but scarce the manner
 see. 130
 Frosts that constrain the ground, and birth deny
 To flow'rs that in its womb expecting lie,
 Do seldom their usurping pow'r withdraw,
 But raging floods pursue their hasty thaw.
 Our thaw was mild, the cold not chas'd
 away,
 But lost in kindly heat of lengthen'd day.
 Heav'n would no bargain for its blessings
 drive,
 But what we could not pay for, freely give.
 The Prince of Peace would, like himself, confer
 A gift unhop'd without the price of war: 140
 Yet, as he knew his blessing's worth, took
 care,
 That we should know it by repeated pray'r;
 Which storm'd the skies, and ravish'd
 Charles from thence,
 As heav'n itself is took by violence.
 Booth's forward valor only serv'd to show
 He durst that duty pay we all did owe:
 Th' attempt was fair; but Heav'n's prefixed
 hour
 Not come: so, like the watchful travelour
 That by the moon's mistaken light did rise,
 Lay down again, and clos'd his weary eyes.
 'Twas MONK whom Providence design'd to loose 151
 Those real bonds false freedom did impose.
 The blessed saints that watch'd this turning scene,
 Did from their stars with joyful wonder lean,
 To see small clues draw vastest weights
 along,
 Not in their bulk, but in their order strong.
 Thus pencils can by one slight touch restore Smiles to that changed face that wept before.
 With ease such fond chimæras we pursue
 As fancy frames for fancy to subdue; 160
 But when ourselves to action we betake,
 It shuns the mint like gold that chymists
 make.
 How hard was then his task, at once to be
 What in the body natural we see.
 Man's architect distinctly did ordain
 The charge of muscles, nerves, and of the brain,
 Thro' viewless conduits spirits to dispense,

The springs of motion from the seat of sense.
 'T was not the hasty product of a day,
 But the well-ripen'd fruit of wise delay. 170
 He, like a patient angler, ere he strook,
 Would let them play a while upon the hook.
 Our healthful food the stomach labors thus,
 At first embracing what it straight doth crush.
 Wise leeches will not vain receipts obtrude,
 While growing pains pronounce the humors
 crude;
 Deaf to complaints, they wait upon the ill,
 Till some safe crisis authorize their skill.
 Nor could his acts too close a vizard wear,
 To scape their eyes whom guilt had taught to fear, 180
 And guard with caution that polluted nest, Whence Legion twice before was dispos-
 sess'd:
 Once sacred house; which when they enter'd
 in,
 They thought the place could sanctify a sin;
 Like those that vainly hop'd kind Heav'n would wink,
 While to excess on martyrs' tombs they drink.
 And as devouter Turks first warn their souls
 To part, before they taste forbidden bowls;
 So these, when their black crimes they went about,
 First timely charm'd their useless conscience
 out. 190
 Religion's name against itself was made;
 The shadow serv'd the substance to invade:
 Like zealous missions, they did care pretend
 Of souls in shew, but made the gold their end.
 Th' incensed pow'rs beheld with scorn from
 high
 An heaven so far distant from the sky,
 Which durst, with horses' hoofs that beat
 the ground,
 And martial brass, bely the thunder's sound.
 'T was hence at length just vengeance thought it fit
 To speed their ruin by their impious wit. 200
 Thus Sforza, curst with a too fertile brain,
 Lost by his wiles the pow'r his wit did gain.
 Henceforth their fogue must spend at lesser rate
 Then in its flames to wrap a nation's fate.
 Suffer'd to live, they are like Helots set,
 A virtuous shame within us to beget.
 For by example most we sinn'd before,
 And glass-like clearness mix'd with frailty
 bore.

But since reform'd by what we did amiss,
We by our sufferings learn to prize our
bliss: 210

Like early lovers, whose unpractic'd hearts
Were long the may-game of malicious arts,
When once they find their jealousies were
vain,

With double heat renew their fires again.
'T was this produc'd the joy that hurried o'er Such swarms of English to the neighb'ring
shore,

To fetch that prize, by which Batavia made
So rich amends for our impoverish'd trade.
O had you seen from Scheveline's barren
shore,
(Crowded with troops, and barren now no
more,) 220

Afflicted Holland to his farewell bring True sorrow, Holland to regret a king,
While waiting him his royal fleet did ride,
And willing winds to their low'r'd sails denied.

The wavering streamers, flags, and standart
out,

The merry seamen's rude but cheerful
shout;

And last, the cannons' voice that shook }
the skies,

And, as it fares in sudden ecstasies,
At once bereft us both of ears and eyes. }

The Naseby, now no longer England's shame, 230

But better to be lost in Charles his name,
(Like some unequal bride in nobler sheets)
Receives her lord; the joyful London meets

The princely York, himself alone a freight;
The Swift-sure groans beneath great Gloc'- ster's weight.

Secure as when the halcyon breeds, with
these

He that was born to drown might cross the seas.

Heav'n could not own a Providence, and take

The wealth three nations ventur'd at a stake.

The same indulgence Charles his voyage
bless'd, 240

Which in his right had miracles confess'd.
The winds that never moderation knew,
Afraid to blow too much, too faintly blew;
Or out of breath with joy, could not enlarge Their straighten'd lungs, or conscious of their charge.

The British Amphitrite, smooth and clear,
In richer azure never did appear;
Proud her returning prince to entertain
With the submitted fasces of the main.

And welcome now, great monarch, to your
own; 250

Behold th' approaching cliffs of Albion:
It is no longer motion cheats your view,
As you meet it, the land approacheth you.
The land returns, and in the white it wears
The marks of penitence and sorrow bears.
But you, whose goodness your descent doth
shew,

Your heav'nly parentage and earthly too;
By that same mildness which your father's
crown

Before did ravish, shall secure your own.
Not tied to rules of policy, you find 260
Revenge less sweet than a forgiving mind.
Thus, when th' Almighty would to Moses
give

A sight of all he could behold and live;
A voice before his entry did proclaim
Long-suff'ring goodness, mercy, in his name.
Your pow'r to justice doth submit your
cause,

Your goodness only is above the laws;
Whose rigid letter, while pronounc'd by
you,

Is softer made. So winds that tempests
brew,

When thro' Arabian groves they take their flight, 270

Made wanton with rich odors, lose their spite.

And as those lees that trouble it, refine
The agitated soul of generous wine:
So tears of joy, for your returning spilt,
Work out and expiate our former guilt.
Methinks I see those crowds on Dover's
strand,

Who, in their haste to welcome you to
land,

Chok'd up the beach with their still growing store,

And made a wilder torrent on the shore;
While, spur'd with eager thoughts of past
delight, 280

Those who had seen you court a second
sight;

Preventing still your steps, and making
haste

To meet you often, whereso'er you pass'd.
How shall I speak of that triumphant day

When you renew'd th' expiring pomp of May!

(A month that owns an int'rest in your
name:

You and the flow'rs are its peculiar claim.)
That star that at your birth shone out so bright,

It stain'd the duller sun's meridian light,
Did once again its potent fires renew, ²⁹⁰
Guiding our eyes to find and worship you.

And now Time's whiter series is begun,
Which in soft centuries shall smoothly run:
Those clouds that overcast your morn shall
fly,

Dispell'd to farthest corners of the sky.
Our nation, with united int'rest blest,
Not now content to poise, shall sway the
rest.

Abroad your empire shall no limits know,
But, like the sea, in boundless circles flow.
Your much-lov'd fleet shall with a wide command ³⁰⁰

Besiege the petty monarchs of the land;
And as old Time his offspring swallow'd
down,

Our ocean in its depths all seas shall drown.

Their wealthy trade from pirates' rapine
free,

Our merchants shall no more advent'ers be;
Nor in the farthest East those dangers fear
Which humble Holland must dissemble
here.

Spain to your gift alone her Indies owes,
For what the pow'ful takes not he bestows: ³⁰⁹

And France, that did an exile's presence fear,
May justly apprehend you still too near.

At home the hateful names of parties cease,
And factious souls are wearied into peace.
The discontented now are only they

Whose crimes before did your just cause betray:

Of those your edicts some reclaim from sins,
But most your life and blest example wins.
O happy prince, whom Heav'n hath taught
the way,

By paying vows, to have more vows to pay!
O happy age! O times like those alone ³²⁰

By fate reserv'd for great Augustus' throne!
When the joint growth of arms and arts
foreshew

The world a monarch, and that monarch you.

TO MY HONOR'D FRIEND SIR ROBERT HOWARD, ON HIS EXCELLENT POEMS

[This complimentary poem is inserted in a volume entitled, *Poems, viz. 1. A Panegyrick to the King 2. Songs and Sonnets. 3. The Blind Lady, a Comedy. 4. The Fourth Book of Virgil. 5. Satius his Achillis, with An-notations. 6. A Panegyrick to General Monk.
By the Honorable S^r Robert Howard. London, Printed for Henry Herringman, 1660. It is signed John Driden. It forms the first proof of Dryden's intimacy with the family of Thomas, Earl of Berkshire, father of Sir
Robert Howard and of the Lady Elizabeth Howard, the poet's future wife.]*

As there is music uninform'd by art
In those wild notes, which, with a merry
heart,

The birds in unfrequented shades express,
Who, better taught at home, yet please us
less:

So in your verse a native sweetness dwells,
Which shames composure, and its art excels.
Singing no more can your soft numbers grace

Then paint adds charms unto a beauteous
face.

Yet as, when mighty rivers gently creep,
Their even calmness does suppose them deep; ¹⁰

Such is your Muse: no metaphor swell'd high
With dangerous boldness lifts her to the sky:
Those mounting fancies, when they fall
again,

Shew sand and dirt at bottom do remain.
So firm a strength, and yet withal so sweet,
Did never but in Samson's riddle meet.

'T is strange each line so great a weight should bear,

And yet no sign of toil, no sweat appear.
Either your art hides art, as Stoics feign
Then least to feel, when most they suffer pain; ²⁰

And we, dull souls, admire, but cannot see
What hidden springs within the engine be;
Or 't is some happiness that still pursues
Each act and motion of your graceful Muse.
Or is it fortune's work, that in your head

The curious net * that is for fancies spread, <sup>• Rete mirabile.</sup>

Lets thro' its meshes every meaner thought,

While rich ideas there are only caught?
 Sure that's not all: this is a piece too fair
 To be the child of chance, and not of care.
 No atoms casually together hurl'd ³¹
 Could e'er produce so beautiful a world.
 Nor dare I such a doctrine here admit,
 As would destroy the providence of wit.
 'Tis your strong genius then which does not feel
 Those weights would make a weaker spirit reel.
 To carry weight, and run so lightly too,
 Is what alone your Pegasus can do.
 Great Hercules himself could ne'er do
 more,
 Than not to feel those heav'ns and gods he bore. ⁴⁰
 Your easier odes, which for delight were penn'd,
 Yet our instruction make their second end:
 We're both enrich'd and pleas'd, like them that woo
 At once a beauty and a fortune too.
 Of moral knowledge Poesy was queen,
 And still she might, had wanton wits not
 been;
 Who, like ill guardians, liv'd themselves at large,
 And, not content with that, debauch'd their charge.
 Like some brave captain, your successful pen
 Restores the exil'd to her crown again; ⁵⁰
 And gives us hope, that having seen the days
 When nothing flourish'd but fanatic bays,
 All will at length in this opinion rest:
 "A sober prince's government is best."
 This is not all; your art the way has
 found
 To make improvement of the richest
 ground,
 That soil which those immortal laurels
 bore,
 That once the sacred Maro's temples wore.
 Elisa's griefs are so express'd by you,
 They are too eloquent to have been true. ⁶⁰
 Had she so spoke, Æneas had obey'd What Dido, rather than what Jove, had said.
 If funeral rites can give a ghost repose,
 Your muse so justly has discharged those,
 Elisa's shade may now its wand'ring cease,
 And claim a title to the fields of peace.
 But if Æneas be oblig'd, no less
 Your kindness great Achilles doth confess;

Who, dress'd by Statius in too bold a look,
 Did ill become those virgin's robes he took. ⁷⁰
 To understand how much we owe to you,
 We must your numbers with your author's
 view;
 Then we shall see his work was lamely rough,
 Each figure stiff, as if design'd in buff;
 His colors laid so thick on every place,
 As only shew'd the paint, but hid the face.
 But as in perspective we beauties see,
 Which in the glass, not in the picture, be;
 So here our sight obligingly mistakes
 That wealth which his your bounty only makes. ⁸⁰
 Thus vulgar dishes are by cooks disguis'd,
 More for their dressing than their substance priz'd.
 Your curious notes * so search ^{* Annotations} into that age, ^{on Statius.}
 When all was fable but the sacred page,
 That, since in that dark night we needs must stray,
 We are at least misled in pleasant way.
 But what we most admire, your verse no less
 The prophet than the poet doth confess.
 Ere our weak eyes discern'd the doubtful streak
 Of light, you saw great Charles his morning break. ⁹⁰
 So skilful seamen ken the land from far,
 Which shews like mists to the dull passenger.
 To Charles your Muse first pays her duteous
 love,
 As still the ancients did begin from Jove.
 With Monk you end, whose name preserv'd shall be,
 As Rome recorded Rufus' ^{* Hic situs est} memory, * ^{Rufus, qui} Who thought it greater honor ^{pulso Vindice} to obey ^{quondam,} His country's interest than the ^{Impervium as-} world to sway. ^{seruit non sibi}
 But to write worthy things of worthy men,
 Is the peculiar talent of your pen: ¹⁰⁰
 Yet let me take your mantle up, and I Will venture in your right to prophesy.
 "This work, by merit first of fame secure,
 Is likewise happy in its geniture:
 For, since 'tis born when Charles ascends
 the throne,
 It shares at once his fortune and its own."

TO HIS SACRED MAJESTY

A PANEGRIC ON HIS CORONATION

[Charles II was crowned on St. George's Day, April 23, 1661. This poem was published in 1661 and reprinted in 1688: see note on Astræa Reduz. p. 7, above. There are no significant variant readings. The present edition follows the text of 1661.]

IN that wild deluge where the world was
drown'd,
When life and sin one common tomb had
found,
The first small prospect of a rising hill
With various notes of joy the ark did fill:
Yet when that flood in its own depths was
drown'd,
It left behind it false and slipp'ry ground;
And the more solemn pomp was still deferr'd
Till new-born nature in fresh looks appear'd.
Thus, royal sir, to see you landed here,
Was cause enough of triumph for a year; 10
Nor would your care those glorious joys repeat,
Till they at once might be secure and great;
Till your kind beams by their continued stay Had warm'd the ground, and call'd the damps away.
Such vapors, while your pow'rful influence
dries,
Then soonest vanish when they highest rise.
Had greater haste these sacred rights pre-
par'd,
Some guilty months had in your triumphs
shar'd;
But this untainted year is all your own;
Your glories may without our crimes be
shown. 20
We had not yet exhausted all our store,
When you refresh'd our joys by adding
more:
As Heav'n, of old, dispens'd celestial dew,
You give us manna, and still give us new.
Now our sad ruins are remov'd from
sight,
The season too comes fraught with new
delight;
Time seems not now beneath his years to stoop,
Nor do his wings with sickly feathers droop:
Soft western winds waft o'er the gaudy
spring,
And open'd scenes of flow'rs and blossoms
bring, 30

To grace this happy day, while you appear
Not king of us alone, but of the year.
All eyes you draw, and with the eyes the
heart,
Of your own pomp yourself the greatest
part:
Loud shouts the nation's happiness proclaim,
And heav'n this day is feasted with your
name.
Your cavalcade the fair spectators view
From their high standings, yet look up to
you.
From your brave train each singles out a
prey,
And longs to date a conquest from your
day. 40
Now charg'd with blessings while you seek repose,
Officious slumbers haste your eyes to close;
And glorious dreams stand ready to restore
The pleasing shapes of all you saw before.
Next, to the sacred temple you are led,
Where waits a crown for your more sacred
head:
How justly from the Church that crown is
due,
Preserv'd from ruin, and restor'd by you!
The grateful choir their harmony employ,
Not to make greater, but more solemn
joy. 50
Wrapp'd soft and warm your name is sent on high,
As flames do on the wings of incense fly:
Music herself is lost, in vain she brings Her choicest notes to praise the best of kings;
Her melting strains in you a tomb have
found,
And lie like bees in their own sweetness
drown'd.
He that brought peace, and discord could atone,
His name is music of itself alone.
Now while the sacred oil anoints your head,
And fragrant scents, begun from you, are spread 60

Thro' the large dome, the people's joyful
 sound,
 Sent back, is still preserv'd in hallow'd
 ground;
 Which in one blessing mix'd descends on
 you,
 As heighten'd spirits fall in richer dew.
 Not that our wishes do increase your store:
 Full of yourself, you can admit no more;
 We add not to your glory, but employ
 Our time, like angels, in expressing joy.
 Nor is it duty, or our hopes alone,
 Create that joy, but full fruition: ⁷⁰
 We know those blessings which we must possess,
 And judge of future by past happiness.
 No promise can oblige a prince so much Still to be good, as long to have been such.
 A noble emulation heats your breast,
 And your own fame now robs you of your
 rest:
 Good actions still must be maintain'd with
 good,
 As bodies nourish'd with resembling food.
 You have already quench'd sedition's
 brand;
 And zeal, (which burnt it,) only warms
 the land. ⁸⁰
 The jealous sects, that dare not trust their
 cause
 So far from their own will as to the laws,
 You for their umpire and their synod take,
 And their appeal alone to Cæsar make.
 Kind Heav'n so rare a temper did provide,
 That guilt repenting might in it confide.
 Among our crimes oblivion may be set;
 But 't is our king's perfection to forget.
 Virtues unknown to these rough northern climes
 From milder heav'ns you bring, without their crimes; ⁹⁰
 Your calmness does no after-storms provide,
 Nor seeming patience mortal anger hide.
 When empire first from families did spring,
 Then every father govern'd as a king;
 But you, that are a sovereign prince, allay
 Imperial pow'r with your paternal sway.
 From those great cares when ease your soul unbends,
 Your pleasures are design'd to noble ends:
 Born to command the Mistress of the Seas,
 Your thoughts themselves in that blue empire please. ¹⁰⁰
 Hither in summer ev'nings you repair

To take the fraischeur of the purer air:
 Undaunted here you ride when winter
 raves,
 With Cæsar's heart that rose above the waves.
 More I could sing, but fear my numbers
 stays;
 No loyal subject dares that courage praise.
 In stately frigates most delight you find,
 Where well-drawn battles fire your martial
 mind.
 What to your cares we owe is learnt from
 hence,
 When ev'n your pleasures serve for our defence. ¹¹⁰
 Beyond your court flows in th' admitted tide,
 Where in new depths the wond'ring fishes
 glide:
 Here in a royal bed the waters sleep;
 When tir'd at sea, within this bay they creep.
 Here the mistrustful fowl no harm suspects,
 So safe are all things which our king protects.
 From your lov'd Thames a blessing yet is
 due,
 Second alone to that it brought in you;
 A queen, from whose chaste womb, or-dain'd by fate, ¹¹⁵
 The souls of kings unborn for bodies wait.
 It was your love before made discord cease:
 Your love is destin'd to your country's peace.
 Both Indies, (rivals in your bed,) provide
 With gold or jewels to adorn your bride.
 This to a mighty king presents rich ore,
 While that with incense does a god implore.
 Two kingdoms wait your doom, and, as you choose,
 This must receive a crown, or that must lose.
 Thus from your Royal Oak, like Jove's of
 old,
 Are answers sought, and destinies foretold: ¹²⁰
 Propitious oracles are begg'd with vows,
 And crowns that grow upon the sacred boughs.
 Your subjects, while you weigh the nations'
 fate,
 Suspend to both their doubtful love or hate:
 Choose only, sir, that so they may possess
 With their own peace their children's happiness.

TO MY LORD CHANCELLOR

PRESENTED ON NEW YEAR'S DAY

[The person addressed in this poem is Edward Hyde, Earl of Clarendon, the greatest statesman of the earlier years of Charles the Second's reign. The poem was published in 1662 and reprinted in 1688: see note on Astræa Redux, p. 7, above. There are only small variations between the two copies; the 1662 text is the basis of the present edition.]

MY LORD,
 WHILE flattering crowds officiously appear,
 To give themselves, not you, an happy year;
 And by the greatness of their presents prove How much they hope, but not how well they love;
 The Muses, who your early courtship boast,
 Tho' now your flames are with their beauty
 lost,
 Yet watch their time, that, if you have forgot
 They were your mistresses, the world may not:
 Decay'd by time and wars, they only prove
 Their former beauty by your former love; 10
 And now present as ancient ladies do,
 That courted long, at length are fore'd to woo.
 For still they look on you with such kind
 eyes,
 As those that see the Church's sovereign rise;
 From their own order chose, in whose high
 state
 They think themselves the second choice of
 fate.
 When our great monarch into exile went,
 Wit and religion suffer'd banishment.
 Thus once, when Troy was wrapp'd in fire
 and smoke,
 The helpless gods their burning shrines forsook;
 They with the vanquish'd prince and party
 go,
 And leave their temples empty to the foe.
 At length the Muses stand, restor'd again
 To that great charge which Nature did or-
 dain;
 And their lov'd Druids seem reviv'd by fate,
 While you dispense the laws and guide the
 State.
 The nation's soul (our monarch) does dispense,
 Thro' you to us his vital influence;
 You are the channel where those spirits flow,
 And work them higher, as to us they go. 20

In open prospect nothing bounds our eye,
 Until the earth seems join'd unto the sky:
 So in this hemisphere our utmost view
 Is only bounded by our king and you;
 Our sight is limited where you are join'd,
 And beyond that no farther heav'n can find.
 So well your virtues do with his agree,
 That, tho' your orbs of different greatness
 be,
 Yet both are for each other's use dispos'd,
 His to inclose, and yours to be inclos'd. 40
 Nor could another in your room have been,
 Except an emptiness had come between.
 Well may he then to you his cares impart,
 And share his burden where he shares his
 heart.
 In you his sleep still wakes; his pleasures
 find
 Their share of bus'ness in your lab'ring
 mind:
 So, when the weary sun his place resigns,
 He leaves his light and by reflection shines.
 Justice, that sits and frowns where public
 laws
 Exclude soft Mercy from a private cause, 50
 In your tribunal most herself does please;
 There only smiles because she lives at ease;
 And, like young David, finds her strength
 the more,
 When disincumber'd from those arms she wore.
 Heav'n would your royal master should exceed
 Most in that virtue which we most did
 need;
 And his mild father (who too late did find All mercy vain but what with pow'r was join'd)
 His fatal goodness left to fitter times,
 Not to increase, but to absolve our crimes: 60
 But when the heir of this vast treasure
 knew
 How large a legacy was left to you, (Too great for any subject to retain,)

He wisely tied it to the crown again:
 Yet passing thro' your hands it gathers
 more,
 As streams, thro' mines, bear tincture of their ore.
 While emp'ric politicians use deceit,
 Hide what they give, and cure but by a cheat;
 You boldly show that skill which they pretend,
 And work by means as noble as your end; 70
 Which should you veil, we might unwind
 the clue,
 As men do nature, till we came to you.
 And as the Indies were not found before Those rich perfumes, which from the happy
 shore
 The winds upon their balmy wings con-vey'd,
 Whose guilty sweetness first their world
 betray'd;
 So by your counsels we are brought to view
 A rich and undiscover'd world in you.
 By you our monarch does that fame assure
 Which kings must have, or cannot live secure: 80
 For prosperous princes gain their subjects'
 heart,
 Who love that praise in which themselves have part.
 By you he fits those subjects to obey,
 As heaven's eternal monarch does convey
 His pow'r unseen, and man to his designs
 By his bright ministers the stars inclines.
 Our setting sun from his declining seat Shot beams of kindness on you, not of heat;
 And, when his love was bounded in a few,
 That were unhappy that they might be
 true, 90
 Made you the fav'r ite of his last sad times,
 That is, a suff'rer in his subjects' crimes:
 Thus those first favors you receiv'd were sent,
 Like Heav'n's rewards, in earthly punishment.
 Yet Fortune, conscious of your destiny,
 Ev'n then took care to lay you softly by;
 And wrapp'd your fate among her precious things,
 Kept fresh to be unfolded with your king's.
 Shown all at once, you dazzled so our eyes,
 As newborn Pallas did the gods surprise;
 When, springing forth from Jove's new-closing wound, 101

She struck the warlike spear into the
 ground;
 Which sprouting leaves did suddenly inclose,
 And peaceful olives shaded as they rose.
 How strangely active are the arts of
 peace,
 Whose restless motions less than war's do cease!
 Peace is not freed from labor, but from
 noise;
 And war more force, but not more pains employs:
 Such is the mighty swiftuess of your mind,
 That, like the earth's, it leaves our sense
 behind, 110
 While you so smoothly turn and roll our
 sphere,
 That rapid motion does but rest appear.
 For as in nature's swiftuess, with the through
 Of flying orbs while ours is borne along,
 All seems at rest to the deluded eye,
 (Mov'd by the soul of the same harmony,)
 So carried on by your unwearied care,
 We rest in peace, and yet in motion share.
 Let Envy then those crimes within you see
 From which the happy never must be free;
 (Envy, that does with Misery reside, 121
 The joy and the revenge of ruin'd Pride.)
 Think it not hard, if at so cheap a rate
 You can secure the constancy of Fate,
 Whose kindness sent what does their malice seem,
 By lesser ills the greater to redeem.
 Nor can we this weak show'r a tempest
 call,
 But drops of heat, that in the sunshine fall.
 You have already wearied Fortune so, 129
 She cannot farther be your friend or foe;
 But sits all breathless, and admires to feel
 A fate so weighty that it stops her wheel.
 In all things else above our humble fate,
 Your equal mind yet swells not into state;
 But like some mountain in those happy
 isles,
 Where in perpetual spring young nature
 smiles,
 Your greatness shows: no horror to af-
 fright,
 But trees for shade, and flow'rs to court the
 sight:
 Sometimes the hill submits itself a while In small descents, which do its height beguile; 140

And sometimes mounts, but so as billows
 play,
 Whose rise not hinders but makes short our
 way.
 Your brow, which does no fear of thunder
 know,
 Sees rolling tempests vainly beat below;
 And, (like Olympus' top,) th' impression wears
 Of love and friendship writ in former years.
 Yet, unimpair'd with labors or with time,

Your age but seems to a new youth to climb.
 Thus heav'nly bodies do our time beget,
 And measure change, but share no part of it.

And still it shall without a weight increase,
 Like this new-year, whose motions never
 cease:

For since the glorious course you have begun
 Is led by CHARLES, as that is by the sun,
 It must both weightless and immortal prove,
 Because the center of it is above.

POEMS WRITTEN BETWEEN 1662 AND 1665

[Dryden's career as a dramatist began with the production of The Wild Gallant early in 1663. From that time until the publication of Absalom and Achitophel in November, 1681, his work, with the relatively unimportant exceptions of Annus Mirabilis (1666), the translations from Ovid's Epistles (1680), and possibly a few songs, was exclusively concerned with the theater; and hence, since the text of the dramas is excluded from this volume, can be here represented only in the scantiest manner.]

TO MY HONOR'D FRIEND, DR.
CHARLETON

ON HIS LEARNED AND USEFUL WORKS; AND MORE PARTICULARLY THIS OF STONEHENGE, BY HIM RESTOR'D TO THE TRUE FOUNDERS

[This epistle is prefixed to Chorea Gigantum; or, The Most Famous Antiquity of Great Britain, vulgarly called Stonehenge, standing on Salisbury Plain, restored to the Danes; by Walter Charleton, Dr. in Physic, and Physician in Ordinary to His Majesty. London, 1663. Dryden's poem follows another epistle by Sir Robert Howard. Charleton, who was a man of mark both as physician and author, here presents an argument against the architect Inigo Jones. His summaries of his adversary's theory, and of his own, are as follows:

"Mr. Jones his opinion, then, of the founders, antiquity, and design of Stonehenge, is: that it was a work of the Romans, built by them when they flourished here in greatest peace and prosperity . . . not as a sepulchral monument, but as a temple, and particularly consecrated to the imaginary deity of Caelus, or Caelum, from whence their superstitious belief derived the original of all things." (P. 17.)

"I am apt to believe that having then overrun the whole kingdom, except only Somersetshire, and encamping their main army in Wiltshire, for near upon two years together, and setting up their rest in a confidence to perpetuate their newly acquired power; they [the Danes] employed themselves, during that time of leisure and jollity, in erecting Stonehenge, as a place wherein to elect and inaugurate their supreme commander King of England." (P. 64.)

The censor's imprimatur in Charleton's volume is dated 11 Sept. 1662, and the book was probably published before the close of that year, though dated in the following. Of this edition two issues are known, one of them lacking the above imprimatur. There are a few variant readings in Dryden's epistle as printed in the two issues; the text below is that of the issue without the imprimatur, which is probably the later. A reprint in Poetical Miscellanies, the Fifth Part, 1704, introduces further variants, which may possibly be due to Dryden himself. The poem is principally important as showing Dryden's early enthusiasm for natural science.]

THE longest tyranny that ever sway'd
 Was that wherein our ancestors betray'd
 Their free-born reason to the Stagirite,
 And made his torch their universal light.
 So truth, while only one supplied the state,
 Grew scarce, and dear, and yet sophisticate.
 Until 't was bought, like emp'ric wares, or
 charms,

Hard words seal'd up with Aristotle's arms.
 Columbus was the first that shook his
 throne,

And found a temp'rate in a torrid zone: 10
 The fev'rish air fann'd by a cooling breeze,

The fruitful vales set round with shady trees;
And guiltless men, who danc'd away their
time,
Fresh as their groves, and happy as their clime.
Had we still paid that homage to a name,
Which only God and nature justly claim,
The western seas had been our utmost
bound,
Where poets still might dream the sun was
drown'd:
And all the stars that shine in southern skies
Had been admir'd by none but salvage eyes.
Among th' asserters of free reason's
claim,
Th' English are not the least in worth or
fame.
The world to Bacon does not only owe
Its present knowledge, but its future too.
Gilbert shall live, till loadstones cease to draw,
Or British fleets the boundless ocean awe;
And noble Boyle, not less in nature seen,
Than his great brother read in states and
men.
The circling streams, once thought but pools, of blood
(Whether life's fuel, or the body's food) 30
From dark oblivion Harvey's name shall save;
While Ent keeps all the honor that he gave.
Nor are you, learned friend, the least re-nown'd;
Whose fame, not circumscrib'd with English ground,
Flies like the nimble journeys of the light;
And is, like that, unspent too in its flight.
Whatever truths have been, by art or chance,
Redeem'd from error, or from ignorance,
Thin in their authors, like rich veins of ore,
Your works unite, and still discover more. 40
Such is the healing virtue of your pen,
To perfect cures on books, as well as men.
Nor is this work the least: you well may
give
To men new vigor, who make stones to live.
Thro' you, the Danes, their short dominion
lost,
A longer conquest than the Saxons boast.
Stonehenge, once thought a temple, you have found
A throne, where kings, our earthly gods,
were crown'd;

Where by their wond'ring subjects they were seen,
Joy'd with their stature, and their princely mien.
Our sovereign here above the rest might⁵⁰
stand,
And here be chose again to rule the land.
These ruins shelter'd once his sacred
head,
Then when from Wor'ster's fatal field he
fled;
Watch'd by the genius of this royal place,
And mighty visions of the Danish race.
His refuge then was for a temple shown;
But, he restor'd, 't is now become a throne.

PROLOGUE AND EPILOGUE TO THE WILD GALLANT AS IT WAS FIRST ACTED

[This, Dryden's first play, was produced on February 5, 1663, as is evident from the Prologue, line 15, and from an entry in Evelyn's Diary of that date. It was unsuccessful: see note before the poem To the Lady Castlemaine, p. 20, below. It was later revived, with some changes by the author, probably in 1667, since it was entered on the Stationers' Register for publication on August 7 of that year (Malone, I. 1, 69). The first edition, dated 1669, contains both the original prologue and epilogue and those written for the revival. See p. 52, below.]

PROLOGUE

Is it not strange to hear a poet say,
He comes to ask you how you like the
play?
You have not seen it yet! alas! 't is true;
But now your love and hatred judge, not you;
And cruel factions, brib'd by interest, come,
Not to weigh merit, but to give their doom.
Our poet therefore, jealous of th' event,
And (tho' much boldness takes) not confident,
Has sent me whither you, fair ladies, too,
Sometimes upon as small occasions go,
And from this scheme, drawn for the hour
and day,
Bid me inquire the fortune of his play.
[The curtain drawn discovers two ASTROLOGERS; the PROLOGUE is presented to them.
First Astrol. [Reads.] A figure of the heavenly bodies in their several apartments,

Feb. the 5th, half an hour after three after noon, from whence you are to judge the success of a new play call'd The Wild Gallant. 18

2 Astrol. Who must judge of it, we, or these gentlemen? — We'll not meddle with it, so tell your poet. Here are in this house the ablest mathematicians in Europe for his purpose.

They will resolve the question ere they part.

1 Astrol. Yet let us judge it by the rules of art.

First Jupiter, the ascendant's lord disgrac'd,

In the twelfth house, and near grim Saturn plac'd,

Denote short life unto the play.

2 Astrol. Jove yet, In his apartment Sagittary set,

Under his own roof, cannot take much wrong. 30

1 Astrol. Why then the life's not very short, nor long.

2 Astrol. The luck not very good, nor very ill.

Prolo. That is to say, 't is as 't is taken still.

1 Astrol. But, brother, Ptolemy the learned says,

'Tis the fifth house from whence we judge of plays.

Venus, the lady of that house, I find Is peregrine: your play is ill design'd;

It should have been but one continued song, Or at the least a dance of three hours long.

2 Astrol. But yet the greatest mischief does remain, 40

The twelfth apartment bears the lord of Spain;

Whence I conclude, it is your author's lot, To be indanger'd by a Spanish plot.

Prolo. Our poet yet protection hopes from you,

But bribes you not with anything that's new.

Nature is old, which poets imitate, And for wit, those that boast their own estate,

Forget Fletcher and Ben before them went,

Their elder brothers, and that vastly spent: So much, 't will hardly be repair'd again, 50

Not tho' supplied with all the wealth of Spain.

This play is English, and the growth your own;

As such, it yields to English plays alone.

He could have wish'd it better for your sakes,

But that in plays he finds you love mistakes:

Besides, he thought it was in vain to mend

What you are bound in honor to defend, That English wit, (howe'er despis'd by some,)

Like English valor, still may overcome.

EPILOGUE

The Wild Gallant has quite play'd out his game;

He's married now, and that will make him tame;

Or, if you think marriage will not reclaim him,

The critics swear they'll damn him, but they'll tame him.

Yet, tho' our poet's threaten'd most by these,

They are the only people he can please, For he, to humor them, has shown to-day

That which they only like, a wretched play.

But, tho' his play be ill, here have been shown

The greatest wits and beauties of the town; 10

And his occasion having brought you here, You are too grateful to become severe.

There is not any person here so mean But he may freely judge each act and

scene;

But if you bid him choose his judges then, He boldly names true English gentlemen;

For he ne'er thought a handsome garb or dress

So great a crime to make their judgment less;

And with these gallants he these ladies joins,

To judge that language their converse refines. 20

But if their censures should condemn his play,

Far from disputing, he does only pray He may Leander's destiny obtain:

Now spare him, drown him when he comes again.

TO THE LADY CASTLEMAINE, UPON HER INCOURAGING HIS FIRST PLAY

[In his preface to The Wild Gallant Dryden says that it had "but indifferent success in the action. . . . Yet it was receiv'd at court; and was more than once the divertisement of his Majesty, by his own command." This probably does not refer to the revival of 1667; but, in part at least, to a court performance on February 23, 1663, which Pepys attended, and which may well have been procured for Dryden by the influence of the Countess of Castlemaine, then at the height of her power as the favorite mistress of Charles II. This woman was born Barbara Villiers, daughter of William Villiers, second Viscount Grandison; in 1670 she was created Duchess of Cleveland.

This poem was first printed in Examen Poeticum, 1693.]

As seamen, shipwreck'd on some happy
shore,

Discover wealth in lands unknown before;
And, what their art had labor'd long in
vain,

By their misfortunes happily obtain:
So my much-envied Muse, by storms long
toss'd,

Is thrown upon your hospitable coast,
And finds more favor by her ill success,
Than she could hope for by her happiness.
Once Cato's virtue did the gods oppose:
While they the victor, he the vanquish'd chose: ¹⁰

But you have done what Cato could not do,
To choose the vanquish'd, and restore him
too.

Let others still triumph, and gain their
cause

By their deserts, or by the world's applause,
Let merit crowns, and justice laurels give,
But let me happy by your pity live.
True poets empty fame and praise despise, Fame is the trumpet, but your smile the
prize.

You sit above, and see vain men below
Contend for what you only can bestow; ²⁰
But those great actions others do by chance
Are, like your beauty, your inheritance:
So great a soul, such sweetness join'd in
one,

Could only spring from noble Grandison.
You, like the stars, not by reflection bright,
Are born to your own heav'n, and your own
light;

Like them are good, but from a nobler
cause,

From your own knowledge, not from nature's laws.

Your pow'r you never use but for defense,
To guard your own, or others' innocence: ³⁰
Your foes are such, as they, not you, have
made,

And virtue may repel, tho' not invade.

Such courage did the ancient heroes show,
Who, when they might prevent, would wait
the blow;

With such assurance as they meant to say:
"We will o'ercome, but scorn the safest
way."

What further fear of danger can there be?
Beauty, which captives all things, sets me
free.

Posterity will judge by my success,

I had the Grecian poet's happiness, ⁴⁰
Who, waiving plots, found out a better way;
Some God descended, and preserv'd the play.
When first the triumphs of your sex were sung

By those old poets, Beauty was but young,
And few admir'd the native red and white,
Till poets dress'd them up to charm the
sight;

So Beauty took on trust, and did engage
For sums of praises till she came to age.
But this long-growing debt to poetry ⁴⁰
You justly, madam, have discharg'd to me,
When your applause and favor did infuse
New life to my condemn'd and dying Muse.

PROLOGUE TO THE RIVAL
LADIES

[This tragi-comedy, Dryden's first attempt at the poetic drama, was acted late in 1663 or early in 1664. It was entered on the Stationers' Register June 5, 1664 (Malone, I. i. 57); two separate editions were printed in that year. No epilogue appears in any early edition.]

'T is much desir'd, you judges of the town
Would pass a vote to put all prologues
down:

For who can show me, since they first were writ,

They e'er converted one hard-hearted wit?
Yet the world's mended well: in former
days

Good prologues were as scarce as now good plays.

For the reforming poets of our age,

In this first charge, spend their poetic rage:
Expect no more when once the prologue's
done;

The wit is ended ere the play's begun. 10
You now have habits, dances, scenes, and
rhymes;

High language often; aye, and sense, sometimes.

As for a clear contrivance, doubt it not;
They blow out candles to give light to th'
plot.

And for surprise, two bloody-minded men
Fight till they die, then rise and dance again.
Such deep intrigues you're welcome to this
day:

But blame yourselves, not him who writ the
play;

Tho' his plot's dull, as can be well desir'd,
Wit stiff as any you have e'er admir'd: 20
He's bound to please, not to write well; and knows

There is a mode in plays as well as clothes;
Therefore, kind judges —

A second PROLOGUE enters.

2. Hold; would you admit
For judges all you see within the pit?

1. Whom would he then except, or on what score?

2. All who (like him) have writ ill plays
before;

For they, like thieves condemn'd, are hang-men made,

To execute the members of their trade.

All that are writing now he would disown,
But then he must except — ev'n all the town;
All chol'ric, losing gamesters, who, in spite,
Will damn to-day, because they lost last
night; 30

All servants, whom their mistress' scorn
upbraids;

All maudlin lovers, and all slighted maids;
All who are out of humor, or severe;

All that want wit, or hope to find it here.

PROLOGUE, EPILOGUE, AND SONG FROM THE INDIAN EM-PEROR

OR, THE CONQUEST OF MEXICO BY THE SPANIARDS

[This, Dryden's first independent heroic play, was acted late in 1664 or early in 1665.
It was entered on the Stationers' Register

May 26, 1665 (Malone, I, 1, 218), but was not printed until 1667. It was a sequel to The Indian Queen, a play written by Sir Robert Howard with some assistance from Dryden:
see Appendix I, p. 903, below.]

PROLOGUE

ALMIGHTY critics! whom our Indians here
Worship, just as they do the Devil, for fear;
In reverence to your pow'r I come this day
To give you timely warning of our play.
The scenes are old, the habits are the same
We were last year, before the Spaniards came;

[Our prologue, th' old-cast too —
For to observe the new it should at least
Be spoke by some ingenious bird or beast.]
Now if you stay, the blood that shall be shed 10

From this poor play, be all upon your head.
We neither promise you one dance, or show,
Then plot and language they are wanting
too:

But you, kind wits, will those light faults
excuse;

Those are the common frailties of the Muse,
Which who observes, he buys his place too
dear;

For 't is your business to be cozen'd here.
These wretched spies of wit must then confess

They take more pains, to please themselves
the less.

Grant us such judges, Phœbus, we request,
As still mistake themselves into a jest; 21
Such easy judges, that our poet may Himself admire the fortune of his play;
And arrogantly, as his fellows do,
Think he writes well, because he pleases
you.

This he conceives not hard to bring about,
If all of you would join to help him out;
Would each man take but what he understands,

And leave the rest upon the poet's hands.

EPILOGUE

BY A MERCURY

To all and singular in this full meeting, Ladies and gallants, Phœbus sends me greeting.

To all his sons, by whate'er title known,
Whether of court, of coffee-house, or town;

From his most mighty sons, whose confidence
 Is plac'd in lofty sound, and humble sense,
 Ev'n to his little infants of the time,
 Who write new songs, and trust in tune and rhyme;
 Be't known, that Phœbus (being daily griev'd
 To see good plays condemn'd, and bad receive'd)¹⁰
 Ordains your judgment upon every cause,
 Henceforth, be limited by wholesome laws.
 He first thinks fit no sonneteer advance
 His censure farther than the song or dance.
 Your wit burlesque may one step higher climb,
 And in his sphere may judge all dogg'rel rhyme;
 All proves, and moves, and loves, and honors too;
 All that appears high sense, and scarce is low.
 As for the coffee wits, he says not much;
 Their proper business is to damn the Dutch:²⁰
 For the great dons of wit —
 Phœbus gives them full privilege alone,
 To damn all others, and cry up their own.
 Last, for the ladies, 't is Apollo's will,
 They should have power to save, but not to kill:

For love and he long since have thought it fit,
 Wit live by beauty, beauty reign by wit.

SONG

I

AH fading joy, how quickly art thou past!
 Yet we thy ruin haste.
 As if the cares of human life were few,
 We seek out new:
 And follow fate, which would too fast pursue.

II

See how on every bough the birds express
 In their sweet notes their happiness.
 They all enjoy, and nothing spare;
 But on their mother Nature lay their care:
 Why then should man, the lord of all below,¹⁰
 Such troubles choose to know,
 As none of all his subjects undergo?

III

Hark, hark, the waters fall, fall, fall,
 And with a murmuring sound
 Dash, dash upon the ground,
 To gentle slumbers call.

ANNUS MIRABILIS

THE YEAR OF WONDERS, 1666

AN HISTORICAL POEM

CONTAINING

THE PROGRESS AND VARIOUS SUCCESSES OF OUR NAVAL WAR WITH HOLLAND, UNDER THE CONDUCT OF HIS HIGHNESS PRINCE RUPERT, AND HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF ALBEMARLE

AND DESCRIBING THE FIRE OF LONDON

Multum interest res poscat, an homines latius imperare velint.
 TRAJAN IMPERATOR ad Plin.

Urbs antiqua ruit, multos dominata per annos. — VIRG.

[Annus Mirabilis was licensed for the press on November 22, 1666, and was published in a tiny octavo, date 1667, the title-page of which reads as above. Different copies of this edition apparently show at least one variation in the text: see note on line 267. The poem was reprinted in 1688: see note on Astræa Redux, p. 7, above. The present edition follows the text of 1688, which was apparently slightly revised by Dryden.

The Verses to the Duchess were later published by themselves in Poetical Miscellanies, the Fifth Part, 1704, and have since usually been printed as a separate poem. They are here restored, at the cost of a slight violation of the chronological order, to the position in which Dryden chose to print them. They were addressed to Anne Hyde, first wife of James, Duke of York (afterwards King James II), and daughter of the Earl of Clarendon, in whose honor Dryden had written his poem To my Lord Chancellor (see p. 15, above).]

METROPOLIS OF GREAT BRIT-AIN,

THE MOST RENOWN'D AND LATE FLOUR-ISHING CITY OF LONDON, IN ITS REPRESENTATIVES THE LORD MAYOR AND COURT OF ALDERMEN, THE SHERIFFS, AND COMMON COUNCIL OF IT

As perhaps I am the first who ever presented a work of this nature to the metropolis of any nation; so it is likewise consonant to justice, that he who was to give the first example of such a dedication should begin it with that city, which has set a pattern to all others of true loyalty, invincible courage, and unshaken constancy. Other cities have been prais'd for the same virtues, but I am much deceiv'd if any have so dearly purchas'd their reputation; their fame has been won them by cheaper trials than an expensive, tho' necessary war, a consuming pestilence, and a more consuming fire. To submit yourselves with that humility to the judgments of Heaven, and at the same time to raise yourselves with that vigor above all human enemies; to be combated at once from above and from below, to be struck down and to triumph; I know not whether such trials have been ever parallel'd in any nation: the resolution and successes of them never can be. Never had prince or people more mutual reason to love each other, if suffering for each other can indear affection. You have come together a pair of matchless lovers, thro' many difficulties; he, thro' a long exile, various traverses of fortune, and the interposition of many rivals, who violently ravish'd and withheld you from him: and certainly you have had your share in sufferings. But Providence has cast upon you want of trade, that you might appear bountiful to your country's necessities; and the rest of your afflictions are not more the effects of God's displeasure, (frequent examples of them having been in the reign of the most excellent princes,) than occasions for the manifesting of your Christian and civil virtues. To you, therefore, this Year of Wonders is justly dedicated, because you have made it so. You, who are to stand a wonder to all years and ages, and who have built yourselves an immortal monument on your own ruins. You are now a Phoenix in her ashes, and, as far as humanity can approach, a great emblem of the suffering Deity. But Heaven never made so much piety and virtue to leave it miserable. I have heard, indeed, of some virtuous persons who have ended unfortunately, but never of any virtuous nation: Providence is engag'd too deeply, when the cause becomes so general. And I cannot imagine it has resolv'd the ruin of that people at home which it has blest abroad with such successes. I am therefore to conclude that your sufferings are at an end; and that one part of my poem has not been more an history of your destruction, than the other a prophecy of your restoration. The accomplishment of which happiness, as it is the wish of all true Englishmen, so is by none more passionately desir'd than by,

The greatest of your admirers, and Most humble of your servants,

JOHN DRYDEN.

AN ACCOUNT OF THE ENSUING POEM

IN A LETTER TO THE HONORABLE SIR ROBERT HOWARD

SIR,

I AM so many ways oblig'd to you, and so little able to return your favors, that, like those who owe too much, I can only live by getting farther into your debt. You have not only been careful of my fortune, which was the effect of your nobleness, but you have been solicitous of my reputation, which is that of your kindness. It is not long since I gave you the trouble of perusing a play for me, and now, instead of an acknowledgment, I have given you a greater, in the correction of a poem. But since you are to bear this persecution, I will at least give you the encouragement of a martyr: you could never suffer in a nobler cause. For I have chosen the most heroic subject which any poet could desire; I have taken upon me to describe the motives, the beginning, progress, and successes, of a most just and necessary war: in it, the care, management, and prudence of our king; the conduct and valor of a royal admiral, and of two incomparable generals; the invincible courage of our captains and seamen; and three glorious victories, the result of all. After this, I have, in the fire, the most deplorable, but withal the greatest, argument that can be imagin'd: the destruction being so swift, so sudden, so vast, and miserable, as nothing can parallel in story. The former part of this poem, relating to the war, is but a due expiation for my not serving my king and country in it. All gentlemen are almost oblig'd to it; and I know no reason we should give that advantage to the commonalty of England, to be foremost in brave actions, which the nobleness of France would never suffer in their peasants. I should not have written this but to a person who has been ever forward to appear in all employments whither his honor and generosity have call'd him. The later part of my poem, which describes the fire, I owe first to the piety and fatherly affection of our monarch to his suffering subjects; and, in the second place, to the courage, loyalty, and magnanimity of the city; both which were so conspicuous, that I have wanted words to celebrate them as they deserve. I have call'd my poem historical, not epic, tho' both the actions and actors are as much heroic as any poem can contain. But since the action is not properly one, nor that accomplish'd in the last successes, I have judg'd it too bold a title for a few stanzas, which are little more in number than a single Iliad, or the longest of the Æneids. For this reason (I mean not of length, but broken action, tied too severely to the laws of history) I am apt to agree with those who rank Lucan rather among historians in verse, than epic poets: in whose room, if I am not deceiv'd, Silius Italicus, tho' a worse writer, may more justly be admitted. I have chosen to write my poem in quatrains, or stanzas of four in alternate rhyme, because I have ever judg'd them more noble, and of greater dignity, both for the sound and number, than any other verse in use amongst us; in which I am sure I have your approbation. The learned languages have certainly a great advantage of us, in not being tied to the slavery of any rhyme; and were less constrain'd in the quantity of every syllable, which they might vary with spondres or dactiles, besides so many other helps of grammatical figures, for the lengthening or abbreviation of them, than the modern are in the close of that one syllable, which often confines, and more often corrupts, the sense of all the rest. But in this necessity of our rhymes, I have always found the couplet verse most easy, (tho' not so proper for this occasion,) for there the work is sooner at an end, every two lines concluding the labor of the poet; but in quatrains he is to carry it farther on, and not only so, but to bear along in his head the troublesome sense of four lines together. For those who write correctly in this kind must needs acknowledge that the last line of the stanza is to be consider'd in the composition of the first. Neither can we give ourselves the liberty of making any part of a verse for the sake of rhyme, or concluding with a word which is not current English, or using the variety of female rhymes; all which our fathers practis'd: and for the female rhymes, they are still in use amongst other nations; with the Italian in every line, with the Spaniard promiscuously, with the French alternately: as those who have read the Alarique, the Pucelle, or any of their later poems, will agree with me. And besides this, they write in Alexandrins, or verses of six feet; such as amongst us is the old translation of Homer, by Chapman; all which, by length'ning of their chain, makes the sphere of their activity the larger. I have dwelt too long upon the choice of my stanza, which you may remember is much better defended in the preface to Gondibert; and therefore I will hasten to acquaint you with my endeavors in the writing. In general I will only say, I have never yet seen the description of any naval fight in the proper terms which are us'd at sea; and if there be any such in another language, as that of Lucan in the third of his Pharsalia, yet I could not prevail myself of it in the English; the terms of art in every tongue bearing more of the idiom of it than any other words. We hear indeed among our poets, of the thund'ring of guns, the smoke, the disorder, and the slaughter; but all these are common notions. And certainly as those who, in a logical dispute, keep in general terms, would hide a fallacy, so those who do it in any poetical description would veil their ignorance:

Descriptas servare vices operumque colores,
Cur ego, si nequeo ignoroque, poeta adutor?

For my own part, if I had little knowledge of the sea, yet I have thought it no shame to learn; and if I have made some few mistakes, 't is only, as you can bear me witness, because I have wanted opportunity to correct them; the whole poem being first written, and now sent you from a place where I have not so much as the converse of any seaman. Yet, tho' the trouble I had in writing it was great, it was more than recompens'd by the pleasure: I found myself so warm in celebrating the praises of military men, two such especially as the prince and general, that it is no wonder if they inspir'd me with thoughts above my ordinary level. And I am well satisfied that, as they are incomparably the best subject I have ever had, excepting only the royal family; so also, that this I have written of them is much better than what I have perform'd on any other. I have been forc'd to help out other arguments; but this has been bountiful to me: they have been low and barren of praise, and I have exalted them, and made them fruitful; but here — Omnia sponte sua reddit justissima tellus. I have had a large, a fair, and a pleasant field; so fertile that without my cultivating it has given me two harvests in a summer, and in both oppress'd the reaper. All other greatness in subjects is only counterfeit; it will not endure the test of danger; the greatness of arms is only real: other greatness burdens a nation with its weight; this supports it with its strength. And as it is the happiness of the age, so it is the peculiar goodness of the best of kings, that we may praise his subjects without offending him. Doubtless it proceeds from a just confidence of his own virtue, which the luster of no other can be so great as to darken in him; for the good or the valiant are never safely prais'd under a bad or a degenerate prince.

But to return from this digression to a farther account of my poem, I must crave leave to tell you, that as I have endeavor'd to adorn it with noble thoughts, so much more to express those thoughts with elocution. The composition of all poems is, or ought to be, of wit, and wit in the poet, or wit writing (if you will give me leave to use a school-distinction) is no other than the faculty of imagination in the writer, which, like a nimble spaniel, beats over and ranges thro' the field of memory, till it springs the quarry it hunted after; or, without metaphor, which searches over all the memory for the species or ideas of those things which it designs to represent. Wit written is that which is well defin'd, the happy result of thought, or product of imagination. But to proceed from wit, in the general notion of it, to the proper wit of an heroic or historical poem, I judge it chiefly to consist in the delightful imaging of persons, actions, passions, or things. 'Tis not the jerk or sting of an epigram, nor the seeming contradiction of a poor antithesis, (the delight of an ill-judging audience in a play of rhyme,) nor the jingle of a more poor paronomasia; neither is it so much the morality of a grave sentence, affected by Lucan, but more sparingly us'd by Virgil; but it is some lively and apt description, dress'd in such colors of speech that it sets before your eyes the absent object as perfectly and more delightfully than nature. So then, the first happiness of the poet's imagination is properly invention, or finding of the thought; the second is fancy, or the variation, deriving, or molding of that thought, as the judgment represents it proper to the subject; the third is elocution, or the art of clothing and adorning that thought, so found and varied, in apt, significant, and sounding words: the quickness of the imagination is seen in the invention, the fertility in the fancy, and the accuracy in the expression. For the two first of these, Ovid is famous amongst the poets; for the later, Virgil. Ovid images more often the movements and affections of the mind, either combating between two contrary passions, or extremely compos'd by one: his words therefore are the least part of his care; for he pictures nature in disorder, with which the study and choice of words is inconsistent. This is the proper wit of dialogue or discourse, and consequently of the drama, where all that is said is to be suppos'd the effect of sudden thought; which, tho' it excludes not the quickness of wit in repartees, yet admits not a too curious election of words, too frequent allusions, or use of tropes, or in fine anything that shews remoteness of thought or labor in the writer. On the other side, Virgil speaks not so often to us in the person of another, like Ovid, but in his own. he relates almost all things as from himself, and thereby gains more liberty than the other, to express his thoughts with all the graces of elocution, to write more figuratively, and to confess as well the labor as the force of his imagination. Tho' he describes his Dido well and naturally, in the violence of her passions yet he must yield in that to the Myrrha, the Biblis, the Althæa, of Ovid; for, as great an admirer of him as I am, I must acknowledge, that if I see not more of their souls than I see of Dido's, at least I have a greater concernment for them: and that convinces me that Ovid has touch'd those tender strokes more delicately than Virgil could. But when action or persons are to be describ'd, when any such image is to be set before us, how bold, how masterly are the strokes of Virgil! We see the objects he represents us with in their native figures, in their proper motions; but so we see them, as our own eyes could never have beheld them so beautiful in themselves. We see the soul of the poet, like that universal one of which he speaks, informing and moving thro' all his pictures:

— Totamque infusa per artus

Mens agitat molem, et magno se corpore miscet.

We behold him embellishing his images, as he makes Venus breathing beauty upon her son Æneas:

— lumenque juvenat

Purpureum, et letos oculis afflatat honores:

Quidæ manus addunt ebori decus, aut ubi flavo

Argentum Pariusve lapis circumdatur auro.

See his tempest, his funeral sports, his combat of Turnus and Æneas: and in his Georgics, which I esteem the divinest part of all his writings, the plague, the country, the battle of bulls, the labor of the bees, and those many other excellent images of nature, most of which are neither great in themselves, nor have any natural ornament to bear them up: but the words wherewith he describes them are so excellent, that it might be well applied to him, which was said by Ovid, Materiam superabat opus: the very sound of his words has often somewhat that is connatural to the subject; and while we read him, we sit, as in a play, beholding the scenes of what he represents. To perform this, he made frequent use of tropes, which you know change the nature of a known word by applying it to some other signification; and this is it which Horace means in his epistle to the Pisos:

Dixeris egregie, notum si callida verbum
Reddidit junctura novum —

But I am sensible I have presum'd too far, to entertain you with a rude discourse of that art which you both know so well, and put into practice with so much happiness. Yet before I leave Virgil, I must own the vanity to tell you, and by you the world, that he has been my master in this poem: I have follow'd him everywhere, I know not with what success, but I am sure with diligence enough: my images are many of them copied from him, and the rest are imitations of him. My expressions also are as near as the idioms of the two languages would admit of in translation. And this, sir, I have done with that boldness for which I will stand accountable to any of our little critics, who, perhaps, are not better acquainted with him than I am. Upon your first perusal of this poem, you have taken notice of some words which I have innovated (if it be too bold for me to say refin'd) upon his Latin; which, as I offer not to introduce into English prose, so I hope they are neither improper, nor altogether unelegant in verse; and, in this, Horace will again defend me:

Et nova, factaque nuper, habebunt verba fidem, si
Græco fonte cadant, parce detorta —

The inference is exceeding plain: for if a Roman poet might have liberty to coin a word, supposing only that it was deriv'd from the Greek, was put into a Latin termination, and that he us'd this liberty but seldom, and with modesty; how much more justly may I challenge that privilege to do it with the same prerequisites, from the best and most judicious of Latin writers? In some places where either the fancy or the words were his, or any other's, I have not'd it in the margin, that I might not seem a plagiarist; in others I have neglected it, to avoid as well tediousness, as the affectation of doing it too often. Such descriptions or images, well wrought, which I promise not for mine, are, as I have said, the adequate delight of heroic poesy; for they beget admiration, which is its proper object; as the images of the burlesque, which is contrary to this, by the same reason beget laughter; for the one shews nature beautified, as in the picture of a fair woman, which we all admire; the other shews her deform'd, as in that of a lazar, or of a fool with distorted face and antic gestures, at which we cannot forbear to laugh, because it is a deviation from nature. But tho' the same images serve equally for the epic poesy, and for the historic and panegyric, which are branches of it, yet a several sort of sculpture is to be us'd in them. If some of them are to be like those of Juvenal, Stantes in curribus Æmilianis, heroes drawn in their triumphal chariots, and in their full proportion; others are to be like that of Virgil, Spirantia mollius æra: there is somewhat more of softness and tenderness to be shewn in them. You will soon find I write not this without concern. Some, who have seen a paper of verses which I wrote last year to her Highness the Duchess, have accus'd them of that only thing I could defend in them; they said, I did humi scerpere, that I wanted not only height of fancy, but dignity of words to set it off. I might well answer with that of Horace, Nunc non erat his locus; I knew I address'd them to a lady, and accordingly I affected the softness of expression, and the smoothness of measure, rather than the height of thought; and in what I did endeavor, it is no vanity to say I have succeeded. I detest arrogance; but there is some difference betwixt that and a just defense. But I will not farther bribe your candor or the reader's. I leave them to speak for me; and, if they can, to make out that character, not pretending to a greater, which I have given them.

VERSES TO HER HIGHNESS THE DUCHESS

ON THE MEMORABLE VICTORY GAIN'D
BY THE DUKE AGAINST THE HOL-LANDERS, JUNE THE 3D, 1665; AND
ON HER JOURNEY AFTERWARDS INTO THE NORTH

MADAM,
WHEN for our sakes your hero you re-
sign'd
To swelling seas, and every faithless wind;
When you releas'd his courage, and set free
A valor fatal to the enemy;
You lodg'd your country's cares within your
breast,
(The mansion where soft love should only
rest:)
And, ere our foes abroad were overcome,

The noblest conquest you had gain'd at home.

Ah, what concerns did both your souls divide!

Your honor gave us what your love denied:

And 't was for him much easier to subdue
Those foes he fought with, than to part from you.

That glorious day, which two such navies saw,

As each, unmatched, might to the world give law,

Neptune yet doubtful whom he should obey,

Held to them both the trident of the sea:
The winds were hush'd, the waves in ranks were cast,

As awfully as when God's people pass'd:
Those, yet uncertain on whose sails to blow,

These, where the wealth of nations ought to flow.

Then with the duke your Highness rul'd the day:

While all the brave did his command obey,
The fair and pious under you did pray.

How pow'rful are chaste vows! the wind and tide

You brib'd to combat on the English side.
Thus to your much-lov'd lord you did convey

An unknown succor, sent the nearest way.
New vigor to his wearied arms you brought,
(So Moses was upheld while Israel fought)
While, from afar, we heard the cannon play,

Like distant thunder on a shiny day.

For absent friends we were asham'd to fear,

When we consider'd what you ventur'd there.

Ships, men, and arms, our country might restore,

But such a leader could supply no more.

With generous thoughts of conquest he did burn,

Yet fought not more to vanquish than return.

Fortune and victory he did pursue,
To bring them, as his slaves, to wait on you.

Thus beauty ravish'd the rewards of fame,
And the fair triumph'd when the brave o'er-came.

Then, as you meant to spread another way

By land your conquests, far as his by sea,

Leaving our southern clime, you march'd along

The stubborn North, ten thousand Cupids strong.

Like commons the nobility resort,
In crowding heaps, to fill your moving court:

To welcome your approach the vulgar run,
Like some new envoy from the distant sun,

And country beauties by their lovers go, so Blessing themselves, and wond'ring at the show.

So when the newborn Phoenix first is seen,
Her feather'd subjects all adore their queen;
And, while she makes her progress thro' the East,

From every grove her numerous train's increas'd:

Each poet of the air her glory sings,
And round him the pleas'd audience clap their wings.

And now, sir, 't is time I should relieve you from the tedious length of this account. You have better and more profitable employment for your hours, and I wrong the public to detain you longer. In conclusion, I must leave my poem to you with all its faults, which I hope to find fewer in the printing by your emendations. I know you are not of the number of those of whom the younger Pliny speaks: Nec sunt parum multi, qui carpere amicos suos judicium vocant: I am rather too secure of you on that side. Your candor in pardoning my errors may make you more remiss in correcting them; if you will not withal consider that they come into the world with your approbation, and thro' your hands. I beg from you the greatest favor you can confer upon an absent person, since I repose upon your management what is dearest to me, my fame and reputation; and therefore I hope it will stir you up to make my poem fairer by many of your blots; if not, you know the story of the gamester who married the rich man's daughter, and when her father denied the portion, christen'd all the children by his surname, that if, in conclusion, they must beg, they should do so by one name, as well as by the other. But since the reproach of my faults will light on you, 't is but reason I should do you that justice to the readers, to let them know, that if there be anything tolerable in this poem, they owe the argument to your choice, the writing to your encouragement, the correction to your judgment, and the care of it to your friendship, to which he must ever acknowledge himself to owe all things, who is.

Sir,
The most obedient, and most Faithful of your Servants.
JOHN DRYDEN.

From Charlton in Wiltshire,
Nov. 10, 1686.

ANNUS MIRABILIS

THE YEAR OF WONDERS, MDCLXVI

I

IN thriving arts long time had Holland grown,
Crouching at home and cruel when
abroad;
Scarce leaving us the means to claim our
own;
Our king they courted, and our merchants
aw'd.

II

Trade, which like blood should circularly
flow,
Stopp'd in their channels, found its freedom lost:
Thither the wealth of all the world did
go,
And seem'd but shipwreck'd on so base
a coast.

III

For them alone the heav'ns had kindly heat;
(a) In eastern quarries ripening precious dew: to
For them the Idumæan balm
did sweat,
And in hot Ceylon spicy forests grew.

(a) *In eastern quarries, &c.
Precious stones at first are dew, con-dens'd and harden'd by the warmth of the sun or subterranean fires.*

IV

The sun but seem'd the lab'rer of their year;
(b) Each waxing moon supplied her wat'ry store,
To swell those tides, which from the line did bear
Their brim-full vessels to the Belgian shore.

(b) *Each waxing, &c.
According to their opinion, who think that great heap of waters under the line is de-press'd into tides by the moon, towards the poles.*

V

Thus mighty in her ships stood Carthage
long,
And swept the riches of the world from
far;
Yet stoop'd to Rome, less wealthy, but more
strong;
And this may prove our second Punic war.

VI

What peace can be, where both to one pretend?
(But they more diligent, and we more strong)
Or if a peace, it soon must have an end;
For they would grow too pow'rful were it long.

Behold two nations then, ingag'd so far,
That each sev'n years the fit must shake each land:
Where France will side to weaken us by
war,
Who only can his vast designs withstand.

VIII

See how he feeds (c) th' Ibe- (c) *Th' Iberian.
rian with delays, The Spaniard.*
To render us his timely friendship
vain:
And while his secret soul on Flanders preys,
He rocks the cradle of the babe of Spain.

IX

Such deep designs of empire does he lay O'er them whose cause he seems to take in hand;
And, prudently, would make them lords at
sea,
To whom with ease he can give laws by
land.

This saw our king; and long within his
breast
His pensive counsels balanc'd to and fro:
He griev'd the land he freed should be op-
press'd,
And he less for it than usurpers do. 40

XI

His gen'rous mind the fair ideas drew
Of fame and honor, which in dangers lay;

Where wealth, like fruit on precipices,
grew,
Not to be gather'd but by birds of prey.

XII

The loss and gain each fatally were great;
And still his subjects call'd aloud for war;
But peaceful kings, o'er martial people set,
Each other's poise and counterbalance are.

XIII

He, first, survey'd the charge with careful eyes,
Which none but mighty monarchs could maintain;
Yet judg'd, like vapors that from limbees rise,
It would in richer showers descend again.

XIV

At length resolv'd t' assert the wat'ry ball,
He in himself did whole armadoes bring:
Him aged seamen might their master call,
And choose for general, were he not their king.

XV

It seems as every ship their sovereign knows,
His awful summons they so soon obey;
So hear the sealy herd when (d) Proteus blows,
And so to pasture follow thro' the sea.

(d) When Proteus blows or Cæruleus Proteus immensa pauca. Armado et mutans pas-cat sub gurgite phœas -- Virgil.

XVI

To see this fleet upon the ocean move,
Angels drew wide the curtains of the skies;
And Heav'n, as if there wanted lights above,
For tapers made two glaring comets rise;

XVII

Whether they unctuous exhalations are,
Fir'd by the sun, or seeming so alone;
Or each some more remote and slippery star,
Which loses footing when to mortals shown;

XVIII

Or one, that bright companion of the sun,
Whose glorious aspect seal'd our new-born king, 70

And now, a round of greater years begun,
New influence from his walks of light did bring.

XIX

Victorious York did first, with fam'd success,
To his known valor make the Dutch give place:
Thus Heav'n our monarch's fortune did confess,
Beginning conquest from his royal race.

XX

But since it was decreed, auspicious king,
In Britain's right that thou shouldst wed the main,
Heav'n, as a gage, would cast some precious thing,
And therefore doom'd that Lawson should be slain.

XXI

Lawson amongst the foremost met his fate,
Whom sea-green Sirens from the rocks lament:
Thus as an off'ring for the Grecian state,
He first was kill'd who first to battle went.

XXII

(e) Their chief blown up, in (e) The Admirair, not waves, expir'd, ral of Holland.
To which his pride presum'd to give the law:
The Dutch confess'd Heav'n present, and retir'd,
And all was Britain the wide ocean saw.

XXIII

To nearest ports their shatter'd ships repair,
Where by our dreadful cannon they lay aw'd:
So reverently men quit the open air,
When thunder speaks the angry gods abroad.

XXIV

And now approach'd their fleet from India, fraught
With all the riches of the rising sun:
And precious sand from (f) southern climates brought,
(The fatal regions where the war begun.)

The attempt at Berghen.
(f) southern climates. Guinea.

XXV

Like hunted castors, conscious of their store,
 Their waylaid wealth to Norway's coasts
 they bring:
 There first the North's cold bosom spices
 bore,
 And winter brooded on the eastern spring.

XXVI

By the rich scent we found our perfum'd prey,¹⁰¹
 Which, flank'd with rocks, did close in covert lie;
 And round about their murdering cannon
 lay,
 At once to threaten and invite the eye.

XXVII

Fiercer than cannon, and than rocks more
 hard,
 The English undertake th' unequal war:
 Seven ships alone, by which the port is barr'd,
 Besiege the Indies, and all Denmark dare.

XXVIII

These fight like husbands, but like lovers
 those:
 These fain would keep, and those more fain enjoy;¹¹⁰
 And to such height their frantic passion
 grows,
 That what both love, both hazard to destroy.

XXIX

Amidst whole heaps of spices lights a ball,
 And now their odors arm'd against them
 fly:
 Some preciously by shatter'd porcel'ain fall,
 And some by aromatic splinters die.

XXX

And tho' by tempests of the prize bereft,
 In heaven's inclemency some ease we
 find:
 Our foes we vanquish'd by our valor left,
 And only yielded to the seas and wind.

XXXI

Nor wholly lost we so deserv'd a prey;¹²¹
 For storms, repenting, part of it restor'd:
 Which, as a tribute from the Baltic sea,
 The British ocean sent her mighty lord.

XXXII

Go, mortals, now, and vex yourselves in vain
 For wealth, which so uncertainly must
 come:
 When what was brought so far, and with such pain,
 Was only kept to lose it nearer home.

XXXIII

The son, who twice three months on th'
 ocean toss'd,¹²⁹
 Prepar'd to tell what he had pass'd before,
 Now sees in English ships the Holland coast,
 And parents' arms in vain stretch'd from the shore.

XXXIV

This careful husband had been long away,
 Whom his chaste wife and little children
 mourn;
 Who on their fingers learn'd to tell the day
 On which their father promis'd to return.

XXXV

(g) Such are the proud designs (g) Such are,

XXXVI

The undistinguish'd seeds of good and ill, Heav'n, in his bosom, from our knowledge hides;
 And draws them in contempt of human
 skill,
 Which oft for friends mistaken foes provides.

XXXVII

XXXVIII

Happy, who never trust a stranger's will,
 Whose friendship's in his interest understood!¹⁵⁰

Since money giv'n but tempts him to be ill,
When pow'r is too remote to make him good.

XXXIX

Till now, alone the mighty nations strove;
The rest, at gaze, without the lists did stand:
And threat'ning France, plac'd War declar'd by France.
like a painted Jove,
Kept idle thunder in his lifted hand.

XL

That eunuch guardian of rich Holland's trade,
Who envies us what he wants pow'r t' enjoy;
Whose noiseful valor does no foe invade,
And weak assistance will his friends destroy: 179

XLI

Offended that we fought without his leave,
He takes this time his secret hate to show;
Which Charles does with a mind so calm receive,
As one that neither seeks nor shuns his foe.

XLII

With France, to aid the Dutch, the Danes unite:
France as their tyrant, Denmark as their slave.
But when with one three nations join to fight,
They silently confess that one more brave.

XLIII

Lewis had chas'd the English from his shore,
But Charles the French as subjects does invite: 170
Would Heav'n for each some Solomon restore,
Who, by their mercy, may decide their right!

XLIV

Were subjects so but only by their choice,
And not from birth did forc'd dominion take,

Our prince alone would have the public voice;
And all his neighbors' realms would deserts make.

XLV

He without fear a dangerous war pursues,
Which without rashness he began before:
As honor made him first the danger choose,
So still he makes it good on virtue's score. 180

XLVI

The doubled charge his subjects' love supplies,
Who, in that bounty, to themselves are kind:
So glad Egyptians see their Nilus rise,
And in his plenty their abundance find.

XLVII

With equal pow'r he does two chiefs create,
Two such as each seem'd Prince Rupert and Duke Al-
worthiest when alone; bemarle sent to sea.
Each able to sustain a nation's fate,
Since both had found a greater in their own.

XLVIII

Both great in courage, conduct, and in fame,
Yet neither envious of the other's praise; 190
Their duty, faith, and int'rest too the same,
Like mighty partners equally they raise.

XLIX

The prince long time had courted Fortune's love,
But once possess'd did absolutely reign:
Thus with their Amazons the heroes strove,
And conquer'd first those beauties they would gain.

L

The duke beheld, like Scipio, with disdain,
That Carthage which he ruin'd rise once more;
And shook aloft the fasces of the main,
To fright those slaves with what they felt before. 200

LI

Together to the wat'ry camp they haste,

Whom matrons passing to their children show:

Infants' first vows for them to heav'n are cast,

And (i) future people bless them as they go.

(i) Future people. Examina infantium futurisque populus. — PLIN. Juv. in Pan. ad Traj.

LII

With them no riotous pomp, nor Asian
train,

T' infect a navy with their gaudy fears;
To make slow fights, and victories but vain;
But war, severely, like itself, appears.

LIII

Diffusive of themselves, where'er they pass,
They make that warmth in others they expect;

Their valor works like bodies on a glass,
And does its image on their men project.

LIV

Our fleet divides, and straight the Dutch appear,

In number, and a fam'd commander, bold:

The narrow seas can scarce
their navy bear,

Or crowded vessels can their soldiers
hold.

Duke of Albemarle's battle, first day.

LV

The duke, less numerous, but in courage
more,

On wings of all the winds to combat flies:
His murdering guns a loud defiance roar.

And bloody crosses on his flag-staff's rise.

LVI

Both furl their sails, and strip them for
the fight,

Their folded sheets dismiss the useless
air:

(j) Th' Elean plains could boast no nobler sight,

When struggling champions
did their bodies bare.

(j) Th' Elean, &c. Where the Olympic games were celebrated.

LVII

Borne each by other in a distant line,
The sea-built forts in dreadful order
move:

So vast the noise, as if not fleets did join,

But (k) lands unfix'd and floating nations strove.

(k) Lands unfix'd, from Virgil: Credas innare revulsas Cycladas, &c.

LVIII

Now pass'd, on either side they nimbly tack;

Both strive to intercept and guide the
wind:

And, in its eye, more closely they come back,

To finish all the deaths they left behind.

LIX

On high-raisd decks the haughty Belgians ride,

Beneath whose shade our humble frigates
go:

Such port the elephant bears, and so defied

By the rhinoceros her unequal foe.

LX

And as the built, so different is the
fight;

Their mounting shot is on our sails de-
sign'd:

Deep in their hulls our deadly bullets light,
And thro' the yielding planks a passage
find.

LXI

Our dreaded admiral from far they threat, Whose batter'd rigging their whole war
receives:

All bare, like some old oak which tempests
beat,

He stands, and sees below his scatter'd leaves.

LXII

Heroes of old, when wounded, shelter
sought;

But he, who meets all danger with dis-
dain,

Ev'n in their face his ship to anchor brought,
And steeple-high stood propp'd upon the main.

LXIII

At this excess of courage, all amaz'd,

The foremost of his foes a while with-
draw:

With such respect in enter'd Rome they gaze'd,
Who on high chairs the godlike fathers saw.

LXIV

And now, as where Patroclus' body lay, Here Trojan chiefs advanc'd, and there the Greek;
Ours o'er the duke their pious wings dis-
play,
And theirs the noblest spoils of Britain seek.

LXV

Meantime his busy mariners he hastes,
His shatter'd sails with rigging to restore;
And willing pines ascend his broken masts, Whose lofty heads rise higher than before. 270

LXVI

Straight to the Dutch he turns his dreadful prow,
More fierce th' important quarrel to decide:
Like swans, in long array his vessels show,
Whose crests, advancing, do the waves divide.

LXVII

They charge, recharge, and all along the sea
They drive, and squander the huge Belgian fleet.
Berkeley alone, who nearest danger lay,
Did a like fate with lost Creüsa meet.

LXVIII

The night comes on, we eager to pursue
The combat still, and they asham'd to leave:
Till the last streaks of dying day withdrew,
And doubtful moonlight did our rage deceive.

LXIX

In th' English fleet each ship resounds with
joy,
And loud applause of their great leader's
fame:
In fiery dreams the Dutch they still destroy,
And, slumb'ring, smile at the imagin'd flame.

LXX

Not so the Holland fleet, who, tir'd and done, Stretch'd on their decks like weary oxen
lie:
Faint sweats all down their mighty members run, (Vast bulks, which little souls but ill supply.) 280

LXXI

In dreams they fearful precipices tread;
Or, shipwrack'd, labor to some distant
shore:
Or in dark churches walk among the dead;
They wake with horror, and dare sleep no
more.

LXXII

The morn they look on with unwilling eyes,
Till from their maintop joyful news
they hear Second day's
Of ships, which by their mold battle.
bring new supplies,
And in their colors Belgian lions bear.

LXXIII

Our watchful general had dis- (1) His face, cern'd from far &c. Spem
This mighty succor, which vultu simu-made glad the foe; lat, premit
He sigh'd, but, like a father of 290 alto corde
the war, dolorem. —
VIRGIL.
(1) His face spake hope, while deep his sorrows flow.

LXXIV

His wounded men he first sends off to shore, (Never, till now, unwilling to obey:)
They not their wounds, but want of strength
deplore,
And think them happy who with him can stay.

LXXV

Then to the rest: "Rejoice," said he, "to-
day;
In you the fortune of Great Britain lies:
Among so brave a people, you are they Whom Heav'n has chose to fight for such a prize. 300

LXXVI

"If number English courages could quell,
We should at first have shunn'd, not met,
our foes,

Whose numerous sails the fearful only
tell:

Courage from hearts, and not from numbers, grows."

LXXVII

He said, nor needed more to say: with
haste

To their known stations cheerfully they
go;

And all at once, disdaining to be last,
Solicit every gale to meet the foe.

LXXVIII

Nor did th' encourag'd Belgians long de-
lay,

But bold in others, not themselves, they
stood:

So thick, our navy scarce could steer their
way,

But seem'd to wander in a moving wood.

LXXIX

Our little fleet was now ingag'd so far,
That, like the swordfish in the whale, they fought:

The combat only seem'd a civil war,
Till thro' their bowels we our passage wrought.

LXXX

Never had valor, no, not ours, before Done aught like this upon the land or
main,

Where not to be o'ercome was to do more Than all the conquests former kings did gain.

LXXXI

The mighty ghosts of our great Harries
rose,

And armed Edwards look'd, with anxious eyes,

To see this fleet among unequal foes,
By which fate promis'd them their Charles should rise.

LXXXII

Meantime the Belgians tack upon our rear,

And raking chase-guns thro' our sterns
they send:

Close by, their fire-ships, like jackals, appear,

Who on their lions for the prey attend.

LXXXIII

Silent in smoke of cannons they come on:
(Such vapors once did fiery Cacus hide:)
In these the height of pleas'd revenge is
shown,

Who burn contented by another's side.

LXXXIV

Sometimes, from fighting squadrons of each fleet,

(Deceiv'd themselves, or to preserve some friend,)

Two grappling Ætnas on the ocean meet,
And English fires with Belgian flames contend.

LXXXV

Now, at each tack, our little fleet grows
less;

And, like main'd fowl, swim lagging on the main;

Their greater loss their numbers scarce
confess,

While they lose cheaper than the English gain.

LXXXVI

Have you not seen, when, whistled from the fist,

Some falcon stoops at what her eye de-
sign'd,

And, with her eagerness the quarry miss'd,
Straight flies at cheek, and clips it down
the wind;

LXXXVII

The dastard crow, that to the wood made wing,

And sees the groves no shelter can afford,
With her loud caws her craven kind does
bring,

Who, safe in numbers, cuff the noble bird?

LXXXVIII

Among the Dutch thus Albemarle did fare:
He could not conquer, and disdain'd to
fly;

Past hope of safety, 't was his latest care,
Like falling Cæsar, decently to die.

LXXXIX

Yet pity did his manly spirit move,
To see those perish who so well had
fought;

And generously with his despair he strove,
Resolv'd to live till he their safety
wrought.

XC

Let other Muses write his prosp'rous fate,
Of conquer'd nations tell, and kings restor'd;
But mine shall sing of his eclips'd estate,
Which, like the sun's, more wonders does afford. 360

XCI

He drew his mighty frigates all before,
On which the foe his fruitless force employs:
His weak ones deep into his rear he bore, Remote from guns, as sick men from the noise.

XCII

His fiery cannon did their passage guide,
And foll'wing smoke obscur'd them from
the foe:
Thus Israel safe from the Egyptian's pride,
By flaming pillars, and by clouds did go.

XCIII

Elsewhere the Belgian force we did defeat,
But here our courages did theirs subdue; 370
So Xenophon once led that fam'd retreat,
Which first the Asian empire overthrew.

XCIV

The foe approach'd; and one, for his bold
sin,
Was sunk; (as he that touch'd the ark was slain:)
The wild waves master'd him and suck'd him in,
And smiling eddies dimpl'd on the main.

XCV

This seen, the rest at awful distance stood;
As if they had been there as servants
set,
To stay, or to go on, as he thought good, 379
And not pursue, but wait on his retreat.

XCVI

So Libyan huntsmen, on some sandy plain,
From shady coverts rous'd, the lion
chase: ■

The kingly beast roars out with loud disdain,
(m) And slowly moves, unknowing to give place. 389

(m) The simile is Virgil's: Vestigia retro impropere referet, &c.

XCVII

But if some one approach to dare his force,
He swings his tail, and swiftly turns him round;
With one paw seizes on his trembling horse,
And with the other tears him to the ground.

XCVIII

Amidst these toils succeeds the balmy night; 389
Now hissing waters the quench'd guns restore;
And (n) weary waves, withdrawing from the fight,
Lie lull'd and panting on the silent shore.

(n) Weary waves: from Statius, Sylvæ: Nec truncibus fluxus ullem sonus occidit horror Equoris, antennis maria acclinata quiescunt.

XCIX

The moon shone clear on the becalmed flood,
Where, while her beams like glittering silver play,
Upon the deck our careful general stood,
And deeply mus'd on the (o) succeeding day. 390

(o) The third of June, famous for two former victories.

C

"That happy sun," said he, "will rise again,
Who twice victorious did our navy see;
And I alone must view him rise in vain,
Without one ray of all his star for me. 400

CI

"Yet like an English gen'ral will I die,
And all the ocean make my spacious grave:
Women and cowards on the land may lie;
The sea's a tomb that's proper for the brave."

CII

Restless he pass'd the remnants of the night,
Till the fresh air proclam'd the morning nigh;
And burning ships, the martyrs of the fight,
With paler fires beheld the eastern sky.

CIII

But now, his stores of ammunition spent,
 His naked valor is his only guard; ⁴¹⁰
 Rare thunders are from his dumb cannon
 sent,
 And solitary guns are scarcely Third day.
 heard.

CIV

Thus far had Fortune pow'r, here fore'd to
 stay,
 Nor longer durst with virtue be at strife:
 This, as a ransom, Albemarle did pay
 For all the glories of so great a life.

CV

For now brave Rupert from afar appears, Whose waving streamers the glad general knows:
 With full-spread sails his eager navy steers,
 And every ship in swift proportion grows.

CVI

The anxious prince had heard the cannon long, ⁴²¹
 And from that length of time dire omens
 drew
 Of English overmatch'd, and Dutch too
 strong,
 Who never fought three days, but to pursue.

CVII

Then, as an eagle, who with pious care
 Was beating widely on the wing for prey,
 To her now silent eyry does repair,
 And finds her callow infants fore'd away;

CVIII

Stung with her love, she stoops upon the
 plain,
 The broken air loud whistling as she flies, ⁴³⁰
 She stops and listens, and shoots forth
 again,
 And guides her pinions by her young ones' cries:

CIX

With such kind passion hastes the prince to fight,
 And spreads his flying canvas to the sound;
 Him, whom no danger, were he there,
 could fright,
 Now, absent, every little noise can wound.

CX

As in a drought the thirsty creatures cry,
 And gape upon the gather'd clouds for
 rain;
 And first the martlet meets it in the sky,
 And with wet wings joys all the fea-ther'd train. ⁴⁴⁰

CXI

With such glad hearts did our despairing
 men
 Salute th' appearance of the prince's fleet;
 And each ambitiously would claim the ken
 That with first eyes did distant safety
 meet.

CXII

The Dutch, who came like greedy hinds
 before,
 To reap the harvest their ripe ears did
 yield;
 Now look like those, when rolling thunders
 roar,
 And sheets of lightning blast the standing field.

CXIII

Full in the prince's passage, hills of sand
 And dang'rous flats in secret ambush lay,
 Where the false tides skim o'er the cover'd land, ⁴⁵¹
 And seamen with dissembled depths betray.

CXIV

The wily Dutch, who, like fall'n angels,
 fear'd
 This new Messiah's coming, there did wait,
 And round the verge their braving vessels
 steer'd,
 To tempt his courage with so fair a bait.

CXV

But he, unmov'd, contemns their idle threat, Secure of fame whene'er he please to
 fight:
 His cold experience tempers all his heat,
 And inbred worth doth boasting valor slight. ⁴⁶⁰

CXVI

Heroic virtue did his actions guide,
 And he the substance, not the appearance chose;

To rescue one such friend he took more
pride
Than to destroy whole thousands of such foes.

CXXVII

But when approach'd, in strict embraces
bound,
Rupert and Albemarle together grow;
He joys to have his friend in safety found,
Which he to none but to that friend would owe.

CXXVIII

The cheerful soldiers, with new stores supplied,
Now long to execute their spleenful
will;
And in revenge for those three days they
tried,
Wish one, like Joshua's, when the sun stood still.

CXXIX

Thus reinforce'd, against the adverse fleet, Still doubling ours, brave Rupert leads
the way:
With the first blushes of the ^{Fourth day's} battle
morn they meet,
And bring night back upon the new-born
day.

CXXX

His presence soon blows up the kindling
fight,
And his loud guns speak thick like angry
men:
It seem'd as slaughter had been breath'd
all night,
And Death new pointed his dull dart
again.

CXXXI

The Dutch too well his mighty conduct
knew,
And matchless courage, since the former
fight:
Whose navy like a stiff-stretch'd cord did
shew,
Till he bore in and bent them into flight.

CXXXII

The wind he shares, while half their fleet offends
His open side, and high above him shows:

Upon the rest at pleasure he descends,
And, doubly harm'd, he double harms bestows.

CXXXIII

Behind, the gen'ral mends his ^{(p) So glides,} weary pace ^{&c. From Vir-} And sullenly to his revenge ^{gil: Quum me-}
he sails; ^{dii necus, ex-} ⁴⁹⁰ ^{tremæque ag-}
(p) So glides some trodden ^{mina caude} serpent on the grass, ^{Solvuntur; tar-}
And long behind his wounded ^{dosque trahit} volume trails. ^{suus ultimus}
^{orbis, &c.}

CXXXIV

Th' increasing sound is borne to either
shore,
And for their stakes the throwing nations
fear:
Their passion double with the canons' roar,
And with warm wishes each man combats
there.

CXXXV

Plied thick and close as when the fight begun,
Their huge unwieldy navy wastes away;
So sicken waning moons too near the sun,
And blunt their crescents on the edge of day. ⁵⁰⁰

CXXXVI

And now reduc'd on equal terms to fight,
Their ships like wasted patrimonies show;
Where the thin scatt'ring trees admit the
light,
And shun each other's shadows as they grow.

CXXXVII

The warlike prince had sever'd from the
rest
Two giant ships, the pride of all the
main;
Which with his one so vigorously he press'd,
And flew so home they could not rise
again.

CXXXVIII

Already batter'd, by his lee they lay;
In vain upon the passing winds they call:
The passing winds thro' their torn canvas play, ⁵¹¹
And flagging sails on heartless sailors fall.

CXXIX

Their open'd sides receive a gloomy light,
Dreadful as day let in to shades below;
Without, grim Death rides barefac'd in their sight,
And urges ent'ring billows as they flow.

CXXX

When one dire shot, the last they could supply,
Close by the board the prince's mainmast
bore:
All three now, helpless, by each other lie,
And this offends not, and those fear no
more. 520

CXXXI

So have I seen some fearful hare maintain
A course, till tir'd before the dog she
lay;
Who, stretch'd behind her, pants upon the
plain,
Past pow'r to kill, as she to get away:

CXXXII

With his loll'd tongue he faintly licks his
prey;
His warm breath blows her flix up as she lies;
She, trembling, creeps upon the ground
away,
And looks back to him with beseeching
eyes.

CXXXIII

The prince unjustly does his stars accuse,
Which hinder'd him to push his fortune
on; 530
For what they to his courage did refuse,
By mortal valor never must be done.

CXXXIV

This lucky hour the wise Batavian takes,
And warns his tatter'd fleet to follow
home:
Proud to have so got off with (q) From equal stakes, Horace Quos

CXXXV

The general's force, as kept alive by fight,
Now, not oppos'd, no longer can pursue:

Lasting till Heav'n had done his courage
right;
When he had conquer'd, he his weakness
knew. 540

CXXXVI

He casts a frown on the departing foe,
And sighs to see him quit the wat'ry
field:
His stern fix'd eyes no satisfaction show
For all the glories which the fight did yield.

CXXXVII

Tho', as when fiends did miracles avow,
He stands confess'd ev'n by the boastful
Dutch;
He only does his conquest disavow,
And thinks too little what they found too much.

CXXXVIII

Return'd, he with the fleet resolv'd to stay;
No tender thoughts of home his heart
divide; 550
Domestic joys and cares he puts away;
For realms are households which the great must guide.

CXXXIX

As those who unripe veins in mines explore,
On the rich bed again the warm turf lay,
Till time digests the yet imperfect ore,
And know it will be gold another day:

CXL

So looks our monarch on this early fight,
Th' essay and rudiments of great success;
Which all-maturing time must bring to
light,
While he, like Heav'n, does each day's labor bless. 560

CXLI

Heav'n ended not the first or second day,
Yet each was perfect to the work de-
sign'd:
God and kings work, when they their work
survey,
And passive aptness in all subjects find.

CXLII

In burden'd vessels first, with speedy care,
His plenteous stores do season'd timber
send:

Thither the brawny carpenters His Majesty repair, repairs the
 And as the surgeons of fleet.
 main'd ships attend.

CXLIII

With cord and canvas from rich Hamburg
 sent,
 His navies' molted wings he imps once
 more; 570
 Tall Norway fir, their masts in battle spent,
 And English oak, sprung leaks and planks, restore.

CXLIV

All hands employ'd, (r) the (r) Perret

 warm: similitude in Like laboring bees on a long summer's
 day,
 Some sound the trumpet for the rest to swarm,
 And some on bells of tasted lilies play;

CXLV

With gluey wax some new foundations lay
 Of virgin combs, which from the roof are hung;
 Some arm'd within doors upon duty stay,
 Or tend the sick, or educate the young. 575

CXLVI

So here, some pick out bullets from the sides,
 Some drive old oakum thro' each seam
 and rift:
 Their left hand does the calking-iron guide,
 The rattling mallet with the right they lift.

CXLVII

With boiling pitch another near at hand,
 From friendly Sweden brought, the seams instops:
 Which well paid o'er, the salt sea waves withstand,
 And shakes them from the rising beak in drops.

CXLVIII

Some the gall'd ropes with dauby marling
 bind,
 Or searcloth masts with strong tarpauling
 coats: 580

To try new shrouds one mounts into the
 wind,
 And one, below, their ease or stiffness notes.

CXLIX

Our careful monarch stands in person by,
 His new-cast cannons' firmness to explore:
 The strength of big-corn'd powder loves to
 try,
 And ball and cartrage sorts for every bore.

CL

Each day brings fresh supplies of arms
 and men,
 And ships which all last winter were
 abroad;
 And such as fitted since the fight had
 been,
 Or new from stocks were fall'n into the road. 600

 Like a rich bride does to the ocean swim,
 And on her shadow rides in floating

CLII

Her flag aloft, spread ruffling to the

 And sanguine streamers seem the flood

 The weaver, charm'd with what his loom
 design'd,
 Goes on to sea, and knows not to retire.

CLIII

With roomy decks, her guns of mighty

 Whose low-laid mouths each mounting

 Deep in her draught, and warlike in her

 She seems a sea-wasp flying on the waves.

CLIV

This martial present, piously design'd,
 The loyal city give their best-lov'd king:

And, with a bounty ample as the wind,
Built, fitted, and maintain'd, to aid him
bring.

Makes mighty things from small beginnings grow:
Thus fishes first to shipping did impart
Their tail the rudder, and their head the prow.

620

CLVI

Some log, perhaps, upon the waters swam,
An useless drift, which, rudely cut within,
And hollow'd, first a floating trough became,
And cross some riv'let passage did begin.

CLVII

In shipping such as this, the Irish kern,
And untaught Indian, on the stream did
glide:
Ere sharp-keel'd boats to stem the flood did learn,
Or fin-like oars did spread from either side.

CLVIII

Add but a sail, and Saturn so appear'd,
When from lost empire he to exile
went,
And with the golden age to Tiber steer'd,
Where coin and first commerce he did invent.

630

CLIX

Rude as their ships was navigation then;
No useful compass or meridian known;
Coasting, they kept the land within their ken,
And knew no North but when the Pole-star shone.

CLX

CLXI

But what so long in vain, and yet unknown,
By poor mankind's benighted wit is
sought,
Shall in this age to Britain first be shown,
And hence be to admiring nations taught.

CLXII

The ebbs of tides and their mysterious
flow,
We, as arts' elements, shall understand,
And as by line upon the ocean go,
Whose paths shall be familiar as the land.

CLXIII

(t) Instructed ships shall sail (t) By a

By which remotest regions measure of

Which makes one city of the universe;
Where some may gain, and all may be

CLXIV

Then, we upon our globe's last verge shall
go,
And view the ocean leaning on the sky:
From thence our rolling neighbors we shall
know,
And on the lunar world securely pry.

CLXV

This I foretell from your auspicious care,
Who great in search of God and Nature
grow;
Who best your wise Creator's praise declare, Apostrophe to the Royal Society.
Since best to praise his works is best to know. 660

CLXVI

O truly Royal! who behold the law
And rule of beings in your Maker's mind;
And thence, like limbecs, rich ideas draw,
To fit the level'd use of humankind.

CLXVII

But first the toils of war we must endure,
And from th' injurious Dutch redeem
the seas.
War makes the valiant of his right secure,
And gives up fraud to be chastis'd with ease.

CLXVIII

Already were the Belgians on our coast, Whose fleet more mighty every day became ⁶⁷⁰
 By late success, which they did falsely
 boast,
 And now by first appearing seem'd to claim.

CLXIX

Designing, subtile, diligent, and close,
 They knew to manage war with wise de-
 lay:
 Yet all those arts their vanity did cross,
 And, by their pride, their prudence did betray.

CLXX

Nor stay'd the English long; but, well supplied,
 Appear as numerous as th' insulting foe:
 The combat now by courage must be tried,
 And the success the braver nation show.

CLXXI

There was the Plymouth squadron now come in, ⁶⁸¹
 Which in the Straits last winter was
 abroad;
 Which twice on Biscay's working bay had
 been,
 And on the midland sea the French had aw'd.

CLXXII

Old expert Allen, loyal all along, Fam'd for his action on the Smyrna
 fleet;
 And Holmes, whose name shall live in epic
 song,
 While music numbers, or while verse
 has feet;

CLXXIII

Holmes, the Achates of the gen'ral's fight,
 Who first bewitch'd our eyes with Guinea
 gold, ⁶⁹⁰
 As once old Cato in the Romans' sight
 The tempting fruits of Afric did unfold.

CLXXIV

With him went Sprag, as bountiful as brave,
 Whom his high courage to command had
 brought;

Harman, who did the twice-fir'd Harry save,
 And in his burning ship undaunted fought;

CLXXV

Young Hollis, on a Muse by Mars begot, Born, Cæsar-like, to write and act great deeds:
 Impatient to revenge his fatal shot,
 His right hand doubly to his left succeeds.

CLXXVI

Thousands were there in darker fame that dwell, ⁷⁰¹
 Whose deeds some nobler poem shall
 adorn;
 And tho' to me unknown, they, sure, fought
 well,
 Whom Rupert led, and who were British born.

CLXXVII

Of every size an hundred fighting sail,
 So vast the navy now at anchor rides,
 That underneath it the press'd waters fail,
 And with its weight it shoulders off the tides.

CLXXVIII

Now, anchors weigh'd, the seamen shout so shrill,
 That heav'n, and earth, and the wide ocean rings; ⁷¹⁰
 A breeze from westward waits their sails to fill,
 And rests in those high beds his downy wings.

CLXXIX

The wary Dutch this gathering storm foresaw,
 And durst not bide it on the English
 coast:
 Behind their treach'rous shallows they with-
 draw,
 And there lay snares to catch the British host.

CLXXX

So the false spider, when her nets are
 spread,
 Deep ambush'd in her silent den does lie,
 And feels far off the trembling of her
 thread,
 Whose filmy cord should bind the struggling fly; ⁷²⁰

CLXXXI

Then, if at last she find him fast beset,
 She issues forth, and runs along her loom:
 She joys to touch the captive in her net,
 And drags the little wretch in triumph
 home.

CLXXXII

The Belgians hop'd that, with disorder'd
 haste,
 Our deep-cut keels upon the sands might
 run;
 Or, if with caution leisurely were pass'd,
 Their numerous gross might charge us
 one by one.

CLXXXIII

But with a fore-wind pushing them above,
 And swelling tide that heav'd them from
 below,
 O'er the blind flats our warlike squadrons
 move,
 And with spread sails to welcome battle
 go.

CLXXXIV

It seem'd as there the British Neptune
 stood,
 With all his hosts of waters at command,
 Beneath them to submit th' (u) Lerat ipse

CLXXXV

To the pale foes they suddenly draw near,
 And summon them to unexpected fight;
 They start like murderers when ghosts ap-
 pear,
 And draw their curtains in the dead of night.

CLXXXVI

Now van to van the foremost Second battle
 squadrons meet,
 The midmost battles hast'ning up behind;
 Who view, far off, the storm of falling sleet,
 And hear their thunder rattling in the wind.

CLXXXVII

At length the adverse admirals appear;
 (The two bold champions of each country's right:)

Their eyes describe the lists as they come
 near,
 And draw the lines of death before they
 fight.

CLXXXVIII

The distance judg'd for shot of every size,
 The linstocks touch, the pond'rous ball
 expires:
 The vig'rous seaman every porthole plies,
 And adds his heart to every gun he fires.

CLXXXIX

Fierce was the fight on the proud Belgians'
 side,
 For honor, which they seldom sought be-
 fore;
 But now they by their own vain boasts were tied,
 And fore'd at least in shew to prize it
 more.

CXCI

Nor long the Belgians could that fleet sus-tain,
 Which did two gen'ral's' fates, and 761
 Caesar's bear:
 Each several ship a victory did gain,
 As Rupert or as Albemarle were there.

CXCI

Their batter'd admiral too soon withdrew,
 Unthank'd by ours for his unfinish'd fight;
 But he the minds of his Dutch masters
 knew,
 Who call'd that providence which we call'd flight.

CXCII

Never did men more joyfully obey,
 Or sooner understood the sign to fly: 770
 With such alacrity they bore away,
 As if to praise them all the States stood by.

CXCIV

O famous leader of the Belgian fleet, Thy monument inscrib'd such praise shall
wear,
As Varro, timely flying, once did meet,
Because he did not of his Rome despair.

CXCV

Behold that navy, which a while before
Provok'd the tardy English close to fight,
Now draw their beaten vessels close to
shore,
As larks lie dar'd to shun the hobby's
flight. 780

CXCVI

Whoe'er would English monuments survey,
In other records may our courage know:
But let them hide the story of this day,
Whose fame was blemish'd by too base a foe.

CXCVII

Or if too busily they will enquire Into a victory which we dis-
dain;

Then let them know, the Belgians did retire

landers, rebel-ling, were

CXCIX

Our fathers bent their baneful industry
To check a monarchy that slowly grew;
But did not France or Holland's fate fore-
see,

Whose rising pow'r to swift dominion flew.

CC

In fortune's empire blindly thus we go,
And wander after pathless destiny;
Whose dark resorts since prudence cannot
know, 780
In vain it would provide for what shall be.

CCI

But whate'er English to the blest shall
go,
And the fourth Harry or first Orange
meet;
Find him disowning of a Burbon foe,
And him detesting a Batavian fleet.

CCII

Now on their coasts our conquering navy
rides,
Waylays their merchants, and their land
besets;
Each day new wealth without their care provides;
They lie asleep with prizes in their nets.

CCIII

So, close behind some promontory lie 809
The huge leviathans t' attend their prey;
And give no chase, but swallow in the fry,
Which thro' their gaping jaws mistake
the way.

CCIV

Nor was this all: in ports and roads remote, Destructive fires among whole fleets we
send;

Triumphant flames upon the Burning of the fleet in the water float,

And outbound ships at home
their voyage end.

CCV

Those various squadrons, variously de-
sign'd,

Each vessel freighted with a several load,
Each squadron waiting for a several wind,
All find but one, to burn them in the road.

CCVI

Some bound for Guinea, golden sand to find, Bore all the gauds the simple natives
wear; 822

Some, for the pride of Turkish courts de-
sign'd,
For folded turbants finest Holland bear.

CCVII

Some English wool, vex'd in a Belgian loom,
And into cloth of spongy softness made,
Did into France or colder Denmark doom,
To ruin with worse ware our staple trade.

CCVIII

Our greedy seamen rummage every hold,
 Smile on the booty of each wealthier chest;
 And, as the priests who with their gods
 make bold,
 Take what they like, and sacrifice the rest.

CCIX

But ah ! how unsincere are all our joys !
 Which, sent from heav'n, like lightning
 make no stay:
 Their palling taste the journey's length destroys,
 Or grief, sent post, o'ertakes Transit to the

 them on the way.

CCX

Swell'd with our late successes on the foe,
 Which France and Holland wanted power
 to cross,
 We urge an unseen fate to lay us low,
 And feed their envious eyes with English loss.

CCXI

Each element his dread command obeys,
 Who makes or ruins with a smile or
 frown;
 Who, as by one he did our nation raise,
 So now he with another pulls us down.

CCXII

Yet London, empress of the northern clime,
 By an high fate thou greatly didst expire: (y) Quam mors, quon-tollis corrup-
tuque regna cave
 (y) Great as the world's, which at the death of time Must fall, and rise a nobler frame by fire. Ardeat, &c — OVID

CCXIII

As when some dire usurper Heav'n provides To scourge his country with a lawless
 sway,
 His birth perhaps some petty village hides,
 And sets his cradle out of fortune's way,

CCXIV

Till fully ripe his swelling fate breaks out,
 And hurries him to mighty mischiefs on;
 His prince, surpris'd at first, no ill could doubt,
 And wants the pow'r to meet it when 't is
 known.

CCXV

Such was the rise of this prodigious fire,
 Which, in mean buildings first obscurely
 bred,
 From thence did soon to open streets aspire,
 And straight to palaces and temples spread.

CCXVI

The diligence of trades and noiseful gain,
 And luxury, more late, asleep were laid:
 All was the Night's, and in her silent reign
 No sound the rest of nature did invade.

CCXVII

In this deep quiet, from what source un-
 known,
 Those seeds of fire their fatal birth dis-
 close;
 And first, few scatt'ring sparks about were blown,
 Big with the flames that to our ruin rose.

CCXVIII

Then, in some close-pent room it crept along,
 And, smould'ring as it went, in silence
 fed;
 Till th' infant monster, with devouring
 strong,
 Walk'd boldly upright with exalted head.

CCXIX

Now, like some rich or mighty murderer,
 Too great for prison, which he breaks
 with gold;
 Who fresher for new mischiefs does appear,
 And dares the world to tax him with the old;

CCXX

So scapes th' insulting fire his narrow jail,
 And makes small outlets into open air;
 There the fierce winds his tender force
 assail,
 And beat him downward to his first repair.

CCXXI

(z) The winds, like crafty (z) Like craft-ty, &c. Hoc arte tracta bat cupidum virum, ut illius ani-mam inopia accenderet
 courtesans, withheld
 His flames from burning, but to blow them more:
 And, every fresh attempt, he is repell'd
 With faint denials, weaker than before.

CCXXXII

And now, no longer letted of his prey,
 He leaps up at it with inrag'd desire;
 O'erlooks the neighbors with a wide survey,
 And nods at every house his threat'ning
 fire.

CCXXXIII

The ghosts of traitors from the Bridge descend,
 With bold fanatic specters to rejoice; 890
 About the fire into a dance they bend,
 And sing their sabbath notes with feeble voice.

CCXXXIV

Our guardian angel saw them where he sate
 Above the palace of our slumb'ring king:
 He sigh'd, abandoning his charge to fate,
 And, drooping, oft look'd back upon the wing.

CCXXXV

At length the crackling noise and dreadful blaze
 Call'd up some waking lover to the sight;
 And long it was ere he the rest could
 raise,
 Whose heavy eyelids yet were full of
 night. 900

CCXXXVI

The next to danger, hot pursued by fate,
 Half-cloth'd, half-naked, hastily retire;
 And frighted mothers strike their breasts,
 too late,
 For helpless infants left amidst the fire.

CCXXXVII

Their cries soon waken all the dwellers
 near;
 Now murmuring noises rise in every street;
 The more remote run stumbling with their
 fear,
 And in the dark men jostle as they meet.

CCXXXVIII

So weary bees in little cells repose;
 But if night-robbers lift the well-stor'd hive, 910
 An humming thro' their waxen city grows,
 And out upon each other's wings they drive.

CCXXXIX

Now streets grow throng'd and busy as by
 day:
 Some run for buckets to the hallow'd choir:
 Some cut the pipes, and some the engines
 play;
 And some more bold mount ladders to the fire.

CCXXX

In vain; for from the East a Belgian wind
 His hostile breath thro' the dry rafters
 sent;
 The flames impell'd soon left their foes behind,
 And forward with a wanton fury went. 920

CCXXXI

A key of fire ran all along the shore,
 (a) And lighten'd all the river (a) Sigæa igni
 with a blaze; freta lata re-
 The waken'd tides began again lucent. —
 to roar, VIRG.
 And wond'ring fish in shining waters gaze.

CCXXXII

Old father Thames rais'd up his reverend
 head,
 But fear'd the fate of Simoeis would return:
 Deep in his ooze he sought his sedgy bed,
 And shrunk his waters back into his urn.

CCXXXIII

The fire, meantime, walks in a broader gross;
 To either hand his wings he opens wide:
 He wades the streets, and straight he reaches cross, 931
 And plays his longing flames on th' other side.

CCXXXIV

At first they warm, then scorch, and then they take;
 Now with long necks from side to side
 they feed;
 At length, grown strong, their mother-fire
 forsake,
 And a new colony of flames succeed.

CCXXXV

To every nobler portion of the town
 The curling billows roll their restless
 tide:

In parties now they straggle up and down,
As armies, unoppos'd, for prey divide. 940

CCXXXVI

One mighty squadron, with a side-wind
sped,
Thro' narrow lanes his cumber'd fire
does haste,
By pow'rful charms of gold and silver led,
The Lombard bankers and the Change to waste.

CCXXXVII

Another backward to the Tow'r would go,
And slowly eats his way against the
wind;
But the main body of the marching foe
Against th' imperial palace is design'd.

CCXXXVIII

Now day appears, and with the day the
king,
Whose early care had robb'd him of his
rest: 950
Far off the cracks of falling houses ring,
And shrieks of subjects pierce his tender
breast.

CCXXXIX

Near as he draws, thick harbingers of smoke
With gloomy pillars cover all the place;
Whose little intervals of night are broke
By sparks that drive against his sacred
face.

CCXL

More than his guards his sorrows made him known,
And pious tears, which down his cheeks
did show'r:
The wretched in his grief forgot their own;
(So much the pity of a king has pow'r.)

CCXLI

He wept the flames of what he lov'd so
well, 960
And what so well had merited his love;
For never prince in grace did more excel,
Or royal city more in duty strove.

CCXLII

Nor with an idle care did he behold:
(Subjects may grieve, but monarchs must redress;)

He cheers the fearful, and commends the
bold,
And makes despairers hope for good success.

CCXLIII

Himself directs what first is to be done,
And orders all the succors which they
bring: 970
The helpful and the good about him run,
And form an army worthy such a king.

CCXLIV

He sees the dire contagion spread so fast,
That, where it seizes, all relief is vain;
And therefore must unwillingly lay waste
That country which would, else, the foe maintain.

CCXLV

The powder blows up all before the fire:
Th' amazed flames stand gather'd on a heap;
And from the precipice's brink retire,
Afraid to venture on so large a leap. 980

CCXLVI

Thus fighting fires a while themselves consume,
But straight, like Turks, forc'd on to win
or die,
They first lay tender bridges of their fume,
And o'er the breach in unctuous vapors
fly.

CCXLVII

Part stays for passage, till a gust of wind
Ships o'er their forces in a shining sheet:
Part, creeping under ground, their journey
blind,
And, climbing from below, their fellows
meet.

CCXLVIII

Thus to some desert plain, or old wood-side,
Dire night-hags come from far to dance their round; 990
And o'er broad rivers on their fiends they
ride,
Or sweep in clouds above the blasted
ground.

CCXLIX

No help avails: for, hydra-like, the fire
Lifts up his hundred heads to aim his way;

And scarce the wealthy can one half retire,
Before he rushes in to share the prey.

CCL

The rich grow suppliant, and the poor grow
proud;
Those offer mighty gain, and these ask
more:
So void of pity is th' ignoble crowd,
When others' ruin may increase their store. 1000

CCLI

As those who live by shores with joy behold
Some wealthy vessel split or stranded
nigh,
And from the rocks leap down for ship-
wrack'd gold,
And seek the tempests which the others
fly:

CCLII

So these but wait the owners' last despair,
And what's permitted to the flames in-
vade:
Ev'n from their jaws they hungry morsels
tear,
And on their backs the spoils of Vulcan lade.

CCLIII

The days were all in this lost labor spent;
And when the weary king gave place to
night, 1001
His beams he to his royal brother lent,
And so shone still in his reflective light.

CCLIV

Night came, but without darkness or re-
pose,
A dismal picture of the gen'ral doom;
Where souls distracted, when the trumpet
blows,
And half unready with their bodies come.

CCLV

Those who have homes, when home they do
repair,
To a last lodging call their wand'ring
friends:
Their short uneasy sleeps are broke with
care,
To look how near their own destruction tends. 1020

CCLVI

Those who have none, sit round where once it was,
And with full eyes each wonted room require;
Haunting the yet warm ashes of the place,
As murder'd men walk where they did expire.

CCLVII

Some stir up coals, and watch the vestal fire,
Others in vain from sight of ruin run;
And, while thro' burning lab'rinth they retire,
With loathing eyes repeat what they would shun.

CCLVIII

The most in fields like herded beasts lie
down,
To dews obnoxious on the grassy floor;
And while their babes in sleep their sorrows
drown, 1031
Sad parents watch the remnants of their store.

CCLIX

While by the motion of the flames they guess
What streets are burning now, and what are near,
An infant, waking, to the paps would press,
And meets, instead of milk, a falling tear.

CCLX

No thought can ease them but their sovereign's care,
Whose praise th' afflicted as their comfort sing:
Ev'n those whom want might drive to just despair. 1039
Think life a blessing under such a king.

CCLXI

Meantime he sadly suffers in their grief,
Out-weeps an hermit, and out-prays a saint:
All the long night he studies their relief,
How they may be supplied, and he may want.

CCLXII

"O God," said he, "thou pa- King's prayer.
tron of my days,
Guide of my youth in exile and distress!

Who me unfriended brought'st by wondrous ways,
The kingdom of my fathers to possess:

CCLXIII

"Be thou my judge, with what unwearied
care
I since have labor'd for my people's
good;
To bind the bruises of a civil war,
And stop the issues of their wasting blood.

CCLXIV

"Thou, who hast taught me to forgive the
ill,
And recompense, as friends, the good misled;
If mercy be a precept of thy will,
Return that mercy on thy servant's head.

CCLXV

"Or, if my heedless youth has stepp'd astray,
Too soon forgetful of thy gracious hand;
On me alone thy just displeasure lay,
But take thy judgments from this mourning land.

CCLXVI

"We all have sinn'd, and thou hast laid us
low,
As humble earth from whence at first we
came:
Like flying shades before the clouds we
show,
And shrink like parchment in consuming flame.

CCLXVII

"O let it be enough what thou hast done;
When spotted deaths ran arm'd thro'
every street,
With poison'd darts, which not the good could shun,
The speedy could out-fly, or valiant meet.

CCLXVIII

"The living few, and frequent funerals
then,
Proclaim'd thy wrath on this forsaken
place;
And now those few who are return'd again,
Thy searching judgments to their dwellings trace.

CCLXIX

"O pass not, Lord, an absolute decree,
Or bind thy sentence unconditional;
But in thy sentence our remorse foresee,
And, in that foresight, this thy doom recall.

CCLXX

"Thy threatings, Lord, as thine thou mayst revoke;
But, if immutable and fix'd they stand,
Continue still thyself to give the stroke,
And let not foreign foes oppress thy
land."

CCLXXI

Th' Eternal heard, and from the heav'nly
choir
Chose out the cherub with the flaming
sword;
And bade him swiftly drive th' approaching
fire
From where our naval magazins were stor'd.

CCLXXII

The blessed minister his wings display'd.
And like a shooting star he cleft the
night;
He charg'd the flames, and those that dis-obey'd
He lash'd to duty with his sword of
light.

CCLXXIII

The fugitive flames, chastis'd, went forth to prey
On pious structures, by our fathers-
rear'd;
By which to heav'n they did affect the way,
Ere faith in churchmen without works was heard.

CCLXXIV

The wanting orphans saw with wat'ry eyes
Their founders' charity in dust laid low;
And sent to God their ever-answer'd cries,
(For he protects the poor, who made them so.)

CCLXXV

Nor could thy fabric, Paul's, defend thee
long,
Tho' thou wert sacred to thy Maker's
praise;

Tho' made immortal by a poet's song,
And poets' songs the Theban walls could raise. 1100

CCLXXVI

The daring flames peep'd in, and saw from
far
The awful beauties of the sacred choir;
But, since it was profan'd by civil war,
Heav'n thought it fit to have it purg'd by
fire.

CCLXXVII

Now down the narrow streets it swiftly
came,
And, widely opening, did on both sides
prey:
This benefit we sadly owe the flame,
If only ruin must enlarge our way.

CCLXXVIII

And now four days the sun had seen our woes;
Four nights the moon beheld th' incessant fire: 1110
It seem'd as if the stars more sickly rose,
And farther from the fev'rish north retire.

CCLXXIX

In th' empyrean heaven, (the blest abode,)
The Thrones and the Dominions prostrate lie,
Not daring to behold their angry God;
And an hush'd silence damps the tuneful
sky.

CCLXXX

At length th' Almighty cast a pitying eye,
And mercy softly touch'd his melting
breast:
He saw the town's one half in rubbish lie,
And eager flames drive on to storm the
rest. 1120

CCLXXXI

An hollow crystal pyramid he takes,
In firmamental waters dipp'd above;
Of it a broad extinguisher he makes
And hoods the flames that to their quarry strove.

CCLXXXII

The vanquish'd fires withdraw from every
place,
Or, full with feeding, sink into a sleep:

Each household genius shews again his face,
And from the hearths the little Lares
creep.

CCLXXXIII

Our king this more than natural change
beholds;
With sober joy his heart and eyes
abound: 1130
To the All-good his lifted hands he folds,
And thanks him low on his redeemed
ground.

CCLXXXIV

As when sharp frosts had long constrain'd
the earth,
A kindly thaw unlocks it with mild rain;
And first the tender blade peeps up to birth,
And straight the green fields laugh with promis'd grain:

CCLXXXV

By such degrees the spreading gladness
grew
In every heart which fear had froze be-
fore;
The standing streets with so much joy they
view,
That with less grief the perish'd they deplore. 1140

CCLXXXVI

The father of the people open'd wide
His stores, and all the poor with plenty
fed:
Thus God's anointed God's own place supplied,
And fill'd the empty with his daily bread.

CCLXXXVII

This royal bounty brought its own reward,
And in their minds so deep did print the
sense,
That if their ruins sadly they regard,
'Tis but with fear the sight might drive him thence.

CCLXXXVIII

But so may he live long, that town to sway,
Which by his auspice they will nobler make, 1150 City's request
As he will hatch their ashes by to the king his stay, not to leave
And not their humble ruins now forsake.

CCCLXXXIX

They have not lost their loyalty by fire;
 Nor is their courage or their wealth so
 low,
 That from his wars they poorly would retire,
 Or beg the pity of a vanquish'd foe.

CCXC

Not with more constancy the Jews of
 old,
 By Cyrus from rewarded exile sent,
 Their royal city did in dust behold, ¹¹⁵⁹
 Or with more vigor to rebuild it went.

CCXCI

The utmost malice of their stars is past,
 And two dire comets, which have scourg'd
 the town,
 In their own plague and fire have breath'd their last,
 Or, dimly, in their sinking sockets frown.

CCXCII

Now frequent trines the happier lights
 among,
 And high-rais'd Jove, from his dark prison freed,
 ('Those weights took off that on his planet hung,)
 Will gloriously the new-laid works succeed.

CCXCIII

Metinks already, from this chymic flame,
 I see a city of more precious mold, ¹¹⁷⁰
 Rich as the town which gives ^{(b) Mexico.}
 the (b) Indies name,
 With silver pav'd, and all divine with gold.

CCXCIV

Already, laboring with a mighty fate,
 She shakes the rubbish from her mounting brow,
 And seems to have renew'd her charter's
 date,
 Which Heav'n will to the death of time allow.

CCXCV

More great than human, now, and more
 (c) august,
 New-deified she from her ^{(c) Augusta,} fires does rise: ^{the old name} of London.

Her widening streets on new foundations trust, ¹¹⁷⁹
 And, opening, into larger parts she flies.

CCXCVI

Before, she like some shepherdess did show,
 Who sate to bathe her by a river's side;
 Not answering to her fame, but rude and
 low,
 Nor taught the beauteous arts of modern pride.

CCXCVII

Now, like a maiden queen, she will behold,
 From her high turrets, hourly suitors
 come:
 The East with incense, and the West with
 gold,
 Will stand, like suppliants, to receive her doom.

CCXCVIII

The silver Thames, her own domestic flood, Shall bear her vessels like a sweeping train; ¹¹⁹²
 And often wind, (as of his mistress proud,)
 With longing eyes to meet her face
 again.

CCXCIX

The wealthy Tagus, and the wealthier Rhine,
 The glory of their towns no more shall
 boast;
 And Seine, that would with Belgian rivers
 join,
 Shall find her luster stain'd, and traffic
 lost.

CCC

The vent'rous merchant, who design'd more
 far,
 And touches on our hospitable shore,
 Charm'd with the splendor of this northern star,
 Shall here unlade him, and depart no more. ¹²⁰⁰

CCCI

Our pow'rful navy shall no longer meet,
 The wealth of France or Holland to in-
 vade;
 The beauty of this town, without a fleet,
 From all the world shall vindicate her trade.

CCCII

And, while this fam'd emporium we prepare,
The British ocean shall such triumphs
boast,
That those who now disdain our trade to share,
Shall rob like pirates on our wealthy coast.

CCCIII

Already we have conquer'd half the war,
And the less dang'rous part is left behind;

Our trouble now is but to make them
dare,
And not so great to vanquish as to find. ¹²¹¹

CCCV

Thus to the eastern wealth thro' storms we
go,
But now, the Cape once doubled, fear no
more;
A constant trade-wind will securely blow,
And gently lay us on the spicy shore.

POEMS WRITTEN BETWEEN 1667 AND 1680

PROLOGUE, EPILOGUE, AND SONG FROM SECRET LOVE

OR, THE MAIDEN QUEEN

[Pepys saw "The Maiden Queen, a new play of Dryden's," on March 2, 1667. The play was entered on the Stationers' Register on August 7 of that year (Malone, I, 1, 69); the first edition is dated 1668. The epilogue printed with the play was "by a person of honor;" that given below is taken from The Covent Garden Drollery, a small miscellany published in 1672, which contains a large number of prologues and epilogues, some of them known to be by Dryden. There is, however, no absolute proof that the present epilogue is his work. The song is one which the Maiden Queen "made of" her lover Philocles and "call'd . . . Secret Love."]]

PROLOGUE

I

HE who writ this, not without pains and thought
From French and English theaters has
brought
Th' exactest rules by which a play is wrought:

II

The unities of action, place, and time;
The scenes unbroken; and a mingled chime
Of Jonson's humor with Corneille's rhyme.

III

But while dead colors he with care did lay,
He fears his wit or plot he did not weigh,
Which are the living beauties of a play.

IV

Plays are like towns, which, howe'er fortified
By engineers, have still some weaker side
By the o'er-seen defendant unespied. ¹⁰

V

And with that art you make approaches now;
Such skilful fury in assaults you show,
That every poet without shame may bow.

VI

Ours therefore humbly would attend your
doom,
If, soldier-like, he may have terms to come
With flying colors and with beat of drum.

[The PROLOGUE goes out, and stays while a tune is play'd, after which he returns again]

SECOND PROLOGUE

I had forgot one half, I do protest, ¹⁹
And now am sent again to speak the rest.
He bows to every great and noble wit;
But to the little Hectors of the pit }
Our poet's sturdy, and will not submit. }
He'll be beforehand with 'em, and not stay
To see each peevish critic stab his play:
Each puny censor, who, his skill to boast,
Is cheaply witty on the poet's cost.
No critic's verdict should of right stand
good;
They are excepted all, as men of blood;
And the same law should shield him from their fury ³⁰
Which has excluded butchers from a jury.
You'd all be wits —
But writing's tedious, and that way may fail;

The most compendious method is to rail;
Which you so like, you think yourselves ill
us'd

When in smart prologues you are not abus'd.

A civil prologue is approv'd by no man;
You hate it as you do a civil woman:
Your fancy's pall'd, and liberally you pay
To have it quicken'd, ere you see a play;
Just as old sinners, worn from their de-
light,

Give money to be whipp'd to appetite.
But what a pox keep I so much ado
To save our poet? He is one of you;
A brother judgment, and, as I hear say,
A cursed critic as e'er damn'd a play.
Good salvage gentlemen, your own kind
spare;

He is, like you, a very wolf or bear.
Yet think not he'll your ancient rights in-
vade,

Or stop the course of your free damning
trade;

For he, he vows, at no friend's play can sit,
But he must needs find fault to shew his
wit.

Then, for his sake, ne'er stint your own de-
light;

Throw boldly, for he sets to all that write:
With such he ventures on an even lay,
For they bring ready money into play.

Those who write not, and yet all writers
nick,

Are bankrupt gamesters, for they damn on tick.

EPILOGUE

THE Prologue durst not tell, before 't was
seen,

The plot we had to swinge *The Maiden
Queen*;

For had we then discover'd our intent,
The fop who writ it had not giv'n consent.
Or the new peaching trick at least had
shown,

And brought in others' faults to hide his
own.

That wit he has been by his betters taught,
When he's accus'd to shew another's fault.
When one wit's hunted hard, by joint consent

Another claps betwixt and does prevent } His death, for many hares still foil the scent.

Thus our poor poet would have scap'd to-
day,

But from the herd I singled out his play.

Then heigh along with me —

Both great and small, you poets of the town,

And Nell will love you, [f]or to run him
down.

SONG

I

I FEED a flame within, which so torments
me,

That it both pains my heart, and yet contents me:

'Tis such a pleasing smart, and I so love it,
That I had rather die than once remove it.

II

Yet he for whom I grieve shall never know it;

My tongue does not betray, nor my eyes
show it:

Not a sigh, nor a tear, my pain discloses,
But they fall silently, like dew on roses.

III

Thus to prevent my love from being cruel,
My heart 's the sacrifice, as 't is the fuel: 10
And while I suffer this, to give him quiet,
My faith rewards my love, tho' he deny it.

IV

On his eyes will I gaze, and there delight
me;

Where I conceal my love, no frown can fright me:

To be more happy, I dare not aspire;
Nor can I fall more low, mounting no higher.

PROLOGUE AND EPILOGUE TO THE WILD GALLANT, REVIV'D

[See note on p. 18, above.]

PROLOGUE

As some raw squire, by tender mother bred,
Till one and twenty keeps his maiden-
head,

(Pleas'd with some sport, which he alone does find,

And thinks a secret to all humankind,
 Till mightily in love, yet half afraid,
 He first attempts the gentle dairymaid.
 Succeeding there, and led by the renown
 Of Whetstone's Park, he comes at length to
 town,
 Where enter'd, by some school-fellow or
 friend,
 He grows to break glass windows in the end: 10
 His valor too, which with the watch began,
 Proceeds to duel, and he kills his man.
 By such degrees, while knowledge he did
 want,
 Our unfletch'd author writ a Wild Gallant.
 He thought him monstrous lewd (I'll lay my life)
 Because suspected with his landlord's wife;
 But, since his knowledge of the town began,
 He thinks him now a very civil man;
 And, much asham'd of what he was be-
 fore,
 Has fairly play'd him at three wenches
 more. 20
 'T is some amends his frailties to confess:
 Pray pardon him his want of wickedness.
 He's towardly, and will come on apace;
 His frank confession shows he has some
 grace.
 You balk'd him when he was a young beginner,
 And almost spoil'd a very hopeful sinner;
 But, if once more you slight his weak in-deavor,
 For aught I know, he may turn tail for ever.

EPILOGUE

Of all dramatic writing, comie wit,
 As 't is the best, so 't is most hard to hit,
 For it lies all in level to the eye,
 Where all may judge, and each defect may spy.
 Humor is that which every day we meet,
 And therefore known as every public street;
 In which, if e'er the poet go astray,
 You all can point, 't was there he lost his
 way.
 But, what's so common, to make pleasant
 too,
 Is more than any wit can always do. 10
 For 't is like Turks, with hen and rice to treat;

To make regalias out of common meat.
 But, in your diet, you grow salvages:
 Nothing but human flesh your taste can
 please;
 And, as their feasts with slaughter'd slaves
 began,
 So you, at each new play, must have a
 man.
 Hither you come, as to see prizes fought;
 If no blood 's drawn, you cry, the prize is naught.
 But fools grow wary now; and, when they
 see
 A poet cyeing round the company, 20 Straight each man for himself begins to doubt;
 They shrink like seamen when a press comes
 out.
 Few of 'em will be found for public use,
 Except you charge an oaf upon each house,
 Like the trainbands, and every man ingage
 For a sufficient fool, to serve the stage.
 And when, with much ado, you get him
 there,
 Where he in all his glory should appear,
 Your poets make him such rare things to say,
 That he's more wit than any man i' th'
 play: 30
 But of so ill a mingle with the rest,
 As when a parrot's taught to break a jest.
 Thus, aiming to be fine, they make a show,
 As tawdry squires in country churches
 do.
 Things well consider'd, 't is so hard to make
 A comedy which should the knowing take,
 That our dull poet, in despair to please,
 Does humbly beg, by me, his writ of ease.
 'T is a land tax, which he's too poor to pay;
 You therefore must some other impost
 lay. 40
 Would you but change, for serious plot and verse,
 This motley garniture of fool and farce,
 Nor scorn a mode, because 't is taught at
 home,
 Which does, like vests, our gravity become,
 Our poet yields you should this play refuse:
 As tradesmen, by the change of fashions,
 lose,
 With some content, their fripperies of France,
 In hope it may their staple trade advance.

PROLOGUE, EPILOGUE, AND SONGS FROM SIR MARTIN
MAR-ALL

OR, THE FEIGN'D INNOCENCE

[This comedy is an adaptation of Molière's L'Étourdi. Downes states that the Duke of Newcastle gave Dryden a bare translation from Molière, which our poet adapted for the English stage. Pepys saw the play on August 16, 1667, when he terms it "the new play acted yesterday . . . made by my Lord Duke of Newcastle, but, as everybody says, corrected by Dryden." It was entered on the Stationers' Register June 24, 1668 (Malone, I. i, 93), as the Duke's play, and published anonymously in that year. Dryden's name did not appear on the title-page until 1691.

The first song is printed also in Westminster Drollery; or, a Choice Collection of the Newest Songs and Poems, 1671.]

PROLOGUE

FOOLS, which each man meets in his dish
each day,
Are yet the great regalios of a play;
In which to poets you but just appear.
To prize that highest which cost them so
dear.

Fops in the town more easily will pass;
One story makes a statutable ass:
But such in plays must be much thicker sown,
Like yolks of eggs, a dozen beat to one.
Observing poets all their walks invade,
As men watch woodcocks gliding thro' a glade;

And when they have enough for comedy,
They stow their several bodies in a pie:
The poet's but the cook to fashion it,
For, gallants, you yourselves have found the wit.

To bid you welcome would your bounty
wrong;

None welcome those who bring their cheer
along.

EPILOGUE

As country vicars, when the sermon's
done,

Run huddling to the benediction;
Well knowing, tho' the better sort may
stay,

The vulgar rout will run unblest away:

So we, when once our play is done, make
haste

With a short epilogue to close your taste.
In thus withdrawing we seem mannerly,
But when the curtain's down we peep and
see

A jury of the wits who still stay late,
And in their club decree the poor play's
fate:

Their verdict back is to the boxes brought;
Thence all the town pronounces it their
thought.

Thus, gallants, we like Lilly can foresee;
But if you ask us what our doom will
be,

We by to-morrow will our fortune cast,
As he tells all things when the year is past.

SONGS

I

I

MAKE ready, fair lady, to-night,
And stand at the door below;
For I will be there
To receive you with care,
And to your true love you shall go.

II

THE LADY'S ANSWER

And when the stars twinkle so bright,
Then down to the door will I creep;
To my love will I fly,
Ere the jealous can spy,
And leave my old daddy asleep.

II

I

BLIND love, to this hour,
Had never, like me, a slave under his power.

Then blest be the dart
That he threw at my heart,
For nothing can prove
A joy so great as to be wounded with love.

II

My days and my nights
Are fill'd to the purpose with sorrows and
frights:
From my heart still I sigh,
And my eyes are ne'er dry;

So that, Cupid be prais'd,
I am to the top of love's happiness rais'd.

III

My soul's all on fire,
So that I have the pleasure to dote and desire:
Such a pretty soft pain
That it tickles each vein;
'T is the dream of a smart,
Which makes me breathe short when it beats at my heart.

IV

Sometimes in a pet,
When I am despis'd, I my freedom would get;
But straight a sweet smile
Does my anger beguile,
And my heart does recall;
Then the more I do struggle, the lower I fall.

V

Heaven does not impart
Such a grace as to love unto ev'ry one's
heart;
For many may wish
To be wounded, and miss:
Then blest be love's fire,
And more blest her eyes that first taught me desire.

PROLOGUE AND EPILOGUE TO THE TEMPEST

OR, THE ENCHANTED ISLAND

[This play was an adaptation and debasement of Shakespeare, by Sir William Davenant and Dryden. It was first acted, as the prologue shows, in 1667. Pepys saw a first-day production of The Tempest, undoubtedly this version, on November 7 of that year. It was not printed until 1670. The style of prologue and epilogue clearly shows them to be the work of the younger adapter.]

PROLOGUE

As, when a tree's cut down, the secret root Lives under ground, and thence new branches shoot;
So from old Shakespeare's honor'd dust,
this day

Springs up and buds a new reviving play:
Shakespeare, who (taught by none) did first impart

To Fletcher wit, to laboring Jonson art.
He, monarch-like, gave those, his subjects,
law;

And is that nature which they paint and
draw.

Fletcher reach'd that which on his heights
did grow,

Whilst Jonson crept, and gather'd all below.
This did his love, and this his mirth digest:
One imitates him most, the other best.

If they have since outwrit all other men,
'T is with the drops which fell from Shakespeare's pen.

The storm which vanish'd on the neigh-b'ring shore,

Was taught by Shakespeare's Tempest first
to roar.

That innocence and beauty which did smile
In Fletcher, grew on this Enchanted Isle.

But Shakespeare's magic could not copied
be;

Within that circle none durst walk but he. 20
I must confess 't was bold, nor would you now

That liberty to vulgar wits allow,
Which works by magic supernatural things;
But Shakespeare's pow'r is sacred as a king's.

Those legends from old priesthood were re-
ceiv'd,

And he then writ, as people then believ'd.
But if for Shakespeare we your grace im-
plore,

We for our theater shall want it more:
Who by our dearth of youths are forc'd
t' employ

One of our women to present a boy; 30
And that's a transformation, you will say,
Exceeding all the magic in the play.

Let none expect in the last act to find
Her sex transform'd from man to woman-
kind.

Whate'er she was before the play began,
All you shall see of her is perfect man.
Or if your fancy will be farther led
To find her woman, it must be abed.

EPILOGUE

GALLANTS, by all good signs it does appear
That sixty-seven's a very damning year,
For knaves abroad, and for ill poets here.

Among the Muses there 's a gen'ral rot:
The rhyming Mounseieur and the Spanish
plot,
Defy or court, all 's one, they go to pot.

The ghosts of poets walk within this place,
And haunt us actors wheresoe'er we pass,
In visions bloodier than King Richard's
was. 9

For this poor wretch he has not much to say,
But quietly brings in his part o' th' play,
And begs the favor to be damn'd to-day.

He sends me only like a sh'riff's man here,
To let you know the malefactor 's near,
And that he means to die en cavalier.

For if you should be gracious to his pen,
Th' example will prove ill to other men,
And you 'll be troubled with 'em all again.

PROLOGUE TO ALBUMAZAR, REVIV'D

[This play was written by Thomas Tomkis, of Trinity College, Cambridge, where it was acted March 9, 1615, on the occasion of a visit by King James I. Pepys saw a revival of it, doubtless that for which Dryden wrote this prologue, on February 22, 1668. The prologue is printed anonymously in the Covent Garden Drollery, 1672; and with Dryden's name in Miscellany Poems, 1684, from which this text is taken.

Since The Alchemist was acted in 1610, there is no possible truth in Dryden's assertion in lines 5-10.]

To say, this comedy pleas'd long ago,
Is not enough to make it pass you now.
Yet, gentlemen, your ancestors had wit;
When few men censur'd, and when fewer
writ.

And Jonson, of those few the best, chose
this,

As the best model of his masterpiece.
Subtle was got by our Albumazar,
That Alchymist by his Astrologer;
Here he was fashion'd, and we may suppose

He lik'd the fashion well, who wore the clothes. 10

But Ben made nobly his what he did mold;
What was another's lead becomes his gold:

Like an unrighteous conqueror he reigns,
Yet rules that well, which he unjustly gains.
But this our age such authors does afford,
As make whole plays, and yet scarce write
one word;

Who, in this anarchy of wit, rob all,
And what 's their plunder, their possession
call;

Who, like bold padders, scorn by night to
prey,

But rob by sunshine, in the face of day: 20
Nay, scarce the common ceremony use Of: "Stand, sir, and deliver up your Muse;"

But knock the poet down, and, with a
grace,

Mount Pegasus before the owner's face.
Faith, if you have such country Toms
abroad,

'T is time for all true men to leave that
road.

Yet it were modest, could it but be said,
They strip the living, but these rob the dead;

Dare with the mummies of the Muses play,
And make love to them the Egyptian
way; 30

Or, as a rhyming author would have said,
Join the dead living to the living dead.
Such men in poetry may claim some part:
They have the license, tho' they want the
art;

And might, where theft was prais'd, for Laureats stand,

Poets, not of the head, but of the hand.
They make the benefits of others' study-
ing,

Much like the meals of politic Jack-Pudding,

Whose dish to challenge no man has the courage;

'T is all his own, when once h' has spit i'
th' porridge. 40

But, gentlemen, you 're all concern'd in
this;

You are in fault for what they do amiss:
For they their thefts still undiscover'd think,

And durst not steal, unless you please to wink.

Perhaps, you may award by your decree,
They should refund; but that can never be.
For should you letters of reprisal seal,
These men write that which no man else would steal.

PROLOGUE, EPILOGUE, AND SONGS FROM AN EVENING'S
LOVE

OR, THE MOCK ASTROLOGER

[Mrs. Pepys saw this "new play" by Dryden on June 19, 1668. It was entered on the Stationers' Register on November 20 of that year (Malone, I, 1, 93), but was not printed until 1671, when two slightly different editions appeared. The fourth song is printed also in Westminster Drollery; or, a Choice Collection of the Newest Songs and Poems, 1671.]

PROLOGUE

WHEN first our poet set himself to write,
Like a young bridegroom on his wedding-
night
He laid about him, and did so bestir him,
His Muse could never lie in quiet for him:
But now his honeymoon is gone and past,
Yet the ungrateful drudgery must last,
And he is bound, as civil husbands do,
To strain himself, in complaisance to you;
To write in pain, and counterfeit a bliss
Like the faint smackings of an after-kiss. 10
But you, like wives ill-pleas'd, supply his
want:
Each writing Monsieur is a fresh gallant;
And tho', perhaps, 't was done as well be-
fore,
Yet still there 's something in a new amour.
Your several poets work with several tools:
One gets you wits, another gets you fools;
This pleases you with some by-stroke of
wit,
This finds some cranny that was never hit.
But should these jaunty lovers daily come
To do your work, like your good man at
home, 20
Their fine small-timber'd wits would soon
decay:
These are gallants but for a holiday.
Others you had who oft'ner have appear'd,
Whom for mere impotence you have cashier'd:
Such as at first came on with pomp and glory,
But, over-straining, soon fell flat before ye.
Their useless weight with patience long was borne,
But at the last you threw 'em off with scorn.

As for the poet of this present night,
Tho' now he claims in you an husband's
right, 30
He will not hinder you of fresh delight.
He, like a seaman, seldom will appear;
And means to trouble home but thrice a
year:
That only time from your gallants he'll borrow;
Be kind to-day, and cuckold him to-morrow.

EPILOGUE

My part being small, I have had time to-
day
To mark your various censures of our play:
First, looking for a judgment or a wit,
Like Jews I saw 'em scatter'd thro' the pit;
And where a knot of smilers lent an ear
To one that talk'd, I knew the foe was
there.
The club of jests went round; he who had none Borrow'd o' th' next, and told it for his
own.
Among the rest they kept a fearful stir
In whispering that he stole th' Astrologer; 10
And said, betwixt a French and English plot
He eas'd his half-tir'd Muse, on pace and trot.
Up starts a Mounsieur, new come o'er and warm
In the French stoop, and the pull-back o'
th' arm:
"Morbieu," dit-il, and cocks, "I am a rogue,
But he has quite spoil'd The Feign'd Astrologue."
"Pox," says another, "here 's so great a stir
With a son of a whore farce that 's regular;
A rule, where nothing must decorum shock!
Damme 'ts as dull as dining by the clock. 20
An evening! Why the devil should we be vex'd
Whether he gets the wench this night or next?"
When I heard this, I to the poet went,
Told him the house was full of discontent,
And ask'd him what excuse he could invent.
He neither swore nor storm'd as poets do,
But, most unlike an author, vow'd 't was
true;
Yet said, he us'd the French like enemies,

And did not steal their plots, but made 'em
prize.
But should he all the pains and charges
count
Of taking 'em, the bill so high would³⁰
mount
That, like prize-goods, which thro' the office come,
He could have had 'em much more cheap
at home.
He still must write, and, banquier-like, each
day
Accept new bills, and he must break or pay.
When thro' his hands such sums must yearly run,
You cannot think the stock is all his own.
His haste his other errors might excuse,
But there's no mercy for a guilty Muse;³⁹
For, like a mistress, she must stand or fall,
And please you to a height, or not at all.

SONGS

I

I
You charm'd me not with that fair face,
Tho' it was all divine:
To be another's is the grace
That makes me wish you mine.

II

The gods and Fortune take their part,
Who like young monarchs fight,
And boldly dare invade that heart
Which is another's right.

III

First, mad with hope, we undertake
To pull up every bar;
But, once possess'd, we faintly make¹⁰
A dull defensive war.

IV

Now, every friend is turn'd a foe,
In hope to get our store;
And passion makes us cowards grow,
Which made us brave before.

II

I

AFTER the pangs of a desperate lover, When day and night I have sigh'd all in
vain,

Ah what a pleasure it is to discover,
In her eyes pity, who causes my pain.

II

When with unkindness our love at a stand
is,
And both have punish'd ourselves with
the pain,
Ah what a pleasure the touch of her hand
is,
Ah what a pleasure to press it again!

III

When the denial comes fainter and fainter,
And her eyes give what her tongue does deny,¹⁰
Ah what a trembling I feel when I venture,
Ah what a trembling does usher my joy!

IV

When, with a sigh, she accords me the blessing,
And her eyes twinkle 'twixt pleasure and
pain,
Ah what a joy 't is, beyond all expressing,
Ah what a joy to hear: "Shall we
again?"

III

I

CALM was the even, and clear was the
sky,
And the new-budding flowers did spring,
When all alone went Amyntas and I
To hear the sweet nightingale sing.
I sate, and he laid him down by me,
But scarcely his breath he could draw;
For when with a fear, he began to draw¹⁰
near,
He was dash'd with: "A ha ha ha ha!"

II

He blush'd to himself, and lay still for a while,
And his modesty curb'd his desire;¹⁰
But straight I convinc'd all his fear with a smile,
Which added new flames to his fire.
"O Sylvia," said he, "you are cruel,
To keep your poor lover in awe;"
Then once more he press'd with his hand to my breast,
But was dash'd with: "A ha ha ha ha!"

III

I knew 't was his passion that caus'd all his fears,
And therefore I pitied his case;
I whisper'd him softly: "There's nobody near,"
And laid my cheek close to his face: 20
But as he grew bolder and bolder,
A shepherd came by us and saw,
And just as our bliss we began with a kiss,
He laugh'd out with: "A ha ha ha ha!"

IV

I

Damon. CELIMENA, of my heart,
None shall e'er bereave you:
If with your good leave I may Quarrel with you once a day,
I will never leave you.

II

Celimena. Passion's but an empty name
Where respect is wanting:
Damon, you mistake your aim;
Hang your heart, and burn your flame,
If you must be ranting. 10

III

Damon. Love as dull and muddy is
As decaying liquor:
Anger sets it on the lees,
And refines it by degrees,
Till it works it quicker.

IV

Celimena. Love by quarrels to beget Wisely you endeavor;
With a grave physician's wit,
Who, to cure an ague fit,
Put me in a fever. 20

V

Damon. Anger rouses love to fight,
And his only bait is:
'T is the spur to dull delight,
And is but an eager bite,
When desire at height is.

VI

Celimena. If such drops of heat can fall
In our wooing weather;
If such drops of heat can fall,
We shall have the devil and all
When we come together. 30

PROLOGUE, EPILOGUE, AND SONG FROM TYRANNIC LOVE

OR, THE ROYAL MARTYR

[This heroic play, by Dryden, was probably acted early in 1669; it was entered on the Stationers' Register on July 14 of that year (Malone, I, 1, 94), and published in 1670. The epilogue was spoken by Nell Gwyn, who acted the part of the chaste princess Valeria. The second edition (1672) was "review'd by the author," but the reviewing did not affect the text of the pieces here printed.]

PROLOGUE

SELF-LOVE, which never rightly understood,
Makes poets still conclude their plays are good,
And malice, in all critics, reigns so high,
That for small errors they whole plays de-
cry;
So that to see this fondness, and that spite,
You'd think that none but madmen judge or write.
Therefore our poet, as he thinks not fit
T' impose upon you what he writes for wit;
So hopes, that leaving you your censures free,
You equal judges of the whole will be: 10
They judge but half, who only faults will see.
Poets, like lovers, should be bold and dare,
They spoil their business with an over-care;
And he, who servilely creeps after sense,
Is safe, but ne'er will reach an excellence.
Hence 't is, our poet, in his conjuring,
Allow'd his fancy the full scope and swing.
But when a tyrant for his theme he had,
He loos'd the reins, and bid his Muse run mad:
And tho' he stumbles in a full career, 20
Yet rashness is a better fault than fear.
He saw his way; but in so swift a pace,
To choose the ground might be to lose the race.
They then, who of each trip th' advantage take,
Find but those faults which they want wit to make.

EPILOGUE

SPOKEN BY MRS. ELLEN, WHEN SHE WAS TO BE CARRIED OFF DEAD BY THE BEARERS

[To the Bearer.] Hold, are you mad?
you damn'd confounded dog,
I am to rise, and speak the epilogue.

[To the Audience.] I come, kind gentlemen,
strange news to tell ye,
I am the ghost of poor departed Nelly.
Sweet ladies, be not frightened, I'll be civil;
I'm what I was, a little harmless devil:
For after death, we sprites have just such natures

We had for all the world, when human creatures;

And therefore I that was an actress here,
Play all my tricks in hell, a goblin there. 10
Gallants, look to 't, you say there are no
sprites;

But I'll come dance about your beds at nights.

And faith you'll be in a sweet kind of taking,
When I surprise you between sleep and waking.

To tell you true, I walk because I die
Out of my calling in a tragedy.

O poet, damn'd dull poet, who could prove
So senseless! to make Nelly die for love!
Nay, what's yet worse, to kill me in the prime

Of Easter term, in tart and cheese-cake
time! 20

I'll fit the fop, for I'll not one word say
T'excuse his godly out-of-fashion play:
A play, which if you dare but twice sit out,
You'll all be slander'd, and be thought devout.

But farewell, gentlemen, make haste to me;
I'm sure ere long to have your company.
As for my epitaph, when I am gone,
I'll trust no poet, but will write my own:

*Here Nelly lies, who, tho' she liv'd a slattern,
Yet died a princess, acting in St. Cathar'n.* 30

SONG

I

AH how sweet it is to love!
Ah how gay is young desire!
And what pleasing pains we prove
When we first approach love's fire!
Pains of love be sweeter far
Than all other pleasures are.

II

Sighs which are from lovers blown,
Do but gently heave the heart:
Ev'n the tears they shed alone,
Cure, like trickling balm, their smart. 10
Lovers when they lose their breath,
Bleed away in easy death.

III

Love and time with reverence use,
Treat 'em like a parting friend:
Nor the golden gifts refuse,
Which in youth sincere they send:
For each year their price is more,
And they less simple than before.

IV

Love, like spring-tides full and high,
Swells in every youthful vein;
But each tide does less supply,
Till they quite shrink in again:
If a flow in age appear,
'T is but rain, and runs not clear.

PROLOGUES, EPILOGUES, AND SONGS FROM THE CONQUEST OF GRANADA BY THE SPAN-IARDS

[This, Dryden's most famous heroic play, is divided into two parts, which seem to have been presented on successive days. It was first acted at some time between May 8, 1670, when a son was born to Nell Gwyn, the chief actress in the play, and February 20, 1671, when it was entered on the Stationers' Register (Malone, I, 1, 94). The first edition is dated 1672. The second song is printed also in Westminster Drollery; or, a Choice Collection of the Newest Songs and Poems, 1671, under the title, A Song at the King's House (the Theater Royal). The first song is twice printed in the same collection, once under the title, A Vision, and once under the same title as the other song.]

PROLOGUE

TO THE FIRST PART

SPOKEN BY

MRS. ELLEN GWYN

IN A BROAD-BRIMM'D HAT, AND WAIST-BELT
THIS jest was first of t'other house's making,
And, five times tried, has never fail'd of taking;

For 't were a shame a poet should be kill'd
Under the shelter of so broad a shield.
This is that hat, whose very sight did win ye
To laugh and clap as tho' the devil were in ye.

As then, for Nokes, so now I hope you'll
be
So dull, to laugh, once more, for love of
me.

"I'll write a play," says one, "for I have got

A broad-brimm'd hat, and waist-belt, tow'rds a plot." ¹⁰

Says t'other: "I have one more large than that."

Thus they out-write each other with a hat!
The brims still grew with every play they
writ;

And grew so large, they cover'd all the
wit.

Hat was the play; 't was language, wit, and
tale:

Like them that find meat, drink, and cloth
in ale.

What dulness do these mungril wits confess,

When all their hope is acting of a dress!
Thus, two the best comedians of the age
Must be worn out, with being blocks o' th'
stage; ²⁰

Like a young girl who better things has
known,

Beneath their poet's impotence they groan.
See now what charity it was to save!

They thought you lik'd, what only you forgave;

And brought you more dull sense, dull sense much worse

Than brisk gay nonsense, and the heavier
curse.

They bring old ir'n and glass upon the stage,

To barter with the Indians of our age.
Still they write on, and like great authors }
show;

But 't is as rollers in wet garden grow ³⁰
Heavy with dirt, and gath'ring as they go. }

May none, who have so little understood,
To like such trash, presume to praise
what 's good!

And may those drudges of the stage, whose
fate

Is damn'd dull farce more dully to translate,

Fall under that excise the State thinks fit

To set on all French wares, whose worst is
wit.

French farce, worn out at home, is sent
abroad;

And, patch'd up here, is made our English mode. ³⁹

Henceforth, let poets, ere allow'd to write,
Be search'd, like duellists, before they fight,
For wheel-broad hats, dull humor, all that chaff

Which makes you mourn, and makes the vulgar laugh:

For these, in plays, are as unlawful arms,
As, in a combat, coats of mail and charms.

EPILOGUE

SUCCESS, which can no more than beauty
last,

Makes our sad poet mourn your favors
past:

For, since without desert he got a name,
He fears to lose it now with greater shame.
Fame, like a little mistress of the town,
Is gain'd with ease, but then she 's lost as soon:

For as those tawdry misses, soon or late,
Jilt such as keep 'em at the highest rate;
(And oft the lackey, or the brawny clown, Gets what is hid in the loose-bodied gown,)

So, Fame is false to all that keep her long;
And turns up to the fop that 's brisk and young. ¹²

Some wiser poet now would leave Fame
first,

But elder wits are like old lovers curst;
Who, when the vigor of their youth is spent,
Still grow more fond, as they grow impotent.

This, some years hence, our poet's case may prove;

But yet, he hopes, he 's young enough to
love.

When forty comes, if e'er he live to see
That wretched, fumbling age of poetry, ²⁰
'T will be high time to bid his Muse adieu:
Well he may please himself, but never you.
Till then, he'll do as well as he began,
And hopes you will not find him less a
man.

Think him not duller for this year's de-
lay;

He was prepar'd, the women were away; }
And men, without their parts, can hardly }
play.

If they, thro' sickness, seldom did appear,
 Pity the virgins of each theater: ²⁹
 For, at both houses, 't was a sickly year!
 And pity us, your servants, to whose cost,
 In one such sickness, nine whole months are lost.

Their stay, he fears, has ruin'd what he
 writ:

Long waiting both disables love and wit.
 They thought they gave him leisure to do
 well;

But, when they forc'd him to attend, he fell!

Yet, tho' he much has fail'd, he begs, to-day,
 You will excuse his unperforming play:

Weakness sometimes great passion does
 express;

He had pleas'd better, had he lov'd you less. ⁴⁰

PROLOGUE

TO THE SECOND PART

THEY who write ill, and they who ne'er durst
 write,

Turn critics, out of mere revenge and spite:
 A playhouse gives 'em fame; and up there starts,

From a mean fifth-rate wit, a man of parts.
 (So common faces on the stage appear;
 We take 'em in, and they turn beauties
 here.)

Our author fears those critics as his fate;
 And those he fears, by consequence, must
 hate,

For they the traffic of all wit invade, ⁹
 As scriveners draw away the bankers' trade.
 Howe'er, the poet's safe enough to-day,
 They cannot censure an unfinish'd play.
 But, as when vizard-mask appears in pit,
 Straight every man who thinks himself a
 wit

Perks up, and, managing his comb with
 grace,

With his white wig sets off his nut-brown
 face;

That done, bears up to th' prize, and views
 each limb,

To know her by her rigging and her trim;
 Then, the whole noise of fops to wagers go:
 'Pox on her, 't must be she;' and:

"Damme, no!" — ²⁰

Just so, I prophesy, these wits to-day
 Will blindly guess at our imperfect play;

With what new plots our Second Part is
 fill'd,

Who must be kept alive, and who be kill'd.
 And as those vizard-masks maintain that fashion,

To soothe and tickle sweet imagination;
 So our dull poet keeps you on with masking,
 To make you think there's something worth your asking.

But, when 't is shown, that which does now delight you

Will prove a dowdy, with a face to fright
 you. ³⁰

EPILOGUE

THEY who have best succeeded on the stage

Have still conform'd their genius to their
 age.

Thus Jonson did mechanic humor show,
 When men were dull, and conversation low.
 Then comedy was faultless, but 't was coarse:

Cob's tankard was a jest, and Otter's
 horse.

And, as their comedy, their love was mean;
 Except, by chance, in some one labor'd
 scene

Which must atone for an ill-written play.
 They rose, but at their height could seldom stay. ¹⁰

Fame then was cheap, and the first comer
 sped;

And they have kept it since, by being dead.
 But, were they now to write, when critics weigh

Each line, and ev'ry word, throughout a
 play,

None of 'em, no, not Jonson in his height, Could pass, without allowing grains for weight.

Think it not envy, that these truths are told;

Our poet's not malicious, tho' he's bold.
 'T is not to brand 'em, that their faults are
 shown,

But, by their errors, to excuse his own. ²⁰
 If love and honor now are higher rais'd,
 'T is not the poet, but the age is prais'd.

Wit's now arriv'd to a more high degree;
 Our native language more refin'd and free.
 Our ladies and our men now speak more wit
 In conversation, than those poets writ.

Then, one of these is, consequently, true;

That what this poet writes comes short of
 you,
 And imitates you ill, (which most he fears,)
 Or else his writing is not worse than theirs.
 Yet, tho' you judge (as sure the critics
 will) 31
 That some before him writ with greater
 skill,
 In this one praise he has their fame sur-
 pass'd,
 To please an age more gallant than the last.

SONGS

I

THE ZAMBRA DANCE

I

BENEATH a myrtle shade,
 Which love for none but happy lovers made,
 I slept; and straight my love before me
 brought
 Phyllis, the object of my waking thought.
 Undress'd she came my flames to meet,
 While love strow'd flow'rs beneath her feet;
 Flow'rs which, so press'd by her, became more sweet.

II

From the bright vision's head
 A careless veil of lawn was loosely spread:
 From her white temples fell her shaded
 hair, 10
 Like cloudy sunshine, not too brown nor
 fair;
 Her hands, her lips, did love inspire;
 Her every grace my heart did fire:
 But most her eyes, which languish'd with desire.

III

"Ah, charming fair," said I,
 "How long can you my bliss and yours
 deny?
 By nature and by love this lonely shade
 Was for revenge of suffer'ing lovers made.
 Silence and shades with love agree;
 Both shelter you and favor me: 20
 You cannot blush, because I cannot see."

IV

"No, let me die," she said,
 "Rather than lose the spotless name of maid!"

Faintly, methought, she spoke; for all the while

She bid me not believe her, with a smile.
 "Then die," said I: she still denied;
 "And is it thus, thus, thus," she cried,
 "You use a harmless maid?" — and so she died!

V

I wak'd, and straight I knew,
 I lov'd so well, it made my dream prove
 true: 30
 Fancy, the kinder mistress of the two,
 Fancy had done what Phyllis would not
 do!
 Ah, cruel nymph, cease your disdain,
 While I can dream, you scorn in vain —
 Asleep or waking, you must ease my pain.

II

I

WHEREVER I am, and whatever I do,
 My Phyllis is still in my mind;
 When angry, I mean not to Phyllis to go,
 My feet, of themselves, the way find:
 Unknown to myself I am just at her door,
 And, when I would rail, I can bring out
 no more,
 Than: "Phyllis too fair and unkind!"

II

When Phyllis I see, my heart bounds in my
 breast,
 And the love I would stifle is shown;
 But asleep, or awake, I am never at rest, 10
 When from my eyes Phyllis is gone.
 Sometimes a sad dream does delude my sad
 mind;
 But, alas! when I wake, and no Phyllis
 I find,
 How I sigh to myself all alone!

III

Should a king be my rival in her I adore,
 He should offer his treasure in vain:
 O let me alone to be happy and poor,
 And give me my Phyllis again!
 Let Phyllis be mine, and but ever be kind,
 I could to a desert with her be confin'd,
 And envy no monarch his reign. 21

IV

Alas! I discover too much of my love,
 And she too well knows her own pow'r!

She makes me each day a new martyrdom
 prove,
 And makes me grow jealous each hour:
 But let her each minute torment my poor
 mind,
 I had rather love Phyllis, both false and unkind,
 Than ever be freed from her pow'r.

III

I

He. How unhappy a lover am I,
 While I sigh for my Phyllis in vain;
 All my hopes of delight
 Are another man's right,
 Who is happy, while I am in pain!

II

She. Since her honor allows no relief,
 But to pity the pains which you
 bear,
 'Tis the best of your fate,
 (In a hopeless estate,) 9
 To give o'er, and betimes to despair.

III

He. I have tried the false med'cine in vain;
 For I wish what I hope not to win:
 From without, my desire
 Has no food to its fire;
 But it burns and consumes me within.

IV

She. Yet at least 'tis a pleasure to know
 That you are not unhappy alone:
 For the nymph you adore
 Is as wretched, and more;
 And accounts all your suff'rings her
 own. 20

V

He. O ye gods, let me suffer for both;
 At the feet of my Phyllis I'll lie:
 I'll resign up my breath,
 And take pleasure in death,
 To be pitied by her when I die.

VI

She. What her honor denied you in life,
 In her death she will give to your
 love.
 Such a flame as is true
 After fate will renew, 29
 For the souls to meet closer above.

PROLOGUE SPOKEN THE FIRST DAY OF THE KING'S HOUSE
 ACTING AFTER THE FIRE

[The Theater Royal in Drury Lane was burnt on January 25, 1672. (See FitzGerald: A New History of the English Stage, 1882; vol. i, p. 137.) The King's Company in their distress moved to the old playhouse in Lincoln's Inn Fields, which had recently been vacated by their rivals, the Duke of York's Company, in favor of a new and gaudy theater in Dorset Gardens; on February 26 they gave a performance of Beaumont and Fletcher's Wit without Money, for which Dryden wrote this prologue (Malone, I, 1, 76). The piece is printed anonymously in Westminster Drollery, the Second Part, 1672, and in Covent Garden Drollery, 1672; and, with Dryden's name, in Miscellany Poems, 1684, from which the present text and heading are taken.]

So shipwrack'd passengers escape to land,
 So look they, when on the bare beach they
 stand
 Dropping and cold, and their first fear scarce o'er,
 Expecting famine on a desert shore.
 From that hard climate we must wait for bread,
 Whence ev'n the natives, forc'd by hunger,
 fled.
 Our stage does human chance present to
 view,
 But ne'er before was seen so sadly true:
 You are chang'd too, and your pretense to see
 Is but a nobler name for charity. 10
 Your own provisions furnish out our feasts, While you the founders make yourselves the guests.
 Of all mankind beside Fate had some
 care,
 But for poor Wit no portion did prepare:
 'Tis left a rent-charge to the brave and
 fair. }
 You cherish'd it, and now its fall you mourn,
 Which blind unmanner'd zealots make their
 scorn,
 Who think that fire a judgment on the stage,
 Which spar'd not temples in its furious rage.
 But as our new-built city rises higher, 20
 So from old theaters may new aspire,
 Since Fate contrives magnificence by fire.
 Our great metropolis does far surpass Whate'er is now, and equals all that was:
 Our wit as far does foreign wit excel,
 And, like a king, should in a palace dwell.

But we with golden hopes are vainly fed,
Talk high, and entertain you in a shed:
Your presence here, for which we humbly
sue, ²⁹
Will grace old theaters, and build up new.

PROLOGUE TO ARVIRAGUS, REVIV'D

SPOKEN BY MR. HART

[Arviragus and Philicia, a tragi-comedy by Lodowick Carlell, was first published in 1639. The revival may be dated soon after the retreat of the King's Company to the old house at Lincoln's Inn Fields. This prologue was first printed, with title as above, in Miscellany Poems, 1684.]

WITH sickly actors and an old house too,
We're match'd with glorious theaters and
new,
And with our alehouse scenes, and clothes
bare worn,
Can neither raise old plays, nor new adorn.
If all these ills could not undo us quite,
A brisk French troop is grown your dear
delight,
Who with broad bloody bills call you each
day,
To laugh and break your buttons at their
play;
Or see some serious piece, which we presume
Is fall'n from some incomparable plume; ¹⁰
And therefore, Messieurs, if you'll do us
grace,
Send lackeys early, to preserve your place.
We dare not on your privilege intrench,
Or ask you why you like 'em. — They are French.
Therefore some go with courtesy exceeding, Neither to hear nor see, but show their breeding;
Each lady striving to out-laugh the rest,
To make it seem they understood the jest.
Their countrymen come in, and nothing pay,
To teach us English where to clap the play:
Civil, igad! our hospitable land ²¹
Bears all the charge, for them to understand:
Meantime we languish, and neglected lie,
Like wives, while you keep better company;
And wish for our own sakes, without a satire,
You'd less good breeding, or had more good nature.

PROLOGUE FOR THE WOMEN
WHEN THEY ACTED AT THE OLD THEATER IN LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS

[The title proves that this prologue was written between February 26, 1672, when the King's Company began performances in the old theater, and March 26, 1674, when they opened their new house in Drury Lane. It probably came near the beginning of this period; otherwise the jests in it would have lost their savor. It was first printed in Miscellany Poems, 1684.]

WERE none of you gallants e'er driven so
hard,
As when the poor kind soul was under
guard,
And could not do 't at home, in some by-
street
To take a lodging, and in private meet?
Such is our case: we can't appoint our house,
The lovers' old and wonted rendezvous,
But hither to this trusty nook remove;
The worse the lodging is, the more the love.
For much good pastime, many a dear sweet hug,
Is stol'n in garrets on the humble rug. ¹⁰
Here's good accommodation in the pit;
The grave demurely in the midst may sit,
And so the hot Burgundian on the side
Ply vizard-mask, and o'er the benches stride:
Here are convenient upper boxes too
For those that make the most triumphant
show;
All that keep coaches must not sit below.
There, gallants, you betwixt the acts retire,
And at dull plays have something to admire; ¹⁹
We, who look up, can your addresses mark,
And see the creatures coupl'd in the ark:
So we expect the lovers, braves, and wits;
The gaudy house with scenes will serve for cits.

PROLOGUE AND EPILOGUE TO [SECRET LOVE, OR] THE MAIDEN QUEEN, WHEN ACTED BY THE WOMEN ONLY

[These two pieces are taken from Covent Garden Drollery, 1672. They must be of about the same date as the preceding prologue. Though they were never printed under Dryden's name in his lifetime, there seems no reason to doubt his authorship of them. The above heading is due in part to Christie.]

PROLOGUE

SPOKEN BY MRS. BOUTEL

WOMEN like us (passing for men), you'll
cry,
Presume too much upon your secrecy.
There's not a fop in town but will pretend
To know the cheat himself, or by his friend.
Then make no words on 't, gallants, 't is e'en
true,
We are condemn'd to look, and strut, like
you.
Since we thus freely our hard fate confess,
Accept us these bad times in any dress.
You'll find the sweet on 't, now old pantalons
Will go as far as formerly new gowns;
And from your own cast wigs expect no
frowns. 11
The ladies we shall not so easily please;
They'll say: "What impudent bold things are these,
That dare provoke, yet cannot do us right,
Like men with huffing looks that dare not
fight!"
But this reproach our courage must not daunt:
The bravest soldier may a weapon want;
Let her that doubts us still send her gallant.
Ladies, in us you'll youth and beauty find,
All things, but one, according to your mind;
And when your eyes and ears are feasted
here, 21
Rise up and make out the short meal elsewhere.

EPILOGUE

SPOKEN BY MRS. REEVES

WHAT think you, sirs, was't not all well enough?
Will you not grant that we can strut and huff?
Men may be proud; but faith, for aught I
see,
They neither walk nor cock so well as we.
And for the fighting part, we may in time
Grow up to swagger in heroic rhyme;
For tho' we cannot boast of equal force,

Yet at some weapons men have still the worse.

Why should not then we women act
alone, 9
Or whence are men so necessary grown?
Ours are so old, they are as good as none.
Some who have tried 'em, if you'll take their oaths,
Swear they're as arrant tinsel as their clothes.

Imagine us but what we represent,
And we could e'en give you as good content.

Our faces, shapes, all's better than you see,
And for the rest they want as much as we.
O would the highest powers be kind to us,
And grant us to set up a female house!
We'll make ourselves to please both sexes
then, 20

To the men women, to the women men.
Here, we presume, our legs are no ill sight,
And they would give you no ill dreams at
night.

In dreams both sexes may their passions
ease;

You make us then as civil as you please.
This would prevent the houses joining too,
At which we are as much displeas'd as
you;

For all our women most devoutly swear,
Each would be rather a poor actress here
Than to be made a Manamouchi there. 30

PROLOGUE, EPILOGUE, AND SONGS FROM MARRIAGE À LA MODE

[The date of this lively comedy, by Dryden, is fixed by the opening lines of the prologue, which apparently "allude to the equipment of the fleet which afterwards engaged the Dutch off Southwold Bay, May 28, 1672" (Malone, I, 1, 106). The play was printed in 1673. The prologue and epilogue, and the second of the two songs, were printed in the Covent Garden Drollery, 1672; both songs appear also in New Court Songs and Poems, by R. V., Gent., 1672; and the second of them in Westminster Drollery, the Second Part, 1672.]

PROLOGUE

LORD, how reform'd and quiet are we grown, Since all our braves and all our wits are
gone!

Fop-corner now is free from civil war,
 White-wig and vizard make no longer jar.
 France, and the fleet, have swept the town
 so clear

That we can act in peace, and you can hear.

[Those that durst fight are gone to get renown,
 And those that durst not, blush to stand in
 town.]

'T was a sad sight, before they march'd }
 from home,
 To see our warriors in red waistcoats }
 come, 10
 With hair tuck'd up, into our tiring-room. }
 But 't was more sad to hear their last adieu:

The women sobb'd, and swore they would be
 true;

And so they were, as long as e'er they
 could,

But powerful guinea cannot be withstood, }
 And they were made of playhouse flesh and blood.

Fate did their friends for double use or-
 dain;

In wars abroad they grinning honor gain,
 And mistresses for all that stay maintain. }

Now they are gone, 't is dead vacation here,
 For neither friends nor enemies appear. 21

Poor pensive punk now peeps ere plays begin,

Sees the bare bench, and dares not venture
 in;

But manages her last half-crown with care,
 And trudges to the Mall, on foot, for air.

Our city friends so far will hardly come,
 They can take up with pleasures nearer
 home;

And see gay shows and gaudy scenes elsewhere;

For we presume they seldom come to hear.
 But they have now ta'en up a glorious
 trade, 30

And cutting Morecraft struts in masquerade.

There's all our hope, for we shall show
 to-day

A masking ball, to recommend our play;
 Nay, to endear 'em more, and let 'em see

We scorn to come behind in courtesy,
 We'll follow the new mode which they begin,

And treat 'em with a room, and couch
 within:

For that's one way, howe'er the play fall
 short,

T' oblige the town, the city, and the court.

EPILOGUE

THUS have my spouse and I inform'd the nation,

And led you all the way to reformation;
 Not with dull morals, gravely writ, like those

Which men of easy phlegm with care compose —

(Your poets of stiff words and limber sense, Born on the confines of indifference;)

But by examples drawn, I dare to say,
 From most of you who hear and see the
 play.

There are more Rhodophils in this theater,
 More Palamedes, and some few wives, I
 fear: 10

But yet too far our poet would not run;
 Tho' 't was well offer'd, there was nothing
 done,

He would not quite the woman's frailty
 bare,

But stripp'd 'em to the waist, and left 'em
 there:

And the men's faults are less severely
 shown,

For he considers that himself is one.
 Some stabbing wits, to bloody satire bent,
 Would treat both sexes with less compli-
 ment;

Would lay the scene at home; of husbands
 tell,

For wenches taking up their wives i' th'
 Mell; 20

And a brisk bout, which each of them did
 want,

Made by mistake of mistress and gallant.
 Our modest author thought it was enough
 To cut you off a sample of the stuff:

He spar'd my shame, which you, I'm sure,
 would not,

For you were all for driving on the plot:
 You sigh'd when I came in to break the sport,

And set your teeth when each design fell short.

To wives and servants all good wishes lend,
 But the poor cuckold seldom finds a friend.

Since, therefore, court and town will take no pity, 31

I humbly cast myself upon the city.

SONGS

I

I

WHY should a foolish marriage vow,
Which long ago was made,
Oblige us to each other now,
When passion is decay'd?
We lov'd, and we lov'd, as long as we
could,
Till our love was lov'd out in us both;
But our marriage is dead, when the pleasure is fled:
'T was pleasure first made it an oath.

II

If I have pleasures for a friend,
And farther love in store, ¹⁰
What wrong has he whose joys did end,
And who could give no more?
'T is a madness that he should be jealous of me,
Or that I should bar him of another:
For all we can gain is to give ourselves
pain,
When neither can hinder the other.

II

I

WHILST Alexis lay press'd
In her arms he lov'd best,
With his hands round her neck, and his head on her breast,
He found the fierce pleasure too hasty to
stay,
And his soul in the tempest just flying away.

II

When Celia saw this,
With a sigh and a kiss,
She cried: "O my dear, I am robb'd of my
bliss!
'T is unkind to your love, and unfaithfully
done,
To leave me behind you, and die all alone."⁹

III

The youth, tho' in haste,
And breathing his last,
In pity died slowly, while she died more
fast;
Till at length she cried: "Now, my dear,
now let us go;
Now die, my Alexis, and I will die too!"

IV

Thus intranc'd they did lie,
Till Alexis did try
To recover new breath, that again he might die:
Then often they died; but the more they did so,
The nymph died more quick, and the shepherd more slow. ²⁰

A SONG

[This Song and the following Answer to it are found in Covent Garden Drollery, 1672, and New Court Songs and Poems, by R. V., Gent., 1672, from the latter of which collections the following texts are taken. They were never published under Dryden's name during his lifetime. A parody of the second stanza of the Song appears in the third (1675) and later editions of The Rehearsal. The Key to that piece, published in 1704, states that the song ridiculed was "made by Mr. Bayes [Dryden] on the death of Captain Digby, son of George, Earl of Bristol, who was a passionate admirer of the Duchess Dowager of Richmond, called by the author Armida: he lost his life in a sea-fight against the Dutch, the twenty-eighth of May, 1672." The Song may probably be accepted as Dryden's work; the Answer has not so strong evidence in its favor, as it may easily be the work of an imitator.

Christie suggests that another song in the same meter in Covent Garden Drollery, addressed to "dear Revecchia," may also be by Dryden, in honor of his mistress Anne Reeve. The piece is given below (see Appendix I, p. 104) among Poems attributed to Dryden.]

I

FAREWELL, fair Armida, my joy and my grief;
In vain I have lov'd you, and find no relief;
Undone by your virtue, too strict and severe,
Your eyes gave me love, and you gave me
despair.
Now call'd by my honor, I seek with content
A fate which in pity you would not prevent:
To languish in love, were to find by de-
lay
A death that's more welcome the speediest
way.

II

On seas and in battles, in bullets and fire,
The danger is less than in hopeless desire;¹⁰
My death's wound you gave me, tho' far off I bear

My fate from your sight, not to cost you a
tear.

But if the kind flood on a wave should convey,

And under your window my body should
lay,

The wound on my breast when you happen
to see,

You'll say with a sigh: "It was given by
me."

THE ANSWER

I

BLAME not your Armeda, nor call her your
grief;

'T was honor, not she, that denied you relief;
Abuse not her virtue, nor call it severe;

Who loves without honor, must meet with
despair.

Now prompted by pity I truly lament,
And mourn for your fall, which I could not prevent;

I languish to think that your blood should defray

The expense of a fate, tho' so noble a way.

II

On seas and in battles that you did expire
Was th' effect of your valor, not hopeless

desire;¹⁰

Of the fame you acquir'd I greedily hear,
And grieve when I think that it cost you so dear.

And when dismal fate did your body convey
By my window, your funeral rites for to pay,

I sigh that your fate I could not reverse,
And all my kind wishes I strew on your hearse.

OR, LOVE IN A NUNNERY

[Ravenscroft, in his prologue to The Careless Lovers, produced in Lent, 1673, exults over the failure of Dryden's comedy, The Assigna- nation as if it were a recent event. The play was probably produced late in 1672. It was entered on the Stationers' Register March 18, 1673 (Malone, I, 1, 107), and published in the same year.]

PROLOGUE

PROLOGUES, like bells to churches, toll you
in

With chiming verse, till the dull plays begin:

With this sad difference, tho', of pit and pew,

You damn the poet, but the priest damns
you.

But priests can treat you at your own expense,

And gravely call you fools, without offense.
Poets, poor devils, have ne'er your folly

shown,
But, to their cost, you prov'd it was their
own;

For, when a fop's presented on the stage,
Straight all the coxcombs in the town in-gaze:

For his deliverance and revenge they join,¹⁰
And grunt, like hogs, about their captive swine.

Your poets daily split upon this shelf:
You must have fools, yet none will have himself;

Or, if in kindness you that leave would
give,

No man could write you at that rate you
live;

For some of you grow fops with so much
haste,

Riot in nonsense, and commit such waste,
'T would ruin poets should they spend so fast.¹⁰

He who made this, observ'd what farces hit,

And durst not disoblige you now with wit.
But, gentlemen, you overdo the mode;

You must have fools out of the common
road.

Th' unnatural strain'd buffoon is only taking;

No fop can please you now of God's own making.

Pardon our poet, if he speaks his mind;
You come to plays with your own follies

lin'd:

Small fools fall on you, like small showers,
in vain;

Your own oil'd coats keep out all common
rain.

You must have Mamamouchi, such a fop
As would appear a monster in a shop: 31
He'll fill your pit and boxes to the brim,
Where, ramn'd in crowds, you see yourselves in him.

Sure there's some spell our poet never
knew,

In hullababillah da, and chu, chu, chu.

But marabarah sahem most did touch you;
That is: "O how we love the Mamamou-chi!"

Grimace and habit sent you pleas'd away:
You damn'd the poet, and cried up the play.

This thought had made our author more uneasy, 40

But that he hopes I'm fool enough to please ye.

But here's my grief: tho' nature, join'd
with art,

Have cut me out to act a fooling part,
Yet, to your praise, the few wits here will
say,

"Twas imitating you taught Haynes to play.

EPILOGUE

SOME have expected from our bills to-day,
To find a satire in our poet's play.

The zealous rout from Coleman Street did
run,

To see the story of the Friar and Nun;
Or tales, yet more ridiculous to hear,

Vouch'd by their vicar of ten pounds a year:
Of nuns who did against temptation pray,

And discipline laid on the pleasant way;
Or that, to please the malice of the town,

Our poet should in some close cell have
shown 10

Some sister, playing at content alone.
This they did hope; the other side did fear;

And both you see alike are cozen'd here.
Some thought the title of our play to blame:

They lik'd the thing, but yet abhorr'd the
name;

Like modest punks, who all you ask afford,
But, for the world, they would not name
that word.

Yet, if you'll credit what I heard him say,
Our poet meant no scandal in his play;

His nuns are good, which on the stage are
shown, 20

And, sure, behind our scenes you'll look for none.

SONG

I

LONG betwixt love and fear Phyllis, tormented,

Shunn'd her own wish, yet at last she consented:

But, loth that day should her blushes discover,

"Come, gentle night," she said,

"Come quickly to my aid,

And a poor shamefac'd maid

Hide from her lover.

II

"Now cold as ice I am, now hot as fire,
I dare not tell myself my own desire; 9

But let day fly away, and let night haste her:
Grant, ye kind powers above,

Slow hours to parting love,

But when to bliss we move,

Bid 'em fly faster.

III

"How sweet it is to love, when I discover That fire which burns my heart, warming my lover!

'Tis pity love so true should be mistaken;

But, if this night he be

False or unkind to me,

Let me die, ere I see 20

That I'm forsaken."

PROLOGUE, EPILOGUE, AND SONGS FROM AMBOYNA

OR, THE CRUELITIES OF THE DUTCH TO THE ENGLISH MERCHANTS

[This worthless tragedy, the poorest of all Dryden's dramatic works, must have been performed before the end of 1672, since in a prologue included in Covent Garden Drollery
(p. 33), printed in that year, there is an unmistakable reference to it:

But when fierce critics get them in their clutch,
They're crueler then the tyrannic Dutch;
And with more art do dislocate each scene
Then in Amboyne they the limbs of men.

It was entered on the Stationers' Register June 26, 1673 (Malone, I, 1, 108), and published in the same year.

Amboyne was written for a political purpose, to stir up the national feeling against the Dutch, with whom England was then at war.

From this prologue and epilogue a bookseller concocted a Satire upon the Dutch, written by Mr. Dryden in the year 1662, which was first printed in Poems on Affairs of State, vol. iii, 1704; and was afterwards regularly included in editions of Dryden. Christie called attention to the imposture.]

PROLOGUE

As needy gallants in the scriv'ners' hands,
Court the rich knave that gripes their mort-
gag'd lands,

The first fat buck of all the season's sent,
And keeper takes no fee in compliment:
The dotage of some Englishmen is such,
To fawn on those who ruin them — the Dutch.

They shall have all, rather than make a war
With those who of the same religion are.

The Straits, the Guinea trade, the herrings
too,

Nay, to keep friendship, they shall pickle
you.

Some are resolv'd not to find out the cheat,
But, cuckold-like, love him who does the feat:
What injuries see'er upon us fall,

Yet, still the same religion answers all:
Religion wheedled you to civil war,
Drew English blood, and Dutchmen's now would spare:

Be gull'd no longer, for you'll find it true,
They have no more religion, faith — then
you;

Interest's the god they worship in their
state;

And you, I take it, have not much of that.
Well monarchies may own religion's name,
But states are atheists in their very frame.
They share a sin, and such proportions fall,
That, like a stink, 't is nothing to 'em all.
How they love England, you shall see this
day;

No map shews Holland truer than our play:
Their pictures and inscriptions well we
know;

We may be bold one medal sure to show.
View then their falsehoods, rapine, cruelty;
And think what once they were, they still would be;

But hope not either language, plot, or art;
'T was writ in haste, but with an English
heart:

And least hope wit; in Dutchmen that would
be

As much improper, as would honesty.

EPILOGUE

A POET once the Spartans led to fight,
And made 'em conquer in the Muses' right:
So would our poet lead you on this day,
Showing your tortur'd fathers in his play.
To one well born th' affront is worse, and
more,

When he's abus'd and baffled by a boor:
With an ill grace the Dutch their mischiefs
do,

They've both ill nature and ill manners
too.

Well may they boast themselves an ancient
nation,

For they were bred ere manners were in
fashion;

And their new commonwealth has set 'em
free

Only from honor and civility.

Venetians do not more uncouthly ride,
Than did their lubber state mankind be-stride;

Their sway became 'em with as ill a mien,
As their own paunches swell above their
chin:

Yet is their empire no true growth, but humor.

And only two kings' touch can cure the tumor.

As Cato did his Afric fruits display,
So we before your eyes their Indies lay: 20
All loyal English will, like him, conclude,
Let Cæsar live, and Carthage be subdued!

SONGS

I

EPI THALAMIUM

1

THE day is come, I see it rise,
Betwixt the bride's and bridegroom's eyes;
That golden day they wish'd so long,
Love pick'd it out amidst the throng;
He destin'd to himself this sun,
And took the reins, and drove him on;
In his own beams he dress'd him bright,
Yet bid him bring a better night.

II

The day you wish'd arriv'd at last,
You wish as much that it were past;
One minute more, and night will hide
The bridegroom and the blushing bride.

The virgin now to bed does go:
Take care, O youth, she rise not so:
She pants and trembles at her doom,
And fears and wishes thou wouldst come.

III

The bridegroom comes, he comes apace,
With love and fury in his face;
She shrinks away, he close pursues,
And prayers and threats at once does
use. 20
She, softly sighing, begs delay,
And with her hand puts his away;
Now out aloud for help she cries,
And now despairing shuts her eyes.

II

THE SEA-FIGHT

Who ever saw a noble sight,
That never view'd a brave sea-fight !
Hang up your bloody colors in the air,
Up with your fights, and your nettings prepare;
Your merry mates cheer, with a lusty bold
sprite,
Now each man his brindice, and then to the
fight.
St. George, St. George, we cry,
The shouting Turks reply.
O now it begins, and the gun-room grows
hot;
Ply it with culverin and with small shot; 10
Hark, does it not thunder ? no, 't is the guns'
roar,
The neighboring billows are turn'd into
gore;
Now each man must resolve to die,
For here the coward cannot fly.
Drums and trumpets toll the knell,
And culverins the passing bell.
Now, now they grapple, and now board
amain;
Blow up the hatches, they're off all
again:
Give 'em a broadside, the dice run at
all;
Down comes the mast and yard, and tacklings fall. 20
She grows giddy now, like blind Fortune's
wheel,
She sinks there, she sinks, she turns up her keel.
Who ever beheld so noble a sight,
As this so brave, so bloody sea-fight !

PROLOGUE AND EPILOGUE TO
THE UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD

SPOKEN BY MR. HART, AT THE ACTING OF THE SILENT WOMAN

[These are evidently the pieces to which Dryden refers in a letter to Lord Rochester, dated 1673 by Malone, from internal evidence: "I have sent your lordship a prologue and epilogue which I made for our players, when they went down to Oxford. I hear they have succeeded; and by the event your lordship will judge how easy 't is to pass any thing upon an university, and how gross flattery the learned will endure" (Malone, I, 2, 11-13). Both poems were first printed in Miscellany Poems, 1684.]

PROLOGUE

WHAT Greece, when learning flourish'd, only knew,
Athenian judges, you this day renew.
Here too are annual rites to Pallas done,
And here poetic prizes lost or won.
Methinks I see you, crown'd with olives, sit,
And strike a sacred horror from the pit.
A day of doom is this of your decree,
Where even the best are but by mercy
free: }
A day, which none but Jonson durst have wish'd to see. } Here they, who long have known the useful stage, 10
Come to be taught themselves to teach the
age.
As your commissioners our poets go,
To cultivate the virtue which you sow;
In your Lycæum first themselves refin'd,
And delegated thence to humankind.
But as ambassadors, when long from home,
For new instructions to their princes come;
So poets, who your precepts have forgot,
Return, and beg they may be better taught:
Follies and faults elsewhere by them are
shown, 20
But by your manners they correct their
own.
Th' illiterate writer, empiric-like, applies
To minds diseas'd, unsafe, chance remedies:
The learn'd in schools, where knowledge
first began,
Studies with care th' anatomy of man;
Sees virtue, vice, and passions in their
cause.

And fame from science, not from fortune,
draws.
So poetry, which is in Oxford made
An art, in London only is a trade.
There haughty dunces, whose unlearned
pen³⁰
Could ne'er spell grammar, would be reading men.
Such build their poems the Lucretian way;
So many huddled atoms make a play;
And if they hit in order by some chance,
They call that nature, which is ignorance.
To such a fame let mere town-wits aspire,
And their gay nonsense their own cites admire.
Our poet, could he find forgiveness here,
Would wish it rather than a plaudit there.
He owns no crown from those Prætorian bands,⁴⁰
But knows that right is in this senate's hands.
Not impudent enough to hope your praise,
Low at the Muses' feet his wreath he lays,
And, where he took it up, resigns his bays. }
Kings make their poets whom themselves think fit,
But 't is your suffrage makes authentic wit.

EPILOGUE

No poor Dutch peasant, wing'd with all his
fear,
Flies with more haste, when the French arms draw near,
Than we with our poetic train come down
For refuge hither, from th' infected town:
Heaven for our sins this summer has thought fit
To visit us with all the plagues of wit.
A French troop first swept all things in its way;
But those hot Monsieurs were too quick to
stay:
Yet, to our cost, in that short time, we find
They left their itch of novelty behind.¹⁰
Th' Italian merry-andrews took their
place,
And quite debauch'd the stage with lewd
grimace;
Instead of wit and humors, your delight
Was there to see two hobby-horses fight;
Stout Scaramoucha with rush lance rode in,
And ran a tilt at centaur Arlequin.
For love you heard how amorous asses
bray'd,
And cats in gutters gave their serenade.

Nature was out of countenance, and each
day
Some new-born monster shewn you for a play.²⁰
But when all fail'd, to strike the stage
quite dumb,
Those wicked engines call'd machines are
come.
Thunder and lightning now for wit are
play'd,
And shortly scenes in Lapland will be laid:
Art magic is for poetry profess'd;
And cats and dogs, and each obscener
beast,
To which Egyptian dotards once did bow,
Upon our English stage are worshipp'd
now.
Witchcraft reigns there, and raises to renown
Macbeth, the Simon Magus of the town,³⁰ Fletcher's despis'd, your Jonson out of fashion,
And wit the only drug in all the nation.
In this low ebb our wares to you are
shown;
By you those staple authors' worth is
known;
For wit's a manufacture of your own. }
When you, who only can, their scenes have
prais'd,
We'll boldly back, and say their price is rais'd.

PROLOGUE AND EPILOGUE

SPOKEN AT THE OPENING OF THE NEW HOUSE, MARCH 26, 1674

[These pieces were first printed in Miscellany Poems. 1684. The new house was the theater in Drury Lane, built for the King's Company on designs by Sir Christopher Wren.]

PROLOGUE

A PLAIN-BUILT house, after so long a stay,
Will send you half-unsatisfied away;
When, fall'n from your expected pomp,
you find
A bare convenience only is design'd.
You, who each day can theaters behold,
Like Nero's palace, shining all with gold,
Our mean ungilded stage will scorn, we
fear,

And, for the homely room, disdain the cheer.
Yet now cheap druggets to a mode are

grown,
And a plain suit, since we can make
but one,

Is better than to be by tarnish'd gau-dry known.

They who are by your favors wealthy
made,

With mighty sums may carry on the trade:
We, broken bankers, half destroy'd by
fire,

With our small stock to humble roofs
retire:

Pity our loss, while you their pomp admire.

For fame and honor we no longer strive,
We yield in both, and only beg to live:

Unable to support their vast expense,
Who build and treat with such magnificence;

That, like th' ambitious monarchs of the
age,

They give the law to our provincial stage:
Great neighbors enviously promote excess,
While they impose their splendor on the
less.

But only fools, and they of vast estate,
Th' extremity of modes will imitate,
The dangling knee-fringe, and the bibcravat.

Yet if some pride with want may be allow'd,
We in our plainness may be justly proud:
Our royal master will'd it should be so;
Whate'er he's pleas'd to own, can need no
show:

That sacred name gives ornament and grace,
And, like his stamp, makes basest metals
pass.

'T were folly now a stately pile to raise,
To build a playhouse while you throw down plays,

Whilst scenes, machines, and empty operas
reign,

And for the pencil you the pen disdain.
While troops of famish'd Frenchmen hither
drive,

And laugh at those upon whose alms they
live:

Old English authors vanish, and give place
To these new conqu'rors of the Norman
race.

More tamely than your fathers you submit:
You're now grown vassals to 'em in your
wit.

Mark, when they play, how our fine fops advance

The mighty merits of these men of France,

Keep time, cry Ben, and humor the cadence.

Well, please yourselves; but sure 't is understood

That French machines have ne'er done
England good.

I would not prophesy our house's fate:

But while vain shows and scenes you over-
rate,

'T is to be fear'd —

That as a fire the former house o'erthrew, Machines and tempests will destroy the new.

EPILOGUE

Tho' what our Prologue said was sadly
true,

Yet, gentlemen, our homely house is
new,

A charm that seldom fails with wicked
you.

A country lip may have the velvet touch;
Tho' she's no lady, you may think her
such:

A strong imagination may do much.

But you, loud sirs, who thro' your curls
look big,

Critics in plume and white vallaney wig;
Who lolling on our foremost benches sit,
And still charge first, the true forlorn of
wit;

Whose favors, like the sun, warm where you roll,

Yet you, like him, have neither heat nor
soul:

So may your hats your foretops never press, Untouch'd your ribbons, sacred be your dress;

So may you slowly to old age advance,
And have th' excuse of youth for ignorance;

So may fop-corner full of noise remain,
And drive far off the dull attentive train;

So may your midnight scourgings happy
prove,

And morning batt'ries force your way to
love;

So may not France your warlike hands recall,

But leave you by each other's swords to fall,
As you come here to ruffle vizard punk,

When sober, rail, and roar when you are drunk.
 But to the wits we can some merit plead,
 And urge what by themselves has oft been said:
 Our house relieves the ladies from the frights
 Of ill-pav'd streets, and long dark winter nights;
 The Flanders horses from a cold bleak road,
 Where bears in furs dare scarcely look abroad;
 The audience from worn plays and fustian stuff³⁰
 Of rhyme, more nauseous than three boys in buff.
 Tho' in their house the poets' heads appear,
 We hope we may presume their wits are here.
 The best which they reserv'd they now will play,
 For, like kind cuckolds, tho' w' have not the way
 To please, we'll find you abler men who may.
 If they should fail, for last recruits we breed
 A troop of frisking Monsieurs to succeed:
 You know the French sure cards at time of need.⁴⁰

PROLOGUE AND EPILOGUE TO
 THE UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD,
 1674

[The prologue below was first printed in Miscellany Poems, 1684, with the heading Prologue to the University of Oxford, 1674. Spoken by Mr. Hart. Written by Mr. Dryden. After it follows Epilogue, Spoken by Mrs. Boutell. Written by Mr. Dryden. Six pages later the same epilogue is reprinted, with insignificant variations of text, but headed Epilogue to Oxford: Spoken by Mrs. Marshal. Writ by Mr. Dryden. The latter text is here followed.]

PROLOGUE

SPOKEN BY MR. HART

POETS, your subjects, have their parts assign'd
 T' unbend, and to divert their sovereign's mind:

When tir'd with following nature, you think fit
 To seek repose in the cool shades of wit,
 And, from the sweet retreat, with joy survey
 What rests, and what is conquer'd, of the way.
 Here, free yourselves from envy, care, and strife,
 You view the various turns of human life:
 Safe in our scene, thro' dangerous courts you go,
 And, undebauch'd, the vice of cities know.¹⁰
 Your theories are here to practice brought,
 As in mechanic operations wrought;
 And man, the little world, before you set,
 As once the sphere of crystal shew'd the great.
 Blest sure are you above all mortal kind,
 If to your fortunes you can suit your mind:
 Content to see, and shun, those ills we show,
 And crimes on theaters alone to know,
 With joy we bring what our dead authors writ,
 And beg from you the value of their wit:²⁰
 That Shakespeare's, Fletcher's, and great Jonson's claim
 May be renew'd from those who gave them fame.
 None of our living poets dare appear;
 For Muses so severe are worshipp'd here,
 That, conscious of their faults, they shun the eye,
 And, as profane, from sacred places fly,
 Rather than see th' offended God, and die.
 We bring no imperfections but our own;
 Such faults as made are by the makers shown:
 And you have been so kind, that we may boast,³⁰
 The greatest judges still can pardon most.
 Poets must stoop, when they would please our pit,
 Debas'd even to the level of their wit;
 Disdaining that which yet they know will take,
 Hating themselves what their applause must make.
 But when to praise from you they would aspire,
 Tho' they like eagles mount, your Jove is higher.

So far your knowledge all their pow'r transcends
As what should be, beyond what is, extends.

EPILOGUE

SPOKEN BY MRS. MARSHALL

OFT has our poet wish'd, this happy seat
Might prove his fading Muse's last retreat:

I wonder'd at his wish, but now I find
He here sought quiet, and content of mind;
Which noiseful towns and courts can never
know,

And only in the shades like laurels grow.
Youth, ere it sees the world, here studies
rest,

And age returning thence concludes it
best.

What wonder if we court that happiness
Yearly to share, which hourly you possess,

Teaching ev'n you, while the vex'd world
we show,

Your peace to value more, and better
know?

'T is all we can return for favors past,
Whose holy memory shall ever last,
For patronage from him whose care pre-
sides

O'er every noble art, and every science
guides:

Bathurst, a name the learn'd with rev'rence
know,

And scarcely more to his own Virgil owe;
Whose age enjoys but what his youth de-
serv'd,

To rule those Muses whom before he
serv'd.

His learning, and untainted manners too,
We find, Athenians, are deriv'd to you:

Such ancient hospitality there rests
In yours, as dwelt in the first Grecian breasts,

Where kindness was religion to their guests.

Such modesty did to our sex appear,
As, had there been no laws, we need not
fear,

Since each of you was our protector here.
Converse so chaste, and so strict virtue
shown,

As might Apollo with the Muses own.
Till our return, we must despair to find Judges so just, so knowing, and so kind.

EPILOGUE INTENDED TO HAVE BEEN SPOKEN BY THE LADY
HENR. MAR. WENTWORTH, WHEN CALISTO WAS ACTED
AT COURT

[This epilogue is by no means certainly the work of Dryden. It was first printed, without any ascription to Dryden, in Miscellany Poems, 1684, near the end of the volume, apart from the other prologues and epilogues, and just before the translation of Virgil's Eclogues, which is paged separately. It was evidently inserted in the volume as an afterthought; in the table of contents it is put out of its natural order, at the close of the list of prologues and epilogues. Dryden's name was first joined to the piece in 1702, in the third edition of Miscellany Poems, the First Part.

Calisto, or The Chaste Nymph, a masque by John Crowne, was presented at Court in 1675 by a company of ladies and gentlemen. The Lady Mary and the Lady Anne, daughters of the Duke of York, played the parts of Calisto and of her companion, Nyphe (see line 20 below); Lady Wentworth, afterwards mistress of the Duke of Monmouth, who himself was among "the persons of quality of the men that danced," represented Jupiter.]

As Jupiter I made my court in vain;
I'll now assume my native shape again.
I'm weary to be so unkindly us'd,
And would not be a god, to be refus'd.
State grows uneasy when it hinders love;
A glorious burden, which the wise re-
move.

Now, as a nymph, I need not sue, nor try
The force of any lightning but the eye.

Beauty and youth more than a god command;

No Jove could e'er the force of these with-
stand.

'T is here that sovereign pow'r admits dispute;

Beauty sometimes is justly absolute.
Our sullen Catos, whatsoe'er they say,
Even while they frown and dictate laws,
obey.

You, mighty sir, our bonds more easy
make,

And gracefully, what all must suffer, take:
Above those forms the grave affect to wear;
For 't is not to be wise to be severe.

True wisdom may some gallantry admit,
And soften business with the charms of
wit.

These peaceful triumphs with your cares
 you bought,
 And from the midst of fighting nations
 brought.
 You only hear it thunder from afar,
 And sit in peace the arbiter of war.
 Peace, the loath'd manna, which hot brains
 despise,
 You knew its worth, and made it early
 prize:
 And in its happy leisure sit and see
 The promises of more felicity:
 Two glorious nymphs of your one godlike
 line,
 Whose morning rays like noontide strike
 and shine;
 Whom you to suppliant monarchs shall dis-
 pose,
 To bind your friends, and to disarm your
 foes.

PROLOGUE AND EPILOGUE TO AURENG-ZEBE

[This, the last of Dryden's rhymed heroic plays, was acted in 1675, being entered on the Stationers' Register on November 29 of that year (Malone, I, 1, 115). It was published in 1676.]

PROLOGUE

Our author, by experience, finds it true,
 'T is much more hard to please himself than
 you;
 And out of no feign'd modesty, this day
 Damns his laborious trifle of a play:
 Not that it's worse than what before he writ,
 But he has now another taste of wit;
 And, to confess a truth, (tho' out of time,) ^s
 Grows weary of his long-lov'd mistress, Rhyme.
 Passion's too fierce to be in fetters bound,
 And nature flies him like enchanted ground.
 What verse can do, he has perform'd in this,
 Which he presumes the most correct of his;
 But spite of all his pride, a secret shame
 Invades his breast at Shakespeare's sacred
 name:
 Aw'd when he hears his godlike Romans
 rage,
 He, in a just despair, would quit the stage;
 And to an age less polish'd, more unskill'd,
 Does, with disdain, the foremost honors
 yield.

As with the greater dead he dares not strive,
 He would not match his verse with those who live: ²⁰
 Let him retire, betwixt two ages cast,
 The first of this, and hindmost of the last.
 A losing gamester, let him sneak away;
 He bears no ready money from the play.
 The fate which governs poets thought it fit
 He should not raise his fortunes by his wit.
 The clergy thrive, and the litigious bar;
 Dull heroes fatten with the spoils of war:
 All southern vices, Heav'n be prais'd, are
 here;
 But wit's a luxury you think too dear. ³⁰
 When you to cultivate the plant are loth,
 'T is a shrewd sign 't was never of your growth;
 And wit in northern climates will not blow, Except, like orange trees, 't is hous'd from snow.
 There needs no care to put a playhouse
 down,
 'T is the most desert place of all the town:
 We and our neighbors, to speak proudly,
 are,
 Like monarchs, ruin'd with expensive war;
 While, like wise English, unconcern'd you sit,
 And see us play the tragedy of wit. ⁴⁰

EPILOGUE

A PRETTY task! and so I told the fool, Who needs would undertake to please by rule:
 He thought that, if his characters were good,
 The scenes entire, and freed from noise and
 blood,
 The action great, yet circumscrib'd by time,
 The words not forc'd, but sliding into rhyme,
 The passions rais'd and calm'd by just degrees,
 As tides are swell'd, and then retire to seas;
 He thought, in hitting these, his bus'ness
 done,
 Tho' he, perhaps, has fail'd in ev'ry one: ¹⁰
 But, after all, a poet must confess,
 His art's like physic, but a happy guess.
 Your pleasure on your fancy must depend:
 The lady's pleas'd, just as she likes her
 friend.
 No song! no dance! no show! he fears you'll say
 You love all naked beauties but a play.

He much mistakes your methods to de-
light,
And, like the French, abhors our target
fight,
But those damn'd dogs can never be i' th'
right.
True English hate your Monsieurs' paltry
arts,
For you are all silk-weavers in your hearts.
Bold Britons, at a brave Bear Garden fray,
Are rous'd; and, clatt'ring sticks, cry:
"Play, play, play!"
Meantime, your filthy foreigner will stare
And mutter to himself: "*Ha, gens bar-
bare!*"
And, gad, 't is well he mutters; well for him;
Our butchers else would tear him limb from limb.
'T is true, the time may come, your sons may be Infected with this French civility;
But this in after-ages will be done: 30
Our poet writes a hundred years too soon.
This age comes on too slow, or he too fast;
And early springs are subject to a blast!
Who would excel, when few can make a test
Betwixt indiff'rent writing and the best?
For favors cheap and common who would
strive,
Which, like abandon'd prostitutes, you give?
Yet scatter'd here and there I some behold
Who can discern the tinsel from the gold:
To these he writes; and, if by them allow'd,
'T is their prerogative to rule the crowd. 41
For he more fears, like a presuming man,
Their votes who cannot judge, than theirs who can.

EPILOGUE TO THE MAN OF MODE

OR, SIR FOPLING FLUTTER

[This comedy, by Sir George Etherege, was acted and published in 1676. Dryden had a hearty admiration for Etherege, as a writer of genuine comic power: see his Letter to Sir George Etherege, p. 214, below; and Mac Flecknoe, lines 151-154, p. 136, below.]

Most modern wits such monstrous fools have shown,
They seem'd not of Heav'n's making, but their own.

Those nauseous harlequins in farce may
pass,
But there goes more to a substantial ass!
Something of man must be expos'd to view,
That, gallants, they may more resemble you.
Sir Fopling is a fool so nicely writ,
The ladies would mistake him for a wit;
And, when he sings, talks loud, and cocks,
would cry:
"I vow, methinks he's pretty company: 10
So brisk, so gay, so travel'd, so refin'd,
As he took pains to graff upon his kind."
True fops help nature's work, and go to school,
To file and finish God-A'mighty's fool.
Yet none Sir Fopling him, or him can call;
He's knight o' th' shire, and represents ye
all.
From each he meets he culls whate'er he can;
Legion's his name, a people in a man.
His bulky folly gathers as it goes,
And, rolling o'er you, like a snowball grows.
His various modes from various fathers follow; 21
One taught the toss, and one the new French wallow:
His sword knot this, his crevat this design'd;
And this, the yard-long snake he twirls behind.
From one the sacred periwig he gain'd,
Which wind ne'er blew, nor touch of hat
profan'd.
Another's diving bow he did adore,
Which with a shog casts all the hair before,
Till he with full decorum brings it back,
And rises with a water-spaniel shake. 30
As for his songs (the ladies' dear delight), Those sure he took from most of you who
write.
Yet every man is safe from what he fear'd;
For no one fool is hunted from the herd.

PROLOGUE TO CIRCE

[This tragedy, by Charles Davenant, son of Sir William, was probably acted late in 1676 or early in 1677; the songs in Circe are mentioned in the Term Catalogue for Easter Term (May), 1677, the play itself in that for Trinity Term (July) of the same year. Downes terms Circe an opera; it is in fact a spectacular heroic play, with many songs interspersed. The prologue is extant in two forms, of which the later (given first below) was printed in Miscellany Poems, 1684, with the heading, An Epilogue, written by Mr. Dryden. The earlier form was printed with the play in 1677.]

WERE you but half so wise as y' are severe,
Our youthful poet should not need to fear:
To his green years your censures you would suit,

Not blast the blossom, but expect the fruit.
The sex that best does pleasure understand,
Will always choose to err on t'other hand.
They check not him that's awkward in de-
light,

But clap the young rogue's cheek, and set him right.

Thus hearten'd well and flesh'd upon his prey,
The youth may prove a man another day. 10
Your Ben and Fletcher, in their first young
flight,

Did no Volpone, no Arbaces write;
But hopp'd about, and short excursions
made

From bough to bough, as if they were afraid,

And each were guilty of some Slighted
Maid.

Shakespeare's own Muse her Pericles first
bore;

The Prince of Tyre was elder than the Moor:
'Tis miracle to see a first good play;

All hawthorns do not bloom on Christmas-
day.

A slender poet must have time to grow, 20
And spread and burnish as his brothers do.
Who still looks lean, sure with some pox
is curst;

But no man can be Falstaff-fat at first.
Then damn not, but indulge his stew'd essays,

Encourage him, and bloat him up with
praise,

That he may get more bulk before he dies:
He's not yet fed enough for sacrifice.

Perhaps, if now your grace you will not grudge,

He may grow up to write, and you to judge.

[The Prologue printed in the first edition agrees with the above for ten lines. It then continues as follows:]

For your own sakes, instruct him when he's
out;

You'll find him mend his work at every bout.

When some young lusty thief is passing by,

How many of your tender kind will cry:
"A proper fellow, pity he should die!"

He might be sav'd and thank us for our
pains:

There's such a stock of love within his veins."

These arguments the women may persuade,
But move not you, the brothers of the trade;
Who, scattering your infection thro' the
pit,

With aching hearts and empty purses sit, 20
To take your dear five shillings' worth of wit.

The praise you give him in your kindest mood

Comes dribbling from you, just like drops
of blood;

And then you clap so civilly, for fear
The loudness might offend your neighbor's
ear,

That we suspect your gloves are lin'd
within.

For silence sake, and cotton'd next the skin.
From these usurpers we appeal to you,

The only knowing, only judging few; 30
You, who in private have this play allow'd,

Ought to maintain your suffrage to the crowd.

The captive once submitted to your bands
You should protect from death by vulgar bands.

TO MR. LEE, ON HIS ALEX- ANDER

[This poem was published in 1677, in The Rival Queens, or The Death of Alexander the Great, by Nathaniel Lee. The play is entered on the Term Catalogue for Michaelmas Term (November). For Lee Dryden had a warm regard, mixed with a trifle of condescension. In a letter to Dennis he writes: "I remember, poor Nat. Lee, who was then upon the verge of madness, yet made a sober and a witty answer to a bad poet, who told him it was an easie thing to write like a madman. 'No,' said he, 'it is very difficult to write like a madman, but it is a very easie matter to write like a fool'" (Malone, I, 2; 35, 36).]

THE blast of common censure could I fear,
Before your play my name should not ap-
pear;

For 't will be thought, and with some color
 too,
 I pay the bribe I first receiv'd from you;
 That mutual vouchers for our fame we
 stand,
 And play the game into each other's hand;
 And as cheap pen'orths to ourselves afford,
 As Bessus and the brothers of the sword.
 Such libels private men may well endure,
 When states and kings themselves are not secure; 10
 For ill men, conscious of their inward guilt,
 Think the best actions on by-ends are built.
 And yet my silence had not 'scap'd their
 spite;
 Then, envy had not suffer'd me to write;
 For, since I could not ignorance pretend,
 Such worth I must or envy or commend.
 So many candidates there stand for wit,
 A place in court is scarce so hard to get:
 In vain they crowd each other at the door;
 For ev'n reversions are all begg'd before: 20
 Desert, how known soe'er, is long delay'd;
 And then, too, fools and knaves are better
 paid.
 Yet, as some actions bear so great a name,
 That courts themselves are just for fear of
 shame;
 So has the mighty merit of your play
 Extorted praise, and forc'd itself a way.
 'T is here as 't is at sea; who farthest goes,
 Or dares the most, makes all the rest his
 foes.
 Yet, when some virtue much outgrows the
 rest,
 It shoots too fast and high to be oppress'd;
 As his heroic worth struck envy dumb, 31
 Who took the Dutchman, and who cut the boom.
 Such praise is yours, while you the passions
 move,
 That 't is no longer feign'd, 't is real love,
 Where nature triumphs over wretched art;
 We only warm the head, but you the heart.
 Always you warm! and if the rising year,
 As in hot regions, bring the sun too near,
 'T is but to make your fragrant spices blow,
 Which in our colder climates will not grow.
 They only think you animate your theme 41
 With too much fire, who are themselves all phle'me.
 Prizes would be for lags of slowest pace,
 Were cripples made the judges of the race.
 Despise those drones, who praise, while they accuse

The too much vigor of your youthful Muse.
 That humble style which they their virtue
 make,
 Is in your pow'r; you need but stoop and
 take.
 Your beauteous images must be allow'd
 By all, but some vile poets of the crowd. 50
 But how should any signpost dauber know
 The worth of Titian or of Angelo?
 Hard features every bungler can command;
 To draw true beauty shews a master's hand.

PROLOGUE AND EPILOGUE TO ALL FOR LOVE

OR, THE WORLD WELL LOST

[This, Dryden's finest tragedy, treats the familiar theme of Antony and Cleopatra in a style that owes much to the study of Shakespeare. It was probably acted in 1677, since it was entered on the Stationers' Register on January 31, 1678 (Malone, I, 1, 116), and published in the same year.]

PROLOGUE

WHAT flocks of critics hover here to-day,
 As vultures wait on armies for their
 prey,
 All gaping for the carcass of a play! }
 With croaking notes they bode some dire event,
 And follow dying poets by the scent.
 Ours gives himself for gone; y' have watch'd your time!
 He fights this day unarm'd, — without his
 rhyme; —
 And brings a tale which often has been told;
 As sad as Dido's; and almost as old.
 His hero, whom you wits his bully call, 10
 Bates of his mettle, and scarce rants at all:
 He's somewhat lewd, but a well-meaning
 mind;
 Weeps much, fights little, but is wondrous
 kind.
 In short, a pattern, and companion fit,
 For all the keeping Tonies of the pit.
 I could name more: a wife, and mistress
 too;
 Both (to be plain) too good for most of
 you:
 The wife well-natur'd, and the mistress
 true. }

Now, poets, if your fame has been his
 care,
 Allow him all the candor you can spare. 20
 A brave man scorns to quarrel once a day;
 Like Hector's, in at every petty fray.
 Let those find fault whose wit's so very small,
 They've need to show that they can think
 at all;
 Errors, like straws, upon the surface flow;
 He who would search for pearls must dive
 below.
 Fops may have leave to level all they can,
 As pigmies would be glad to lop a man.
 Half-wits are fleas; so little and so light,
 We scarce could know they live, but that they bite. 30
 But, as the rich, when tir'd with daily
 feasts,
 For change, become their next poor tenant's guests,
 Drink hearty draughts of ale from plain brown bowls,
 And snatch the homely rasher from the coals;
 So you, retiring from much better cheer,
 For once, may venture to do penance here.
 And since that plenteous autumn now is
 past,
 Whose grapes and peaches have indulg'd
 your taste,
 Take in good part, from our poor poet's board,
 Such rival'd fruits as winter can afford. 40

EPILOGUE

POETS, like disputants, when reasons fail,
 Have one sure refuge left — and that's to rail.
 Fop, coxcomb, fool, are thunder'd thro' the
 pit,
 And this is all their equipage of wit.
 We wonder how the devil this diff'rence
 grows,
 Betwixt our fools in verse, and yours in prose:
 For, 'faith, the quarrel rightly understood,
 'Tis civil war with their own flesh and
 blood.
 The threadbare author hates the gaudy
 coat,
 And swears at the gilt coach, but swears
 afoot: 10
 For 't is observ'd of every scribbling man,

He grows a fop as fast as e'er he can;
 Prunes up, and asks his oracle, the glass,
 If pink or purple best become his face.
 For our poor wretch, he neither rails nor prays;
 Nor likes your wit just as you like his
 plays;
 He has not yet so much of Mr. Bayes.
 He does his best; and if he cannot please,
 Would quietly sue out his writ of ease.
 Yet, if he might his own grand jury call, 20
 By the fair sex he begs to stand or fall.
 Let Caesar's power the men's ambition
 move,
 But grace you him who lost the world for
 love!
 Yet if some antiquated lady say,
 The last age is not copied in his play;
 Heav'n help the man who for that face
 must drudge,
 Which only has the wrinkles of a judge.
 Let not the young and beauteous join with
 those;
 For, should you raise such numerous hosts
 of foes,
 Young wits and sparks he to his aid must
 call; 30
 'Tis more than one man's work to please you all.

EPILOGUE TO MITHRIDATES,
KING OF PONTUS

[This tragedy, by Lee, was published in 1678, being licensed for the press on March 28. The following epilogue is taken from the first edition. Scott prints another epilogue, from a broadside, but gives no proof that it is by Dryden.]

You've seen a pair of faithful lovers die:
 And much you care, for most of you will
 cry,
 'T was a just judgment on their constancy. }
 For, Heav'n be thank'd, we live in such an
 age,
 When no man dies for love, but on the
 stage:
 And ev'n those martyrs are but rare in
 plays;
 A curs'd sign how much true faith decays.
 Love is no more a violent desire;
 'T is a mere metaphor, a painted fire. 10
 In all our sex, the name, examin'd well,

Is pride to gain, and vanity to tell.
 In woman, 't is of subtile int'rest made:
 Curse on the punk that made it first a trade !
 She first did wit's prerogative remove,
 And made a fool presume to prate of love.
 Let honor and preferment go for gold,
 But glorious beauty is not to be sold:
 Or, if it be, 't is at a rate so high,
 That nothing but adoring it should buy.
 Yet the rich cullies may their boasting
 spare; 20
 They purchase but sophisticated ware.
 'T is prodigality that buys deceit,
 Where both the giver and the taker cheat.
 Men but refine on the old half-crown way;
 And women fight, like Swizzers, for their pay.

PROLOGUE, EPILOGUE, AND SONG FROM THE KIND KEEPER

OR, MR. LIMBERHAM

[In a chronological list of his plays which Dryden printed with King Arthur in 1691 (see Malone, I, 1; 56, 218, 219), this comedy is placed between All for Love and Œdipus. Hence it was probably acted early in 1678; though, perhaps because of its ill success on the stage, it was not published until late in 1679, when it is entered on the Term Catalogue for Michaelmas Term (November). The first edition is dated 1680. This play and Œdipus were both "printed for R. Bentley and M. Magnes;" Dryden had evidently quarreled with his former publisher Herringman, to whom a little later (1682) he devoted a sarcastic line (line 105) in Mac Flecknoe.]

PROLOGUE

TRUE wit has seen its best days long ago;
 It ne'er look'd up, since we were dipp'd in
 show;
 When sense in dog'rel rhymes and clouds
 was lost,
 And dulness flourish'd at the actor's cost.
 Nor stopp'd it here; when tragedy was
 done,
 Satire and humor the same fate have run,
 And comedy is sunk to trick and pun.
 Now our machining lumber will not sell,
 And you no longer care for heav'n or hell;
 What stuff can please you next, the Lord
 can tell. 10

Let them, who the rebellion first began
 To wit, restore the monarch, if they can;
 Our author dares not be the first bold man.
 He, like the prudent citizen, takes care
 To keep for better marts his staple ware;
 His toys are good enough for Sturbridge
 fair.

Tricks were the fashion; if it now be spent,
 'Tis time enough at Easter to invent;
 No man will make up a new suit for Lent.
 If now and then he takes a small pretense,
 To forage for a little wit and sense, 21
 Pray pardon him, he meant you no offense.
 Next summer, Nostradamus tells, they say,
 That all the critics shall be shipp'd away,
 And not enow be left to damn a play.
 To every sail beside, good Heav'n, be kind;
 But drive away that swarm with such a
 wind,

That not one locust may be left behind !

EPILOGUE

SPOKEN BY LIMBERHAM

I BEG a boon, that, ere you all disband,
 Some one would take my bargain off my
 hand;

To keep a punk is but a common evil;
 To find her false, and marry — that's the devil.

Well, I ne'er acted part in all my life,
 But still I was fobb'd off with some such
 wife:

I find the trick; these poets take no pity
 Of one that is a member of the city.
 We cheat you lawfully, and in our trades;
 You cheat us basely with your common jades. 10

Now I am married, I must sit down by it,
 But let me keep my dear-bought spouse in quiet;

Let none of you damn'd Woodalls of the pit

Put in for shares to mend our breed, in wit:
 We know your bastards from our flesh and
 blood,

Not one in ten of yours e'er comes to good.
 In all the boys their fathers' virtues shine,
 But all the female fry turn Pugs like
 mine.

When these grow up, Lord, with what rampant gadders
 Our counters will be throng'd, and roads with padders ! 20

This town two bargains has, not worth one farthing,
A Smithfield horse, and wife of Covent Garden.

A SONG FROM THE ITALIAN

By a dismal cypress lying,
Damon cried, all pale and dying:
"Kind is death, that ends my pain,
But cruel she I lov'd in vain.
The mossy fountains
Murmur my trouble,
And hollow mountains
My groans redouble:
Every nymph mourns me,
Thus while I languish; 10
She only scorns me,
Who caus'd my anguish,
No love returning me, but all hope denying."

By a dismal cypress lying,
Like a swan, so sung he dying:
"Kind is death, that ends my pain,
But cruel she I lov'd in vain."

PROLOGUE TO A TRUE WIDOW

[This comedy was by Thomas Shadwell. Two speeches by Lump, in the first act, indicate that it was first acted on March 21, 1678. It was first printed in the next year. After his quarrel with Shadwell, Dryden gave this same prologue to Aphra Behn for her tragedy The Widow Ranter, or The History of Bacon in Virginia, published in 1690. The present text is from the first edition of Shadwell's play.]

HEAV'N save ye, gallants, and this hopeful age!
Y' are welcome to the downfall of the stage:
The fools have labor'd long in their vocation;
And vice (the manufacture of the nation)
O'erstocks the town so much, and thrives so well,
That fops and knaves grow drugs and will not sell.
In vain our wares on theaters are shown,
When each has a plantation of his own.
His cruse ne'er fails; for whatsoe'er he spends,

There's still God's plenty for himself and friends. 10

Should men be rated by poetic rules,
Lord, what a poll would there be rais'd from fools!

Meantime poor wit prohibited must lie,
As if 't were made some French commodity.
Fools you will have, and rais'd at vast expense;

And yet, as soon as seen, they give offense.
Time was, when none would cry: "That oaf was me!"

But now you strive about your pedigree:
Baubles and caps no sooner are thrown down,
But there's a muss of more than half the town. 20

Each one will challenge a child's part at least,

A sign the family is well increas'd.
Of foreign cattle there's no longer need,
When w' are supplied so fast with English breed.

Well! flourish, countrymen; drink, swear, and roar;

Let every freeborn subject keep his whore;
And, wand'ring in the wilderness about,
At end of forty years not wear her out.
But when you see these pictures, let none dare

To own beyond a limb or single share; 30
For where the punk is common, he's a sot
Who needs will father what the parish got.

PROLOGUE AND EPILOGUE TO ŒDIPUS

[This tragedy, by Dryden and Lee, was probably acted in August, 1678, since the Woolen Act (30th Charles II cap. 3), mentioned in the last line of the prologue, went into effect on the first of that month. It was printed the next year. The prologue and epilogue are without doubt by Dryden.]

PROLOGUE

WHEN Athens all the Grecian state did guide,

And Greece gave laws to all the world beside;

Then Sophocles with Socrates did sit,
Supreme in wisdom one, and one in wit:
And wit from wisdom differ'd not in those,
But as 't was sung in verse, or said in prose.
Then, Œdipus, on crowded theaters,

Drew all admiring eyes and list'ning ears:
 The pleas'd spectator shouted every line,
 The noblest, manliest, and the best design !
 And every critic of each learned age, ¹¹
 By this just model has reform'd the stage.
 Now, should it fail, (as Heav'n avert our
 fear !)
 Damn it in silence, lest the world should hear.

For were it known this poem did not please,
 You might set up for perfect salvages:
 Your neighbors would not look on you as
 men,

But think the nation all turn'd Picts again.
 Faith, as you manage matters, 't is not fit
 You should suspect yourselves of too much wit: ²⁰

Drive not the jest too far, but spare this piece;

And, for this once, be not more wise than Greece.

See twice ! do not pellmell to damning fall,
 Like true-born Britons, who ne'er think at
 all:

Pray be advis'd; and tho' at Mons you won,
 On pointed cannon do not always run.
 With some respect to ancient wit proceed;
 You take the four first councils for your creed.

But, when you lay tradition wholly by, }
 And on the private spirit alone rely, ³⁰ }
 You turn fanatics in your poetry. }
 If, notwithstanding all that we can say, }
 You needs will have your pen'worths of } the play, }
 And come resolv'd to damn, because you }
 pay, }

Record it, in memorial of the fact,
 The first play buried since the Woolen Act.

EPILOGUE

WHAT Sophocles could undertake alone,
 Our poets found a work for more than one;
 And therefore two lay tugging at the piece,
 With all their force, to draw the pond'rous
 mass from Greece;

A weight that bent ev'n Seneca's strong
 Muse,

And which Corneille's shoulders did refuse.
 So hard it is th' Athenian harp to string !
 So much two consuls yield to one just king.
 Terror and pity this whole poem sway;
 The mightiest machines that can mount a play: ¹⁰

How heavy will those vulgar souls be found,
 Whom two such engines cannot move from
 ground !

When Greece and Rome have smil'd upon this birth,

You can but damn for one poor spot of
 earth:

And when your children find your judgment
 such,

They 'll scorn their sires, and wish themselves born Dutch;

Each haughty poet will infer with ease,
 How much his wit must underwrite to
 please.

As some strong churl would, brandishing,
 advance

The monumental sword that conquer'd
 France; ²⁰

So you, by judging this, your judgments teach:

Thus far you like, that is, thus far you reach.

Since then the vote of full two thousand years

Has crown'd this plot, and all the dead are theirs,

Think it a debt you pay, not alms you give,
 And, in your own defense, let this play live.
 Think 'em not vain, when Sophocles is
 shown,

To praise his worth, they humbly doubt
 their own.

Yet, as weak states each other's pow'r assure,

Weak poets by conjunction are secure. ³⁰
 Their treat is what your palates relish most.

Charm ! song ! and show ! a murder and a ghost !

We know not what you can desire or hope,
 To please you more, but burning of a pope.

PROLOGUE, EPILOGUE, AND SONG FROM TROILUS AND CRESSIDA

OR, TRUTH FOUND TOO LATE

[In this adaptation from Shakespeare Dryden transformed Cressida into a faithful and unjustly accused maiden. The play was probably acted late in 1678, since it was entered on the Stationers' Register April 14, 1679 (Malone, I, 1, 119) and published late in the same year, being entered in the Term Catalogue for Michaelmas Term (November). This was the first of Dryden's works to be "printed for Jacob Tonson," who from this time on published nearly all his writings.]

PROLOGUE

SPOKEN BY MR. BETTERTON, REPRESENTING THE GHOST OF SHAKESPEARE

SEE, my lov'd Britons, see your Shakespeare rise,

An awful ghost confess'd to human eyes !
Unnam'd, methinks, distinguish'd I had
been

From other shades, by this eternal green,
About whose wreaths the vulgar poets
strive,

And with a touch their wither'd bays revive.

Untaught, unpractic'd, in a barbarous age,
I found not, but created first the stage;
And, if I drain'd no Greek or Latin store,
'T was that my own abundance gave me
more. 10

On foreign trade I needed not rely,
Like fruitful Britain, rich without supply.
In this my rough-drawn play you shall be-
hold

Some master-strokes, so manly and so
bold,

That he who meant to alter, found 'em
such,

He shook, and thought it sacrilege to touch.

Now, where are the successors to my
name ?

What bring they to fill out a poet's fame ?
Weak, short-liv'd issues of a feeble age;
Scarce living to be christen'd on the
stage ! 20

For humor farce, for love they rhyme dispense,

That tolls the knell for their departed
sense.

Dulness might thrive in any trade but
this:

'T would recommend to some fat benefice.
Dulness, that in a playhouse meets dis-
grace,

Might meet with reverence in its proper
place.

The fulsome clench, that nauseates the
town,

Would from a judge or alderman go
down,

Such virtue is there in a robe and gown !

And that insipid stuff which here you
hate, 30
Might somewhere else be call'd a grave
debate;
Dulness is decent in the Church and
State.

But I forget that still 't is understood Bad plays are best decried by showing
good.

Sit silent then, that my pleas'd soul may
see

A judging audience once, and worthy me;
My faithful scene from true records shall
tell

How Trojan valor did the Greek excel;
Your great forefathers shall their fame regain,

And Homer's angry ghost repine in vain. 40

EPILOGUE

SPOKEN BY THERSITES

THESE cruel critics put me into passion,
For in their low'ring looks I read damna-
tion:

Ye expect a satire, and I seldom fail;
When I'm first beaten, 't is my part to rail.

You British fools, of the old Trojan stock,
That stand so thick one cannot miss the flock,

Poets have cause to dread a keeping pit,
When women's cullies come to judge of
wit.

As we strow ratsbane when we vermin fear,
'T were worth our cost to scatter fool-bane
here; 10

And, after all our judging fops were
serv'd,

Dull poets too should have a dose reserv'd;
Such reprobates, as, past all sense of shaming,

Write on, and ne'er are satisfied with damning:

Next, those, to whom the stage does not belong,

Such whose vocation only is to song;
At most to prologue, when, for want of
time,

Poets take in for journeywork in rhyme.
But I want curses for those mighty shoals
Of scribbling Chlorisses and Phyllis fools:
Those oafs should be restrain'd, during their lives, 21

From pen and ink, as madmen are from knives.

I could rail on, but 't were a task as vain
As preaching truth at Rome, or wit in Spain:

Yet to huff out our play was worth my trying;

John Lilburne scap'd his judges by defying:
If guilty, yet I'm sure o' th' Church's
blessing,

By suffering for the plot, without confess-
ing.

SONG

I

CAN life be a blessing,
Or worth the possessing,

Can life be a blessing, if love were away?

Ah, no! tho' our love all night keep us
waking,

And tho' he torment us with cares all the
day,

Yet he sweetens, he sweetens our pains
in the taking;

There's an hour at the last, there's an hour to repay.

II

In every possessing,
The ravishing blessing,

In every possessing the fruit of our pain, 10

Poor lovers forget long ages of anguish, Whate'er they have suffer'd and done to obtain;

'T is a pleasure, a pleasure to sigh and to languish,

When we hope, when we hope to be happy
again.

PROLOGUE TO CÆSAR BORGIA, SON OF POPE ALEXANDER THE SIXTH

[This tragedy, by Nathaniel Lee, was probably acted in 1679. It is entered on the Term Catalogue for Michaelmas Term (November) of that year, though the first edition is dated 1680.]

TH' unhappy man, who once has trail'd a pen,

Lives not to please himself, but other men;
Is always drudging, wastes his life and
blood,

Yet only eats and drinks what you think
good:

What praise soe'er the poetry deserve,
Yet every fool can bid the poet starve.
That fumbling lecher to revenge is bent,
Because he thinks himself or whore is meant:

Name but a cuckold, all the city swarms;
From Leadenhall to Ludgate is in arms. 10
Were there no fear of Antichrist, or France,

In the best times poor poets live by chance.

Either you come not here, or, as you
grace

Some old acquaintance, drop into the
place,

Careless and qualmish with a yawning
face:

You sleep o'er wit, and by my troth you
may;

Most of your talents lie another way.

You love to hear of some prodigious tale,

The bell that toll'd alone, or Irish whale.

News is your food, and you enough provide, 20

Both for yourselves, and all the world be-
side.

One theater there is of vast resort,
Which whilom of Requests was call'd the Court;

But now the great Exchange of News 't is
light,

And full of hum and buzz from noon till
night.

Upstairs and down you run, as for a race,
And each man wears three nations in his
face.

So big you look, tho' claret you retrench,
That, arm'd with bottled ale, you huff the French;

But all your entertainment still is fed 30

By villains in our own dull island bred:

Would you return to us, we dare engage
To show you better rogues upon the stage.

You know no poison but plain ratsbane
here;

Death's more refin'd, and better bred elsewhere.

They have a civil way in Italy,
By smelling a perfume to make you die;

A trick would make you lay your snuff-box by.

Murder's a trade — so known and practic'd
there,

That 't is infallible as is the chair — 40

But mark their feasts, you shall behold
such pranks;
The Pope says grace, but 'tis the Devil gives thanks.

PROLOGUE TO THE LOYAL GENERAL

[This tragedy, by Nahum Tate, was probably acted in 1679; it was published in 1680, being entered on the Term Catalogue for Hilary Term (February) of that year. Dryden's prologue was reprinted in the third edition (1702) of Miscellany Poems, the First Part, where it is called simply A Prologue written by Mr. Dryden.]

If yet there be a few that take delight
In that which reasonable men should
write,
To them alone we dedicate this night.
The rest may satisfy their curious itch
With city gazettes, or some factious speech,
Or whate'er libel, for the public good,
Stirs up the Shrovetide crew to fire and
blood!
Remove your benches, you apostate pit,
And take, above, twelve pennyworth of
wit;
Go back to your dear dancing on the rope,
Or see what's worse, the Devil and the Pope!
The plays that take on our corrupted stage,
Methinks, resemble the distracted age;
Noise, madness, all unreasonable things,
That strike at sense, as rebels do at kings!
The style of forty-one our poets write,
And you are grown to judge like forty-eight.
Such censures our mistaking audience
make,
That 'tis almost grown scandalous to take!
They talk of fevers that infect the brains,
But nonsense is the new disease that reigns.
Weak stomachs, with a long disease op-
press'd,
Cannot the cordials of strong wit digest.
Therefore thin nourishment of farce ye
choose,
Decoctions of a barley-water Muse:
A meal of tragedy would make ye sick,
Unless it were a very tender chick.
Some scenes in sippets would be worth our
time;

Those would go down; some love that's poach'd in rhyme;
If these should fail —
We must lie down, and, after all our cost,
Keep holiday, like watermen in frost;
Whilst you turn players on the world's great stage,
And act yourselves the farce of your own
age.

THE PROLOGUE AT OXFORD, 1680

[This prologue is here reprinted from Miscellany Poems, 1684. It was written for an Oxford production of Lee's Sophonisba, or Hannibal's Overthrow, a tragedy first published in 1675 (see Term Catalogue for Michaelmas Term (November), 1675; the edition is dated 1676), and appeared in an edition of that play in 1681. This text varies somewhat from that included in Miscellany Poems, which Dryden probably revised for publication.]

THESPIS, the first professor of our art,
At country wakes sung ballads from a cart.
To prove this true, if Latin be no trespass,
Dicitur et plaustris verisise poemata Thespis.
But Æschylus, says Horace in some page,
Was the first mountebank that trod the
stage:
Yet Athens never knew your learned sport
Of tossing poets in a tennis court.
But 'tis the talent of our English nation,
Still to be plotting some new reformation;
And few years hence, if anarchy goes on,
Jack Presbyter shall here erect his
throne,
Knock out a tub with preaching once a
day,
And every prayer be longer than a play.
Then all your heathen wits shall go to pot,
For disbelieving of a Popish Plot:
Your poets shall be us'd like infidels,
And worst, the author of *The Oxford
Bells*:
Nor should we scape the sentence, to de-
part,
Ev'n in our first original, a cart.
No zealous brother there would want a
stone,
To maul us cardinals, and pelt Pope Joan:
Religion, learning, wit, would be sup-
press'd,

Rags of the whore, and trappings of the beast.

Scot, Suarez, Tom of Aquin, must go down,
As chief supporters of the triple crown;

And Aristotle's for destruction ripe;
Some say, he call'd the soul an organ-pipe,
Which, by some little help of derivation,
Shall then be prov'd a pipe of inspiration. 30

TRANSLATIONS FROM OVID'S EPISTLES

*Vel tibi composita cantetur epistola voce :
Ignotum hoc aliis ille novavit opus. — OVID.*

[The following translations, Dryden's first experiment in a sort of work which was later to become his main occupation, were first published in a small octavo entitled, Ovid's Epistles, translated by several hands [motto as above], London, 1680. It contains twenty-three pieces, the epistles from Dido to Æneas and from Phyllis to Demophon appearing in two different translations. Among the contributors, besides Dryden, were Tate, Aphra Behn, Duke, Rymer, Otway, Butler, and, queerly enough, Dryden's arch-enemy Settle. Lord Mulgrave appears only as collaborating with Dryden on the epistle from Helen to Paris.]

THE PREFACE TO OVID'S EPISTLES

THE life of Ovid being already written in our language, before the translation of his Metamorphoses. I will not presume so far upon myself, to think I can add anything to Mr. Sandys his undertaking. The English reader may there be satisfied, that he flourish'd in the reign of Augustus Cæsar; that he was extracted from an ancient family of Roman Knights; that he was born to the inheritance of a splendid fortune; that he was design'd to the study of the law, and had made considerable progress in it, before he quitted that profession for this of poetry, to which he was more naturally form'd. The cause of his banishment is unknown; because he was himself unwilling further to provoke the emperor, by ascribing it to any other reason than what was pretended by Augustus, which was the lasciviousness of his Elegies, and his Art of Love. 'Tis true, they are not to be excus'd in the severity of manners, as being able to corrupt a larger empire, if there were any, than that of Rome: yet this may be said in behalf of Ovid, that no man has ever treated the passion of love with so much delicacy of thought, and of expression, or search'd into the nature of it more philosophically than he. And the emperor who condemn'd him had as little reason as another man to punish that fault with so much severity, if at least he were the author of a certain epigram which is ascrib'd to him, relating to the cause of the first civil war betwixt himself and Mark Anthony the triumvir, which is more fulsome than any passage I have met with in our poet. To pass by the naked familiarity of his expressions to Horace, which are cited in that author's life, I need only mention one notorious act of his, in taking Livia to his bed, when she was not only married, but with child by her husband then living. But deeds, it seems, may be justified by arbitrary power, when words are question'd in a poet. There is another guess of the grammarians, as far from truth as the first from reason: they will have him banish'd for some favors, which, they say, he receiv'd from Julia, the daughter of Augustus, whom they think he celebrates under the name of Corinna in his Elegies: but he who will observe the verses which are made to that mistress, may gather from the whole contexture of them, that Corinna was not a woman of the highest quality. If Julia were then married to Agrippa, why should our poet make his petition to Isis for her safe delivery, and afterwards condole her miscarriage; which, for aught he knew, might be by her own husband? Or, indeed, how durst he be so bold to make the least discovery of such a crime, which was no less than capital, especially committed against a person of Agrippa's rank? Or, if it were before her marriage, he would surely have been more discreet than to have publish'd an accident which must have been fatal to them both. But what most confirms me against this opinion is, that Ovid himself complains that the true person of Corinna was found out by the fame of his verses to her: which, if it had been Julia, he durst not have own'd; and, besides, an immediate punishment must have follow'd. He seems himself more truly to have touch'd at the cause of his exile in those obscure verses:

Cur aliquid vidi, cur noxia lumina feci? &c.

Namely, that he had either seen, or was conscious to, somewhat which had procur'd him his disgrace. But neither am I satisfied that this was the incest of the emperor with his own daughter: for Augustus was of a nature too vindictive to have contented himself with so small a revenge, or so unsafe to himself, as that of simple banishment; and would certainly have secur'd his crimes from public notice by the death of him who was witness to them. Neither have histories given us any sight into such an action of this emperor: nor would he (the greatest politician of his time), in all probability, have manag'd his crimes with so little secrecy, as not to shun the observation of any man. It seems more probable, that Ovid was either the confident of some other passion, or that he had stumbled by some inadvertency upon the privacies of Livia, and seen her in a bath; for the words:

Nudam sine veste Dianam

agree better with Livia, who had the fame of chastity, than with either of the Julias, who were both noted of incontinency. The first verses which were made by him in his youth, and recited publicly, according to the custom, were, as he himself assures us, to Corinna; his banishment happen'd not till the age of fifty: from which it may be deduc'd, with probability enough, that the love of Corinna did not occasion it. Nay, he tells us plainly, that his offense was that of error only, not of wickedness: and in the same paper of verses also, that the cause was notoriously known at Rome, tho' it be left so obscure to after ages.

But to leave conjectures on a subject so uncertain, and to write somewhat more authentic of this poet: that he frequented the court of Augustus, and was well receiv'd in it, is most undoubted: all his poems bear the character of a court, and appear to be written, as the French call it, à la cour. Add to this, that the titles of many of his Elegies, and more of his Letters in his banishment, are address'd to persons well known to us, even at this distance, to have been considerable in that court.

Nor was his acquaintance less with the famous poets of his age, than with the noblemen and ladies. He tells you himself, in a particular account of his own life, that Macer, Horace, Tibullus, Propertius, and many others of them, were his familiar friends, and that some of them communicated their writings to him; but that he had only seen Virgil.

If the imitation of nature be the business of a poet, I know no author who can justly be compar'd with ours, especially in the description of the passions. And, to prove this, I shall need no other judges than the generality of his readers; for all passions being inborn with us, we are almost equally judges, when we are concern'd in the representation of them. Now I will appeal to any man who has read this poet, whether he find not the natural emotion of the same passion in himself, which the poet describes in his feign'd persons? His thoughts, which are the pictures and results of those passions, are generally such as naturally arise from those disorderly motions of our spirits. Yet, not to speak too partially in his behalf, I will confess that the copiousness of his wit was such that he often writ too pointedly for his subject, and made his persons speak more eloquently than the violence of their passion would admit; so that he is frequently witty out of season; leaving the imitation of nature, and the cooler dictates of his judgment, for the false applause of fancy. Yet he seems to have found out this imperfection in his riper age, for why else should he complain that his Metamorphoses was left unfinish'd? Nothing sure can be added to the wit of that poem, or of the rest; but many things ought to have been retrench'd; which I suppose would have been the business of his age, if his misfortunes had not come too fast upon him. But take him uncorrected, as he is transmitted to us, and it must be acknowledg'd, in spite of his Dutch friends, the commentators, even of Julius Scaliger himself, that Seneca's censure will stand good against him:

Nescivit quod bene cessit relinquere;

he never knew how to give over, when he had done well; but, continually varying the same sense an hundred ways, and taking up in another place what he had more than enough inculcated before, he sometimes cloy his readers instead of satisfying them; and gives occasion to his translators, who dare not cover him, to blush at the nakedness of their father. This then is the allay of Ovid's writing, which is sufficiently recompens'd by his other excellencies: nay, this very fault is not without its beauties; for the most severe censor cannot but be pleas'd with the prodigality of his wit, tho' at the same time he could have wish'd that the master of it had been a better manager. Everything which he does becomes him; and, if sometimes he appear too gay, yet there is a secret gracefulness of youth which accompanies his writings, tho' the staidness and sobriety of age be wanting. In the most material part, which is the conduct, 't is certain that he seldom has miscarried; for if his elegies be compar'd with those of Tibullus and Propertius, his contemporaries, it will be found that those poets seldom design'd before they writ; and tho' the language of Tibullus be more polish'd, and the learning of Propertius, especially in his fourth book, more set out to ostentation; yet their common practice was to look no further before them than the next line; whence it will inevitably follow that they can drive to no certain point, but ramble from one subject to another, and conclude with somewhat which is not of a piece with their beginning :

Purpureus, late qui splendeat, unus et alter Assuitur pannus,

as Horace says: tho' the verses are golden, they are but patch'd into the garment. But our poet has always the goal in his eye, which directs him in his race; some beautiful design, which he first establishes, and then contrives the means which will naturally conduct it to his end. This will be evident to judicious readers in this work of his Epistles, of which somewhat, at least in general, will be expected.

The title of them in our late editions is Epistolæ Heroidum, the Letters of the Heroines. But Heinsius has judg'd more truly, that the inscription of our author was barely, Epistles; which he concludes from his cited verses, where Ovid asserts this work as his own invention, and not borrow'd from the Greeks, whom (as the masters of their learning) the Romans usually did imitate. But it appears not from their writers, that any of the Grecians ever touch'd upon this way, which our poet therefore justly has vindicated to himself. I quarrel not at the word Heroidum, because 't is us'd by Ovid in his Art of Love:

Jupiter ad veteres supplex Heroidas ibat.

But, sure, he could not be guilty of such an oversight, to call his work by the name of Heroines, when there are divers men or heroes, as, namely, Paris, Leander, and Acontius, join'd in it. Except Sabinus, who writ some answers to Ovid's Letters:

(Quam celer e toto rediit meus orbe Sabinus)

I remember not any of the Romans who have treated this subject, save only Propertius, and that but once, in his Epistle of Arethusa to Lycotas, which is written so near the style of Ovid, that it seems to be but an imitation; and therefore ought not to defraud our poet of the glory of his invention.

Concerning this work of the Epistles, I shall content myself to observe these few particulars: first, that they are generally granted to be the most perfect piece of Ovid, and that the style of them is tenderly passionate and courtly; two properties well agreeing with the persons, which were heroines and lovers. Yet, where the characters were lower, as in Cenone and Hero, he has kept close to nature, in drawing his images after a country life, tho', perhaps, he has romaniz'd his Grecian dames too much, and made them speak, sometimes, as if they had been born in the city of Rome, and under the empire of Augustus. There seems to be no great variety in the particular subjects which he has chosen; most of the Epistles being written from ladies who were forsaken by their lovers; which is the reason that many of the same thoughts come back upon us in divers letters; but of the general character of women, which is modesty, he has taken a most becoming care; for his amorous expressions go no further than virtue may allow, and therefore may be read, as he intended them, by matrons without a blush.

Thus much concerning the poet: whom you find translated by divers hands, that you may at least have that variety in the English, which the subject denied to the author of the Latin. It remains that I should say somewhat of poetical translations in general, and give my opinion (with submission to better judgments) which way of version seems to me most proper.

All translation, I suppose, may be reduc'd to these three heads:

First, that of metaphrase, or turning an author word by word, and line by line, from one language into another. Thus, or near this manner, was Horace his Art of Poetry translated by Ben Jonson. The second way is that of paraphrase, or translation with latitude, where the author is kept in view by the translator, so as never to be lost, but his words are not so strictly follow'd as his sense; and that too is admitted to be amplified, but not alter'd. Such is Mr. Waller's translation of Virgil's Fourth Æneid. The third way is that of imitation, where the translator (if now he has not lost that name) assumes the liberty, not only to vary from the words and sense, but to forsake them both as he sees occasion; and, taking only some general hints from the original, to run division on the groundwork, as he pleases. Such is Mr. Cowley's practice in turning two odes of Pindar, and one of Horace, into English.

Concerning the first of these methods, our master Horace has given us this caution:

Nec verbum verbo curabis reddere, fidus Interpres —

Not word for word too faithfully translate,

as the Earl of Roscommon has excellently render'd it. Too faithfully is, indeed, pedantically: 't is a faith like that which proceeds from superstition, blind and zealous. Take it in the expression of Sir John Denham to Sir Richard Fanshawe, on his version of the Pastor Fido:

That servile path thou nobly dost decline,
Of tracing word by word, and line by line.
A new and nobler way thou dost pursue,
To make translations and translators too;
They but preserve the ashes, thou the flame,
True to his sense, but truer to his fame.

'T is almost impossible to translate verbally and well at the same time; for the Latin (a most severe and compendious language) often expresses that in one word, which either the barbarity, or the narrowness, of modern tongues cannot supply in more. 'T is frequent also that the conceit is couch'd in some expression, which will be lost in English.

Atque iidem venti vela fidemque ferent.

What poet of our nation is so happy as to express this thought literally in English, and to strike wit, or almost sense, out of it?

In short, the verbal copier is incumber'd with so many difficulties at once, that he can never disentangle himself from all. He is to consider, at the same time, the thought of his author, and his words, and to find out the counterpart to each in another language; and, besides this, he is to confine himself to the compass of numbers, and the slavery of rhyme. 'T is much like dancing on ropes with fetter'd legs: a man may shun a fall by using caution; but the gracefulness of motion is not to be expected: and when we have said the best of it, 't is but a foolish task; for no sober man would put himself into a danger for the applause of scaping without breaking his neck. We see Ben Jonson could not avoid obscurity in his literal translation of Horace, attempted in the same compass of lines: nay, Horace himself could scarce have done it to a Greek poet:

Brevis esse laboro, obscurus fio.

either perspicuity or gracefulness will frequently be wanting. Horace has, indeed, avoided both these rocks in his translation of the three first lines of Homer's Odyssees, which he has contracted into two:

Dic mihi, musa, virum, capte post tempora Troje
Qui mores hominum multorum vidit et urbes.

Muse, speak the man, who, since the siege of Troy,
So many towns, such change of manners saw EARL OF ROSC.

But then the sufferings of Ulysses, which are a considerable part of that sentence, are omitted:

*Ὅς μάλα πολλά πάγχθηθι:

The consideration of these difficulties in a servile, literal translation, not long since made two of our famous wits, Sir John Denham and Mr. Cowley, to contrive another way of turning authors into our tongue, call'd, by the latter of them, imitation. As they were friends, I suppose they communicated their thoughts on this subject to each other; and, therefore, their reasons for it are little different, tho' the practice of one is much more moderate. I take imitation of an author, in their sense, to be an endeavor of a later poet to write like one who has written before him, on the same subject: that is, not to translate his words, or to be confin'd to his sense, but only to set him as a pattern, and to write as he supposes that author would have done, had he liv'd in our age, and in our country. Yet I dare not say that either of them have carried this libertine way of rend'ring authors (as Mr. Cowley calls it) so far as my definition reaches. For, in the Pindaric Odes, the customs and ceremonies of ancient Greece are still preserv'd. But I know not what mischief may arise hereafter from the example of such an innovation, when writers of unequal parts to him shall imitate so bold an undertaking. To add and to diminish what we please, which is the way avow'd by him, ought only to be granted to Mr. Cowley, and that too only in his translation of Pindar; because he alone was able to make him amends, by giving him better of his own, whenever he refus'd his author's thoughts. Pindar is generally known to be a dark writer, to want connection. (I mean as to our understanding,) to soar out of sight, and leave his reader at a gaze. So wild and ungovernable a poet cannot be translated literally; his genius is too strong to bear a chain, and, Samson-like, he shakes it off. A genius so elevated and unconfin'd as Mr. Cowley's was but necessary to make Pindar speak English, and that was to be perform'd by no other way than imitation. But if Virgil or Ovid, or any regular intelligible authors be thus us'd, 't is no longer to be call'd their work, when neither the thoughts nor words are drawn from the original; but instead of them there is something new produc'd, which is almost the creation of another hand. By this way, 't is true, somewhat that is excellent may be invented, perhaps more excellent than the first design; tho' Virgil must be still excepted, when that perhaps takes place. Yet he who is inquisitive to know an author's thoughts, will be disappointed in his expectation. And 't is not always that a man will be contented to have a present made him, when he expects the payment of a debt. To state it fairly: imitation of an author is the most advantageous way for a translator to shew himself, but the greatest wrong which can be done to the memory and reputation of the dead. Sir John Denham, who advis'd more liberty than he took himself, gives this reason for his innovation, in his admirable preface before the translation of the Second Æneid: "Poetry is of so subtile a spirit, that, in pouring out of one language into another, it will all evaporate; and, if a new spirit be not added in the transfusion, there will remain nothing but a caput mortuum." I confess this argument holds good against a literal translation; but who defends it? Imitation and verbal version are, in my opinion, the two extremes which ought to be avoided; and therefore, when I have propos'd the mean betwixt them, it will be seen how far his argument will reach.

No man is capable of translating poetry, who, besides a genius to that art, is not a master both of his author's language, and of his own; nor must we understand the language only of the poet, but his particular turn of thoughts and of expression, which are the characters that distinguish, and as it were individuate him from all other writers. When we are come thus far, 't is time to look into ourselves, to conform our genius to his, to give his thought either the same turn, if our tongue will bear it, or, if not, to vary but the dress, not to alter or destroy the substance. The like care must be taken of the more outward ornaments, the words. When they appear (which is but seldom) literally graceful, it were an injury to the author that they should be chang'd; but, since every language is so full of its own proprieties, that what is beautiful in one, is often barbarous, nay, sometimes nonsense, in another, it would be unreasonable to limit a translator to the narrow compass of his author's words: 't is enough if he choose out some expression which does not vitiate the sense. I suppose he may stretch his chain to such a latitude; but, by innovation of thoughts, methinks he breaks it. By this means the spirit of an author may be transfus'd, and yet not lost; and thus 't is plain that the reason alleg'd by Sir John Denham has no farther force than to expression: for thought, if it be translated truly, cannot be lost in another language; but the words that convey it to our apprehension (which are the image and ornament of that thought) may be so ill chosen as to make it appear in an unhandsome dress, and rob it of its native luster. There is, therefore, a liberty to be allow'd for the expression; neither is it necessary that words and lines should be confin'd to the measure of their original. The sense of an author, generally speaking, is to be sacred and inviolable. If the fancy of Ovid be luxuriant, 't is his character to be so; and if I retrench it, he is no longer Ovid. It will be replied that he receives advantage by this lopping of his superfluous branches; but I rejoin that a translator has no such right. When a painter copies from the life, I suppose he has no privilege to alter features and lineaments under pretense that his picture will look better; perhaps the face which he has drawn would be more exact, if the eyes or nose were alter'd; but 't is his business to make it resemble the original. In two cases only there may a seeming difficulty arise; that is, if the thought be notoriously trivial, or dishonest; but the same answer will serve for both, that then they ought not to be translated:

— Et quæ

Desperes tractata nitescere posse, relinquo.

Thus I have ventur'd to give my opinion on this subject against the authority of two great men, but I hope without offense to either of their memories; for I both lov'd them living, and reverence them now they are dead. But if, after what I have urg'd, it be thought by better judges that the praise of a translation consists in adding new beauties to the piece, thereby to recompense the loss which it sustains by change of language, I shall be willing to be taught better, and to recant. In the mean time, it seems to me that the true reason why we have so few versions which are tolerable, is not from the too close pursuing of the author's sense, but because there are so few who have all the talents which are requisite for translation, and that there is so little praise, and so small encouragement, for so considerable a part of learning.

To apply in short what has been said, to this present work, the reader will here find most of the translations with some little latitude or variation from the author's sense. That of Enone to Paris is in Mr. Cowley's way of imitation only. I was desir'd to say that the author, who is of the fair sex, understood not Latin. But if she does not, I am afraid she has given us occasion to be asham'd, who do.

For my own part, I am ready to acknowledge that I have transgress'd the rules which I have given, and taken more liberty than a just translation will allow. But so many gentlemen whose wit and learning are well known being join'd in it, I doubt not but that their excellencies will make you ample satisfaction for my errors.

J. DRYDEN.

CANACE TO MACAREUS

THE ARGUMENT

Macareus and Canace, son and daughter to Æolus, god of the winds, lov'd each other incestuously: Canace was deliver'd of a son, and committed him to her nurse, to be secretly convey'd away. The infant, crying out, by that means was discover'd to Æolus, who, inrag'd at the wickedness of his children, commanded the babe to be expos'd to wild beasts on the mountains; and, withal, sent a sword to Canace, with this message, that her crimes would instruct her how to use it. With this sword she slew herself; but, before she died, she writ the following letter to her brother Macareus, who had taken sanctuary in the temple of Apollo.

If streaming blood my fatal letter stain,
 Imagine, ere you read, the writer slain;
 One hand the sword, and one the pen employs,
 And in my lap the ready paper lies.
 Think in this posture thou behold'st me write:
 In this my cruel father would delight.
 O, were he present, that his eyes and hands
 Might see and urge the death which he commands!
 Than all his raging winds more dreadful,
 he,
 Unmov'd, without a tear, my wounds
 would see. ¹⁰
 Jove justly plac'd him on a stormy throne,
 His people's temper is so like his own.
 The North and South, and each contending blast,
 Are underneath his wide dominion cast:
 Those he can rule; but his tempestuous mind
 Is, like his airy kingdom, unconfin'd.
 Ah! what avail my kindred gods above,
 That in their number I can reckon Jove?
 What help will all my heav'nly friends afford,
 When to my breast I lift the pointed sword? ²⁰
 That hour which join'd us came before its
 time:
 In death we had been one without a crime.
 Why did thy flames beyond a brother's
 move?
 Why lov'd I thee with more than sister's
 love?
 For I lov'd too; and, knowing not my
 wound,
 A secret pleasure in thy kisses found:
 My cheeks no longer did their color boast,
 My food grew loathsome, and my strength
 I lost:
 Still ere I spoke, a sigh would stop my tongue;
 Short were my slumbers, and my nights were long. ³⁰
 I knew not from my love these griefs did
 grow,
 Yet was, alas, the thing I did not know.
 My wily nurse, by long experience, found,
 And first discover'd to my soul its wound.
 "Tis love," said she; and then my down-
 cast eyes,
 And guilty dumbness, witness'd my surprise.

Fore'd at the last, my shameful pain I tell;
 And, O, what follow'd we both know too
 well!
 'When half denying, more than half content,
 'Embraces warm'd me to a full consent, ⁴⁰
 'Then with tumultuous joys my heart did
 beat,
 'And guilt, that made them anxious, made them great.
 But now my swelling womb heav'd up my breast,
 And rising weight my sinking limbs op-
 press'd.
 What herbs, what plants, did not my nurse
 produce,
 To make abortion by their pow'rful juice?
 What medicines tried we not, to thee un-
 known?
 Our first crime common; this was mine
 alone.
 But the strong child, secure in his dark cell,
 With nature's vigor did our arts repel. ⁵⁰
 And now the pale-fac'd empress of the night
 Nine times had fill'd her orb with borrow'd
 light:
 Not knowing 't was my labor, I complain
 Of sudden shootings, and of grinding pain:
 My throes came thicker, and my cries in-
 creas'd,
 Which with her hand the conscious nurse
 suppress'd.
 To that unhappy fortune was I come,
 Pain urg'd my clamors, but fear kept me dumb.
 With inward struggling I restrain'd my cries,
 And drunk the tears that trickled from my eyes. ⁶⁰
 Death was in sight. Lucina gave no aid;
 And ev'n my dying had my guilt betray'd.
 Thou cam'st, and in thy count'nance sate
 despair;
 Rent were thy garments all, and torn thy
 hair:
 Yet, feigning comfort, which thou couldst
 not give,
 (Press'd in thy arms, and whispering me to live:)
 "For both our sakes," saidst thou, "preserve thy life;
 Live, my dear sister, and my dearer wife."
 Rais'd by that name, with my last pangs I
 strove:

Such pow'r have words, when spoke by those we love. ⁷⁰

The babe, as if he heard what thou hadst sworn,

With hasty joy sprung forward to be born.

What helps it to have weather'd out one storm?

Fear of our father does another form.

High in his hall, rock'd in a chair of state,

The king with his tempestuous council sate.

Thro' this large room our only passage lay,

By which we could the newborn babe convey.

Swath'd, in her lap, the bold nurse bore him out,

With olive branches cover'd round about;

And, mutt'ring pray'rs, as holy rites she meant, ⁸¹

Thro' the divided crowd unquestion'd went.

Just at the door, th' unhappy infant cried:

The grandsire heard him, and the theft he spied.

Swift as a whirlwind to the nurse he flies,

And deafs his stormy subjects with his cries.

With one fierce puff he blows the leaves
away:

Expos'd the self-discover'd infant lay.

The noise reach'd me, and my presaging
mind

Too soon its own approaching woes divin'd.

Not ships at sea with winds are shaken
more, ⁹¹

Nor seas themselves, when angry tempests
roar,

Than I, when my loud father's voice I
hear:

The bed beneath me trembled with my
fear.

He rush'd upon me, and divulg'd my stain;

Scarce from my murder could his hands refrain.

I only answer'd him with silent tears:

They flow'd; my tongue was frozen up with fears.

His little grandchild he commands away,

To mountain wolves and every bird of prey. ¹⁰⁰

The babe cried out, as if he understood,

And begg'd his pardon with what voice he
could.

By what expressions can my grief be
shown?

(Yet you may guess my anguish by your
own)

To see my bowels, and, what yet was
worse,

Your bowels too, condemn'd to such a
curse!

Out went the king; my voice its freedom
found,

My breasts I beat, my blubber'd cheeks I
wound.

And now appear'd the messenger of
death;

Sad were his looks, and scarce he drew his breath, ¹¹⁰

To say: "Your father sends you" — with
that word

His trembling hands presented me a sword —

"Your father sends you this; and lets you
know,

That your own crimes the use of it will
show."

Too well I know the sense those words im-
part:

His present shall be treasur'd in my heart.

Are these the nuptial gifts a bride receives?

And this the fatal dow'r a father gives?

Thou god of marriage, shun thy own dis-
grace,

And take thy torch from this detested place: ¹²⁰

Instead of that, let furies light their brands,

And fire my pile with their infernal hands.

With happier fortune may my sisters wed;

Warn'd by the dire example of the dead.

For thee, poor babe, what crime could they pretend?

How could thy infant innocence offend?

A guilt there was; but, O, that guilt was
mine!

Thou suffer'st for a sin that was not thine.

Thy mother's grief and crime! but just enjoy'd,

Shown to my sight, and born to be destroy'd! ¹³⁰

Unhappy offspring of my teeming womb, Dragg'd headlong from thy cradle to thy tomb!

Thy unoffending life I could not save,

Nor weeping could I follow to thy grave!

Nor on thy tomb could offer my shorn
hair;

Nor show the grief which tender mothers
bear!

Yet long thou shalt not from my arms be
lost;

For soon I will o'ertake thy infant ghost.
 But thou, my love, and now my love's despair,
 Perform his funerals with paternal care:
 His scatter'd limbs with my dead body
 burn; 141
 And once more join us in the pious urn.
 If on my wounded breast thou dropp'st a
 tear,
 Think for whose sake my breast that wound
 did bear;
 And faithfully my last desires fulfil
 As I perform my cruel father's will.

HELEN TO PARIS

BY THE RIGHT HONORABLE THE EARL OF MULGRAVE AND MR. DRYDEN

THE ARGUMENT

Helen, having receiv'd the foregoing epistle from Paris, returns the following answer:
 wherein she seems at first to chide him for his presumption in writing as he had done, which could only proceed from his low opinion of her virtue; then owns herself to be sensible of the passion which he had ex-press'd for her, tho' she much suspect his constancy; and at last discovers her inclinations to be favorable to him: the whole letter shewing the extreme artifice of womankind.

WHEN loose epistles violate chaste eyes,
 She half consents, who silently denies.
 How dares a stranger, with designs so vain,
 Marriage and hospitable rights profane?
 Was it for this, your fate did shelter find
 From swelling seas, and every faithless
 wind?
 (For tho' a distant country brought you
 forth,
 Your usage here was equal to your worth.)
 Does this deserve to be rewarded so?
 Did you come here a stranger or a foe? 10
 Your partial judgment may perhaps com-
 plain,
 And think me barbarous for my just dis-
 dain.
 Ill-bred then let me be, but not unhaste,
 Nor my clear fame with any spot defac'd.
 Tho' in my face there's no affected frown,
 Nor in my carriage a feign'd niceness
 shown,
 I keep my honor still without a stain,

Nor has my love made any coxcomb vain.
 Your boldness I with admiration see;
 What hope had you to gain a queen like
 me? 20
 Because a hero forc'd me once away,
 Am I thought fit to be a second prey?
 Had I been won, I had deserv'd your blame,
 But sure my part was nothing but the
 shame.
 Yet the base theft to him no fruit did
 bear,
 I scap'd unhurt by anything but fear.
 Rude force might some unwilling kisses
 gain,
 But that was all he ever could obtain.
 You on such terms would ne'er have let me
 go;
 Were he like you, we had not parted so. 30 Untouch'd the youth restor'd me to my friends,
 And modest usage made me some amends.
 'Tis virtue to repent a vicious deed:
 Did he repent, that Paris might succeed?
 Sure 'tis some fate that sets me above wrongs,
 Yet still exposes me to busy tongues.
 I'll not complain; for who's displeas'd with
 love,
 If it sincere, discreet, and constant prove?
 But that I fear; not that I think you base,
 Or doubt the blooming beauties of my
 face: 40
 But all your sex is subject to deceive,
 And ours, alas, too willing to believe.
 Yet others yield, and love o'ercomes the
 best:
 But why should I not shine above the rest?
 Fair Leda's story seems at first to be
 A fit example ready found for me.
 But she was cozen'd by a borrow'd shape,
 And under harmless feathers felt a rape.
 If I should yield, what reason could I use?
 By what mistake the loving crime excuse?
 Her fault was in her pow'rful lover lost; 51
 But of what Jupiter have I to boast?
 Tho' you to heroes and to kings succeed,
 Our famous race does no addition need;
 And great alliances but useless prove
 To one that's come herself from mighty Jove.
 Go then, and boast in some less haughty
 place
 Your Phrygian blood, and Priam's ancient
 race;

Which I would shew I valued, if I durst;
 You are the fifth from Jove, but I the first.
 The crown of Troy is pow'rful, I confess; 61
 But I have reason to think ours no less.
 Your letter, fill'd with promises of all
 That men can good, or women pleasant
 call,

Gives expectation such an ample field,
 As would move goddesses themselves to
 yield.

But if I e'er offend great Juno's laws,
 Yourself shall be the dear, the only cause:
 Either my honor I'll to death maintain,
 Or follow you, without mean thoughts of
 gain. 70

Not that so fair a present I despise;
 We like the gift, when we the giver prize.
 But 'tis your love moves me, which made you take

Such pains, and run such hazards for my sake.

I have perceiv'd (tho' I dissembled too)
 A thousand things that love has made you
 do.

Your eager eyes would almost dazzle mine,
 In which, wild man, your wanton thoughts would shine.

Sometimes you'd sigh, sometimes disorder'd
 stand,

And with unusual ardor press my hand; 80
 Contrive just after me to take the glass,
 Nor would you let the least occasion pass:
 Which oft I fear'd, I did not mind alone,
 And blushing sate for things which you have done:

Then murmur'd to myself: "He'll for my
 sake

Do anything" — I hope 't was no mistake!
 Oft have I read within this pleasing grove,
 Under my name, those charming words, "I
 love."

I, frowning, seem'd not to believe your
 flame;

But now, alas, am come to write the same. 90
 If I were capable to do amiss,
 I could not but be sensible of this.

For O, your face has such peculiar charms,
 That who can hold from flying to your arms!

But what I ne'er can have without offense,
 May some blest maid possess with innocence.

Pleasure may tempt, but virtue more should
 move;

O learn of me to want the thing you love!

What you desire is sought by all mankind:
 As you have eyes, so others are not blind. 100
 Like you they see, like you my charms
 adore;

They wish not less, but you dare venture
 more.

O, had you then upon our coasts been
 brought,

My virgin love when thousand rivals sought,
 You had I seen, you should have had my
 voice;

Nor could my husband justly blame my choice!

For both our hopes, alas, you come too
 late!

Another now is master of my fate.

More to my wish I could have liv'd with
 you,

And yet my present lot can undergo. 110

Cease to solicit a weak woman's will,
 And urge not her you love to so much ill.

But let me live contented as I may,
 And make not my unspotted fame your
 prey.

Some right you claim, since naked to your
 eyes

Three goddesses disputed beauty's prize:
 One offer'd valor, t'other crowns; but she Obtain'd her cause, who, smiling, promis'd
 me.

But first, I am not of belief so light,
 To think such nymphs would shew you such a sight. 120

Yet, granting this, the other part is feign'd;
 A bribe so mean your sentence had not gain'd.

With partial eyes I should myself regard,
 To think that Venus made me her reward:
 I humbly am content with human praise;
 A goddess's applause would envy raise.

But be it as you say; for, 't is confess'd,
 The men who flatter highest please us best.
 That I suspect it, ought not to displease;

For miracles are not believ'd with ease. 130

One joy I have, that I had Venus' voice;
 A greater yet, that you confirm'd her choice;
 That proffer'd laurels, promis'd sov'reignty,
 Juno and Pallas you condemn'd for me.

Am I your empire then, and your renown?
 What heart of rock, but must by this be won?

And yet bear witness, O you pow'rs above,
 How rude I am in all the arts of love!

My hand is yet untaught to write to men:
 This is th' essay of my unpractic'd pen. 140

Happy those nymphs, whom use has perfect made !

I think all crime, and tremble at a shade.

Ev'n while I write, my fearful conscious eyes

Look often back, misdoubting a surprise.

For now the rumor spreads among the crowd,

At court in whispers, but in town aloud.

Dissemble you, whate'er you hear 'em say :
To leave off loving were your better way ;
Yet if you will dissemble it, you may. }

Love secretly ; the absence of my lord ¹⁵⁰

More freedom gives, but does not all afford :

Long is his journey, long will be his stay ;

Call'd by affairs of consequence away.

To go, or not, when unresolv'd he stood,

I bid him make what swift return he could :

Then kissing me, he said : " I recommend

All to thy care, but most my Trojan friend."

I smil'd at what he innocently said,

And only answer'd : " You shall be obey'd."

Propitious winds have borne him far from hence, ¹⁶⁰

But let not this secure your confidence.

Absent he is, yet absent he commands :

You know the proverb : " Princes have long hands."

My fame's my burden : for the more I'm prais'd,

A juster ground of jealousy is rais'd.

Were I less fair, I might have been more blest :

Great beauty thro' great danger is possess'd.
To leave me here his venture was not hard,
Because he thought my virtue was my guard.

He fear'd my face, but trusted to my life ; ¹⁷⁰

The beauty doubted, but believ'd the wife.

You bid me use th' occasion while I can,

Put in our hands by the good easy man.

I would, and yet I doubt, 'twixt love and fear ;

One draws me from you, and one brings me near.

Our flames are mutual, and my husband's gone :

The nights are long ; I fear to lie alone.

One house contains us, and weak walls divide,

And you're too pressing to be long denied.

Let me not live, but everything conspires ¹⁸⁰

To join our loves, and yet my fear retires.

You court with words, when you should force employ :

A rape is requisite to shame-fac'd joy.

Indulgent to the wrongs which we receive,
Our sex can suffer what we dare not give.

What have I said ? for both of us 't were best,

Our kindling fires if each of us suppress'd.

The faith of strangers is too prone to change,

And, like themselves, their wand'ring passions range.

Hypsipyle, and the fond Minoian maid, ¹⁹⁰
Were both by trusting of their guests betray'd.

How can I doubt that other men deceive,

When you yourself did fair Ceneone leave ?

But lest I should upbraid your treachery,

You make a merit of that crime to me.

Yet grant you were to faithful love inclin'd,

Your weary Trojans wait but for a wind.

Should you prevail ; while I assign the night,

Your sails are hoisted, and you take your flight :

Some bawling mariner our love destroys, ²⁰⁰

And breaks asunder our unfinish'd joys.

But I with you may leave the Spartan port,

To view the Trojan wealth and Priam's court :

Shown while I see, I shall expose my fame,

And fill a foreign country with my shame.

In Asia what reception shall I find ?

And what dishonor leave in Greece behind ?

What will your brothers, Priam, Hecuba,

And what will all your modest matrons say ?

Ev'n you, when on this action you reflect, ²¹⁰

My future conduct justly may suspect ;

And whate'er stranger lands upon your coast,

Conclude me, by your own example, lost.

I from your rage a strumpet's name shall hear,

While you forget what part in it you bear.

You, my crime's author, will my crime upbraid :

Deep under ground, O let me first be laid !

You boast the pomp and plenty of your land,

And promise all shall be at my command :

Your Trojan wealth, believe me, I despise ; ²²⁰

My own poor native land has dearer ties.
Should I be injur'd on your Phrygian shore,

What help of kindred could I there im-
plore?

Medea was by Jason's flatt'ry won:
I may, like her, believe, and be undone.
Plain honest hearts, like mine, suspect no
cheat,

And love contributes to its own deceit.
The ships, about whose sides loud tempests
roar,
With gentle winds were wafted from the
shore.

Your teeming mother dreamt a flaming
brand,

Sprung from her womb, consum'd the Trojan land.

To second this, old prophecies conspire,
That Ilium shall be burnt with Grecian fire.
Both give me fear; nor is it much allay'd,
That Venus is oblig'd our loves to aid:
For they, who lost their cause, revenge will
take;

And for one friend two enemies you make.
Nor can I doubt, but, should I follow you,
The sword would soon our fatal crime pursue:

A wrong so great my husband's rage would rouse,

And my relations would his cause espouse.
You boast your strength and courage; but,
alas!

Your words receive small credit from your
face.

Let heroes in the dusty field delight:
Those limbs were fashion'd for another
fight.

Bid Hector sally from the walls of Troy;
A sweeter quarrel should your arms employ.

Yet fears like these should not my mind
perplex,

Were I as wise as many of my sex.
But time and you may bolder thoughts inspire;

And I perhaps may yield to your desire.
You last demand a private conference:
These are your words, but I can guess your
sense.

Your unripe hopes their harvest must attend:

Be rul'd by me, and time may be your
friend.

This is enough to let you understand,
For now my pen has tir'd my tender hand:
My woman knows the secret of my heart,
And may hereafter better news impart.

DIDO TO ÆNEAS

THE ARGUMENT

Æneas, the son of Venus and Anchises, having, at the destruction of Troy, sav'd his gods, his father, and son Ascanius, from the fire, put to sea with twenty sail of ships; and, having bin long toss'd with tempests, was at last cast upon the shore of Libya, where Queen Dido, flying from the cruelty of Pygmalion, her brother, who had kill'd her husband Sichæus, had lately built Carthage. She entertain'd Æneas and his fleet with great civility, fell passionately in love with him, and in the end denied him not the last favors. But Mercury admonishing Æneas to go in search of Italy, (a kingdom promis'd to him by the gods,) he readily prepar'd to obey him. Dido soon perceiv'd it, and having in vain tried all other means to engage him to stay, at last in despair writes to him as follows

So, on Mæander's banks, when death is nigh,
The mournful swan sings her own elegy.
Not that I hope (for, O, that hope were
vain!)

By words your lost affection to regain:
But, having lost whate'er was worth my
care,

Why should I fear to lose a dying pray'r?
'Tis then resolv'd poor Dido must be left,
Of life, of honor, and of love bereft!

While you, with loosen'd sails, and vows, prepare

To seek a land that flies the searcher's
care.

Nor can my rising tow'rs your flight restrain,

Nor my new empire, offer'd you in vain.
Built walls you shun, unbuilt you seek;
that land

Is yet to conquer, but you this command.
Suppose you landed where your wish de-
sign'd,

Think what reception foreigners would find.
What people is so void of common sense,
To vote succession from a native prince?

Yet there new scepters and new loves you
seek,

New vows to plight, and plighted vows to break.

When will your tow'rs the height of Carthage know?

Or when your eyes discern such crowds
below?

If such a town and subjects you could see,
Still would you want a wife who lov'd like
me.

For, O, I burn, like fires with incense
bright:

Not holy tapers flame with purer light.
Æneas is my thoughts' perpetual theme;
Their daily longing, and their nightly
dream.

Yet he ungrateful and obdurate still:
Fool that I am, to place my heart so ill! 30
Myself I cannot to myself restore;
Still I complain, and still I love him more.
Have pity, Cupid, on my bleeding heart,
And pierce thy brother's with an equal dart.

I rave: nor canst thou Venus' offspring be, Love's mother could not bear a son like thee.

From harden'd oak, or from a rock's cold
womb,

At least thou art from some fierce tigress
come;

Or on rough seas, from their foundation
torn,

Got by the winds, and in a tempest born, 40
Like that which now thy trembling sailors
fear;

Like that whose rage should still detain thee here.

Behold how high the foamy billows ride!
The winds and waves are on the juster
side.

To winter weather and a stormy sea
I'll owe, what rather I would owe to thee.
Death thou deserv'st from heav'n's avenging laws,

But I'm unwilling to become the cause.
To shun my love, if thou wilt seek thy fate,
'Tis a dear purchase, and a costly hate. 50
Stay but a little, till the tempest cease,
And the loud winds are lull'd into a peace.
May all thy rage, like theirs, unconstant
prove!

And so it will, if there be pow'r in love.
Know'st thou not yet what dangers ships sustain?

So often wrack'd, how dar'st thou tempt
the main?

Which were it smooth, were every wave
asleep,

Ten thousand forms of death are in the deep.

In that abyss the gods their vengeance
store,

For broken vows of those who falsely swore. 60

There winged storms on sea-born Venus
wait,

To vindicate the justice of her state.

Thus I to thee the means of safety show;
And, lost myself, would still preserve my
foe.

False as thou art, I not thy death design:
O rather live, to be the cause of mine!

Should some avenging storm thy vessel
tear,

(But Heav'n forbid my words should omen
bear!)

Then in thy face thy perjur'd vows would
fly,

And my wrong'd ghost be present to thy
eye. 70

With threat'ning looks think thou behold'st me stare,

Gasping my mouth, and clotted all my hair.
Then, should fork'd lightning and red thunder fall,

What couldst thou say, but: "I deserv'd
'em all"?

Lest this should happen, make not haste
away;

To shun the danger will be worth thy stay.
Have pity on thy son, if not on me:

My death alone is guilt enough for thee.
What has his youth, what have thy gods
deserv'd,

To sink in seas, who were from fires pre-
serv'd? 80

But neither gods nor parent didst thou bear; (Smooth stories all, to please a woman's ear.)

False was the tale of thy romantic life,
Nor yet am I thy first deluded wife:

Left to pursuing foes Creüsa stay'd,
By thee, base man, forsaken and betray'd.

This, when thou told'st me, struck my tender heart,

That such requital follow'd such desert.
Nor doubt I but the gods, for crimes like
these,

Sev'n winters kept thee wand'ring on the seas. 90

Thy starv'd companions, cast ashore, I fed,
Thyself admitted to my crown and bed.

To harbor strangers, succor the distress'd,
Was kind enough; but, O, too kind the
rest!

Curst be the cave which first my ruin
brought,

Where, from the storm, we common shelter sought !

A dreadful howling echoed round the place:
"The mountain nymphs," thought I, "my nuptials grace."

I thought so then, but now too late I know
The Furies yell'd my funerals from below.
O chastity and violated fame, ¹⁰¹
Exact your dues to my dead husband's name !

By death redeem my reputation lost,
And to his arms restore my guilty ghost !
Close by my palace, in a gloomy grove,
Is rais'd a chapel to my murder'd love;
There, wreath'd with boughs and wool, his statue stands,

The pious monument of artful hands.
Last night, methought, he call'd me from the dome,

And thrice, with hollow voice, cried: "Dido, come !" ¹¹⁰

She comes; thy wife thy lawful summons hears,

But comes more slowly, clogg'd with conscious fears.

Forgive the wrong I offer'd to thy bed;
Strong were his charms, who my weak faith misled.

His goddess mother, and his aged sire,
Borne on his back, did to my fall conspire.
O, such he was, and is, that, were he true,
Without a blush I might his love pursue !
But cruel stars my birthday did attend;
And, as my fortune open'd, it must end. ¹²⁰
My plighted lord was at the altar slain,
Whose wealth was made my bloody brother's gain.

Friendless, and follow'd by the murd'rer's hate,

To foreign countries I remov'd my fate;
And here, a suppliant, from the natives' hands

I bought the ground on which my city stands,

With all the coast that stretches to the sea;

Ev'n to the friendly port that shelter'd thee:

Then rais'd these walls, which mount into the air,

At once my neighbors' wonder, and their fear. ¹³⁰

For now they arm; and round me leagues are made,

My scarce establish'd empire to invade.

To man my new-built walls I must prepare,

An helpless woman, and unskill'd in war.
Yet thousand rivals to my love pretend,
And for my person would my crown defend;

Whose jarring votes in one complaint agree,

That each unjustly is disdain'd for thee.

To proud Hyarbas give me up a prey;
(For that must follow, if thou go'st away):
Or to my husband's murd'rer leave my life, ¹⁴¹

That to the husband he may add the wife.
Go then, since no complaints can move thy mind;

Go, perjur'd man, but leave thy gods behind.

Touch not those gods, by whom thou art forsworn,

Who will in impious hands no more be borne:

Thy sacrilegious worship they disdain,
And rather would the Grecian fires sustain.
Perhaps my greatest shame is still to come,
And part of thee lies hid within my womb.
The babe unborn must perish by thy hate,
And perish guiltless in his mother's fate. ¹⁵²
Some god, thou say'st, thy voyage does command;

Would the same god had barr'd thee from my land !

The same, I doubt not, thy departure steers,
Who kept thee out at sea so many years;
Where thy long labors were a price so great,
As thou to purchase Troy wouldst not repeat.

But Tiber now thou seek'st, to be at best,
When there arriv'd, a poor, precarious guest. ¹⁶⁰

Yet it deludes thy search: perhaps it will
To thy old age lie undiscover'd still.

A ready crown and wealth in dow'r I bring,
And, without conqu'ring, here thou art a king.

Here thou to Carthage may'st transfer thy Troy:

Here young Ascanius may his arms employ;
And, while we live secure in soft repose,
Bring many laurels home from conquer'd foes.

By Cupid's arrows, I adjure thee, stay;
By all the gods, companions of thy way. ¹⁷⁰
So may thy Trojans, who are yet alive,
Live still, and with no future fortune strive;

So may thy youthful son old age attain,
And thy dead father's bones in peace remain;

As thou hast pity on unhappy me,
Who know no crime, but too much love of thee.

I am not born from fierce Achilles' line,
Nor did my parents against Troy combine.
To be thy wife if I unworthy prove,

By some inferior name admit my love. 180
To be secur'd of still possessing thee,

What would I do, and what would I not be !
Our Libyan coasts their certain seasons know,

When free from tempests passengers may go:

But now with northern blasts the billows roar,

And drive the floating seaweed to the shore.

Leave to my care the time to sail away;
When safe, I will not suffer thee to stay.

Thy weary men would be with ease content;

Their sails are tatter'd, and their masts are spent. 190

If by no merit I thy mind can move,

What thou deny'st my merit, give my love.
Stay, till I learn my loss to undergo;

And give me time to struggle with my woe.
If not, know this, I will not suffer long;

My life's too loathsome, and my love too strong.

Death holds my pen, and dictates what I say,

While cross my lap thy Trojan sword I lay.
My tears flow down; the sharp edge cuts

their flood,
And drinks my sorrows, that must drink my blood. 200

How well thy gift does with my fate agree !
My funeral pomp is cheaply made by thee.

To no new wounds my bosom I display;
The sword but enters where love made the

way.
But thou, dear sister, and yet dearer friend,

Shalt my cold ashes to their urn attend.
Sichæus' wife let not the marble boast;

I lost that title, when my fame I lost.
This short inscription only let it bear:

"Unhappy Dido lies in quiet here. 210
The cause of death, and sword by which she

died,
Æneas gave: the rest her arm supplied."

FOUR EPITAPHS

[The exact dates of the following epitaphs are unknown. The poems are grouped at this point for convenience in printing.]

UPON YOUNG MR. ROGERS OF GLOUCESTERSHIRE

[These verses were first printed, with title as above, in Poetical Miscellanies, the Fifth Part, published by Tonson in 1704, after Dryden's death. The miserable conceit in the last couplet suggests an early date of composition, perhaps before 1606, when Dryden wrote Annus Mirabilis. Nothing definite is known of the subject of the epitaph.]

Of gentle blood, his parents' only treasure,
Their lasting sorrow, and their vanish'd pleasure,

Adorn'd with features, virtues, wit, and grace,

A large provision for so short a race;
More mod'rate gifts might have prolong'd

his date,

Too early fitted for a better state;

But, knowing heav'n his home, to shun delay,

He leap'd o'er age, and took the shortest way.

EPITAPH ON THE MONUMENT OF THE MARQUIS OF WINCHESTER

[John Paulet, fifth Marquis of Winchester, was among the most noted adherents of Charles I. After the siege of his mansion, Basing House, in Hampshire, by the Parliamentarians, from August, 1643, to October, 1645, and its final capture by Cromwell, he was called "the great loyalist." He died on March 5, 1675, and was buried at Englefield in Berkshire, where he had lived since the Restoration. Dryden's lines are engraved on his monument, followed by the inscription: "The Lady Marchionesse Dowager (in testimony of her love and sorrow) gave this Monument to the memory of a most affectionate tender husband."

This epitaph was first printed, with title as above, in Miscellaneous Poems and Translations, published by Lintot in 1712. This volume, which contained the first form of The Rape of the Lock, and some minor poems by Pope, is commonly known as Pope's Miscellany. The present text is from a copy of the inscription on the monument.]

HE who in impious times untainted stood,
And midst rebellion durst be just and good;
Whose arms asserted, and whose sufferings
more

Confirm'd the cause for which he fought before,

Rests here, rewarded by an heav'nly prince,
For what his earthly could not recompense.
Pray, reader, that such times no more appear;

Or, if they happen, learn true honor here.

Ark of thy age's faith and loyalty,
Which, to preserve them, Heav'n confin'd in thee,

Few subjects could a king like thine deserve;

And fewer, such a king so well could serve.
Blest king, blest subject, whose exalted state
By sufferings rose, and gave the law to fate.
Such souls are rare, but mighty patterns given

To earth, were meant for ornaments to heaven.

EPITAPH ON MRS. MARGARET PASTON

OF BARNINGHAM IN NORFOLK

[This epitaph was first printed, with title as above, in the same volume as the preceding. Nothing definite is known of the subject of the verses.]

So fair, so young, so innocent, so sweet,
So ripe a judgment, and so rare a wit,
Require at least an age in one to meet. }
In her they met; but long they could not stay,

'T was gold too fine to fix without alloy.
Heav'n's image was in her so well express'd,
Her very sight upbraided all the rest;
Too justly ravish'd from an age like this,
Now she is gone, the world is of a piece.

AN EPITAPH ON SIR PALMES FAIRBORNE'S TOMB IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY

[This epitaph was first printed, with title as above, in Examen Poeticum, 1693. It is here reprinted from a copy of the inscription on the tomb, which varies very slightly from the text in Examen Poeticum. Dryden presumably did not write the prose introduction.]

Sacred to the immortal memory of Sir Palmes Fairborne, Knight, Governor of Tangier; in execution of which command he was mortally wounded by a shot from the Moors, then besieging the town, in the forty-sixth year of his age, October 24th, 1680.

YE sacred relics, which your marble keep,
Here, undisturb'd by wars, in quiet sleep:
Discharge the trust, which, when it was below,

Fairborne's undaunted soul did undergo,
And be the town's Palladium from the foe.

Alive and dead these walls he will defend;

Great actions great examples must attend.
The Candian siege his early valor knew,
Where Turkish blood did his young hands imbue.

From thence returning with deserv'd applause,

Against the Moors his well-flesh'd sword he draws;

The same the courage, and the same the cause.

His youth and age, his life and death combine,

As in some great and regular design,
All of a piece throughout, and all divine.
Still nearer heaven his virtue shone more bright,

Like rising flames expanding in their height;

The martyr's glory crown'd the soldier's fight.

More bravely British general never fell,
Nor general's death was e'er reveng'd so well;

Which his pleas'd eyes beheld before their close

Follow'd by thousand victims of his foes.

To his lamented loss for times to come
His pious widow consecrates this tomb.

PROLOGUE AND SONG FROM THE SPANISH FRIAR

OR, THE DOUBLE DISCOVERY

[This play, one of Dryden's best comedies, was probably acted late in 1680 or early in 1681; it was first printed in the latter year, being entered in the Term Catalogue for Trinity Term (June). The epilogue was "by a friend of the author's." The song is sung by Teresa, woman to Queen Leonora, the heroine of the play, in response to a request from her mistress:

To soothe my sadness,
Sing me the song which poor Olympia made,
When false Bireno left her.]

PROLOGUE

Now, luck for us, and a kind hearty pit;
For he, who pleases, never fails of wit:
Honor is yours;
And you, like kings, at city-treats bestow it;
The writer kneels, and is bid rise a poet;
But you are fickle sovereigns, to our sorrow;
You dub to-day, and hang a man to-morrow:
You cry the same sense up, and down again,
Just like brass money once a year in Spain:
Take you i' th' mood, whate'er base metal
come, 10
You coin as fast as groats at Bromingham:
Tho' 't is no more like sense, in ancient plays,
Than Rome's religion like St. Peter's days.
In short, so swift your judgments turn and
wind,
You cast our fleetest wits a mile behind.
'T were well your judgments but in plays
did range,
But ev'n your follies and debauches change
With such a whirl, the poets of your age
Are tir'd, and cannot score 'em on the stage;
Unless each vice in shorthand they indict,
Ev'n as noteh'd prentices whole sermons
write. 21
The heavy Hollanders no vices know, }
But what they us'd a hundred years ago; }
Like honest plants, where they were } stuck, they grow. }
They cheat, but still from cheating sires
they come;
They drink, but they were christen'd first in mum.
Their patrimonial sloth the Spaniards keep,
And Philip first taught Philip how to sleep.
The French and we still change; but here's the curse,

They change for better, and we change for
worse;

They take up our old trade of conquering, 30
And we are taking theirs, to dance and sing:
Our fathers did for change to France re-
pair,

And they, for change, will try our English
air;

As children, when they throw one toy away,
Straight a more foolish gewgaw comes in
play:

So we, grown penitent, on serious thinking,
Leave whoring, and devoutly fall to drink-
ing.

Scow'ring the watch grows out-of-fashion
wit:

Now we set up for tilting in the pit, 40
Where 't is agreed by bullies, chicken-hearted,

To fright the ladies first, and then be parted.
A fair attempt has twice or thrice been
made,

To hire night-murth'ers, and make death
a trade.

When murder's out, what vice can we advance,

Unless the new-found pois'ning trick of France?

And, when their art of ratsbane we have got,

By way of thanks, we'll send 'em o'er our Plot.

SONG

I

FAREWELL, ungrateful traitor!
Farewell, my perjurd swain!
Let never injurd creature
Believe a man again.
The pleasure of possessing Surpasses all expressing,
But 't is too short a blessing,
And love too long a pain.

II

'T is easy to deceive us,
In pity of your pain; 10
But when we love, you leave us
To rail at you in vain.
Before we have desiered it,
There is no bliss beside it;
But she that once has tried it,
Will never love again.

III

The passion you pretended,
Was only to obtain;
But when the charm is ended,
The charmer you disdain. 20
Your love by ours we measure,
Till we have lost our treasure;
But dying is a pleasure,
When living is a pain.

EPILOGUE TO TAMERLANE THE GREAT

[This tragedy, by Charles Saunders, was probably acted late in 1680 or early in 1681; it was printed in 1681, being entered in the Term Catalogue for Easter Term (May) of that year. Dryden's epilogue was reprinted in the third edition (1702) of Miscellany Poems, the First Part, where it is called simply An Epilogue by Mr. Dryden. Langbaine says that Saunders was "a young gentleman whose wit began to bud as early as that of the incomparable Cowley, and was like him a King's Scholar [at Westminster School] when he writ a play called Tamerlane the Great." The young man seems not to have followed this first performance by any further work.]

LADIES, the beardless author of this day Commends to you the fortune of his
play.

A woman wit has often grac'd the stage,
But he's the first boy poet of our age.

Early as is the year his fancies blow,
Like young Narcissus peeping thro' the
snow:

Thus Cowley blossom'd soon, yet flourish'd
long;

This is as forward, and may prove as
strong.

Youth with the fair should always favor
find,

Or we are damn'd dissemblers of our
kind. 10

What's all this love they put into our parts?

'Tis but the pit-a-pat of two young hearts.
Should hag and graybeard make such tender moan,

Faith, you'd e'en trust 'em to themselves
alone,

And cry: "Let's go, here's nothing to be done."

Since love's our business, as 'tis your de-
light,

The young, who best can practice, best can
write.

What tho' he be not come to his full
pow'r?

He's mending and improving every hour.

You sly she-jockeys of the box and pit 20
Are pleas'd to find a hot unbroken wit.

By management he may in time be made,
But there's no hopes of an old batter'd jade:

Faint and unnerv'd he runs into a sweat,
And always fails you at the second heat.

POEMS WRITTEN IN 1681

PROLOGUE

[The date and occasion of this prologue are unknown. It was not printed until 1693, when it appeared in Examen Poeticum with the heading, Prologue by Mr. Dryden. Christie places it in 1681 on account of its resemblance in style to the Epilogue to Tamerlane the Great, and this guess is as likely to be right as any other.]

GALLANTS, a bashful poet bids me say
He's come to lose his maidenhead to-day.
Be not too fierce, for he's but green of age,
And ne'er, till now, debauch'd upon the
stage.

He wants the suff'ring part of resolution,
And comes with blushes to his execution.

E'er you deflow'r his Muse, he hopes the
pit

Will make some settlement upon his wit.

Promise him well, before the play begin,
For he would fain be cozen'd into sin. 10

'Tis not but that he knows you mean to fail;

But, if you leave him after being frail,
He'll have, at least, a fair pretense to
rail;

To call you base, and swear you us'd him
ill,

And put you in the new Deserters' Bill.
Lord, what a troop of perjur'd men we see,

Enow to fill another Mercury!

But this the ladies may with patience brook:
Theirs are not the first colors you forsook!

He would be loth the beauties to offend; 20
 But, if he should, he's not too old to mend.
 He's a young plant, in his first year of bearing;
 But his friend swears he will be worth the rearing.
 His gloss is still upon him; tho' 't is true
 He's yet unripe, yet take him for the blue.
 You think an apricot half green is best:
 There's sweet and sour, and one side good
 at least.
 Mangoes and limes, whose nourishment is little,
 Tho' not for food, are yet preserv'd for pickle.
 So this green writer may pretend, at least,
 To whet your stomachs for a better feast. 31
 He makes this difference in the sexes too:
 He sells to men, he gives himself to you.
 To both he would contribute some delight,
 A mere poetical hermaphrodite.
 Thus he's equip'd, both to be woo'd and }
 woo,
 With arms offensive and defensive too: }
 'T is hard, he thinks, if neither part will do. }

PROLOGUE TO THE UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD

[This prologue was first printed in Miscellany Poems, 1684. Scott's note upon it is of peculiar interest:

"This prologue must have been spoken at Oxford during the residence of the Duke of York in Scotland, in 1681-82. [More exactly, from October, 1680, to March, 1682.] The humor turns upon a part of the company having attended the duke to Scotland, where, among other luxuries little known to my countrymen, he introduced, during his residence at Holyrood House, the amusements of the theater. I can say little about the actors commemorated in the following verses, excepting that their stage was erected in the tennis court of the palace, which was afterwards converted into some sort of manufactory, and finally burned down many years ago. Besides these deserters, whom Dryden has described very ludicrously, he mentions a sort of strolling company, composed, it would seem, of Irishmen, who had lately acted at Oxford."

DISCORD and plots, which have undone our
 age,
 With the same ruin have o'erwhelm'd the
 stage.

Our house has suffer'd in the common
 woe,
 We have been troubled with Scotch rebels
 too.
 Our brethren are from Thames to } Tweed departed,
 And of our sisters all the kinder-hearted }
 To Edenborough gone, or coach'd, or carted.
 With bonny bluecap there they act all
 night
 For Scotch half-crown, in English threepence hight.
 One nymph, to whom fat Sir John Falstaff's lean, 10
 There with her single person fills the
 scene.
 Another, with long use and age decay'd, Div'd here old woman, and rose there a
 maid.
 Our trusty doorkeepers of former time
 There strut and swagger in heroic rhyme.
 Tack but a copper lace to druggert suit,
 And there's a hero made without dispute;
 And that which was a capon's tail before,
 Becomes a plume for Indian Emperor.
 But all his subjects, to express the care 20
 Of imitation, go, like Indians, bare:
 Lac'd linen there would be a dangerous }
 thing;
 It might perhaps a new rebellion bring; }
 The Scot who wore it would be chosen
 king.
 But why should I these renegades describe,
 When you yourselves have seen a lewder tribe?
 Teg has been here, and, to this learned
 pit,
 With Irish action slander'd English wit:
 You have beheld such barb'rous Macs ap-
 pear,
 As merited a second massacre: 30
 Such as, like Cain, were branded with dis-
 grace,
 And had their country stamp'd upon their
 face.
 When strollers durst presume to pick your purse,
 We humbly thought our broken troop not
 worse.
 How ill soe'er our action may deserve, Oxford's a place where wit can never sterve.

PROLOGUE TO THE UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD

[The date and occasion of this prologue are unknown. It was first published in Miscellany Poems, 1684, where it immediately succeeds the prologue just printed. The present editor follows Christie in retaining this arrangement.]

THO' actors cannot much of learning boast,
Of all who want it, we admire it most:
We love the praises of a learned pit,
As we remotely are allied to wit.
We speak our poet's wit, and trade in ore,
Like those who touch upon the golden shore:

Betwixt our judges can distinction make,
Discern how much, and why, our poems take:

Mark if the fools, or men of sense, rejoice;
Whether th' applause be only sound or voice. 10

When our fop gallants, or our city folly
Clap over-loud, it makes us melancholy;
We doubt that scene which does their wonder raise,

And, for their ignorance, condemn their praise.

Judge then, if we who act, and they who write,

Should not be proud of giving you delight.
London likes grossly; but this nicer pit
Examines, fathoms all the depths of wit;
The ready finger lays on every blot;
Knows what should justly please, and what should not. 20

Nature herself lies open to your view;
You judge by her, what draught of her is true,

Where outlines false, and colors seem too faint,

Where bunglers daub, and where true poets paint.

But, by the sacred genius of this place,
By every Muse, by each domestic grace,
Be kind to wit, which but endeavors well,
And, where you judge, presumes not to excel.

Our poets hither for adoption come,
As nations sued to be made free of Rome: 30
Not in the suffragating tribes to stand,
But in your utmost, last, provincial band.
If his ambition may those hopes pursue,
Who with religion loves your arts and you,

Oxford to him a dearer name shall be,
Than his own mother-university.
Thebes did his green, unknowing youth in-
gage;

He chooses Athens in his riper age.

PROLOGUE TO THE UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD, 1681

[This prologue was first printed, with the above heading, in Examen Porticum, 1693. From the reference in lines 19, 20, it seems to have been delivered shortly after the dissolution of the Oxford Parliament on March 28, 1681.]

THE fam'd Italian Muse, whose rhymes advance

Orlando and the Paladins of France,
Records that, when our wit and sense is flown,

'Tis lodg'd within the circle of the moon
In earthen jars, which one, who thither soar'd,

Set to his nose, snuff'd up, and was restor'd.
Whate'er the story be, the moral's true;
The wit we lost in town we find in you.

Our poets their fled parts may draw from hence,

And fill their windy heads with sober sense. 10

When London votes with Southwark's disagree,

Here may they find their long-lost loyalty.
Here busy senates, to th' old cause inclin'd,
May snuff the votes their fellows left behind:

Your country neighbors, when their grain grows dear,

May come, and find their last provision here:

Whereas we cannot much lament our loss,
Who neither carried back, nor brought one cross.

We look'd what representatives would bring;

But they help'd us, just as they did the king. 20

Yet we despair not, for we now lay forth
The Sibyl's books to those who know their worth;

And tho' the first was sacrific'd before,
These volumes doubly will the price restore.

Our poet bade us hope this grace to find,

To whom by long prescription you are kind.
He whose undaunted Muse, with loyal rage,
Has never spar'd the vices of the age,
Here finding nothing that his spleen can
raise,
Is forc'd to turn his satire into praise. 30

PROLOGUE AND EPILOGUE TO THE UNHAPPY FAVORITE

OR, THE EARL OF ESSEX

[This tragedy, by John Banks, was probably acted in the spring or summer of 1681, since it was published late in that year, being entered in the Term Catalogue for Michaelmas Term (November). According to Langbaine, this edition was dated 1682. As it has been inaccessible, the text of the prologue is taken from the second edition of the play, 1685. The epilogue is also printed, with some variations of text, and with the heading, An Epilogue for the King's House, in Miscellany Poems, 1684, from which the present text is taken.]

The date of the royal visit referred to in the prologue is unknown. It seems to have been at the fifth performance of the play, since in the printed copy Dryden's prologue is preceded by a Prologue spoken by Major Mohun, the first four days. Perhaps it was upon the return of the king to London after the Oxford Parliament.]

PROLOGUE

SPOKEN TO THE KING AND QUEEN AT THEIR COMING TO THE HOUSE, AND WRITTEN ON PURPOSE BY MR. DRYDEN

WHEN first the ark was landed on the
shore,
And Heaven had vow'd to curse the ground
no more;
When tops of hills the longing patriarch
saw,
And the new scene of earth began to draw;
The dove was sent to view the waves decrease,
And first brought back to man the pledge of peace.
'Tis needless to apply, when those appear,
Who bring the olive, and who plant it here.
We have before our eyes the royal dove;
Still Innocence is harbinger to Love: 10
The ark is open'd to dismiss the train,
And people with a better race the plain.

Tell me, you powers, why should vain man pursue,
With endless toil, each object that is
new,
And for the seeming substance leave the
true?
Why should he quit for hopes his certain
good,
And loathe the manna of his daily food?
Must England still the scene of changes
be,
Toss'd and tempestuous, like our ambient
sea?
Must still our weather and our wills
agree? 20
Without our blood our liberties we have:
Who that is free would fight to be a slave?
Or, what can wars to aftertimes assure,
Of which our present age is not secure?
All that our monarch would for us ordain,
Is but t' enjoy the blessings of his reign.
Our land's an Eden, and the main's our fence,
While we preserve our state of innocence:
That lost, then beasts their brutal force employ,
And first their lord, and then themselves destroy. 30
What civil broils have cost we knew too
well;
O let it be enough that once we fell,
And every heart conspire with every
tongue,
Still to have such a king, and this king
long!

EPILOGUE

WE act by fits and starts, like drowning
men,
But just peep up, and then dop down again.
Let those who call us wicked change their
sense,
For never men liv'd more on Providence.
Not lott'ry cavaliers are half so poor,
Nor broken cits, nor a vacation whore;
Nor courts, nor courtiers living on the rents
Of the three last ungiving parliaments:
So wretched, that, if Pharaoh could divine,
He might have spar'd his dream of seven lean kine, 10
And chang'd his vision for the Muses
nine.

The comet, which, they say, portends a dearth,
Was but a vapor drawn from playhouse
earth:
Pent there since our last fire, and, Lilly
says,
Foreshews our change of state, and thin third-days.
'T is not our want of wit that keeps us poor;
For then the printer's press would suffer
more.
Their pamphleteers each day their venom
spit;
They thrive by treason, and we starve by
wit.
Confess the truth, which of you ^{Looking} has not laid ^{above.}
Four farthings out to buy The Hatfield
Maid?
Or, which is duller yet, and more would spite us,
Democritus his wars with Heraclitus?

Such are the authors who have run us down,
And exercis'd you critics of the town.
Yet these are pearls to your lampooning
rhymes,
Y' abuse yourselves more dully than the
times.
Scandal, the glory of the English nation,
Is worn to rags, and scribbled out of fashion;
Such harmless thrusts, as if, like fencers
wise,
They had agreed their play before their
prize.
Faith, they may hang their harps upon the willows;
'T is just like children when they box with pillows.
Then put an end to civil wars for shame;
Let each knight-errant, who has wrong'd a dame,
Throw down his pen, and give her, as he
can,
The satisfaction of a gentleman.

ABSALOM AND ACHITOPHEL

A POEM

*Su propius stes
Te capiet magis*

[According to a note by Jacob Tonson, "in the year 1680 Mr. Dryden undertook the poem of Absalom and Achitophel, upon the desire of King Charles the Second:" see p. 137, below. The poem was printed as a folio pamphlet in 1681. A note on the copy of the satire owned by Narcissus Luttrell, "17th November, ex dono amici Jacobi Tonson," fixes the time of publication as on or shortly before that date: see note by Scott in Scott-Saintsbury edition, ix, 204. The poem was evidently meant to appear at the psychological moment for exciting public sentiment against Shaftesbury, who was brought before the grand jury, on a charge of high treason, on November 24. This first edition was anonymous; and, though the authorship of the satire at once became known, and was acknowledged by Dryden in his Discourse concerning Satire, 1692 (see pp. 303, 313, below), Dryden's name was never directly joined to it during his lifetime. The second edition, in quarto, which appeared before the close of 1681, besides making some minor changes in the text, adds two important passages, lines 180-191 and 957-960. Seven other editions seem to have appeared before Dryden's death; the sixth is included in Miscellany Poems, 1684; the tenth in the collected Poems and Translations, 1701. These editions are apparently mere printers' reprints, containing no variations for which Dryden can be held responsible. The present text follows the second edition.]

Dryden seems to have taken the general idea of applying to contemporary politics the scriptural story of the revolt of Absalom (2 Samuel xiii-xviii), from an anonymous tract, published in 1680, Absalom's Conspiracy, or The Tragedy of Treason. This is reprinted by Scott: see Scott-Saintsbury edition, ix, 206-208.]

TO THE READER

'T is not my intention to make an apology for my poem: some will think it needs no excuse, and others will receive none. The design, I am sure, is honest; but he who draws his pen for one party must expect to make enemies of the other. For wit and fool are consequences of Whig and Tory; and every man is a knave or an ass to the contrary side. There's a treasury of merits in the Fanatic Church, as well as in the Papist; and a pennyworth to be had of saintship, honesty, and poetry, for the lewd, the factious, and the blockheads; but the longest chapter in Deuteronomy has not curses enough for an anti-Bromingham. My comfort is, their manifest prejudice to my cause will render their judgment of less authority against me. Yet if a poem have a genius, it will force its own reception in the world; for there's a sweetness in good verse, which tickles even while it hurts, and no man can be heartily angry with him who pleases him against his will. The commendation of adversaries is the greatest triumph of a writer, because it never comes unless extorted. But I can be satisfied on more easy terms: if I happen to please the more moderate sort, I shall be sure of an honest party, and, in all probability, of the best judges; for the least concern'd are commonly the least corrupt. And, I confess, I have laid in for those, by rebating the satire (where justice would allow it) from carrying too sharp an edge. They who can criticise so weakly, as to imagine I have done my worst, may be convinc'd, at their own cost, that I can write severely with more ease than I can gently. I have but laugh'd at some men's follies, when I could have declaim'd against their vices; and other men's virtues I have commended, as freely as I have tax'd their crimes. And now, if you are a malicious reader, I expect you should return upon me that I affect to be thought more impartial than I am. But if men are not to be judg'd by their professions, God forgive you Commonwealth's-men for professing so plausibly for the government. You cannot be so unconscionable as to charge me for not subscribing of my name; for that would reflect too grossly upon your own party, who never dare, tho' they have the advantage of a jury to secure them. If you like not my poem, the fault may, possibly, be in my writing (tho' 't is hard for an author to judge against himself); but, more probably, 't is in your morals, which cannot bear the truth of it. The violent, on both sides, will condemn the character of Absalom, as either too favorably or too hardly drawn. But they are not the violent whom I desire to please. The fault on the right hand is to extenuate, palliate, and indulge; and, to confess freely. I have endeavor'd to commit it. Besides the respect which I owe his birth, I have a greater for his heroic virtues; and David himself could not be more tender of the young man's life than I would be of his reputation. But since the most excellent natures are always the most easy, and, as being such, are the soonest perverted by ill counsels, especially when baited with fame and glory; 't is no more a wonder that he withstood not the temptations of Achitophel, than it was for Adam not to have resisted the two devils, the serpent and the woman. The conclusion of the story I purposely forbore to prosecute, because I could not obtain from myself to shew Absalom unfortunate. The frame of it was cut out but for a picture to the waist, and if the draught be so far true, 'tis as much as I design'd.

Were I the inventor, who am only the historian, I should certainly conclude the piece with the reconciliation of Absalom to David. And who knows but this may come to pass? Things were not brought to an extremity where I left the story; there seems yet to be room left for a composure; hereafter there may only be for pity. I have not so much as an uncharitable wish against Achitophel, but am content to be accus'd of a good-natur'd error, and to hope with Origen, that the Devil himself may at last be sav'd. For which reason, in this poem, he is neither brought to set his house in order, nor to dispose of his person afterwards as he in wisdom shall think fit. God is infinitely merciful; and his vicegerent is only not so, because he is not infinite.

The true end of satire is the amendment of vices by correction. And he who writes honestly is no more an enemy to the offender, than the physician to the patient, when he prescribes harsh remedies to an inveterate disease; for those are only in order to prevent the surgeon's work of an ense rescindendum, which I wish not to my very enemies. To conclude all; if the body politic have any analogy to the natural, in my weak judgment, an act of oblivion were as necessary in a hot, distemper'd state, as an opiate would be in a raging fever.

ABSALOM AND ACHITOPHEL

IN pious times, ere priestcraft did begin,
Before polygamy was made a sin;
When man on many multiplied his kind,
Ere one to one was cursedly confin'd;
When nature prompted, and no law denied
Promiscuous use of concubine and bride;
Then Israel's monarch after Heaven's own
heart,
His vigorous warmth did variously impart
To wives and slaves; and, wide as his command,
Scatter'd his Maker's image thro' the land.
Michal, of royal blood, the crown did wear;
A soil ungrateful to the tiller's care:
Not so the rest; for several mothers bore
To godlike David several sons before.
But since like slaves his bed they did ascend,

No true succession could their seed attend.
 Of all this numerous progeny was none
 So beautiful, so brave, as Absalon:
 Whether, inspir'd by some diviner lust,
 His father got him with a greater gust; 20
 Or that his conscious destiny made way,
 By manly beauty, to imperial sway.
 Early in foreign fields he won renown,
 With kings and states allied to Israel's
 crown:

In peace the thoughts of war he could remove,
 And seem'd as he were only born for love.
 Whate'er he did, was done with so much ease,

In him alone 't was natural to please:
 His motions all accompanied with grace;
 And paradise was open'd in his face. 30
 With secret joy indulgent David view'd
 His youthful image in his son renew'd:
 To all his wishes nothing he denied;
 And made the charming Annabel his bride.
 What faults he had, (for who from faults is free ?)

His father could not, or he would not see.
 Some warm excesses which the law forbore,
 Were construed youth that purg'd by boiling o'er,

And Amnon's murder, by a specious name,
 Was call'd a just revenge for injur'd fame.
 Thus prais'd and lov'd the noble youth remain'd, 41

While David, undisturb'd, in Sion reign'd.
 But life can never be sincerely blest;
 Heav'n punishes the bad, and proves the best.

The Jews, a headstrong, moody, murmur'ing race,

As ever tried th' extent and stretch of grace;

God's pamper'd people, whom, debauch'd with ease,

No king could govern, nor no God could please;

(Gods they had tried of every shape and size,

That god-smiths could produce, or priests devise:)

These Adam-wits, too fortunately free, 50
 Began to dream they wanted liberty;

And when no rule, no precedent was found,
 Of men by laws less circumscrib'd and bound;

They led their wild desires to woods and caves,

And thought that all but savages were slaves.

They who, when Saul was dead, without a blow,

Made foolish Ishbosheth the crown forego;
 Who banish'd David did from Hebron bring,

And with a general shout proclaim'd him king: 60

Those very Jews, who, at their very best,
 Their humor more than loyalty express'd,
 Now wonder'd why so long they had obey'd
 An idol monarch, which their hands had made;

Thought they might ruin him they could create,

Or melt him to that golden calf, a State.

But these were random bolts; no form'd design,

Nor interest made the factious crowd to join:

The sober part of Israel, free from stain,
 Well knew the value of a peaceful reign; 70
 And, looking backward with a wise afright,

Saw seams of wounds, dishonest to the sight:

In contemplation of whose ugly scars

They curs'd the memory of civil wars.

The moderate sort of men, thus qualified,

Inclin'd the balance to the better side;

And David's mildness manag'd it so well,

The bad found no occasion to rebel.

But when to sin our bias'd nature leans,

The careful Devil is still at hand with means; 80

And providently pimps for ill desires:

The Good Old Cause reviv'd, a plot requires.

Plots, true or false, are necessary things,

To raise up commonwealths, and ruin kings.

Th' inhabitants of old Jerusalem

Were Jebusites; the town so call'd from them;

And theirs the native right —

But when the chosen people grew more strong,

The rightful cause at length became the wrong;

And every loss the men of Jebus bore, 90
 They still were thought God's enemies the more.

Thus worn and weaken'd, well or ill content,
 Submit they must to David's government:

Impoverish'd and depriv'd of all command,

Their taxes doubled as they lost their land;
And, what was harder yet to flesh and
blood,

Their gods disgrac'd, and burnt like common wood.

This set the heathen priesthood in a flame;
For priests of all religions are the same:

Of whatso'er descent their godhead be, 100
Stock, stone, or other homely pedigree,
In his defense his servants are as bold,
As if he had been born of beaten gold.

The Jewish rabbins, tho' their enemies,
In this conclude them honest men and
wise:

For 't was their duty, all the learned think,
T' espouse his cause, by whom they eat
and drink.

From hence began that Plot, the nation's
curse,

Bad in itself, but represented worse;
Rais'd in extremes, and in extremes decried; 110

With oaths affirm'd, with dying vows denied;

Not weigh'd or winnow'd by the multitude;
But swallow'd in the mass, unchew'd and crude.

Some truth there was, but dash'd and brew'd with lies,

To please the fools, and puzzle all the
wise.

Succeeding times did equal folly call,
Believing nothing, or believing all.

Th' Egyptian rites the Jebusites embrac'd; Where gods were recommended by their taste.

Such sav'ry deities must needs be good, 120
As serv'd at once for worship and for food.

By force they could not introduce these gods,

For ten to one in former days was odds;
So fraud was us'd (the sacrificer's trade):
Fools are more hard to conquer than persuade.

Their busy teachers mingled with the Jews,
And rak'd for converts even the court and stews:

Which Hebrew priests the more unkindly
took,

Because the fleece accompanies the flock.
Some thought they God's anointed meant to slay 130

By guns, invented since full many a day:
Our author swears it not; but who can
know

How far the Devil and Jebusites may go?
This Plot, which fail'd for want of common
sense,

Had yet a deep and dangerous consequence:
For, as when raging fevers boil the blood,
The standing lake soon floats into a flood,
And ev'ry hostile humor, which before
Slept quiet in its channels, bubbles o'er;
So several factions from this first fer-
ment 140

Work up to foam, and threat the government.

Some by their friends, more by themselves thought wise,

Oppos'd the pow'r to which they could not
rise.

Some had in courts been great, and thrown from thence,

Like fiends were harden'd in impenitence.
Some, by their monarch's fatal mercy,

grown
From pardon'd rebels kinsmen to the
throne,

Were rais'd in pow'r and public office high;
Strong bands, if bands ungrateful men could tie.

Of these the false Achitophel was first; 150
A name to all succeeding ages curst:

For close designs, and crooked counsels fit;
Sagacious, bold, and turbulent of wit;

Restless, unfix'd in principles and place;
In pow'r unpleas'd, impatient of disgrace:

A fiery soul, which, working out its way, }
Frett'd the pigmy body to decay,
And o'er-inform'd the tenement of clay. }

A daring pilot in extremity;
Pleas'd with the danger, when the waves went high, 160

He sought the storms; but, for a calm unfit,

Would steer too nigh the sands, to boast his wit.

Great wits are sure to madness near allied,
And thin partitions do their bounds divide;
Else why should he, with wealth and honor
blest,

Refuse his age the needful hours of rest?
Punish a body which he could not please;
Bankrupt of life, yet prodigal of ease?

And all to leave what with his toil he
won,

To that unfeather'd two-legg'd thing, a son; 170

Got, while his soul did huddled notions try;
And born a shapeless lump, like anarchy.

In friendship false, implacable in hate;
 Resolv'd to ruin or to rule the State.
 To compass this the triple bond he broke;
 The pillars of the public safety shook;
 And fitted Israel for a foreign yoke: }
 Then seiz'd with fear, yet still affecting
 fame,

Usurp'd a patriot's all-atoning name.
 So easy still it proves in factious times, 180
 With public zeal to cancel private crimes.
 How safe is treason, and how sacred ill,
 Where none can sin against the people's
 will!

Where crowds can wink, and no offense be
 known,

Since in another's guilt they find their own!
 Yet fame deserv'd no enemy can grudge;
 The statesman we abhor, but praise the judge.

In Israel's courts ne'er sat an Abbethdin
 With more discerning eyes, or hands more clean;

Unbrib'd, unsought, the wretched to redress; 190

Swift of dispatch, and easy of access.
 O, had he been content to serve the crown,
 With virtues only proper to the gown;
 Or had the rankness of the soil been freed
 From cockle, that oppress'd the noble
 seed;

David for him his tuneful harp had strung,
 And Heav'n had wanted one immortal song.
 But wild Ambition loves to slide, not stand,
 And Fortune's ice prefers to Virtue's land.
 Achitophel, grown weary to possess 200
 A lawful fame, and lazy happiness,
 Disdain'd the golden fruit to gather free,
 And lent the crowd his arm to shake the tree.

Now, manifest of crimes contriv'd long since,

He stood at bold defiance with his prince;
 Held up the buckler of the people's cause Against the crown, and skulk'd behind the laws.

The wish'd occasion of the Plot he takes;
 Some circumstances finds, but more he makes.

By buzzing emissaries fills the ears 210
 Of list'ning crowds with jealousies and fears

Of arbitrary counsels brought to light,
 And proves the king himself a Jebusite.
 Weak arguments! which yet he knew full
 well

Were strong with people easy to rebel.
 For, govern'd by the moon, the giddy Jews Tread the same track when she the prime renews;

And once in twenty years, their scribes record,

By natural instinct they change their lord.
 Achitophel still wants a chief, and none 220
 Was found so fit as warlike Absalon:

Not that he wish'd his greatness to create,
 (For politicians neither love nor hate,)
 But, for he knew his title not allow'd, Would keep him still depending on the
 crowd:

That kingly pow'r, thus ebbing out, might
 be

Drawn to the dregs of a democracy.
 Him he attempts with studied arts to please,
 And sheds his venom in such words as
 these:

"Auspicious prince, at whose nativity 230
 Some royal planet rul'd the southern sky;
 Thy longing country's darling and desire;
 Their cloudy pillar and their guardian fire:
 Their second Moses, whose extended wand Divides the seas, and shews the promis'd
 land;

Whose dawning day in every distant age
 Has exercis'd the sacred prophets' rage:
 The people's pray'r, the glad diviners'
 theme,

The young men's vision, and the old men's dream!

Thee, Savior, thee, the nation's vows confess, 240

And, never satisfied with seeing, bless:
 Swift unspoken pomps thy steps proclaim,
 And stammering babes are taught to lisp
 thy name.

How long wilt thou the general joy detain, Starve and defraud the people of thy
 reign?

Content ingloriously to pass thy days
 Like one of Virtue's fools that feeds on
 praise;

Till thy fresh glories, which now shine so
 bright,

Grow stale and tarnish with our daily sight.
 Believe me, royal youth, thy fruit must
 be 250

Or gather'd ripe, or rot upon the tree.
 Heav'n has to all allotted, soon or late,
 Some lucky revolution of their fate;
 Whose motions if we watch and guide with
 skill,

(For human good depends on human will,) Our Fortune rolls as from a smooth descent, And from the first impression takes the bent: But, if unseiz'd, she glides away like wind, And leaves repenting Folly far behind. Now, now she meets you with a glorious prize, ²⁶⁰ And spreads her locks before her as she flies. Had thus old David, from whose loins you spring, Not dar'd, when Fortune call'd him, to be king, At Gath an exile he might still remain, And Heaven's anointing oil had been in vain. Let his successful youth your hopes engage; But shun th' example of declining age: Behold him setting in his western skies, The shadows lengthening as the vapors rise. ²⁶⁵ He is not now, as when on Jordan's sand The joyful people throng'd to see him land, Cov'ring the beach, and black'ning all the strand; But, like the Prince of Angels, from his height Comes tumbling downward with diminish'd light; Betray'd by one poor plot to public scorn, (Our only blessing since his curst return;) Those heaps of people which one sheaf did bind, Blown off and scatter'd by a puff of wind. What strength can he to your designs oppose, ²⁷⁰ Naked of friends, and round beset with foes? If Pharaoh's doubtful succor he should use, A foreign aid would more incense the Jews: Proud Egypt would dissembled friendship bring; Foment the war, but not support the king: Nor would the royal party e'er unite With Pharaoh's arms t'assist the Jebusite; Or if they should, their interest soon would break, And with such odious aid make David weak. All sorts of men by my successful arts, Abhorring kings, estrange their alter'd hearts ²⁹⁰ From David's rule: and 't is the general cry, "Religion, commonwealth, and liberty."

If you, as champion of the public good, Add to their arms a chief of royal blood, What may not Israel hope, and what applause Might such a general gain by such a cause? Not barren praise alone, that gaudy flow'r Fair only to the sight, but solid pow'r; And nobler is a limited command, Giv'n by the love of all your native land, ³⁰⁰ Than a successive title, long and dark, Drawn from the moldy rolls of Noah's ark." What cannot praise effect in mighty minds, When flattery soothes, and when ambition blinds! Desire of pow'r, on earth a vicious weed, Yet, sprung from high, is of celestial seed: In God 't is glory; and when men aspire, 'T is but a spark too much of heavenly fire. Th' ambitious youth, too covetous of fame, Too full of angels' metal in his frame, ³¹⁰ Unwarily was led from virtue's ways, Made drunk with honor, and debauch'd with praise. Half loth, and half consenting to the ill, (For loyal blood within him struggled still,) He thus replied: "And what pretense have I To take up arms for public liberty? My father governs with unquestion'd right; The faith's defender, and mankind's delight; Good, gracious, just, observant of the laws: And Heav'n by wonders has espous'd his cause. ³²⁰ Whom has he wrong'd in all his peaceful reign? Who sues for justice to his throne in vain? What millions has he pardon'd of his foes, Whom just revenge did to his wrath expose? Mild, easy, humble, studious of our good; Enclin'd to mercy, and averse from blood; If mildness ill with stubborn Israel suit, His crime is God's beloved attribute. What could he gain, his people to betray, Or change his right for arbitrary sway? ³³⁰ Let haughty Pharaoh curse with such a reign His fruitful Nile, and yoke a servile train. If David's rule Jerusalem displease, The Dog-star heats their brains to this disease. Why then should I, encouraging the bad, Turn rebel and run popularly mad? Were he a tyrant, who, by lawless might

Oppress'd the Jews, and rais'd the Jebusite,
 Well might I mourn; but nature's holy
 bands
 Would curb my spirits and restrain my hands: 340
 The people might assert their liberty;
 But what was right in them were crime in
 me.
 His favor leaves me nothing to require,
 Prevents my wishes, and outruns desire.
 What more can I expect while David lives?
 All but his kingly diadem he gives:
 And that" — But there he paus'd; then sighing, said —
 "Is justly destin'd for a worthier head.
 For when my father from his toils shall rest,
 And late augment the number of the blest,
 His lawful issue shall the throne ascend, 351
 Or the collat'ral line, where that shall end.
 His brother, tho' oppress'd with vulgar spite,
 Yet dauntless, and secure of native right,
 Of every royal virtue stands possess'd;
 Still dear to all the bravest and the best.
 His courage foes, his friends his truth pro-
 claim;
 His loyalty the king, the world his fame.
 His mercy ev'n th' offending crowd will
 find;
 For sure he comes of a forgiving kind. 361
 Why should I then repine at Heaven's decee,
 Which gives me no pretense to royalty?
 Yet O that fate, propitiously inclin'd,
 Had rais'd my birth, or had debas'd my
 mind;
 To my large soul not all her treasure lent,
 And then betray'd it to a mean descent!
 I find, I find my mounting spirits bold,
 And David's part disdains my mother's mold.
 Why am I scanted by a niggard birth? 361
 My soul disclaims the kindred of her earth;
 And, made for empire, whispers me within,
 'Desire of greatness is a godlike sin.'
 Him staggering so when hell's dire agent
 found,
 While fainting Virtue scarce maintain'd her
 ground,
 He pours fresh forces in, and thus replies:
 "Th' eternal God, supremely good and
 wise,
 Imparts not these prodigious gifts in vain:
 What wonders are reserv'd to bless your
 reign!

Against your will, your arguments have
 shown, 379
 Such virtue's only giv'n to guide a throne.
 Not that your father's mildness I contemn;
 But manly force becomes the diadem.
 'Tis true he grants the people all they crave;
 And more, perhaps, than subjects ought to have:
 For lavish grants suppose a monarch tame,
 And more his goodness than his wit pro-
 claim.
 But when should people strive their bonds
 to break,
 If not when kings are negligent or weak?
 Let him give on till he can give no more,
 The thrifty Sanhedrin shall keep him poor;
 And every shkel which he can receive, 391
 Shall cost a limb of his prerogative.
 To ply him with new plots shall be my care;
 Or plunge him deep in some expensive war;
 Which when his treasure can no more supply,
 He must, with the remains of kingship, buy.
 His faithful friends, our jealousies and fears
 Call Jebusites, and Pharaoh's pensioners; Whom when our fury from his aid has
 torn,
 He shall be naked left to public scorn. 400
 The next successor, whom I fear and hate,
 My arts have made obnoxious to the State;
 Turn'd all his virtues to his overthrow,
 And gain'd our elders to pronounce a foe.
 His right, for sums of necessary gold, Shall first be pawn'd, and afterwards be sold;
 Till time shall ever-wanting David draw,
 To pass your doubtful title into law:
 If not, the people have a right supreme
 To make their kings; for kings are made for them. 410
 All empire is no more than pow'r in trust,
 Which, when resum'd, can be no longer
 just.
 Succession, for the general good design'd,
 In its own wrong a nation cannot bind;
 If altering that the people can relieve,
 Better one suffer than a nation grieve.
 The Jews well know their pow'r: ere Saul they chose,
 God was their king, and God they durst
 depose.
 Urge now your piety, your filial name,
 A father's right, and fear of future fame;
 The public good, that universal call, 421

To which even Heav'n submitted, answers
all.

Nor let his love enchant your generous
mind;

'Tis Nature's trick to propagate her kind.
Our fond begetters, who would never die,
Love but themselves in their posterity.
Or let his kindness by th' effects be tried,
Or let him lay his vain pretense aside.
God said he lov'd your father; could he
bring

A better proof, than to anoint him king?
It surely shew'd he lov'd the shepherd
well, 431

Who gave so fair a flock as Israel.
Would David have you thought his darling son?

What means he then, to alienate the
crown?

The name of godly he may blush to bear:
'Tis after God's own heart to cheat his heir.

He to his brother gives supreme command,
To you a legacy of barren land:
Perhaps th' old harp, on which he thrums
his lays,

Or some dull Hebrew ballad in your praise.
Then the next heir, a prince severe and
wise, 441

Already looks on you with jealous eyes;
Sees thro' the thin disguises of your arts,
And marks your progress in the people's hearts.

Tho' now his mighty soul its grief contains,
He meditates revenge who least complains;
And, like a lion, slumb'ring in the way,
Or sleep dissembling, while he waits his
prey,

His fearless foes within his distance draws, Constrains his roaring, and contracts his paws; 451

Till at the last, his time for fury found,
He shoots with sudden vengeance from the
ground;

The prostrate vulgar passes o'er and spares,
But with a lordly rage his hunters tears.
Your case no tame expedients will afford:
Resolve on death, or conquest by the sword,
Which for no less a stake than life you
draw;

And self-defense is nature's eldest law.
Leave the warm people no considering
time;

For then rebellion may be thought a
crime. 460

Prevail yourself of what occasion gives,
But try your title while your father lives;
And that your arms may have a fair pretense,

Proclaim you take them in the king's defense;

Whose sacred life each minute would expose

To plots, from seeming friends, and secret
foes.

And who can sound the depth of David's
soul?

Perhaps his fear his kindness may control.

He fears his brother, tho' he loves his son,
For plighted vows too late to be undone. 470
If so, by force he wishes to be gain'd;
Like women's lechery, to seem constrain'd.
Doubt not: but, when he most affects the
frown,

Commit a pleasing rape upon the crown.
Secure his person to secure your cause:
They who possess the prince, possess the
laws.

He said, and this advice above the rest,
With Absalom's mild nature suited best:
Unblam'd of life, (ambition set aside,)
Not stain'd with cruelty, nor puff'd with
pride; 480

How happy had he been, if destiny
Had higher plac'd his birth, or not so high!
His kingly virtues might have claim'd a
throne,

And blest all other countries but his own.
But charming greatness since so few re-
fuse,

'Tis juster to lament him than accuse.
Strong were his hopes a rival to remove,
With blandishments to gain the public
love;

To head the faction while their zeal was
hot,

And popularly prosecute the Plot. 490
To farther this, Achitophel unites

The malecontents of all the Israelites;
Whose differing parties he could wisely
join,

For several ends, to serve the same design:
The best, (and of the princes some were such,)

Who thought the pow'r of monarchy too
much;

Mistaken men, and patriots in their hearts;
Not wicked, but seduc'd by impious arts.
By these the springs of property were bent,

And wound so high, they crack'd the government. 500
 The next for interest sought t' embroil the
 State,
 To sell their duty at a dearer rate;
 And make their Jewish markets of the
 throne,
 Pretending public good, to serve their
 own.
 Others thought kings an useless heavy
 load,
 Who cost too much, and did too little good.
 These were for laying honest David by,
 On principles of pure good husbandry.
 With them join'd all th' haranguers of the throng,
 That thought to get preferment by the
 tongue. 510
 Who follow next, a double danger bring,
 Not only hating David, but the king:
 The Solymean rout, well-vers'd of old
 In godly faction, and in treason bold;
 Cow'ring and quaking at a conqueror's
 sword;
 But lofty to a lawful prince restor'd;
 Saw with disdain an Ethnic plot begun,
 And scorn'd by Jebusites to be outdone.
 Hot Levites headed these; who, pull'd be-
 fore
 From th' ark, which in the Judges' days
 they bore, 520
 Resum'd their cant, and with a zealous cry
 Pursued their old belov'd Theocracy:
 Where Sanhedrin and priest enslav'd the
 nation,
 And justified their spoils by inspiration:
 For who so fit for reign as Aaron's race,
 If once dominion they could found in
 grace?
 These led the pack; tho' not of surest
 scent,
 Yet deepest mouth'd against the government.
 A numerous host of dreaming saints succeed,
 Of the true old enthusiastic breed: 530
 'Gainst form and order they their pow'r
 employ,
 Nothing to build, and all things to destroy.
 But far more numerous was the herd of
 such,
 Who think too little, and who talk too
 much.
 These, out of mere instinct, they knew not why,

Ador'd their fathers' God and property;
 And, by the same blind benefit of fate,
 The Devil and the Jebusite did hate:
 Born to be sav'd, even in their own despite,
 Because they could not help believing
 right. 540
 Such were the tools; but a whole Hydra
 more Remains, of sprouting heads too long to score.
 Some of their chiefs were princes of the
 land:
 In the first rank of these did Zimri stand;
 A man so various, that he seem'd to be
 Not one, but all mankind's epitome:
 Stiff in opinions, always in the wrong;
 Was everything by starts, and nothing
 long;
 But, in the course of one revolving moon,
 Was chymist, fiddler, statesman, and buf-
 foon: 550
 Then all for women, painting, rhyming,
 drinking,
 Besides ten thousand freaks that died in thinking.
 Blest madman, who could every hour employ,
 With something new to wish, or to enjoy!
 Railing and praising were his usual themes;
 And both (to shew his judgment) in extremes:
 So over-violent, or over-civil,
 That every man, with him, was God or Devil.
 In squandering wealth was his peculiar art:
 Nothing went unrewarded but desert. 560
 Beggar'd by fools, whom still he found too
 late,
 He had his jest, and they had his estate.
 He laugh'd himself from court; then sought relief
 By forming parties, but could ne'er be chief;
 For, spite of him, the weight of business
 fell
 On Absalom and wise Achitophel:
 Thus, wicked but in will, of means bereft,
 He left not faction, but of that was left.
 Titles and names 't were tedious to rehearse
 Of lords, below the dignity of verse. 570
 Wits, warriors, Commonwealth's-men, were
 the best;
 Kind husbands, and mere nobles, all the
 rest.

And therefore, in the name of dulness, be
The well-hung Balaam and cold Caleb,
free;

And canting Nadab let oblivion damn,
Who made new porridge for the paschal lamb.

Let friendship's holy band some names assure;

Some their own worth, and some let scorn
secure.

Nor shall the rascal rabble here have place,
Whom kings no titles gave, and God no
grace:

Not bull-fac'd Jonas, who could statutes⁵⁸⁰
draw

To mean rebellion, and make treason law.
But he, tho' bad, is follow'd by a worse,
The wretch who Heav'n's anointed dar'd to
curse:

Shimei, whose youth did early promise
bring

Of zeal to God and hatred to his king,
Did wisely from expensive sins refrain,
And never broke the Sabbath, but for gain;
Nor ever was he known an oath to vent,
Or curse, unless against the government.
Thus heaping wealth, by the most ready⁵⁹¹
way

Among the Jews, which was to cheat and
pray,

The city, to reward his pious hate
Against his master, chose him magistrate.
His hand a vane of justice did uphold;
His neck was loaded with a chain of gold.
During his office, treason was no crime;
The sons of Belial had a glorious time;
For Shimei, tho' not prodigal of pelf,
Yet lov'd his wicked neighbor as himself.

When two or three were gather'd to de-
claim

Against the monarch of Jerusalem,
Shimei was always in the midst of them; }
And if they curs'd the king when he was
by,

Would rather curse than break good company.

If any durst his factious friends accuse,
He pack'd a jury of dissenting Jews;
Whose fellow-feeling in the godly cause
Would free the suff'ring saint from human laws.

For laws are only made to punish those⁶¹⁰
Who serve the king, and to protect his foes.

If any leisure time he had from pow'r,
(Because 't is sin to misemploy an hour,)
His bus'ness was, by writing, to persuade That kings were useless, and a clog to
trade;

And, that his noble style he might refine,
No Rechabite more shunn'd the fumes of wine.

Chaste were his cellars, and his shrieval
board

The grossness of a city feast abhorr'd:
His cooks, with long disuse, their trade forgot;

Cool was his kitchen, tho' his brains were⁶²⁰
hot.

Such frugal virtue malice may accuse,
But sure 't was necessary to the Jews;
For towns once burnt such magistrates require

As dare not tempt God's providence by
fire.

With spiritual food he fed his servants
well,

But free from flesh that made the Jews
rebel;

And Moses' laws he held in more account,
For forty days of fasting in the mount.

To speak the rest, who better are forgot,

Would tire a well-breath'd witness of the⁶³⁰
Plot.

Yet, Corah, thou shalt from oblivion pass:
Erect thyself, thou monumental brass,
High as the serpent of thy metal made,
While nations stand secure beneath thy shade.

What tho' his birth were base, yet comets
rise

From earthy vapors, ere they shine in
skies.

Prodigious actions may as well be done
By weaver's issue, as by prince's son.

This arch-attester for the public good⁶⁴⁰
By that one deed ennobles all his blood.

Who ever ask'd the witnesses' high race,
Whose oath with martyrdom did Stephen
grace?

Ours was a Levite, and as times went then,
His tribe were God Almighty's gentlemen.
Sunk were his eyes, his voice was harsh and loud,

Sure signs he neither choleric was nor
proud:

His long chin prov'd his wit; his saintlike
grace

A church vermilion, and a Moses' face.
 His memory, miraculously great, ⁶⁵⁰
 Could plots, exceeding man's belief, repeat;
 Which therefore cannot be accounted lies,
 For human wit could never such devise.
 Some future truths are mingled in his book;
 But where the witness fail'd, the prophet spoke:
 Some things like visionary flights appear;
 The spirit caught him up, the Lord knows where;
 And gave him his rabbinical degree,
 Unknown to foreign university.
 His judgment yet his mem'ry did excel; ⁶⁶⁰
 Which piec'd his wondrous evidence so well,
 And suited to the temper of the times,
 Then groaning under Jebusitic crimes.
 Let Israel's foes suspect his heav'nly call,
 And rashly judge his writ apocryphal;
 Our laws for such affronts have forfeits made:
 He takes his life, who takes away his trade.
 Were I myself in witness Corah's place,
 The wretch who did me such a dire disgrace,
 Should whet my memory, tho' once forgot, ⁶⁷⁰
 To make him an appendix of my plot.
 His zeal to Heav'n made him his prince despise,
 And load his person with indignities;
 But zeal peculiar privilege affords,
 Indulging latitude to deeds and words;
 And Corah might for Agag's murder call,
 In terms as coarse as Samuel us'd to Saul.
 What others in his evidence did join,
 (The best that could be had for love or coin,)
 In Corah's own predicament will fall; ⁶⁸⁰
 For witness is a common name to all.
 Surrounded thus with friends of every sort,
 Deluded Absalom forsakes the court;
 Impatient of high hopes, urg'd with renown,
 And fir'd with near possession of a crown.
 Th' admiring crowd are dazzled with surprise,
 And on his goodly person feed their eyes.
 His joy conceal'd, he sets himself to show,
 On each side bowing popularly low;

His looks, his gestures, and his words he frames, ⁶⁹⁰
 And with familiar ease repeats their names.
 Thus form'd by nature, furnish'd out with arts,
 He glides unfelt into their secret hearts.
 Then, with a kind compassionating look,
 And sighs, bespeaking pity ere he spoke,
 Few words he said; but easy those and fit,
 More slow than Hybla-drops, and far more sweet.
 "I mourn, my countrymen, your lost estate;
 Tho' far unable to prevent your fate:
 Behold a banish'd man, for your dear cause
 Expos'd a prey to arbitrary laws! ⁷⁰¹
 Yet O! that I alone could be undone,
 Cut off from empire, and no more a son!
 Now all your liberties a spoil are made;
 Egypt and Tyrus intercept your trade,
 And Jebusites your sacred rites invade. }
 My father, whom with reverence yet I name,
 Charm'd into ease, is careless of his fame;
 And, brib'd with petty sums of foreign gold,
 Is grown in Bathsheba's embraces old; ⁷¹⁰
 Exalts his enemies, his friends destroys;
 And all his pow'r against himself employs.
 He gives, and let him give, my right away;
 But why should he his own and yours betray?
 He, only he, can make the nation bleed,
 And he alone from my revenge is freed.
 Take then my tears, (with that he wip'd his eyes,)
 'Tis all the aid my present pow'r supplies:
 No court-informer can these arms accuse;
 These arms may sons against their fathers use: ⁷²⁰
 And 't is my wish, the next successor's reign
 May make no other Israelite complain."
 Youth, beauty, graceful action seldom fail;
 But common interest always will prevail;
 And pity never ceases to be shown
 To him who makes the people's wrongs his own.
 The crowd, that still believe their kings oppress,
 With lifted hands their young Messiah bless:
 Who now begins his progress to ordain
 With chariots, horsemen, and a num'rous train; ⁷³⁰

From east to west his glories he displays,
And, like the sun, the promis'd land surveys.

Fame runs before him as the morning star,
And shouts of joy salute him from afar:
Each house receives him as a guardian god,
And consecrates the place of his abode.
But hospitable treats did most commend
Wise Issachar, his wealthy western friend.
This moving court, that caught the people's
eyes,

And seem'd but pomp, did other ends disguise: 740

Achitophel had form'd it, with intent
To sound the depths, and fathom, where it
went,

The people's hearts; distinguish friends
from foes,

And try their strength, before they came to blows.

Yet all was color'd with a smooth pretense
Of specious love, and duty to their prince.

Religion, and redress of grievances,
Two names that always cheat and always
please,

Are often urg'd; and good King David's life

Endanger'd by a brother and a wife. 750

Thus in a pageant shew a plot is made,
And peace itself is war in masquerade.

O foolish Israel! never warn'd by ill!

Still the same bait, and circumvented still!

Did ever men forsake their present ease,

In midst of health imagine a disease;

Take pains contingent mischiefs to foresee,

Make heirs for monarchs, and for God decree?

What shall we think! Can people give
away,

Both for themselves and sons, their native
sway? 760

Then they are left defenseless to the sword
Of each unbounded, arbitrary lord:

And laws are vain, by which we right enjoy,

If kings unquestion'd can those laws destroy.

Yet if the crowd be judge of fit and just,

And kings are only officers in trust,

Then this resuming cov'nant was declar'd

When kings were made, or is for ever harr'd.

If those who gave the scepter could not tie
By their own deed their own posterity, 770

How then could Adam bind his future race?

How could his forfeit on mankind take
place?

Or how could heavenly justice damn us all,
Who ne'er consented to our father's fall?

Then kings are slaves to those whom they command,

And tenants to their people's pleasure stand.

Add, that the pow'r for property allow'd

Is mischievously seated in the crowd;

For who can be secure of private right,

If sovereign sway may be dissolv'd by might? 780

Nor is the people's judgment always true:

The most may err as grossly as the few;

And faultless kings run down, by common
cry,

For vice, oppression, and for tyranny.

What standard is there in a fickle rout,

Which, flowing to the mark, runs faster
out?

Nor only crowds, but Sanhedrins may be Infected with this public lunacy,

And share the madness of rebellious times,

To murder monarchs for imagin'd
crimes. 790

If they may give and take whene'er they
please,

Not kings alone, (the Godhead's images,)

But government itself at length must fall

To nature's state, where all have right to
all.

Yet, grant our lords the people kings can make.

What prudent men a settled throne would shake?

For whatsoever their sufferings were be-
fore,

That change they covet makes them suffer more.

All other errors but disturb a state,

But innovation is the blow of fate. 800

If ancient fabries nod, and threat to fall,

To patch the flaws, and buttress up the wall,

Thus far 't is duty: but here fix the mark;

For all beyond it is to touch our ark.

To change foundations, cast the frame
anew,

Is work for rebels, who base ends pursue,

At once divine and human laws control,

And mend the parts by ruin of the whole.

The tampering world is subject to this curse,

To physic their disease into a worse. 810

Now what relief can righteous David
bring?

How fatal 'tis to be too good a king !
 Friends he has few, so high the madness
 grows:
 Who dare be such, must be the people's
 foes.
 Yet some there were, ev'n in the worst of
 days;
 Some let me name, and naming is to praise.
 In this short file Barzillai first appears; Barzillai, crown'd with honor and with
 years.
 Long since, the rising rebels he withstood
 In regions waste, beyond the Jordan's flood: 820
 Unfortunately brave to buoy the State;
 But sinking underneath his master's fate:
 In exile with his godlike prince he mourn'd;
 For him he suffer'd, and with him return'd.
 The court he practic'd, not the courtier's
 art:
 Large was his wealth, but larger was his
 heart,
 Which well the noblest objects knew to
 choose,
 The fighting warrior, and recording Muse.
 His bed could once a fruitful issue boast;
 Now more than half a father's name is
 lost. 830
 His eldest hope, with every grace adorn'd,
 By me (so Heav'n will have it) always
 mourn'd,
 And always honor'd, snatch'd in manhood's
 prime
 B' unequal fates, and Providence's crime;
 Yet not before the goal of honor won, }
 All parts fulfill'd of subject and of son: }
 Swift was the race, but short the time }
 to run.
 O narrow circle, but of pow'r divine,
 Scanted in space, but perfect in thy line !
 By sea, by land, thy matchless worth was
 known, 840
 Arms thy delight, and war was all thy own:
 Thy force, infus'd, the fainting Tyrians
 propp'd;
 And haughty Pharaoh found his fortune
 stopp'd.
 O ancient honor ! O unconquer'd hand, Whom foes unpunish'd never could with-
 stand !
 But Israel was unworthy of thy name;
 Short is the date of all immoderate fame.
 It looks as Heav'n our ruin had design'd,
 And durst not trust thy fortune and thy
 mind.

Now, free from earth, thy disencumber'd
 soul 850
 Mounts up, and leaves behind the clouds
 and starry pole:
 From thence thy kindred legions mayst
 thou bring,
 To aid the guardian angel of thy king.
 Here stop, my Muse, here cease thy painful
 flight;
 No pinions can pursue immortal height:
 Tell good Barzillai thou canst sing no more,
 And tell thy soul she should have fled be-
 fore.
 Or fled she with his life, and left this verse
 To hang on her departed patron's hearse ?
 Now take thy steepy flight from heav'n, and see 860
 If thou canst find on earth another he :
 Another he would be too hard to find;
 See then whom thou canst see not far behind.
 Zadoc the priest, whom, shunning pow'r
 and place,
 His lowly mind advanc'd to David's grace.
 With him the Sagan of Jerusalem,
 Of hospitable soul, and noble stem;
 Him of the western dome, whose weighty
 sense
 Flows in fit words and heavenly eloquence.
 The prophets' sons, by such example led, 870
 To learning and to loyalty were bred:
 For colleges on bounteous kings depend,
 And never rebel was to arts a friend.
 To these succeed the pillars of the laws;
 Who best could plead, and best can judge
 a cause.
 Next them a train of loyal peers ascend;
 Sharp-judging Adriel, the Muses' friend;
 Himself a Muse — in Sanhedrin's debate
 True to his prince, but not a slave of state:
 Whom David's love with honors did adorn,
 That from his disobedient son were torn. 880
 Jotham of piercing wit, and pregnant
 thought;
 Endued by nature, and by learning taught
 To move assemblies, who but only tried
 The worse a while, then chose the better
 side:
 Nor chose alone, but turn'd the balance
 too;
 So much the weight of one brave man can
 do.
 Hushai, the friend of David in distress;
 In public storms, of manly steadfastness:
 By foreign treaties he inform'd his youth,

And join'd experience to his native truth. 891
His frugal care supplied the wanting throne;

Frugal for that, but bounteous of his own:
'Tis easy conduct when exchequers flow,
But hard the task to manage well the low;
For sovereign power is too depress'd or high,
When kings are forc'd to sell, or crowds to buy.

Indulge one labor more, my weary Muse,
For Amiel: who can Amiel's praise refuse?
Of ancient race by birth, but nobler yet 900
In his own worth, and without title great:
The Sanhedrin long time as chief he rul'd,
Their reason guided, and their passion cool'd:

So dext'rous was he in the crown's defense,
So form'd to speak a loyal nation's sense,
That, as their band was Israel's tribes in small,

So fit was he to represent them all.
Now rasher charioteers the seat ascend,
Whose loose careers his steady skill commend:

They, like th' unequal ruler of the day, 910
Misguide the seasons, and mistake the way;
While he withdrawn at their mad labor smiles,

And safe enjoys the sabbath of his toils.
These were the chief, a small but faithful band

Of worthies, in the breach who dar'd to stand,

And tempt th' united fury of the land.
With grief they view'd such powerful engines bent,

To batter down the lawful government:
A numerous faction, with pretended frights,
In Sanhedrins to plume the regal rights: 920
The true successor from the court remov'd;
The Plot, by hiring witnesses, improv'd.
These ills they saw, and, as their duty bound,

They shew'd the king the danger of the wound;

That no concessions from the throne would please,

But lenitives fomented the disease;
That Absalom, ambitious of the crown,
Was made the lure to draw the people down;

That false Achitophel's pernicious hate
Had turn'd the Plot to ruin Church and State;

930

The council violent, the rabble worse;
That Shimei taught Jerusalem to curse.

With all these loads of injuries oppress'd,
And long revolving in his careful breast
Th' event of things, at last, his patience tir'd,

Thus from his royal throne, by Heav'n inspir'd,

The godlike David spoke: with awful fear
His train their Maker in their master hear.

"Thus long have I, by native mercy sway'd,

My wrongs dissembled, my revenge delay'd: 940

So willing to forgive th' offending age;
So much the father did the king assuage.

But now so far my clemency they slight,
Th' offenders question my forgiving right.

That one was made for many, they contend;

But 'tis to rule; for that's a monarch's end.

They call my tenderness of blood, my fear;
Tho' manly tempers can the longest bear.

Yet, since they will divert my native course,
'Tis time to shew I am not good by force.

Those heap'd affronts that haughty subjects bring, 951

Are burthens for a camel, not a king.
Kings are the public pillars of the State,

Born to sustain and prop the nation's weight;

If my young Samson will pretend a call
To shake the column, let him share the fall:

But O that yet he would repent and live!
How easy 'tis for parents to forgive!

With how few tears a pardon might be won
From nature, pleading for a darling son! 960

Poor pitied youth, by my paternal care
Rais'd up to all the height his frame could bear!

Had God ordain'd his fate for empire born,
He would have giv'n his soul another turn:

Gull'd with a patriot's name, whose modern sense

Is one that would by law supplant his prince;

The people's brave, the politician's tool;
Never was patriot yet, but was a fool.

Whence comes it that religion and the laws
Should more be Absalom's than David's

cause? 970

His old instructor, ere he lost his place,
Was never thought indued with so much

grace.

Good heav'ns, how faction can a patriot paint !

My rebel ever proves my people's saint.
Would they impose an heir upon the throne ?
Let Sanhedrins be taught to give their own.
A king's at least a part of government,
And mine as requisite as their consent;
Without my leave a future king to choose,
Infers a right the present to depose. ^{9,80}
True, they petition me t' approve their choice;

But Esau's hands suit ill with Jacob's voice.
My pious subjects for my safety pray;
Which to secure, they take my pow'r away.
From plots and treasons Heav'n preserve my
years,

But save me most from my petitioners !
Unsate as the barren womb or grave;
God cannot grant so much as they can crave.

What then is left, but with a jealous eye
To guard the small remains of royalty ? ^{9,90}
The law shall still direct my peaceful sway,
And the same law teach rebels to obey:
Votes shall no more establish'd pow'r control —

Such votes as make a part exceed the whole:

No groundless clamors shall my friends remove,

Nor crowds have pow'r to punish ere they
prove;

For gods and godlike kings their care express,

Still to defend their servants in distress.

O that my pow'r to saving were confin'd !

Why am I forc'd, like Heav'n, against my
mind, ^{10,100}

To make examples of another kind ?

Must I at length the sword of justice draw ?
O curst effects of necessary law !

How ill my fear they by my mercy scan !
Beware the fury of a patient man.

Law they require, let Law then shew her
face;

They could not be content to look on Grace,
Her hinder parts, but with a daring eye
To tempt the terror of her front and die.

By their own arts, 't is righteously decreed,
'Those dire artificers of death shall bleed.

Against themselves their witnesses will
swear, ^{10,12}

Till viper-like their mother Plot they tear;
And suck for nutriment that bloody gore,
Which was their principle of life before.

Their Belial with their Belzebub will fight;
Thus on my foes, my foes shall do me
right.

Nor doubt th' event; for factious crowds engage,

In their first onset, all their brutal rage.

Then let 'em take an unresisted course;
Retire, and traverse. and delude their force; ^{10,21}

But, when they stand all breathless, urge
the fight,

And rise upon 'em with redoubled might;
For lawful pow'r is still superior found;
When long driv'n back, at length it stands
the ground."

He said. Th' Almighty, nodding, gave consent;

And peals of thunder shook the firmament.
Henceforth a series of new time began,

The mighty years in long procession ran:

Once more the godlike David was re-
stor'd, ^{10,30}

And willing nations knew their lawful lord.

PROLOGUE AND EPILOGUE TO THE LOYAL BROTHER

OR, THE PERSIAN PRINCE

[This tragedy, the first play of Thomas South-erne (1660-1746), was printed in 1682, being entered in the Term Catalogue for Easter Term (May). If we may judge from the description of the annual pope-burning on "Queen Bess's night," November 17 (see Prologue, line 18), it was probably acted late in the preceding year. The play had a political object: Tach-

mas, "the loyal brother," suggesting the Duke of York; and Ismael, "a villainous favorite,"
the Earl of Shaftesbury.

Pope, in his lines To Mr. Thomas Southerne, on his Birthday, 1712, alludes to him as:

Tom, whom Heav'n sent down to raise
The price of prologues and of plays.

On this Warburton remarks:

"This alludes to a story Mr. Southerne told about the same time to Mr. P[ope] and Mr.
W[arburton] of Dryden; who, when South-erne first wrote for the stage, was so famous for his prologues that the players would act

nothing without that decoration. His usual price till then had been four guineas; but when Southerne came to him for the prologue he had bespoke, Dryden told him he must have six guineas for it; 'which,' said he, 'young man, is out of no disrespect to you, but the players have had my goods too cheap.'

Dr. Johnson tells the same anecdote in his Life of Dryden; but, probably by a mere slip of memory, alters the figures to two guineas and three.]

PROLOGUE

POETS, like lawful monarchs, rul'd the stage,
Till critics, like damn'd Whigs, debauch'd our age.

Mark how they jump: critics would regulate

Our theaters, and Whigs reform our state:
Both pretend love, and both (plague rot
'em!) hate.

The critic humbly seems advice to bring;
The fawning Whig petitions to the king:
But one's advice into a satire slides;
T'other's petition a remonstrance hides.
These will no taxes give, and those no

pence;
Critics would starve the poet, Whigs the prince.

The critic all our troops of friends discards;
Just so the Whig would fain pull down the guards.

Guards are illegal, that drive foes away,
As watchful shepherds, that fright beasts of prey.

Kings, who disband such needless aids as
these,

Are safe — as long as e'er their subjects
please:

And that would be till next Queen Bess's
night,

Which thus grave penny chroniclers indite.
Sir Edmond-berry first, in woful wise,
Leads up the show, and milks their maudlin
eyes.

There's not a butcher's wife but dribs her
part,

And pities the poor pageant from her heart;
Who, to provoke revenge, rides round the
fire,

And, with a civil congee, does retire.
But guiltless blood to ground must never
fall;

There's Antichrist behind, to pay for all.
The punk of Babylon in pomp appears,

A lewd old gentleman of seventy years;
Whose age in vain our mercy would im-
plore,

For few take pity on an old cast whore.

The Devil, who brought him to the shame,
takes part;

Sits cheek by jowl, in black, to cheer his
heart;

Like thief and parson in a Tyburn cart.

The word is giv'n, and with a loud huzza
The miter'd moppet from his chair they draw:

On the slain corpse contending nations fall:
Alas! what's one poor pope among 'em all!

He burns; now all true hearts your triumphs ring:

And next (for fashion) cry: "God save
the king!"

A needful cry in midst of such alarms,
When forty thousand men are up in arms.

But after he's once sav'd, to make amends,

In each succeeding health they damn
his friends:

So God begins, but still the Devil ends.

What if some one, inspir'd with zeal, should
call:

"Come, let's go cry: 'God save him at Whitehall'!"

His best friends would not like this overcare,
Or think him e'er the safer for that pray'r.

Five praying saints are by an act allow'd;
But not the whole Church-militant, in

crowd.
Yet, should Heav'n all the true petitions drain

Of Presbyterians who would kings main-
tain,

Of forty thousand, five would scarce remain.

EPILOGUE

A VIRGIN poet was serv'd up to-day,
Who till this hour ne'er cackled for a play.

He's neither yet a Whig nor Tory boy;
But, like a girl whom several would enjoy,

Begs leave to make the best of his own natural toy.

Were I to play my callow author's game,
The King's House would instruct me, by the
name.

There's loyalty to one: I wish no more;
A commonwealth sounds like a common whore.

Let husband or gallant be what they will,
 One part of woman is true Tory still. 11
 If any factious spirit should rebel,
 Our sex, with ease, can every rising quell.
 Then, as you hope we should your failings

hide,
 An honest jury for our play provide.
 Whigs at their poets never take offense;
 They save dull culprits who have murth'rd
 sense:

Tho' nonsense is a nauseous heavy mass;
 The vehicle call'd faction makes it pass.
 Faction in play's the Commonwealth'sman's bribe, 20

The leaden farthing of the canting tribe;
 Tho' void in payment laws and statutes
 make it,
 The neighborhood, that knows the man,
 will take it.

'Tis faction buys the votes of half the pit;
 Theirs is the pension-parliament of wit.
 In city clubs their venom let 'em vent,
 For there 't is safe, in its own element:
 Here, where their madness can have no pre-
 tense,

Let 'em forget themselves an hour in sense.
 In one poor isle why should two factions be? 30
 Small diff'rence in your vices I can see:
 In drink and drabs both sides too well
 agree.

Would there were more preferments in the
 land;

If places fell, the party could not stand.
 Of this damn'd grievance ev'ry Whig com-
 plains:

They grunt like hogs, till they have got their grains.

Meantime you see what trade our plots advance:

We send each year good money into France;
 And they, that know what merchandise we
 need,

Send o'er true Protestants to mend our
 breed. 40

PROLOGUE AND EPILOGUE TO THE PRINCESS OF CLEVES

[This tragi-comedy, by Lee, would seem, from the reference to Absalom and Achitophel (Prologue, line 25), which would have most point when that poem was in its first heyday of success, probably to have been acted late in 1681 or early in 1682. Dryden's prologue and epilogue were first printed in Miscellany Poems, 1684. The early editions of the play, of which the first appeared in 1689, do not contain either piece, but instead of them a prologue and epilogue apparently written by Lee himself. The play is called The Princess of Cleve in the early editions; the spelling Cleves is found, however, in Miscellany Poems, 1684.]

PROLOGUE

LADIES! (I hope there's none behind to hear)

I long to whisper something in your ear:
 A secret, which does much my mind perplex —

There 's treason in the play against our sex.
 A man that 's false to love, that vows and cheats,

And kisses every living thing he meets!
 A rogue in mode — I dare not speak too broad —

One that does something to the very bawd.
 Out on him, traitor, for a filthy beast! 9
 Nay, and he 's like the pack of all the rest:

None of 'em stick at mark; they all de-
 ceive.

Some Jew has chang'd the text, I half
 believe;

Their Adam cozen'd our poor grandame Eve.

To hide their faults they rap out oaths and
 tear:

Now tho' we lie, we're too well bred to
 swear.

So we compound for half the sin we owe,
 But men are dipp'd for soul and body too,
 And when found out excuse themselves, pox
 cant 'em!

With Latin stuff, perjuria ridet amantum.
 I'm not book-learn'd, to know that word in vogue, 20

But I suspect 't is Latin for a rogue.

I'm sure I never heard that scritch-owl hollow'd

In my poor ears, but separation follow'd.
 How can such perjurd villains e'er be saved!

Achitophel's not half so false to David.
 With vows and soft expressions to allure,

They stand like foremen of a shop, demure;

No sooner out of sight, but they are gad-
 ding,

And for the next new face ride out a-padding.

Yet, by their favor when they have bin kissing, ³⁰
 We can perceive the ready money missing.
 Well! we may rail, but 't is as good e'en
 wink;
 Something we find, and something they will sink.
 But since they're at renouncing, 't is our parts
 To trump their diamonds, as they trump our hearts.

EPILOGUE

A QUALM of conscience brings me back
 again
 To make amends to you bespatter'd men!
 We women love like cats, that hide their joys
 By growling, squalling, and a hideous noise.
 I rail'd at wild young sparks, but, without lying,
 Never was man worse thought on for high-flying:
 The prodigal of love gives each her part,
 And squand'ring shows, at least, a noble
 heart.
 I've heard of men, who, in some lewd
 lampoon,
 Have hir'd a friend to make their valor known. ¹⁰

That accusation straight this question
 brings:
 What is the man that does such naughty
 things?
 The spaniel lover, like a sneaking fop,
 Lies at our feet; he's scarce worth taking up.
 'T is true, such heroes in a play go far;
 But chamber practice is not like the bar.
 When men such vile, such faint petitions
 make,
 We fear to give, because they fear to take;
 Since modesty's the virtue of our kind,
 Pray let it be to our own sex confin'd. ²⁰
 When men usurp it from the female nation,
 'T is but a work of supererogation. —
 We show'd a princess in the play, 't is true,
 Who gave her Cæsar more than all his due;
 Told her own faults; but I should much abhor
 To choose a husband for my confessor.
 You see what fate follow'd the saintlike
 fool,
 For telling tales from out the nuptial
 school.
 Our play a merry comedy had prov'd,
 Had she confess'd as much to him she lov'd. ³⁰
 True Presbyterian wives the means would try,
 But damn'd confessing is flat Popery.

THE MEDAL

A SATIRE AGAINST SEDITION

BY THE AUTHOR OF ABSALOM AND ACHITOPHEL

Per Gravam populos, mediisque per Flutis urbem Ibat ans, divumque sibi posebat honores.

[On November 24, 1681, the government sought to indict the Earl of Shaftesbury of high treason, but the London grand jury rejected the bill. What followed is well described by Sir Walter Scott:

"The triumph of the Whigs was unbounded; and, among other symptoms of exultation, it displayed itself in that which gave rise to this poem of Dryden. This was a medal of Lord Shaftesbury, struck by William [sic, really George] Bower, an artist who had executed some popular pieces allusive to the Roman Catholic Plot. The obverse presented the bust of the Earl, with the legend, Antonio Comiti de Shaftesbury; the reverse, a view of London, the Bridge, and the Tower; the sun is rising above the Tower, and just in the act of dispersing a cloud; the legend around the exergue is Lortamur, and beneath is the date of his acquittal, 24th November, 1681. The partisans of the acquitted patriot wore these medals at their breasts, and care was taken that this emblem should be made as general as possible.

"The success of Absalom and Achitophel made the Tories look to our author as the only poet whose satire might check, or ridicule, the popular triumph of Shaftesbury. If the following anecdote, which Spence has given on the authority of a Catholic priest, a friend of Pope, be absolutely correct, Charles himself engaged Dryden to write on this theme: 'One day as the king was walking in the Mall, and talking with Dryden, he said: "If I was a poet, and I think I am poor enough to be one, I would write a poem on such a subject, in the following manner." He then gave him the plan of The Medal. Dryden took the hint, carried the poem, as soon as it was written, to the king, and had a present of a hundred broad pieces for it.'" [Scott's quotation from Spence is not quite literal.]

The Medal was first published, as is evident from a manuscript note by Luttrell (Malone, I, 1, 163), about March 16, 1682. Of this first edition two issues are known, one of which lacks the quotation from Ovid at the end of the poem. The second edition appeared with Miscellany Poems, 1684, but has a separate title-page, dated 1683. A third edition was printed in 1692. The present text follows that of the issue lacking the quotation from Ovid, which, however, is added from the other issue of the first edition.]

EPISTLE TO THE WHIGS

FOR to whom can I dedicate this poem, with so much justice as to you? 'Tis the representation of your own hero: 'tis the picture drawn at length, which you admire and prize so much in little. None of your ornaments are wanting; neither the landscape of the Tower, nor the rising sun; nor the Anno Domini of your new sovereign's coronation. This must needs be a grateful undertaking to your whole party; especially to those who have not been so happy as to purchase the original. I hear the graver has made a good market of it: all his kings are bought up already; or the value of the remainder so inhand'd, that many a poor Polanders who would be glad to worship the image, is not able to go to the cost of him, but must be content to see him here. I must confess I am no great artist; but signpost painting will serve the turn to remember a friend by, especially when better is not to be had. Yet for your comfort the lineaments are true; and tho' he sate not five times to me, as he did to B., yet I have consulted history, as the Italian painters do, when they would draw a Nero or a Caligula; tho' they have not seen the man, they can help their imagination by a statue of him, and find out the coloring from Suetonius and Tacitus. Truth is, you might have spar'd one side of your Medal: the head would be seen to more advantage if it were plac'd on a spike of the Tower, a little nearer to the sun, which would then break out to better purpose.

You tell us in your preface to the No-Protestant Plot, that you shall be forc'd hereafter to leave off your modesty: I suppose you mean that little which is left you; for it was worn to rags when you put out this Medal. Never was there practis'd such a piece of notorious impudence in the face of an establish'd government. I believe when he is dead you will wear him in thumb-rings, as the Turks did Scanderbeg, as if there were virtue in his bones to preserve you against monarchy. Yet all this while you pretend not only zeal for the public good, but a due veneration for the person of the king. But all men who can see an inch before them may easily detect those gross fallacies. That it is necessary for men in your circumstances to pretend both, is granted you; for without them there could be no ground to raise a faction. But I would ask you one civil question, what right has any man among you, or any association of men, (to come nearer to you,) who, out of Parliament, cannot be consider'd in a public capacity, to meet as you daily do in factious clubs, to vilify the government in your discourses, and to libel it in all your writings? Who made you judges in Israel? Or how is it consistent with your zeal of the public welfare to promote sedition? Does your definition of loyal, which is to serve the king according to the laws, allow you the license of traducing the executive power with which you own he is invested? You complain that his Majesty has lost the love and confidence of his people; and by your very urging it you endeavor, what in you lies, to make him lose them. All good subjects abhor the thought of arbitrary power, whether it be in one or many: if you were the patriots you would seem, you would not at this rate incense the multitude to assume it; for no sober man can fear it, either from the king's disposition, or his practice, or even, where you would odiously lay it, from his ministers. Give us leave to enjoy the government and the benefit of laws under which we were born, and which we desire to transmit to our posterity. You are not the trustees of the public liberty; and if you have not right to petition in a crowd, much less have you to intermeddle in the management of affairs, or to arraign what you do not like, which in effect is everything that is done by the king and council. Can you imagine that any reasonable man will believe you respect the person of his Majesty, when 'tis apparent that your seditious pamphlets are stuff'd with particular reflections on him? If you have the confidence to deny this, 'tis easy to be evine'd from a thousand passages, which I only forbear to quote, because I desire they should die, and be forgotten. I have perus'd many of your papers, and to show you that I have, the third part of your No-Protestant Plot is much of it stolen from your dead author's pamphlet, call'd The Growth of Popery; as manifestly as Milton's Defense of the English People is from Buchanan, De Jure Regni apud Scotos; or your first Covenant and new Association from the Holy League of the French Guisards. Anyone who reads Davila may trace your practices all along. There were the same pretences for reformation and loyalty, the same aspersions of the king, and the same grounds of a rebellion. I know not whether you will take the historian's word, who says it was reported that Poltrot, a Huguenot, murder'd Francis, Duke of Guise, by the instigations of Theodore Beza, or that it was a Huguenot minister, otherwise call'd a Presbyterian. (for our Church abhors so devilish a tenet.) who first writ a treatise of the lawfulness of deposing and murdering kings of a different persuasion in religion; but I am able to prove, from the doctrine of Calvin, and principles of Buchanan, that they set the people above the magistrate; which, if I mistake not, is your own fundamental, and which carries your loyalty no farther than your liking. When a vote of the House of Commons goes on your side, you are as ready to observe it as if it were pass'd into a law; but when you are pinch'd with any former, and yet un repeal'd act of parliament, you declare that in some cases you will not be oblig'd by it. The passage is in the same third part of the No-Protestant Plot, and is too plain to be denied. The late copy of your intended Association, you neither wholly justify nor condemn; but as the Papists, when they are unoppos'd, fly out into all the pageantries of worship; but in times of war, when they are hard press'd by arguments, lie close intrench'd behind the Council of Trent: so now, when your affairs are in a low condition, you dare not pretend that to be a legal combination, but whensoever you are afloat, I doubt not but it will be maintain'd and justified to purpose. For indeed there is nothing to defend it but the sword; 't is the proper time to say anything, when men have all things in their power.

In the mean time, you would fain be nibbling at a parallel betwixt this Association and that in the time of Queen Elizabeth. But there is this small difference betwixt them, that the ends of the one are directly opposite to the other: one with the queen's approbation and conjunction, as head of it; the other without either the consent or knowledge of the king, against whose authority it is manifestly design'd. Therefore you do well to have recourse to your last evasion, that it was contriv'd by your enemies, and shuffled into the papers that were seiz'd; which yet you see the nation is not so easy to believe as your own jury; but the matter is not difficult, to find twelve men in Newgate who would acquit a malefactor.

I have one only favor to desire of you at parting, that when you think of answering this poem, you would employ the same pens against it, who have combated with so much success against Absalom and Achitophel; for then you may assure yourselves of a clear victory, without the least reply. Rail at me abundantly; and, not to break a custom, do it without wit: by this method you will gain a considerable point, which is, wholly to waive the answer of my arguments. Never own the bottom of your principles, for fear they should be treason. Fall severely on the miscarriages of government; for if scandal be not allow'd, you are no freeborn subjects. If God has not blest you with the talent of rhyming, make use of my poor stock and welcome: let your verses run upon my feet; and, for the utmost refuge of notorious blockheads, reduc'd to the last extremity of sense, turn my own lines upon me, and, in utter despair of your own satire, make me satirize myself. Some of you have been driven to this bay already; but, above all the rest, commend me to the Non-conformist parson, who writ the Whip and Key. I am afraid it is not read so much as the piece deserves, because the bookseller is every week crying help at the end of his gazette, to get it off. You see I am charitable enough to do him a kindness, that it may be publish'd as well as printed; and that so much skill in Hebrew derivations may not lie for waste paper in the shop. Yet I half suspect he went no farther for his learning, than the index of Hebrew names and etymologies, which is printed at the end of some English Bibles. If Achitophel signify the brother of a fool, the author of that poem will pass with his readers for the next of kin. And perhaps 't is the relation that makes the kindness. Whatever the verses are, buy 'em up, I beseech you, out of pity; for I hear the conventicle is shut up, and the brother of Achitophel out of service.

Now footmen, you know, have the generosity to make a purse for a member of their society, who has had his livery pull'd over his ears; and even Protestant socks are bought up among you, out of veneration to the name. A dissenter in poetry from sense and English will make as good a Protestant rhymers, as a dissenter from the Church of England a Protestant parson. Besides, if you encourage a young beginner, who knows but he may elevate his style a little above the vulgar epithets of profane, and saucy Jack, and atheistic scribbler, with which he treats me, when the fit of enthusiasm is strong upon him; by which well-manner'd and charitable expressions I was certain of his sect before I knew his name. What would you have more of a man? He has damn'd me in your cause from Genesis to the Revelations; and has half the texts of both the Testaments against me, if you will be so civil to yourselves as to take him for your interpreter, and not to take them for Irish witnesses. After all, perhaps you will tell me that you retain'd him only for the opening of your cause, and that your main lawyer is yet behind. Now if it so happen he meet with no more reply than his predecessors, you may either conclude that I trust to the goodness of my cause, or fear my adversary, or disdain him, or what you please, for the short on 't is, 't is indifferent to your humble servant, whatever your party says or thinks of him.

THE MEDAL

Of all our antic sights and pageantry,
Which English idiots run in crowds to see,

The Polish Medal bears the prize alone: }
A monster, more the favorite of the town }
Than either fairs or theaters have shown. }
Never did art so well with nature strive,
Nor ever idol seem'd so much alive:
So like the man; so golden to the sight,
So base within, so counterfeit and light.
One side is fill'd with title and with face; 10
And, lest the king should want a regal place,
On the reverse, a tow'r the town surveys;
O'er which our mounting sun his beams displays.

The word, pronounc'd aloud by shrieval voice,

Lætatur, which, in Polish, is rejoice.

The day, month, year, to the great act are join'd;

And a new canting holiday design'd.

Five days he sate for every east and look;

Four more than God to finish Adam took.

But who can tell what essence angels are, 20

Or how long Heav'n was making Lucifer?

O could the style that copied every grace,
And plow'd such furrows for an eunuch face,

Could it have form'd his ever-changing will,

The various piece had tir'd the graver's skill!

A martial hero first, with early care,

Blown, like a pigmy by the winds, to war.

A beardless chief, a rebel, ere a man:

(So young his hatred to his prince began.)

Next this, (how wildly will ambition steer!)

A vermin wriggling in th' usurper's ear. 31

Bart'ring his venal wit for sums of gold,

He cast himself into the saintlike mold;

Groan'd, sigh'd, and pray'd, while godliness was gain,

The loudest bagpipe of the squeaking train.

But, as 't is hard to cheat a juggler's eyes,

His open lewdness he could ne'er disguise.

There split the saint; for hypocritic zeal

Allows no sins but those it can conceal.

Whoring to scandal gives too large a scope;

Saints must not trade, but they may interlope. 41

Th' ungodly principle was all the same;

But a gross cheat betrays his partner's game.

Besides, their pace was formal, grave, and slack;

His nimble wit outran the heavy pack.

Yet still he found his fortune at a stay;

Whole droves of blockheads choking up his way:

They took, but not rewarded, his advice;

Villain and wit exact a double price.

Pow'r was his aim; but, thrown from that pretense, 50

The wretch turn'd loyal in his own defense,

And malice reconcil'd him to his prince.

Him in the anguish of his soul he serv'd,

Rewarded faster still than he deserv'd.

Behold him now exalted into trust;

His counsel's oft convenient, seldom just.

Ev'n in the most sincere advice he gave,

He had a grudging still to be a knave.

The frauds he learnt in his fanatic years

Made him uneasy in his lawful gears: 60

At best as little honest as he could,

And, like white witches, mischievously good;

To his first bias longingly he leans,

And rather would be great by wicked means.

Thus, fram'd for ill, he loos'd our triple hold;

(Advice unsafe, precipitous, and bold.)

From hence those tears! that Ilium of our woe!

Who helps a pow'ful friend, forearm's a foe.

What wonder if the waves prevail so far,

When he cut down the banks that made the bar? 70

Seas follow but their nature to invade,
But he by art our native strength betray'd.
So Samson to his foe his force confess'd;
And, to be shorn, lay slumb'ring on her
breast.

But when this fatal counsel, found too
late,

Expos'd its author to the public hate;
When his just sovereign, by no impious
way,

Could be seduc'd to arbitrary sway;
Forsaken of that hope, he shifts the sail, }
Drives down the current with a pop'lar }
gale; 80 }

And shews the fiend confess'd without a veil.

He preaches to the crowd that pow'r is
lent,

But not convey'd to kingly government;
That claims successive bear no binding
force,

That coronation oaths are things of course;
Maintains the multitude can never err,
And sets the people in the papal chair.

The reason's obvious: int'rest never lies; }
The most have still their int'rest in their }
eyes; }

The pow'r is always theirs, and pow'r is ever wise. 90 }

Almighty crowd, thou shorten'st all dispute;

Pow'r is thy essence, wit thy attribute!
Nor faith nor reason make thee at a stay,
Thou leap'st o'er all eternal truths in thy Pindaric way!

Athens no doubt did righteously decide,
When Phocion and when Socrates were
tried;

As righteously they did those dooms repent;

Still they were wise, whatever way they
went.

Crowds err not, tho' to both extremes they
run;

To kill the father and recall the son. 100
Some think the fools were most, as times went then;

But now the world's o'erstock'd with prudent men.

The common cry is ev'n religion's test:
The Turk's is at Constantinople best;
Idols in India; Popery at Rome;
And our own worship only true at home.

And true, but for the time; 'tis hard to
know

How long we please it shall continue so.
This side to-day, and that to-morrow burns;
So all are God-a'mighties in their turns. 110
A tempting doctrine, plausible and new:
What fools our fathers were, if this be
true!

Who, to destroy the seeds of civil war,
Inherent right in monarchs did declare;
And, that a lawful pow'r might never cease,
Secur'd succession, to secure our peace.

Thus property and sovereign sway, at last,
In equal balances were justly cast:

But this new Jehu spurs the hot-mouth'd
horse; 119

Instructs the beast to know his native force,
To take the bit between his teeth, and fly
To the next headlong steep of anarchy.

Too happy England, if our good we knew,
Would we possess the freedom we pursue!
The lavish government can give no more;
Yet we repine, and plenty makes us poor.

God tried us once: our rebel fathers fought;
He glutted 'em with all the pow'r they
sought:

Till, master'd by their own usurping brave,
The freeborn subject sunk into a slave. 130

We loathe our manna, and we long for quails;

Ah, what is man, when his own wish prevails!

How rash, how swift to plunge himself in
ill;

Proud of his pow'r, and boundless in his
will!

That kings can do no wrong we must believe;

None can they do, and must they all receive?

Help, Heaven! or sadly we shall see an
hour,

When neither wrong nor right are in their
pow'r!

Already they have lost their best defense,
The benefit of laws which they dispense: 140
No justice to their righteous cause allow'd;

But baffled by an arbitrary crowd;
And medals grav'd, their conquest to record,
The stamp and coin of their adopted lord.

The man who laugh'd but once, to see an ass

Mumbl'ing to make the crossgrain'd thistles
pass,

Might laugh again, to see a jury chaw

'T is working in th' immediate pow'r to be;
 For from pretended grievances they rise,
 First to dislike, and after to despise;
 Then, Cyclop-like, in human flesh to deal,
 Chop up a minister at every meal;
 Perhaps not wholly to melt down the king,
 But clip his regal rights within the ring;
 From thence t' assume the pow'r of peace and war; 230

And ease him by degrees of public care.
 Yet, to consult his dignity and fame,
 He should have leave to exercise the
 name, }
 And hold the cards, while commons play'd
 the game. }
 For what can pow'r give more than food
 and drink,

To live at ease, and not be bound to think?
 These are the cooler methods of their crime,
 But their hot zealots think 'tis loss of time;
 On utmost bounds of loyalty they stand,
 And grin and whet like a Croatian band,
 That waits impatient for the last command. 241

Thus outlaws open villainy maintain,
 They steal not, but in squadrons scour the
 plain;

And, if their pow'r the passengers subdue,
 The most have right, the wrong is in the few.

Such impious axioms foolishly they show,
 For in some soils republics will not grow:
 Our temp'rate isle will no extremes sustain
 Of pop'lar sway or arbitrary reign,
 But slides between them both into the best,
 Secure in freedom, in a monarch blest; 251
 And tho' the climate, vex'd with various winds,

Works thro' our yielding bodies on our minds,

The wholesome tempest purges what it
 breeds,

To recommend the calmness that succeeds.

But thou, the pander of the people's
 hearts,

(O crooked soul, and serpentine in arts!)
 Whose blandishments a loyal land have whor'd,

And broke the bonds she plighted to her
 lord;

What curses on thy blasted name will
 fall! 260

Which age to age their legacy shall call;
 For all must curse the woes that must descend on all. }

Religion thou hast none; thy mercury
 Has pass'd thro' every sect, or theirs thro'
 thee.

But what thou giv'st, that venom still remains;

And the pox'd nation feels thee in their brains.

What else inspires the tongues and swells
 the breasts

Of all thy bellowing renegado priests,
 That preach up thee for God, dispense thy
 laws,

And with thy stum ferment their fainting
 cause, 270

Fresh fumes of madness raise, and toil and sweat

To make the formidable cripple great?

Yet should thy crimes succeed, should lawless pow'r

Compass those ends thy greedy hopes devour,

Thy canting friends thy mortal foes would
 be,

Thy God and theirs will never long agree;
 For thine (if thou hast any) must be one

That lets the world and humankind alone;
 A jolly god, that passes hours too well

To promise heav'n, or threaten us with hell; 280

That unconcern'd can at rebellion sit,
 And wink at crimes he did himself commit.

A tyrant theirs; the heav'n their priesthood paints

A conventicle of gloomy sullen saints;
 A heav'n like Bedlam, slovenly and sad,

Foredoom'd for souls with false religion
 mad.

Without a vision poets can foreshow
 What all but fools by common sense may
 know;

If true succession from our isle should fail,
 And crowds profane with impious arms
 prevail, 290

Not thou, nor those thy factious arts in-
 gage, }

Shall reap that harvest of rebellious rage,
 With which thou flatter'st thy decrepit
 age. }

The swelling poison of the sev'ral sects,
 Which, wanting vent, the nation's health
 infects,

Shall burst its bag; and, fighting out their
 way,

The various venoms on each other prey.

The presbyter, puff'd up with spiritual pride,

Shall on the necks of the lewd nobles ride,
 His brethren damn, the civil pow'r defy, ³⁰⁰
 And parcel out republic prelacy.
 But short shall be his reign: his rigid yoke
 And tyrant pow'r will puny sects provoke;
 And frogs and toads, and all the tadpole
 train,
 Will croak to Heav'n for help from this devouring crane.
 The cutthroat sword and clamorous gown
 shall jar,
 In sharing their ill-gotten spoils of war;
 Chiefs shall be grudg'd the part which they pretend;
 Lords envy lords, and friends with every friend ³⁰⁹
 About their impious merit shall contend.]

The surly commons shall respect deny,
 And justle peerage out with property.
 Their gen'ral either shall his trust betray,
 And force the crowd to arbitrary sway;
 Or they, suspecting his ambitious aim,
 In hate of kings shall cast anew the frame;
 And thrust out Collatine that bore their
 name.
 Thus inborn broils the factions would
 ingage,
 Or wars of exil'd heirs, or foreign rage,
 Till halting vengeance overtook our age;
 And our wild labors wearied into rest, ³²¹
 Reclin'd us on a rightful monarch's breast.

PROLOGUE TO HIS ROYAL HIGH-NESS, UPON HIS FIRST AP-PEARANCE AT THE DUKE'S THEATER SINCE HIS RETURN FROM SCOTLAND

SPOKEN BY MR. SMITH

[This prologue was first published as a broad-side, in 1682; it was reprinted in the third edition, 1702, of Sylve, with the addition of 1682 at the close of the title.

In March, 1682, the Duke of York was recalled from Scotland, where he had been living in honorable exile, as high commissioner, since October, 1680. His first visit to the theater called by his name was on April 21.
Otway's Venice Preserv'd, or A Plot Discover'd, a play of political tendency (first performed in the preceding February), in which Antonio, the villain, "a fine speaker in the senate," is meant to suggest Anthony. Earl of Shaftesbury, was represented on this occasion. Date and play are known to us from the heading of the special epilogue, published as a broad-side, which Otway wrote for this performance.
 The play was first published in 1682; the special prologue and epilogue were not printed with it.]

In those cold regions which no summers
 cheer,
 When brooding darkness covers half the
 year,
 To hallow caves the shivering natives go;
 Bears range abroad, and hunt in tracks of
 snow:

But when the tedious twilight wears away,
 And stars grow paler at th' approach of
 day,
 The longing crowds to frozen mountains
 run;
 Happy who first can see the glimmering
 sun!
 The surly salvage offspring disappear,
 And curse the bright successor of the
 year.
 Yet, tho' rough bears in covert seek de- ¹⁰
 fense,
 White foxes stay, with seeming innocence:
 That crafty kind with daylight can dispense.
 Still we are throng'd so full with Reynard's
 race,
 That loyal subjects scarce can find a place:
 Thus modest truth is cast behind the crowd;
 Truth speaks too low, Hypocrisy too loud.
 Let 'em be first to flatter in success;
 Duty can stay, but guilt has need to press.
 Once, when true zeal the sons of God did ²⁰
 call,
 To make their solemn show at heaven's Whitehall,
 The fawning Devil appear'd among the rest,
 And made as good a courtier as the best.
 The friends of Job, who rail'd at him be-
 fore,
 Came cap in hand when he had three times
 more.
 Yet late repentance may, perhaps, be true;
 Kings can forgive, if rebels can but sue:
 A tyrant's pow'r in rigor is express'd;

The father yearns in the true prince's
breast.

We grant, an o'ergrown Whig no grace can mend; ³⁰

But most are babes, that know not they offend.

The crowd, to restless motion still enclin'd,
Are clouds, that rack according to the wind.
Driv'n by their chiefs, they storms of hailstones pour;

Then mourn, and soften to a silent show'r.
O welcome to this much-offending land,
The prince that brings forgiveness in his
hand!

Thus angels on glad messages appear;
Their first salute commands us not to fear:

Thus Heav'n, that could constrain us to obey, ⁴⁰

(With reverence if we might presume to say,)

Seems to relax the rights of sov'reign
sway;

Permits to man the choice of good and ill,
And makes us happy by our own free will.

TO THE DUCHESS ON HER RE- TURN FROM SCOTLAND IN THE YEAR 1682

[This poem was first published as a broad-side in 1682, with the heading, Prologue to the Duchess on her Return from Scotland. It was reprinted, with title as above, in Examen Poeticum, 1693. The texts of the two editions are identical.]

This prologue is addressed to Mary of Este, Princess of Modena, the second wife of the Duke of York, whom he had married in 1673.
His first duchess, Anne Hyde, in whose honor Dryden wrote some earlier verses (see p. 26, above), died on March 31, 1671. On May 3, 1682, the duke sailed for Scotland to bring back his wife, and suffered shipwreck on the Lemmon Ore, off the Yorkshire coast, nearly losing his life. (See the Second Part of Absalom and Achitophel, lines 1081-1084, and Britannia Rediviva, line 97.) The duke and duchess returned in safety to England, reaching London on May 27 (Luttrell). The exact date of the duchess's visit to the theater is unknown.]

WHEN factions rage to cruel exile drove
The Queen of Beauty, and the Court of
Love,
The Muses droop'd, with their forsaken
arts,

And the sad Cupids broke their useless
darts;

Our fruitful plains to wilds and desarts
turn'd,

Like Eden's face when banish'd man it
mourn'd;

Love was no more, when Loyalty was gone,
The great supporter of his awful throne;

Love could no longer after Beauty stay,
But wandered northward to the verge of day, ¹⁰

As if the sun and he had lost their way.

But now th' illustrious nymph, return'd
again,

Brings every Grace triumphant in her
train.

The wond'ring Nereids, tho' they rais'd no
storm,

Foreslow'd her passage, to behold her form:
Some cried, a Venus; some, a Thetis

pass'd;
But this was not so fair, nor that so chaste.

Far from her sight flew Faction, Strife, and Pride;

And Envy did but look on her, and died.
Whate'er we suffer'd from our sullen fate,

Her sight is purchas'd at an easy rate. ²¹
Three gloomy years against this day were

set,
But this one mighty sum has clear'd the debt;

Like Joseph's dream, but with a better

doom,
The famine past, the plenty still to come.

For her the weeping heav'ns become serene;

For her the ground is clad in cheerful
green;

For her the nightingales are taught to
sing,

And Nature has for her delay'd the spring.
The Muse resumes her long-forgotten

lays, ³⁰
And Love, restor'd, his ancient realm

surveys,
Recalls our beauties, and revives our

plays;
His waste dominions peoples once again,

And from her presence dates his second
reign.

But awful charms on her fair forehead sit,
Dispensing what she never will admit;

Pleasing, yet cold, like Cynthia's silver beam,

The people's wonder and the poet's theme.

Distemper'd Zeal, Sedition, canker'd Hate,
 No more shall vex the Church, and tear the
 State: 40
 No more shall Faction civil discords move,
 Or only discords of too tender love:

Discord, like that of music's various parts;
 Discord, that makes the harmony of hearts;
 Discord, that only this dispute shall bring,
 Who best shall love the duke, and serve the king.

MAC FLECKNOE

OR, A SATIRE UPON THE TRUE-BLUE-PROTESTANT POET

T. S.

BY THE AUTHOR OF ABSALOM AND ACHITOPHEL

[Thomas Shadwell, once Dryden's friend (see note, p. 83, above), now his enemy, and an ardent Whig, had published an answer to The Medal, entitled, The Medal of John Bayes, a Satire against Folly and Knavery, in which he assailed Dryden with foul and scurrilous abuse. Dryden's reply was the following poem, published, according to Malone (I, 1, 169), who probably had some authority for his statement, on October 4, 1682. It was "printed for D. Green," instead of for Tonson; part of the title-page is reproduced above. A second edition, with numerous changes in the text, appeared as the first piece in Miscellany Poems, 1684, from which the present text is taken.

In the preface to his translation of the Tenth Satire of Juvenal, 1687, Shadwell says that Dryden, when charged by him with writing Mac Flecknoe, denied the fact, "with all the execrations he could think of." This story deserves no attention; if true, it merely shows that Dryden was jesting at Shadwell's expense. Dryden admits the authorship in his Discourse concerning Satire, 1693: see p. 303, below. After the Revolution Shadwell was created poet laureate; Dr. Johnson wrongly states that Dryden wrote Mac Flecknoe to celebrate that occasion.]

ALL human things are subject to decay,
 And when fate summons, monarchs must
 obey.
 This Flecknoe found, who, like Augustus,
 young
 Was call'd to empire, and had govern'd
 long;
 In prose and verse, was own'd, without dispute,
 Thro' all the realms of Nonsense, absolute.
 This aged prince, now flourishing in peace,
 And blest with issue of a large increase;
 Worn out with business, did at length debate
 To settle the succession of the State; 10
 And, pond'ring which of all his sons was fit
 To reign, and wage immortal war with wit, Cried: "'T is resolv'd; for nature pleads, that he Should only rule, who most resembles me.
 Sh—— alone my perfect image bears,
 Mature in dulness from his tender years:
 Sh—— alone, of all my sons, is he
 Who stands confirm'd in full stupidity.

The rest to some faint meaning make pre-
 tense,
 But Sh—— never deviates into sense. 20
 Some beams of wit on other souls may fall,
 Strike thro', and make a lucid interval;
 But Sh——'s genuine night admits no ray,
 His rising fogs prevail upon the day.
 Besides, his goodly fabric fills the eye,
 And seems design'd for thoughtless majesty;
 Thoughtless as monarch oaks that shade
 the plain,
 And, spread in solemn state, supinely reign.
 Heywood and Shirley were but types of
 thee,
 Thou last great prophet of tautology. 30
 Even I, a dunce of more renown than they,
 Was sent before but to prepare thy way;
 And, coarsely clad in Norwich druggut,
 came
 To teach the nations in thy greater name.
 My warbling lute, the lute I whilom strung,
 When to King John of Portugal I sung,
 Was but the prelude to that glorious day,
 When thou on silver Thames didst cut thy
 way,

With well-tim'd oars before the royal barge,
 Swell'd with the pride of thy celestial
 charge;
 And big with hymn, commander of a host,
 The like was ne'er in Epsom blankets toss'd.
 Methinks I see the new Arion sail,
 The lute still trembling underneath thy nail.
 At thy well-sharpen'd thumb from shore to shore
 The treble squeaks for fear, the basses
 roar;
 Echoes from Pissing Alley Sh—— call,
 And Sh—— they resound from Aston Hall.
 About thy boat the little fishes throng,
 As at the morning toast that floats along. 50
 Sometimes, as prince of thy harmonious band,
 Thou wield'st thy papers in thy threshing
 hand.
 St. André's feet ne'er kept more equal
 time,
 Not ev'n the feet of thy own Psyche's
 rhyme;
 Tho' they in number as in sense excel:
 So just, so like tautology, they fell,
 That, pale with envy, Singleton forswore
 The lute and sword, which he in triumph
 bore,
 And vow'd he ne'er would act Villerius
 more." }
 Here stopp'd the good old sire, and wept for joy 60
 In silent raptures of the hopeful boy.
 All arguments, but most his plays, persuade,
 That for anointed dulness he was made.
 Close to the walls which fair Augusta
 bind,
 (The fair Augusta much to fears inclin'd,)
 An ancient fabric rais'd t' inform the sight,
 There stood of yore, and Barbican it hight:
 A watchtower once; but now, so fate ordains,
 Of all the pile an empty name remains.
 From its old ruins brothel-houses rise, 70
 Scenes of lewd loves, and of polluted joys,
 Where their vast courts the mother-strumpets keep,
 And, undisturb'd by watch, in silence sleep.
 Near these a Nursery erects its head,
 Where queens are form'd, and future heroes
 bred;

Where unfledg'd actors learn to laugh and
 cry,
 Where infant punks their tender voices
 try,
 And little Maximins the gods defy.
 Great Fletcher never treads in buskins here,
 Nor greater Jonson dares in socks appear; 80
 But gentle Simkin just reception finds
 Amidst this monument of vanish'd minds:
 Pure clinches the suburban Muse affords,
 And Panton waging harmless war with words.
 Here Flecknoe, as a place to fame well
 known,
 Ambitiously design'd his Sh——'s throne;
 For ancient Dekker prophesied long since,
 That in this pile should reign a mighty
 prince,
 Born for a scourge of wit, and flail of sense;
 To whom true dulness should some Psyches
 owe, 90
 But worlds of Misers from his pen should
 flow;
Humorists and hypocrites it should produce,
 Whole Raymond families, and tribes of Bruce.
 Now Empress Fame had publish'd the renown
 Of Sh——'s coronation thro' the town.
 Rous'd by report of Fame, the nations meet,
 From near Bunhill, and distant Watling
 Street.
 No Persian carpets spread th' imperial way,
 But scatter'd limbs of mangled poets lay;
 From dusty shops neglected authors come,
 Martyrs of pies, and relics of the bum. 101
 Much Heywood, Shirley, Ogleby there lay,
 But loads of Sh—— almost chok'd the way.
 Bilk'd stationers for yeomen stood prepar'd,
 And Herringman was captain of the guard.
 The hoary prince in majesty appear'd,
 High on a throne of his own labors rear'd.
 At his right hand our young Ascanius sate,
 Rome's other hope, and pillar of the State.
 His brows thick fogs, instead of glories,
 grace, 110
 And lambent dulness play'd around his face.
 As Hannibal did to the altars come,
 Sworn by his sire a mortal foe to Rome;
 So Sh—— swore, nor should his vow be
 vain,
 That he till death true dulness would main-
 tain;
 And, in his father's right, and realm's defense,

Ne'er to have peace with wit, nor truce with sense.

The king himself the sacred unction made,
As king by office, and as priest by trade.

In his sinister hand, instead of ball, ¹²⁰

He plac'd a mighty mug of potent ale;
Love's Kingdom to his right he did convey,
At once his scepter, and his rule of sway;
Whose righteous lore the prince had practic'd young,

And from whose loins recorded Psyche
sprung.

His temples, last, with poppies were o'er-
spread,

That nodding seem'd to consecrate his head.
Just at that point of time, if fame not lie,
On his left hand twelve reverend owls did
fly.

So Romulus, 't is sung, by Tiber's brook, ¹³⁰
Presage of sway from twice six vultures
took.

Th'admiring throng loud acclamations make,
And omens of his future empire take.

The sire then shook the honors of his head,
And from his brows damps of oblivion shed
Full on the filial dulness: long he stood, }
Repelling from his breast the raging god; }
At length burst out in this prophetic
mood:

"Heavens bless my son, from Ireland let him reign

To far Barbadoes on the western main; ¹⁴⁰
Of his dominion may no end be known,
And greater than his father's be his throne;
Beyond Love's Kingdom let him stretch his
pen!"

He paus'd, and all the people cried,
"Amen."

Then thus continued he: "My son, advance
Still in new impudence, new ignorance.

Success let others teach, learn thou from me
Pangs without birth, and fruitless industry.

Let Virtuosos in five years be writ;

Yet not one thought accuse thy toil of wit.

Let gentle George in triumph tread the stage, ¹⁵¹

Make Dorimant betray, and Loveit rage;

Let Cully, Cockwood, Fopling, charm the
pit,

And in their folly shew the writer's wit.

Yet still thy fools shall stand in thy defense,

And justify their author's want of sense.

Let 'em be all by thy own model made
Of dulness, and desire no foreign aid;

That they to future ages may be known,

Not copies drawn, but issue of thy own. ¹⁶⁰

Nay, let thy men of wit too be the same,

All full of thee, and differing but in name.

But let no alien S—dl—y interpose,

To lard with wit thy hungry Epsom prose.

And when false flowers of rhetoric thou wouldst cull,

Trust nature, do not labor to be dull;

But write thy best, and top; and, in each
line,

Sir Formal's oratory will be thine:

Sir Formal, tho' unsought, attends thy quill,

And does thy northern dedications fill. ¹⁷⁰

Nor let false friends seduce thy mind to
fame,

By arrogating Jonson's hostile name.

Let father Flecknoe fire thy mind with
praise,

And uncle Ogleby thy envy raise.

Thou art my blood, where Jonson has no
part:

What share have we in nature, or in art?

Where did his wit on learning fix a brand,

And rail at arts he did not understand?

Where made he love in Prince Nicander's
vein,

Or swept the dust in Psyche's humble strain?

Where sold he bargains, 'whip-stitch, kiss
my arse,'

Promis'd a play and dwindled to a farce?

When did his Muse from Fletcher scenes
purloin,

As thou whole Eth'rege dost transfuse to thine?

But so transfus'd, as oil on water's flow,

His always floats above, thine sinks below.

This is thy province, this thy wondrous way,

New humors to invent for each new play:

This is that boasted bias of thy mind,

By which one way, to dulness, 't is inclin'd;

Which makes thy writings lean on one side
still, ¹⁷¹

And, in all changes, that way bends thy will.

Nor let thy mountain-belly make pretense

Of likeness; thine's a tympany of sense.

A tun of man in thy large bulk is writ,

But sure thou'rt but a kilderkin of wit.

Like mine, thy gentle numbers feebly creep;

Thy tragic Muse gives smiles, thy comic sleep.

With whate'er gall thou sett'st thyself to
write,

Thy inoffensive satires never bite. ²⁰⁰

In thy felonious heart tho' venom lies,

It does but touch thy Irish pen, and dies.

Thy genius calls thee not to purchase fame
In keen iambics, but mild anagram.
Leave writing plays, and choose for thy command
Some peaceful province in acrostic land.
There thou may'st wings display and altars
raise,
And torture one poor word ten thousand
ways.
Or, if thou wouldst thy diff'rent talents suit,

Set thy own songs, and sing them to thy lute."
Hesaid: but his last words were scarcely
heard;
For Bruce and Longvil had a trapprepar'd,²¹¹
And down they sent the yet declaiming
bard.
Sinking he left his drugget robe behind,
Borne upwards by a subterranean wind.
The mantle fell to the young prophet's part,
With double portion of his father's art.

THE SECOND PART OF
ABSALOM AND ACHITOPHEL

A POEM

Si quis tamen hoc quoque, si quis Captus amore legat.

[According to an advertisement in the Observer (see Scott-Saintsbury edition, xviii, 205; and compare Malone, I, 1, 173) this poem was published about November 11, 1682; a second edition, with a few changes of text, appeared before the close of the year. No author's name was printed with either edition. To the third edition, which did not appear until 1716, in the fourth edition of the Second Part of Miscellany Poems, Tonson prefixed the following note, To the Reader, which is probably authentic, being confirmed by internal evidence:

"In the year 1680 Mr. Dryden undertook the poem of Absalom and Achitophel, upon the desire of King Charles the Second. The performance was applauded by everyone; and several persons pressing him to write a second part, he, upon declining it himself, spoke to Mr. Tate to write one, and gave him his advice in the direction of it; and that part beginning:

'Next these, a troop of busy spirits press,'
and ending:

'To talk like Doeg, and to write like thee,' containing near two hundred verses, were intirely Mr. Dryden's compositions, besides some touches in other places."

Lines 310-509 may then be accepted as written by Dryden; in the rest of the poem his work cannot be distinguished with any certainty. Sir Walter Scott's opinion on the matter is however of much interest:

"To prevent Tate from suffering too much by comparison, Dryden has obviously contributed much to the poem at large. . . . Much of the character of Corah [lines 69-102], for example, is unquestionably Dryden's; so probably is that of Arod [lines 534-555] and the verses generally descriptive of the Green-ribbon Club [lines 522-533] which precede it. Such pungent satire is easily distinguished from the smooth insipid flow of other parts, in which Dryden's corrections probably left nothing for censure, and which Tate was unable to qualify with anything entitled to praise. The character of Michal [lines 51-68], of Dryden as Asaph [lines 1037-1064], and some of the encomiastic passages, seem to show the extent of Tate's powers, when unsupported by the vivifying assistance of his powerful auxiliary. They are just decently versified, but flat, commonplace, and uninteresting." (Scott-Saintsbury edition, ix, 321.)

The present text is that of the second edition.]

SINCE men, like beasts, each other's prey were made,
Since trade began, and priesthood grew a
trade,
Since realms were form'd, none sure so curst as those

That madly their own happiness oppose;
There Heaven itself and godlike kings, in
vain
Show'r down the manna of a gentle reign;
While pauper'd crowds to mad sedition
run,

And monarchs by indulgence are undone.
Thus David's clemency was fatal grown,
While wealthy faction aw'd the wanting throne. ¹⁰

For now their sov'reign's orders to contemn
Was held the charter of Jerusalem,
His rights t' invade, his tributes to refuse,
A privilege peculiar to the Jews;
As if from heav'nly call this license fell,
And Jacob's seed were chosen to rebel !

Achitophel with triumph sees his crimes
Thus suited to the madness of the times;
And Absalom, to make his hopes succeed,
Of flattering charms no longer stands in need; ²⁰

While fond of change, tho' ne'er so dearly
bought,

Our tribes outstrip the youth's ambitious
thought;

His swiftest hopes with swifter homage
meet,

And crowd their servile necks beneath his feet.

Thus to his aid while pressing tides repair,
He mounts and spreads his streamers in the air.

The charms of empire might his youth mislead,

But what can our besotted Israel plead ?

Sway'd by a monarch, whose serene command

Seems half the blessing of our promis'd land; ³⁰

Whose only grievance is excess of ease;
Freedom our pain, and plenty our disease !
Yet, as all folly would lay claim to sense,
And wickedness ne'er wanted a pretense,
With arguments they'd make their treason
good,

And righteous David's self with slanders
load:

That arts of foreign sway he did affect,
And guilty Jebusites from law protect,
Whose very chiefs, convict, were never
freed,

Nay, we have seen their sacrificers bleed ! ⁴⁰
Accusers' infamy is urg'd in vain,
While in the bounds of sense they did con-
tain;

But soon they launch'd into th' unfathom'd
tide,

And in the depths they knew disdain'd to
ride.

For probable discoveries to dispense,
Was thought below a pension'd evidence;

Mere truth was dull, nor suited with the port

Of pamper'd Corah, when advanc'd to court.
No less than wonders now they will impose,
And projects void of grace or sense disclose. ⁵⁰

Such was the charge on pious Michal
brought,

Michal that ne'er was cruel ev'n in thought,
The best of queens and most obedient wife,
Impeach'd of curst designs on David's life !
His life, the theme of her eternal pray'r,
'Tis scarce so much his guardian angel's
care.

Not summer morns such mildness can dis-
close,

The Hermon lily, nor the Sharon rose.

Neglecting each vain pomp of majesty, Transported Michal feeds her thoughts on high. ⁶⁰

She lives with angels, and, as angels do, Quits heav'n sometimes to bless the world
below;

Where, cherish'd by her bounties' plenteous
spring,

Reviving widows smile, and orphans sing.
O, when rebellious Israel's crimes at height
Are threaten'd with her lord's approaching
fate,

The piety of Michal then remain

In Heaven's remembrance, and prolong his
reign !

Less desolation did the pest pursue,
That from Dan's limits to Beersheba slew, ⁷⁰
Less fatal the repeated wars of Tyre,
And less Jerusalem's avenging fire.
With gentler terror these our state o'eran,
Than since our evidencing days began !
On every cheek a pale confusion sat,
Continued fear beyond the worst of fate !
Trust was no more, art, science, useless
made,

All occupations lost but Corah's trade.

Meanwhile a guard on modest Corah wait,
If not for safety, needful yet for state. ⁸⁰
Well might he deem each peer and prince his slave,

And lord it o'er the tribes which he could save:

Ev'n vice in him was virtue — what sad fate
But for his honesty had seiz'd our state ?

And with what tyranny had we been curst,
Had Corah never prov'd a villain first ?

'T have told his knowledge of th' intrigue
in gross,

Had been, alas, to our deponent's loss:
The travel'd Levite had th' experience got,
To husband well, and make the best of 's
plot;

And therefore, like an evidence of skill,
With wise reserves secur'd his pension still;
Nor quite of future pow'r himself bereft,
But limbos large for unbelievers left.

And now his writ such reverence had got,
'T was worse than plotting to suspect his plot.
Some were so well convinc'd, they made no
doubt

Themselves to help the founder'd swearers
out.

Some had their sense impos'd on by their
fear,

But more for int'rest sake believe and
swear:

Ev'n to that height with some the frenzy
grew,

They rag'd to find their danger not prove
true.

Yet, than all these a viler crew remain,
Who with Achitophel the cry maintain;
Not urg'd by fear, nor thro' misguided sense, (Blind zeal and starving need had some pretense,)

But for the Good Old Cause, that did excite Th' original rebels' wiles, revenge, and spite.

These raise the Plot, to have the scandal thrown

Upon the bright successor of the crown, ¹¹⁰ Whose virtue with such wrongs they had pursued,

As seem'd all hope of pardon to exclude.
Thus, while on private ends their zeal is built,

The cheated crowd applaud and share their guilt.

Such practices as these, too gross to lie
Long unobserv'd by each discerning eye,
The more judicious Israelites unspell'd,
'Tho' still the charm the giddy rabble held.
Ev'n Absalom, amidst the dazzling beams
Of empire, and ambition's flattering dreams, ¹²⁰

Perceives the Plot, (too foul to be excus'd,)
'To aid designs, no less pernicious, us'd.

And, filial sense yet striving in his breast,
Thus to Achitophel his doubts express'd:

"Why are my thoughts upon a crown
employ'd,

Which once obtain'd, can be but half enjoy'd?

Not so, when virtue did my arms require,
And to my father's wars I flew intire.
My regal pow'r how will my foes resent,
When I myself have scarce my own consent?

Give me a son's unblemish'd truth again,
Or quench the sparks of duty that remain.
How slight to force a throne that legions
guard

The task to me; to prove unjust, how hard!
And if th' imagin'd guilt thus wound my
thought,

What will it when the tragic scene is
wrought?

Dire war must first be conjur'd from be-
low,

The realm we'd rule we first must over-
throw;

And, when the civil furies are on wing
That blind and undistinguish'd slaughters fling,

Who knows what impious chance may reach the king?

O rather let me perish in the strife,
Than have my crown the price of David's life!

Or if the tempest of the war he stand,
In peace, some vile officious villain's hand
His soul's anointed temple may invade,
Or, press'd by clamorous crowds, myself be made

His murderer; rebellious crowds, whose guilt

Shall dread his vengeance till his blood be spilt.

Which if my filial tenderness oppose, ¹⁵⁰
Since to the empire by their arms I rose,
Those very arms on me shall be employ'd,

A new usurper crown'd, and I destroy'd:
The same pretense of public good will
hold,

And new Achitophels be found as bold
To urge the needful change, perhaps the
old."

He said. The statesman with a smile
replies

(A smile that did his rising spleen disguise):
"My thoughts presum'd our labors at an
end,

And are we still with conscience to contend, ¹⁶⁰

Whose want in kings as needful is allow'd,
As 't is for them to find it in the crowd?

Far in the doubtful passage you are gone,
And only can be safe by pressing on.

The crown's true heir, a prince severe and
 wise,
 Has view'd your motions long with jealous
 eyes:
 Your person's charms, your more prevailing arts,
 And mark'd your progress in the people's
 hearts,
 Whose patience is th' effect of stinted
 pow'r,
 But treasures vengeance for the fatal
 hour; 170
 And if remote the peril he can bring,
 Your present danger's greater from the
 king.
 Let not a parent's name deceive your sense,
 Nor trust the father in a jealous prince!
 Your trivial faults if he could so resent,
 To doom you little less than banishment,
 What rage must your presumption since inspire:
 Against his orders your return from Tyre?
 Nor only so, but with a pomp more high,
 And open court of popularity, 180
 The factious tribes — "And this reproof
 from thee?"
 The prince replies: "O statesman's winding
 skill,
 They first condemn that first advis'd the
 ill!"
 "Illustrious youth," return'd Achitophel,
 "Misconstrue not the words that mean you
 well.
 The course you steer I worthy blame conclude,
 But 'tis because you leave it unpursued.
 A monarch's crown with fate surrounded
 lies,
 Who reach, lay hold on death that miss the
 prize.
 Did you for this expose yourself to show, 190
 And to the crowd bow popularly low?
 For this your glorious progress next or-
 dain,
 With chariots, horsemen, and a numerous
 train;
 With fame before you like the morning
 star,
 And shouts of joy saluting from afar?
 O from the heights you've reach'd but take a view,
 Scarce leading Lucifer could fall like you!
 And must I here my shipwreck'd arts bemoan?
 Have I for this so oft made Israel groan?

Your single interest with the nation
 weigh'd,
 And turn'd the scale where your desires 200
 were laid?
 Ev'n when at helm a course so dang'rous
 mov'd
 To land your hopes, as my removal
 prov'd?"
 "I not dispute," the royal youth replies,
 "The known perfection of your policies,
 Nor in Achitophel yet grudge or blame
 The privilege that statesmen ever claim;
 Who private interest never yet pursued,
 But still pretended 't was for others' good:
 What politician yet e'er scap'd his fate, 210
 Who saving his own neck not sav'd the
 State?
 From hence on ev'ry hum'rous wind that veer'd,
 With shifted sails a sev'ral course you
 steer'd.
 What form of sway did David e'er pursue,
 That seem'd like absolute, but sprung
 from you?
 Who at your instance quash'd each penal
 law,
 That kept dissenting factious Jews in awe;
 And who suspends fix'd laws, may abro-
 gate,
 That done, form new, and so enslave the
 State.
 Ev'n property, whose champion now you
 stand, 220
 And seem for this the idol of the land,
 Did ne'er sustain such violence before,
 As when your counsel shut the royal store;
 Advice, that ruin to whole tribes procur'd,
 But secret kept till your own banks secur'd.
 Recount with this the triple cov'nant broke,
 And Israel fitted for a foreign yoke;
 Nor here your counsel's fatal progress
 stay'd,
 But sent our levied powers to Pharaoh's aid.
 Hence Tyre and Israel, low in ruins laid, 230
 And Egypt, once their scorn, their common terror made.
 Ev'n yet of such a season we can dream,
 When royal rights you made your darling
 theme;
 For pow'r unlimited could reasons draw,
 And place prerogative above the law;
 Which, on your fall from office, grew un-
 just,
 The laws made king, the king a slave in trust:

Whom with statecraft, (to int'rest only true,)

You now accuse of ills contriv'd by you."

To this Hell's agent: "Royal youth, fix here, ²⁴⁰

Let int'rest be the star by which I steer.

Hence to repose your trust in me was wise,
Whose int'rest most in your advancement lies,

A tie so firm as always will avail,
When friendship, nature, and religion fail:
On ours the safety of the crowd depends;
Secure the crowd, and we obtain our ends,
Whom I will cause so far our guilt to share,

Till they are made our champions by their fear.

What opposition can your rival bring, ²⁵⁰

While Sanhedrims are jealous of the king?
His strength as yet in David's friendship lies,

And what can David's self without supplies?

Who with exclusive bills must now dispense,

Debar the heir, or starve in his defense;
Conditions which our elders ne'er will quit,
And David's justice never can admit.

Or, forc'd by wants his brother to betray,
To your ambition next he clears the way;
For if succession once to naught they bring, ²⁶⁰

Their next advance removes the present king:

Persisting else his senates to dissolve,
In equal hazard shall his reign involve.

Our tribes, whom Pharaoh's pow'r so much alarms,

Shall rise without their prince t' oppose his arms;

Nor boots it on what cause at first they join,

Their troops, once up, are tools for our design.

At least such subtle covenants shall be made,

Till peace itself is war in masquerade.

Associations of mysterious sense, ²⁷⁰
Against, but seeming for, the king's defense,

Ev'n on their courts of justice fetters draw,
And from our agents muzzle up their law.
By which a conquest if we fail to make,
'T is a drawn game at worst, and we secure our stake."

He said, and for the dire success depends
On various sects, by common guilt made friends,

Whose heads, tho' ne'er so diff'ring in their creed,

I' th' point of treason yet were well agreed.

'Mongst these, extorting Ishban first appears, ²⁸⁰

Pursued b' a meager troop of bankrupt heirs.

Blest times, when Ishban, he whose occupation

So long has been to cheat, reforms the nation!

Ishban of conscience suited to his trade,

As good a saint as usurer e'er made.

Yet Mammon has not so engross'd him quite,

But Belial lays as large a claim of spite;
Who, for those pardons from his prince he draws,

Returns reproaches, and cries up the cause.

That year in which the city he did sway, ²⁹⁰

He left rebellion in a hopeful way.

Yet his ambition once was found so bold,

To offer talents of extorted gold;

Could David's wants have so been brib'd to shame

And scandalize our peerage with his name;

For which, his dear sedition he'd forswear,

And e'en turn loyal to be made a peer.

Next him, let railing Rabsheka have place,

So full of zeal he has no need of grace;

A saint that can both flesh and spirit use, ³⁰⁰

Alike haunt conventicles and the stews:

Of whom the question difficult appears,

If most i' th' preachers' or the bawds' arrears.

What caution could appear too much in him

That keeps the treasure of Jerusalem!

Let David's brother but approach the town,

"Double our guards," he cries, "we are undone."

Protesting that he dares not sleep in 's bed,

Lest he should rise next morn without his head.

Next these, a troop of busy spirits press,

Of little fortunes, and of conscience less; ³¹¹

With them the tribe, whose luxury had drain'd

Their banks, in former sequestrations gain'd;

Who rich and great by past rebellions grew,

And long to fish the troubled streams anew.

Some future hopes, some present payment draws,

To sell their conscience and espouse the cause.

Such stipends those vile hirelings best befit,
Priests without grace, and poets without wit.

Shall that false Hebronite escape our curse,
Judas, that keeps the rebels' pension-purse;
Judas, that pays the treason-writer's fee,
Judas, that well deserves his namesake's tree;

Who at Jerusalem's own gates erects
His college for a nursery of sects;
Young prophets with an early care secures,
And with the dung of his own arts manures!
What have the men of Hebron here to do?
What part in Israel's promis'd land have you?

Here Phaleg, the lay Hebronite, is come, 330
'Cause like the rest he could not live at home;

Who from his own possessions could not drain

An omer even of Hebronitish grain,
Here struts it like a patriot, and talks high
Of injur'd subjects, alter'd property;
An emblem of that buzzing insect just,
That mounts the wheel, and thinks she raises dust.

Can dry bones live? or skeletons produce
The vital warmth of cuckoldizing juice?
Slim Phaleg could, and at the table fed, 340
Return'd the grateful product to the bed.

A waiting-man to trav'ling nobles chose,
He his own laws would saucily impose,
Till bastinado'd back again he went,
To learn those manners he to teach was sent.
Chastis'd, he ought to have retreated home,
But he reads politics to Absalom;

For never Hebronite, tho' kick'd and scorn'd,

To his own country willingly return'd.
— But leaving famish'd Phaleg to be fed,
And to talk treason for his daily bread, 351
Let Hebron, nay, let hell produce a man
So made for mischief as Ben-Jochanan.

A Jew of humble parentage was he,
By trade a Levite, tho' of low degree:
His pride no higher than the desk aspir'd,
But for the drudgery of priests was hir'd
To read and pray in linen ephod brave,
And pick up single shekels from the grave.
Married at last, and finding charge come faster, 360

He could not live by God, but chang'd his master;

Inspir'd by want, was made a factious tool,
They got a villain, and we lost a fool:

Still violent, whatever cause he took,
But most against the party he forsook;
For renegadoes, who ne'er turn by halves,
Are bound in conscience to be double knaves.

So this prose-prophet took most monstrous pains

To let his masters see he earn'd his gains.
But as the Dev'l owes all his imps a shame, 370

He chose th' Apostate for his proper theme;

With little pains he made the picture true,
And from reflection took the rogue he drew:

A wondrous work, to prove the Jewish nation

In every age a murmuring generation;
To trace 'em from their infancy of sinning,
And shew 'em factious from their first beginning;

To prove they could rebel, and rail, and mock,

Much to the credit of the chosen flock;
A strong authority, which must convince,
That saints own no allegiance to their prince; 381

As 't is a leading card to make a whore,
To prove her mother had turn'd up before.
But, tell me, did the drunken patriarch bless

The son that shew'd his father's nakedness?

Such thanks the present Church thy pen will give,

Which proves rebellion was so primitive.
Must ancient failings be examples made?
Then murderers from Cain may learn their trade.

As thou the heathen and the saint hast drawn, 390

Methinks th' Apostate was the better man;
And thy hot father, (waiving my respect,)
Not of a mother church, but of a sect.
And such he needs must be of thy inditing;
This comes of drinking asses' milk and writing.

If Balak should be call'd to leave his place,

(As profit is the loudest call of grace,)
His temple dispossess'd of one, would be Replenish'd with seven devils more by thee.

Levi, thou art a load, I'll lay thee down, ⁴⁰⁰
 And shew rebellion bare, without a gown;
 Poor slaves in meter, dull and addle-pated,
 Who rhyme below ev'n David's psalms translated;
 Some in my speedy pace I must outrun,
 As lame Mephibosheth the wizard's son;
 To make quick way I'll leap o'er heavy blocks,
 Shun rotten Uzza, as I would the pox
 And hasten Og and Doeg to rehearse,
 Two fools that crutch their feeble sense on
 verse;
 Who, by my Muse, to all succeeding times ⁴¹⁰
 Shall live, in spite of their own dogg'rel
 rhymes.
 Doeg, tho' without knowing how or why,
 Made still a blund'ring kind of melody;
 Spurr'd boldly on, and dash'd thro' thick and thin,
 Thro' sense and nonsense, never out nor in;
 Free from all meaning, whether good or bad,
 And, in one word, heroically mad:
 He was too warm on picking-work to dwell,
 But fagoted his notions as they fell,
 And if they rhym'd and rattled, all was well. ⁴²⁰
 Spiteful he is not, tho' he wrote a satire,
 For still there goes some thinking to ill-nature:
 He needs no more than birds and beasts to
 think;
 All his occasions are to eat and drink.
 If he call rogue and rascal from a garret,
 He means you no more mischief than a parrot;
 The words for friend and foe alike were
 made,
 To fetter 'em in verse is all his trade.
 For almonds he'll cry whore to his own mother;
 And call young Absalom King David's brother. ⁴³⁰
 Let him be gallows-free by my consent,
 And nothing suffer, since he nothing meant;
 Hanging supposes human soul and reason,
 This animal's below committing treason.
 Shall he be hang'd who never could rebel?
 That's a preferment for Achitophel.
 The woman that committed buggary.
 Was rightly sentenc'd by the law to die;

But 't was hard fate that to the gallows led
 The dog that never heard the statute read. ⁴⁴⁰
 Railing in other men may be a crime,
 But ought to pass for mere instinct in him:
 Instinct he follows, and no farther knows,
 For to write verse with him is to *trans-
 prose*.
 'T were pity treason at his door to lay,
 Who makes heaven's gate a lock to its own key:
 Let him rail on, let his invective Muse
 Have four and twenty letters to abuse,
 Which if he jumbles to one line of sense,
 Indict him of a capital offense. ⁴⁵⁰
 In fireworks give him leave to vent his
 spite,
 Those are the only serpents he can write;
 The height of his ambition is, we know,
 But to be master of a puppet show:
 On that one stage his works may yet ap-
 pear,
 And a month's harvest keeps him all the
 year.
 Now stop your noses, readers, all and some,
 For here's a tun of midnight work to
 come,
 Og, from a treason-tavern rolling home. }
 Round as a globe, and liquor'd ev'ry chink, ⁴⁶⁰
 Goodly and great he sails behind his link.
 With all this bulk there's nothing lost in Og,
 For ev'ry inch that is not fool is rogue:
 A monstrous mass of foul corrupted matter,
 As all the devils had spew'd to make the batter.
 When wine has given him courage to blaspheme,
 He curses God, but God before curs'd him;
 And if man could have reason, none has
 more,
 That made his paunch so rich, and him so
 poor.
 With wealth he was not trusted, for Heav'n knew ⁴⁷⁰
 What 't was of old to pamper up a Jew;
 To what would he on quail and pheasant
 swell,
 That ev'n on tripe and carrion could rebel?
 But tho' Heav'n made him poor, (with rev'rence speaking.)
 He never was a poet of God's making.
 The midwife laid her hand on his thick skull,

With this prophetic blessing: Be thou dull ;
 Drink, swear, and roar, forbear no lewd
 delight

Fit for thy bulk, do anything but write:
 Thou art of lasting make, like thoughtless
 men, 480

A strong nativity — but for the pen;
 Eat opium, mingle arsenic in thy drink,
 Still thou mayst live, avoiding pen and ink.
 I see, I see, 't is counsel given in vain,
 For treason botch'd in rhyme will be thy bane;

Rhyme is the rock on which thou art to wreck,

'T is fatal to thy fame and to thy neck:
 Why should thy meter good King David
 blast ?

A psalm of his will surely be thy last.
 Dar'st thou presume in verse to meet thy
 foes, 490

Thou whom the penny pamphlet foil'd in prose ?

Doeg, whom God for mankind's mirth has
 made,

O'ertops thy talent in thy very trade;
 Doeg to thee, thy paintings are so coarse,
 A poet is, tho' he's the poets' horse.

A double noose thou on thy neck dost pull,
 For writing treason, and for writing dull;
 To die for faction is a common evil,
 But to be hang'd for nonsense is the devil:
 Hadst thou the glories of thy king ex-
 press'd, 500

Thy praises had been satire at the best;
 But thou in clumsy verse, unlick'd, un-pointed,

Hast shamefully defied the Lord's anointed:

I will not rake the dunghill of thy crimes,
 For who would read thy life that reads
 thy rhymes ?

But of King David's foes, be this the doom,
 May all be like the young man Absalom;
 And for my foes may this their blessing be,
 To talk like Doeg, and to write like thee.

Achitophel each rank, degree, and age, 510
 For various ends, neglects not to engage;
 The wise and rich for purse and counsel
 brought,

The fools and beggars for their number
 sought:

Who yet not only on the town depends,
 For ev'n in court the faction had its friends;
 These thought the places they possess'd too small,

And in their hearts wish'd court and king
 to fall:

Whose names the Muse disdaining, holds i'
 th' dark,

Thrust in the villain herd without a mark;
 With parasites and libel-spawning imps, 520 Intriguing fops, dull jesters, and worse pimps.

Disdain the rascal rabble to pursue,
 Their set cabals are yet a viler crew;
 See where involv'd in common smoke they
 sit,

Some for our mirth, some for our satire fit:
 These gloomy, thoughtful, and on mischief
 bent,

While those for mere good-fellowship frequent

Th' appointed club, can let sedition pass, Sense, nonsense, anything t' employ the glass; 529

And who believe, in their dull honest hearts,
 The rest talk treason but to shew their parts;
 Who ne'er had wit or will for mischief
 yet,

But pleas'd to be reputed of a set.

But in the sacred annals of our Plot,
 Industrious Arod never be forgot:
 The labors of this midnight-magistrate
 May vie with Corah's to preserve the State.
 In search of arms he fail'd not to lay hold
 On war's most powerful dang'rous weapon,
 GOLD. 530

And last, to take from Jebusites all odds,
 Their altars pillag'd, stole their very gods.
 Oft would he cry, when treasure he surpris'd:

"'T is Baalish gold in David's coin dis-guis'd."

Which to his house with richer relicts came,
 While lumber idols only fed the flame;
 For our wise rabble ne'er took pains t' en-
 quire,

What 't was he burnt, so 't made a rousing
 fire.

With which our elder was enrich'd no more Than false Gehazi with the Syrian's store;
 So poor, that when our choosing-tribes were met, 550

Ev'n for his stinking votes he ran in debt;
 For meat the wicked, and as authors think,
 The saints he chous'd for his electing drink;
 Thus ev'ry shift and subtle method pass'd,
 And all to be no Zaken at the last.

Now, rais'd on Tyre's sad ruins, Pharaoh's pride

Soar'd high, his legions threat'ning far and wide;

As when a batt'ring storm ingender'd high,
By winds upheld, hangs hov'ring in the sky,
Is gaz'd upon by ev'ry trembling swain, ⁵⁶⁰
This for his vineyard fears, and that his grain;

For blooming plants, and flow'rs new opening; these

For lambs ean'd lately, and far-lab'ring bees:

To guard his stock each to the gods does call,
Uncertain where the fire-charg'd clouds will fall:

Ev'n so the doubtful nations watch his arms,
With terror each expecting his alarms.

Where, Judah, where was now thy lion's roar ?

Thou only couldst the captive lands restore;
But thou, with inbred broils and faction press'd, ⁵⁷⁰

From Egypt need'st a guardian with the rest:

Thy prince from Sanhedrims no trust allow'd,

Too much the representers of the crowd,
Who for their own defense give no supply,
But what the crown's prerogatives must buy;

As if their monarch's rights to violate
More needful were than to preserve the State !

From present dangers they divert their care,

And all their fears are of the royal heir;
Whom now the reigning malice of his foes
Unjudg'd would sentence, and ere crown'd depose. ⁵⁸¹

Religion the pretense, but their decree
To bar his reign, whate'er his faith shall be !
By Sanhedrims and clam'rous crowds thus press'd,

What passions rent the righteous David's breast !

Who knows not how t' oppose, or to comply;
Unjust to grant, and dangerous to deny !
How near in this dark juncture Israel's fate,
Whose peace one sole expedient could create, ⁵⁸⁹

Which yet th' extremest virtue did require,
Ev'n of that prince whose downfall they conspire !

His absence David does with tears advise,
T' appease their rage; undaunted he complies.

Thus he, who, prodigal of blood and ease,
A royal life expos'd to winds and seas,
At once contending with the waves and fire,
And heading danger in the wars of Tyre,
Inglorious now forsakes his native sand,
And like an exile quits the promis'd land !
Our monarch scarce from pressing tears refrains, ⁶⁰⁰

And painfully his royal state maintains,
Who now embracing on th' extremest shore
Almost revokes what he injoin'd before:
Concludes at last more trust to be allow'd
To storms and seas than to the raging crowd !

Forbear, rash Muse, the parting scene to draw,

With silence charm'd as deep as theirs that saw !

Not only our attending nobles weep,
But hardy sailors swell with tears the deep !
The tide restrain'd her course, and, more amaz'd, ⁶¹⁰

The twin-stars on the royal brothers gaz'd:
While this sole fear —

Does trouble to our suff'ring hero bring,
Lest next the popular rage oppress the king !
Thus parting, each for th' other's danger griev'd,

The shore the king, and seas the prince receive'd.

Go, injur'd hero, while propitious gales,
Soft as thy consort's breath, inspire thy sails;

Well may she trust her beauties on a flood
Where thy triumphant fleets so oft have rode ! ⁶²⁰

Safe on thy breast reclin'd, her rest be deep,
Rock'd like a Nereid by the waves asleep;
While happiest dreams her fancy entertain,
And to Elysian fields convert the main !

Go, injur'd hero, while the shores of Tyre
At thy approach so silent shall admire,
Who on thy thunder still their thoughts employ,

And greet thy landing with a trembling joy.
On heroes thus the prophet's fate is thrown,

Admir'd by ev'ry nation but their own; ⁶³⁰
Yet while our factious Jews his worth deny,
Their aching conscience gives their tongue the lie.

Ev'n in the worst of men the noblest parts
Confess him, and he triumphs in their hearts,
Whom to his king the best respects commend

Of subject, soldier, kinsman, prince, and friend;

All sacred names of most divine esteem,
And to perfection all sustain'd by him,
Wise, just, and constant, courtly without art,

Swift to discern and to reward desert; 640
No hour of his in fruitless ease destroy'd,
But on the noblest subjects still employ'd;
Whose steady soul ne'er learnt to separate
Between his monarch's int'rest and the State,
But heaps those blessings on the royal head,

Which he well knows must be on subjects shed.

On what pretense could then the vulgar rage

Against his worth, and native rights engage?

Religious fears their argument are made,
Religious fears his sacred rights invade! 650
Of future superstition they complain,
And Jebusitic worship in his reign:

With such alarms his foes the crowd deceive,
With dangers fright, which not themselves believe.

Since nothing can our sacred rites remove,

Whate'er the faith of the successor prove;
Our Jews their ark shall undisturb'd retain,

At least while their religion is their gain,
Who know by old experience Baal's commands

Not only claim'd their conscience, but their lands: 660

They grutch God's tythes, how therefore shall they yield

An idol full possession of the field?

Grant such a prince enthron'd, we must confess

The people's suff'rings than that monarch's less,

Who must to hard conditions still be bound,
And for his quiet with the crowd compound;

Or should his thoughts to tyranny incline,
Where are the means to compass the design?

Our crown's revenues are too short a store,
And jealous Sanhedrims would give no more. 670

As vain our fears of Egypt's potent aid;
Not so has Pharaoh learnt ambition's trade,

Nor ever with such measures can comply,
As shock the common rules of policy.

None dread like him the growth of Israel's king,

And he alone sufficient aids can bring;
Who knows that prince to Egypt can give law,

That on our stubborn tribes his yoke could draw.

At such profound expense he has not stood,
Nor dyed for this his hands so deep in blood; 680

Would ne'er thro' wrong and right his progress take,

Grudge his own rest, and keep the world awake,

To fix a lawless prince on Judah's throne,
First to invade our rights and then his own;

His dear-gain'd conquests cheaply to despoil,

And reap the harvest of his crimes and toil.
We grant his wealth vast as our ocean's sand,

And curse its fatal influence on our land,
Which our brib'd Jews so num'rously per-take,

That ev'n an host his pensioners would make. 690

From these deceivers our divisions spring,
Our weakness, and the growth of Egypt's king;

These with pretended friendship to the State,

Our crowd's suspicion of their prince create,
Both pleas'd and frighten'd with the specious cry

To guard their sacred rights and property.
To ruin, thus, the chosen flock are sold,
While wolves are ta'en for guardians of the fold;

Seduc'd by these, we groundlessly complain,

And loathe the manna of a gentle reign: 700
Thus our forefathers' crooked paths are trod,

We trust our prince no more than they their God.

But all in vain our reasoning prophets preach

To those whom sad experience ne'er could teach,

Who can commence new broils in bleeding scars,

And fresh remembrance of intestine wars;

When the same, household mortal foes did
 yield,
 And brothers stain'd with brothers' blood
 the field;
 When sons' curst steel the fathers' gore did
 stain,
 And mothers mourn'd for sons by fathers slain ! ⁷¹⁰
 When thick as Egypt's locusts on the sand,
 Our tribes lay slaughter'd thro' the promis'd
 land,
 Whose few survivors with worse fate re-
 main,
 To drag the bondage of a tyrant's reign:
 Which scene of woes, unknowing, we re-
 new,
 And madly ev'n those ills we fear pursue;
 While Pharaoh laughs at our domestic broils,
 And safely crowds his tents with nations'
 spoils.
 Yet our fierce Sanhedrim, in restless rage,
 Against our absent hero still engage, ⁷²⁰
 And chiefly urge (such did their frenzy prove)
 The only suit their prince forbids to move,
 Which till obtain'd, they cease affairs of
 state,
 And real dangers waive for groundless
 hate.
 Long David's patience waits relief to bring,
 With all th' indulgence of a lawful king, Expecting till the troubled waves would
 cease,
 But found the raging billows still increase.
 The crowd, whose insolence forbearance
 swells,
 While he forgives too far, almost rebels. ⁷³⁰
 At last his deep resentments silence broke,
 Th' imperial palace shook, while thus he spoke:
 "Then Justice wake, and Rigor take her
 time,
 For lo! our mercy is become our crime.
 While halting Punishment her stroke delays,
 Our sov'reign right, Heav'n's sacred trust,
 decays;
 For whose support ev'n subjects' interest
 calls —
 Woe to that kingdom where the monarch falls!
 That prince who yields the least of regal
 sway,
 So far his people's freedom does betray. ⁷⁴⁰

Right lives by law, and law subsists by
 pow'r;
 Disarm the shepherd, wolves the flock de-
 vour.
 Hard lot of empire o'er a stubborn race,
 Which Heav'n itself in vain has tried with
 grace!
 When will our reason's long-charm'd eyes
 unclose,
 And Israel judge between her friends and
 foes?
 When shall we see expir'd deceivers' sway,
 And credit what our God and monarchs say?
 Dissembled patriots, brib'd with Egypt's
 gold,
 Ev'n Sanhedrims in blind obedience hold; ⁷⁵⁰
 Those patriots' falsehood in their actions
 see,
 And judge by the pernicious fruit the tree:
 If aught for which so loudly they declaim,
 Religion, laws, and freedom, were their aim;
 Our senates in due methods they had led,
 T' avoid those mischiefs which they seem'd to dread;
 But first ere yet they propp'd the sinking
 State,
 T' impeach and charge, as urg'd by private
 hate,
 Proves that they ne'er believ'd the fears
 they press'd, ⁷⁵⁹
 But barb'rously destroy'd the nation's rest!
 O! whither will ungovern'd senates drive,
 And to what bounds licentious votes arrive?
 When their injustice we are press'd to share,
 The monarch urg'd t' exclude the lawful
 heir;
 Are princes thus distinguish'd from the
 crowd,
 And this the privilege of royal blood?
 But grant we should confirm the wrongs
 they press,
 His sufferings yet were than the people's
 less;
 Condemn'd for life the murd'ring sword to wield,
 And on their heirs entail a bloody field: ⁷⁷⁰
 Thus madly their own freedom they betray,
 And for th' oppression which they fear
 make way;
 Succession fix'd by Heav'n, the kingdom's
 bar,
 Which once dissolv'd, admits the flood of
 war;
 Waste, rapine, spoil, without th' assault
 begin,

And our mad tribes supplant the fence
 within.
 Since then their good they will not under-
 stand,
 'Tis time to take the monarch's pow'r in
 hand;
 Authority and force to join with skill,
 And save the lunatics against their will. 780
 The same rough means that swage the crowd, appease
 Our senates raging with the crowd's disease.
 Henceforth unbias'd measures let 'em draw From no false gloss, but genuine text of
 law;
 Nor urge those crimes upon religion's score,
 Themselves so much in Jebusites abhor.
 Whom laws convict, (and only they,) shall bleed,
 Nor Pharisees by Pharisees be freed.
 Impartial justice from our throne shall show'r,
 All shall have right, and we our sov'reign
 pow'r." 790
 He said, th' attendants heard with awful
 joy,
 And glad presages their fix'd thoughts im-
 ploy;
 From Hebron now the suffering heir re-
 turn'd,
 A realm that long with civil discord
 mourn'd,
 Till his approach, like some arriving god,
 Compos'd and heal'd the place of his abode;
 The deluge check'd that to Judea spread,
 And stopp'd sedition at the fountain's head.
 Thus in forgiving David's paths he drives,
 And chas'd from Israel, Israel's peace contrives. 800
 The field confess'd his pow'r in arms be-
 fore,
 And seas proclaim'd his triumphs to the
 shore;
 As nobly has his sway in Hebron shown,
 How fit t' inherit godlike David's throne.
 Thro' Zion's streets his glad arrival's spread,
 And conscious Faction shrinks her snaky
 head;
 His train their sufferings think o'erpaid, to
 see
 The crowd's applause with virtue once agree.
 Success charms all, but zeal for worth distress'd,
 A virtue proper to the brave and best; 810
 'Mongst whom was Jothran, Jothran always
 bent

To serve the crown, and loyal by descent,
 Whose constancy so firm, and conduct just,
 Deserv'd at once two royal masters' trust;
 Who Tyre's proud arms had manfully with-
 stood
 On seas, and gather'd laurels from the flood;
 Of learning yet no portion was denied,
 Friend to the Muses, and the Muses' pride.
 Nor can Benaiah's worth forgotten lie,
 Of steady soul when public storms were
 high; 820
 Whose conduct, while the Moor fierce on-sets made,
 Secur'd at once our honor and our trade.
 Such were the chiefs who most his suff'rings
 mourn'd,
 And view'd with silent joy the prince re-
 turn'd;
 While those that sought his absence to be-
 tray,
 Press first their nauseous false respects to
 pay;
 Him still th' officious hypocrites molest,
 And with malicious duty break his rest.
 While real transports thus his friends
 employ,
 And foes are loud in their dissembled joy, 830
 His triumphs, so resounded far and near,
 Miss'd not his young ambitious rival's ear;
 And as when joyful hunters' clam'rous train
 Some slumb'ring lion wakes in Moab's plain,
 Who oft had fore'd the bold assailants
 yield,
 And scatter'd his pursuers thro' the field,
 Disdaining, furls his mane and tears the
 ground,
 His eyes enflaming all the desert round,
 With roar of seas directs his chasers' way, Provokes from far, and dares them to the fray; 840
 Such rage storm'd now in Absalom's fierce
 breast,
 Such indignation his fir'd eyes confess'd.
 Where now was the instructor of his pride?
 Slept the old pilot in so rough a tide,
 Whose wiles had from the happy shore be-
 tray'd,
 And thus on shelves the cred'lous youth
 convey'd?
 In deep revolving thoughts he weighs his
 state,
 Secure of craft, nor doubts to baffle fate;
 At least, if his storm'd bark must go adrift,
 To balk his charge, and for himself to shift, 850

In which his dext'rous wit had oft been
shown,
And in the wreck of kingdoms sav'd his
own;
But now with more than common danger
press'd,
Of various resolutions stands possess'd,
Perceives the crowd's unstable zeal decay,
Lest their recanting chief the cause betray,
Who on a father's grace his hopes may
ground,
And for his pardon with their heads compound.
Him therefore, ere his Fortune slip her time,
The statesman plots t' engage in some bold
crime 860
Past pardon, whether to attempt his bed,
Or threat with open arms the royal head,
Or other daring method, and unjust,
That may confirm him in the people's trust.
But failing thus t' ensnare him, nor secure
How long his foil'd ambition may endure,
Plots next to lay him by, as past his date,
And try some new pretender's luckier fate;
Whose hopes with equal toil he would pursue,
Nor cares what claimer's crown'd, except
the true. 870
Wake, Absalom, approaching ruin shun,
And see, O see, for whom thou art undone !
How are thy honors and thy fame betray'd,
The property of desp'rate villains made !
Lost pow'r and conscious fears their crimes create,
And guilt in them was little less than fate;
But why shouldst thou, from ev'ry grievance free,
Forsake thy vineyards for their stormy sea ?
For thee did Canaan's milk and honey flow ;
Love dress'd thy bow'rs, and laurels sought thy brow ; 880
Preferment, wealth, and pow'r thy vassals were,
And of a monarch all things but the care.
O should our crimes, again, that curse draw
down,
And rebel arms once more attempt the
crown,
Sure ruin waits unhappy Absalon,
Alike by conquest or defeat undone !
Who could relentless see such youth and
charms
Expire with wretched fate in impious arms :
A prince so form'd, with earth's and heav'n's applause,

To triumph o'er crown'd heads in David's
cause ? 890
Or grant him victor, still his hopes must
fail,
Who, conquering, would not for himself
prevail ;
The faction, whom he trusts for future
sway,
Him and the public would alike betray ;
Amongst themselves divide the captive
State,
And found their hydra-empire in his fate !
Thus having beat the clouds with painful
flight,
The pitied youth, with scepters in his sight,
(So have their cruel politics decreed,) Must by that crew that made him guilty
bleed ! 900
For, could their pride brook any prince's
sway,
Whom but mild David would they choose t' obey ?
Who once at such a gentle reign repine,
The fall of monarchy itself design ;
From hate to that their reformations spring,
And David not their grievance, but the
king.
Seiz'd now with panic fear the faction
lies,
Lest this clear truth strike Absalom's charm'd eyes ;
Lest he perceive, from long enchantment
free,
What all beside the flatter'd youth must
see. 910
But whate'er doubts his troubled bosom
swell,
Fair carriage still became Achitophel ;
Who now an envious festival enstalls,
And to survey their strength the faction
calls,
Which fraud, religious worship too must gild —
But O how weakly does sedition build !
For lo ! the royal mandate issues forth, Dashing at once their treason, zeal, and mirth !
So have I seen disastrous chance invade,
Where careful emmets had their forage
laid, 920
Whether fierce Vulcan's rage the furzy
plain
Had seiz'd, engender'd by some careless
swain ;
Or swelling Neptune lawless inroads made,

And to their cell of store his flood convey'd;

The commonwealth broke up, distracted go,
And in wild haste their loaded mates o'er-throw:

Ev'n so our scatter'd guests confus'dly meet

With boil'd, bak'd, roast, all justling in the street;

Dejected all, and ruefully dismay'd,
For shekel, without treat, or treason paid. ⁹³⁰

Sedition's dark eclipse now fainter shows,
More bright each hour the royal planet grows,

Of force the clouds of envy to disperse,

In kind conjunction of assisting stars.

Here, lab'ring Muse, those glorious chiefs relate

That turn'd the doubtful scale of David's fate;

The rest of that illustrious band rehearse,

Immortaliz'd in laurel'd Asaph's verse:

Hard task! yet will not I thy flight recall,
View heav'n, and then enjoy thy glorious fall. ⁹⁴⁰

First write Bezaliel, whose illustrious name

Forestalls our praise, and gives his poet fame.

The Kenites' rocky province his command,

A barren limb of fertile Canaan's land;

Which for its gen'rous natives yet could be Held worthy such a president as he!

Bezaliel with each grace and virtue fraught;

Serene his looks, serene his life and thought;

On whom so largely Nature heap'd her store,

There scarce remain'd for arts to give him more! ⁹⁵⁰

To aid the Crown and State his greatest zeal,

His second care that service to conceal;

Of dues observant, firm in ev'ry trust,

And to the needy always more than just;

Who truth from specious falsehood can divide,

Has all the gownmen's skill without their pride;

Thus crown'd with worth from heights of honor won,

Sees all his glories copied in his son,

Whose forward fame should every Muse engage;

Whose youth boasts skill denied to others' age. ⁹⁶⁰

Men, manners, language, books of noblest kind,

Already are the conquest of his mind.

Whose loyalty before its date was prime;

Nor waited the dull course of rolling time:

The monster faction early he dismay'd,

And David's cause long since confess'd his aid.

Brave Abdael o'er the prophets' school was plac'd;

Abdael with all his father's virtue grac'd;

A hero, who, while stars look'd wond'ring down,

Without one Hebrew's blood restor'd the crown. ⁹⁷⁰

That praise was his; what therefore did remain

For following chiefs, but boldly to maintain

That crown restor'd; and in this rank of fame,

Brave Abdael with the first a place must claim.

Proceed, illustrious, happy chief, proceed,

Foreseize the garlands for thy brow decreed,

While th' inspir'd tribe attend with noblest strain

To register the glories thou shalt gain:

For sure the dew shall Gilboah's hills forsake,

And Jordan mix his stream with Sodom's lake; ⁹⁸⁰

Or seas retir'd their secret stores disclose,

And to the sun their scaly brood expose,

Or swell'd above the cliffs their billows raise,

Before the Muses leave their patron's praise.

Eliab our next labor does invite,

And hard the task to do Eliab right:

Long with the royal wanderer he rovd,

And firm in all the turns of fortune prov'd!

Such ancient service and desert so large,

Well claim'd the royal household for his charge. ⁹⁹⁰

His age with only one mild heiress blest,

In all the bloom of smiling nature dress'd,

And blest again to see his flow'r allied

To David's stock, and made young Othniel's bride!

The bright restorer of his father's youth,

Devoted to a son's and subject's truth:

Resolv'd to bear that prize of duty home,

So bravely sought (while sought) by Absalom.

Ah prince! th' illustrious planet of thy
birth,
And thy more powerful virtue guard thy worth; 1000
That no Achitophel thy ruin boast:
Israel too much in one such wreck has
lost.

Ev'n envy must consent to Helon's worth,
Whose soul (tho' Egypt glories in his birth)
Could for our captive ark its zeal retain,
And Pharaoh's altars in their pomp disdain:
To slight his gods was small; with nobler
pride,
He all th' allurements of his court defied:
Whom profit nor example could betray,
But Israel's friend, and true to David's
sway. 1010

What acts of favor in his province fall,
On merit he confers, and freely all.

Our list of nobles next let Amri grace,
Whose merits claim'd the Abbethdin's high
place;

Who, with a loyalty that did excel,
Brought all th' endowments of Achitophel.
Sincere was Amri, and not only knew,
But Israel's sanctions into practice drew;
Our laws, that did a boundless ocean
seem,

Were coasted all, and fathom'd all by him.
No rabbin speaks like him their mystic
sense, 1021

So just, and with such charms of eloquence:
To whom the double blessing does belong,
With Moses' inspiration, Aaron's tongue.

Than Sheva none more loyal zeal have
shown,

Wakeful as Judah's lion for the crown,
Who for that cause still combats in his age,
For which his youth with danger did engage.

In vain our factious priests the cant revive;

In vain seditious scribes with libel strive T' enflame the crowd, while he with watchful eye 1031

Observes, and shoots their treasons as they
fly;

Their weekly frauds his keen replies detect;

He undeceives more fast than they infect.
So Moses, when the pest on legions prey'd, Advanc'd his signal, and the plague was stay'd.

Once more, my fainting Muse, thy pinions
try,

And strength's exhausted store let love supply.

What tribute, Asaph, shall we render thee?
We'll crown thee with a wreath from thy own tree! 1040

Thy laurel grove no envy's flash can blast;
The song of Asaph shall for ever last!
With wonder late posterity shall dwell
On Absalom and false Achitophel:

Thy strains shall be our slumb'ring prophets' dream;

And, when our Sion virgins sing, their
theme.

Our jubilees shall with thy verse be grac'd;
The song of Asaph shall for ever last!

How fierce his satire loos'd; restrain'd, how tame;

How tender of th' offending young man's
fame! 1050

How well his worth, and brave adventures
styl'd;

Just to his virtues, to his error mild.

No page of thine that fears the strictest
view,

But teems with just reproof, or praise as
due;

Not Eden could a fairer prospect yield,
All paradise without one barren field:

Whose wit the censure of his foes has
pass'd;

The song of Asaph shall for ever last!

What praise for such rich strains shall we allow?

What just rewards the grateful crown bestow? 1060

While bees in flow'rs rejoice, and flow'rs in
dew,

While stars and fountains to their course
are true;

While Judah's throne and Sion's rock stand
fast,

The song of Asaph and the fame shall
last.

Still Hebron's honor'd happy soil retains

Our royal hero's beauteous dear remains;
Who now sails off, with winds nor wishes
slack,

To bring his suff'rings' bright companion
back.

But ere such transport can our sense employ,

A bitter grief must poison half our joy; 1070
Nor can our coasts restor'd those blessings
see

Without a bribe to envious destiny !
Curs'd Sodom's doom for ever fix the tide
Where by inglorious chance the valiant
died !

Give not insulting Askalon to know, Nor let Gath's daughters triumph in our
woe !

No sailor with the news swell Egypt's pride,
By what inglorious fate our valiant died !
Weep, Arnon ! Jordan, weep thy fountains
dry,

While Sion's rock dissolves for a supply !
Calm were the elements, night's silence
deep, 1081

The waves scarce murm'ring, and the winds asleep;

Yet fate for ruin takes so still an hour,
And treacherous sands the princely bark de-
vour;

Then death unworthy seiz'd a gen'rous
race,

To virtue's scandal, and the stars' dis-
grace !

O ! had th' indulgent pow'rs vouchsaf'd to
yield,

Instead of faithless shelves, a listed field;
A listed field of Heav'n's and David's
foes,

Fierce as the troops that did his youth oppose, 1090

Each life had on his slaughter'd heap re-
tir'd,

Not tamely, and unconqu'ring thus expir'd:
But destiny is now their only foe,
And dying ev'n o'er that they triumph
too;

With loud last breaths their master's scape applaud,

Of whom kind force could scarce the fates
defraud,

Who for such followers lost (O matchless
mind !)

At his own safety now almost repin'd !
Say, royal sir, by all your fame in arms,
Your praise in peace, and by Urania's
charms; 1100

If all your suff'rings past so nearly press'd,
Or pierc'd with half so painful grief your
breast.

Thus some diviner Muse her hero forms,
Not sooth'd with soft delights, but toss'd in storms,

Not stretch'd on roses in the myrtle grove,
Nor crowns his days with mirth, his nights
with love;

But far remov'd, in thund'ring camps is
found,

His slumbers short, his bed the herbless
ground;

In tasks of danger always seen the first,
Feeds from the hedge, and slakes with ice
his thirst. 1110

Long must his patience strive with Fortune's
rage,

And long opposing gods themselves engage,

Must see his country flame, his friends destroy'd,

Before the promis'd empire be enjoy'd:
Such toil of fate must build a man of
fame,

And such, to Israel's crown, the godlike
David came.

What sudden beams dispel the clouds so
fast,

Whose drenching rains laid all our vineyards waste ?

The spring, so far behind her course delay'd, 1119

On th' instant is in all her bloom array'd;
The winds breathe low, the element serene;

Yet mark what motion in the waves is
seen;

Thronging and busy as Hyblæan swarms,
Or straggled soldiers summon'd to their
arms !

See where the princely bark, in loosest
pride,

With all her guardian fleet, adorns the
tide !

High on her deck the royal lovers stand,
Our crimes to pardon ere they touch'd our
land.

Welcome to Israel and to David's breast !
Here all your toils, here all your suff'rings
rest. 1130

This year did Ziloah rule Jerusalem,
And boldly all sedition's surges stem,
Howe'er incumber'd with a viler pair
Than Ziph or Shimei to assist the chair;
Yet Ziloah's loyal labors so prevail'd
That faction at the next election fail'd,
When ev'n the common cry did justice
sound,

And merit by the multitude was crown'd:
With David then was Israel's peace re-
stor'd,

Crowds mourn'd their error, and obey'd their lord. 1140

PROLOGUE AND EPILOGUE TO
THE KING AND QUEEN AT THE OPENING OF THEIR THEATER

[These two pieces, with heading on which the above is modeled, were published as a broadside in 1683. They were reprinted in the third edition, 1702, of Miscellany Poems, the First Part, the first of them having the title, A Prologue to the King and Queen, upon the Union of the two Companies in the year 1683 [sic].

In 1682 the King's Company and the Duke's Company, which had been rivals for over twenty years, joined their forces. The articles of union (reprinted in FitzGerald: A New History of the English Stage, 1882; vol. i, pp. 154-158) are dated May 14, 1682; but the united companies did not give their first representation until November 16 (Malone, I, 1, 120, on the authority of a note by Luttrell).]

PROLOGUE

SPOKEN BY MR. BETTERTON

SINCE faction ebbs, and rogues grow out of fashion,
Their penny scribes take care t' inform the
nation,
How well men thrive in this or that planta-
tion:

How Pennsylvania's air agrees with Quakers,
And Carolina's with Associators:
Both e'en too good for madmen and for traitors.

Truth is, our land with saints is so run
o'er,
And every age produces such a store,
That now there's need of two New Englands more.

"What's this," you'll say, "to us and our vocation?"
Only thus much, that we have left our station,
And made this theater our new plantation.

The factious natives never could agree;
But aiming, as they call'd it, to be free,
Those playhouse Whigs set up for property.

Some say they no obedience paid of late,
But would new fears and jealousies create,
Till topsy-turvy they had turn'd the State.

Plain sense, without the talent of foretell-
ing,
Might guess 't would end in downright knocks and quelling;
For seldom comes there better of rebelling.

When men will, needlessly, their freedom barter
For lawless pow'r, sometimes they catch a Tartar; (There's a damn'd word that rhymes to this, call'd Charter.)

But, since the victory with us remains,
You shall be call'd to twelve in all our gains;
(If you'll not think us saucy for our pains.)

Old men shall have good old plays to delight 'em;
And you, fair ladies and gallants, that slight
'em,
We'll treat with good new plays; if our new wits can write 'em.

We'll take no blund'ring verse, no fustian
tumor,
No dribbling love, from this or that presumer;
No dull fat fool shamm'd on the stage for humor.

For, faith, some of 'em such vile stuff have
made.
As none but fools or fairies ever play'd;
But 't was, as shopmen say, to force a trade.

We've giv'n you tragedies, all sense defy-
ing,
And singing men, in woful meter dying:
This 't is when heavy lubbers will be flying.

All these disasters we well hope to weather;
We bring you none of our old lumber
hether:
Whig poets and Whig sheriffs may hang together.

EPILOGUE

SPOKEN BY MR. SMITH

NEW ministers, when first they get in place, Must have a care to please; and that's our case:

Some laws for public welfare we design,
 If you, the power supreme, will please to join.
 There are a sort of prattlers in the pit,
 Who either have, or who pretend to wit:
 These noisy sirs so loud their parts rehearse,
 That oft the play is silenc'd by the farce.
 Let such be dumb, this penalty to shun,
 Each to be thought my lady's eldest son. 10
 But stay; methinks some vizard-mask I see
 Cast out her lure from the mid gallery:
 About her all the flutt'ring sparks are rang'd;
 The noise continues, tho' the scene is chang'd:
 Now growling, sputt'ring, wauling, such a clutter;
 'Tis just like puss defendant in a gutter.
 Fine love no doubt, but e'er two days are o'er ye,
 The surgeon will be told a woful story.
 Let vizard-mask her naked face expose,
 On pain of being thought to want a nose.
 Then for your lackeys, and your train beside, 21
 (By whate'er name or title dignified,) 21
 They roar so loud, you'd think behind the stairs
 Tom Dove, and all the brotherhood of bears:
 They're grown a nuisance, beyond all disasters;
 We've none so great but their unpaying masters.
 We beg you, sirs, to beg your men, that they Would please to give you leave to hear the play.
 Next, in the playhouse spare your precious lives;
 Think, like good Christians, on your bearns and wives; 30
 Think on your souls; but by your lugging forth,
 It seems you know how little they are worth.
 If none of these will move the warlike mind,
 Think on the helpless whore you leave behind!
 We beg you last, our scene-room to forbear,

And leave our goods and chattels to our care.

Alas, our women are but washy toys,
 And wholly taken up in stage employs:
 Poor willing tits they are; but yet I doubt

This double duty soon will wear 'em out.
 Then you are watch'd besides, with jealous care: 41

What if my lady's page should find you there?

My lady knows t'a tittle what there's in ye;

No passing your guilt shilling for a guinea.
 Thus, gentlemen, we have summ'd up in short

Our grievances, from country, town, and court:

Which humbly we submit to your good pleasure;

But first vote money, then redress at leisure.

PROLOGUE, EPILOGUES, AND SONG FROM THE DUKE OF GUISE

["In the year of his Majesty's happy Restoration," Dryden writes in his Vindication of The Duke of Guise, "the first play I undertook was The Duke of Guise, as the fairest way which the Act of Indemnity had then left us of setting forth the rise of the late rebellion. . . . As this was my first essay, so it met with the fortune of an unfinished piece; that is to say, it was damn'd in private, by the advice of some friends to whom I shew'd it; who freely told me that it was an excellent subject, but not so artificially wrought as they could have wish'd."

In 1682, at the request of Lee, Dryden accepted his aid in completing this play, which was ready for acting before midsummer, though, owing to objections from the government, the first performance did not take place until November 30 (Malone, I, 1, 120, probably on manuscript authority). As is obvious from the following pieces, The Duke of Guise was a political play, directed against the Whig party.

The prologue and the first of the two epilogues are assigned to Dryden in the first edition of the play, 1683. They were also printed in a broadside of the same date, which contains, in addition, the second epilogue. The song occurs early in the second scene of the fifth act, a portion of the play which Dryden claims as his own.]

PROLOGUE

SPOKEN BY MR. SMITH

OUR play's a parallel: the Holy League
 Begot our Cov'nant; Guisards got the Whig:
 Whate'er our hot-brain'd sheriffs did advance,
 Was, like our fashions, first produc'd in France;
 And when worn out, well-scourg'd, and banish'd there,
 Sent over, like their godly beggars here.
 Could the same trick, twice play'd, our nation gull?
 It looks as if the Devil were grown dull;
 Or serv'd us up, in scorn, his broken meat,
 And thought we were not worth a better
 cheat.
 The fulsome Cov'nant, one would think in reason,
 Had giv'n us all our bellies-full of trea-
 son;
 And yet, the name but chang'd, our nasty
 nation
 Chaws its own excrement, th' Association.
 'Tis true we have not learn'd their pois'n-
 ing way,
 For that's a mode but newly come in
 play;
 Besides, your drug's uncertain to prevail, }
 But your true Protestant can never fail, }
 With that compendious instrument, a flail. }
 Go on, and bite, ev'n tho' the hook lies
 bare:
 Twice in one age expel the lawful heir;
 Once more decide religion by the sword,
 And purchase for us a new tyrant lord.
 Pray for your king, but yet your purses
 spare;
 Make him not twopence richer by your prayer.
 To show you love him much, chastise him
 more,
 And make him very great, and very poor.
 Push him to wars, but still no pence advance;
 Let him lose England, to recover France.
 Cry freedom up with popular noisy votes,
 And get enough to cut each other's throats.
 Lop all the rights that fence your mon-
 arch's throne:
 For fear of too much pow'r, pray leave him
 none.

A noise was made of arbitrary sway;
 But, in revenge, you Whigs have found a
 way
 An arbitrary duty now to pay.
 Let his own servants turn, to save their stake;
 Glean from his plenty, and his wants for-
 sake;
 But let some Judas near his person stay,
 To swallow the last sop, and then betray.
 Make London independent of the Crown,
 A realm apart, the kingdom of the town.
 Let ignoramus juries find no traitors,
 And ignoramus poets scribble satires.
 And, that your meaning none may fail to scan,
 Do what in coffee-houses you began:
 Pull down the master, and set up the man.

EPILOGUE

SPOKEN BY MRS. COOKE

MUCH time and trouble this poor play has cost;
 And, faith, I doubted once the cause was
 lost.
 Yet no one man was meant, nor great nor
 small;
 Our poets, like frank gamesters, threw at all.
 They took no single aim —
 But, like bold boys, true to their prince and hearty,
 Huzza'd, and fir'd broadsides at the whole party.
 Duels are crimes; but, when the cause is
 right,
 In battle every man is bound to fight.
 For what should hinder me to sell my skin
 Dear as I could, if once my hand were in?
Se defendendo never was a sin.
 'Tis a fine world, my masters; right or wrong,
 The Whigs must talk, and Tories hold their
 tongue.
 They must do all they can —
 But we, forsooth, must bear a Christian
 mind,
 And fight, like boys, with one hand tied
 behind;
 Nay, and when one boy's down, 't were wondrous wise
 To cry: "Box fair, and give him time to
 rise."

When fortune favors, none but fools will dally: ²⁰
Would any of you sparks, if Nan or Mally
Tipp'd you th' inviting wink, stand, shall I, shall I?
A Trimmer cried, that heard me tell this story:
"Fie, Mistress Cooke! faith you're too
rank a Tory!
Wish not Whigs hang'd, but pity their hard cases;
You women love to see men make wry faces."
"Pray, sir," said I, "don't think me such a Jew;
I say no more, but give the Dev'l his due."
"Lenitives," says he, "suit best with our condition."
"Jack Ketch," says I, "'s an excellent physician." ³⁰
"I love no blood." — "Nor I, sir, as I breathe;
But hanging is a fine dry kind of death."
"We Trimmers are for holding all things even."
"Yes — just like him that hung 'twixt hell and heaven."
"Have we not had men's lives enow already?"
"Yes, sure, — but you're for holding all things steady.
Now since the weight hangs all on one side,
brother,
You Trimmers should, to poise it, hang on t'other."
Damn'd neuters, in their middle way of steering,
Are neither fish, nor flesh, nor good red herring: ⁴⁰
Not Whigs, nor Tories they; nor this, nor
that;
Not birds, nor beasts; but just a kind of bat:
A twilight animal, true to neither cause,
With Tory wings, but Whiggish teeth and claws.

ANOTHER EPILOGUE

INTENDED TO HAVE BEEN SPOKEN TO THE PLAY BEFORE IT WAS FORBIDDEN LAST SUMMER

Two houses join'd, two poets to a play?
You noisy Whigs will sure be pleas'd to-
day;

It looks so like two shrieves the city way.
But since our discords and divisions cease,
You, bilbo-gallants, learn to keep the peace;
Make here no tilts; let our poor stage
alone; }
Or if a decent murder must be done,
Pray take a civil turn to Marybone.
If not, I swear we'll pull up all our benches;
Not for your sakes, but for our orange-wenches: ¹⁰
For you thrust wide sometimes; and many a spark,
That misses one, can hit the other mark.
This makes our boxes full; for men of
sense
Pay their four shillings in their own defense,
That safe behind the ladies they may stay,
Peep o'er the fan, and judge the bloody
fray.
But other foes give beauty worse alarms;
The posse poetarum's up in arms:
No woman's fame their libels has escap'd;
Their ink runs venom, and their pens are clapp'd. ²⁰
When sighs and pray'rs their ladies cannot
move,
They rail, write treason, and turn Whigs to love.
Nay, and I fear they worse designs advance;
There's a damn'd love-trick new brought o'er from France.
We charm in vain, and dress, and keep a pothor,
While those false rogues are ogling one another.
All sins beside admit some expiation,
But this against our sex is plain damna-
tion.
They join for libels too, these womenhaters;
And as they club for love, they club for satires. ³⁰
The best on't is they hurt not: for they
wear
Stings in their tails; their only venom's
there.
'Tis true, some shot at first the ladies hit,
Which able marksmen made and men of
wit:
But now the fools give fire, whose bounce
is louder;
And yet, like mere trainbands, they shoot
but powder.

Libels, like plots, sweep all in their first fury;
 Then dwindle like an ignoramus jury:
 Thus age begins with towsing and with tumbling;
 But grunts, and groans, and ends at last in fumbling. 40

SONG

SHEPHERDESS

TELL me, Thyrsis, tell your anguish;
 Why you sigh, and why you languish:
 When the nymph whom you adore
 Grants the blessing of possessing,
 What can love and I do more?
 What can love, what can love and I do
 more?

SHEPHERD

Think it's love beyond all measure
 Makes me faint away with pleasure:
 Strength of cordial may destroy,
 And the blessing of possessing 10
 Kills me with excess of joy.

SHEPHERDESS

Thyrsis, how can I believe you?
 But confess, and I'll forgive you.
 Men are false and so are you:
 Never nature fram'd a creature
 To enjoy, and yet be true:
 Never nature fram'd a creature
 To enjoy and yet be true;
 To enjoy and yet be true;
 And yet be true. 20

SHEPHERD

Mine's a flame beyond expiring,
 Still possessing, still desiring,
 Fit for love's imperial crown;
 Ever shining, and refining,
 Still the more 't is melted down.

CHORUS TOGETHER

Mine's a flame beyond expiring,
 Still possessing, still desiring,
 Fit for love's imperial crown;
 Ever shining, and refining,
 Still the more 't is melted down. 30

RELIGIO LAICI

OR, A LAYMAN'S FAITH

A POEM

Ornari res ipsa negat, contenta doceri.

[An advertisement in the Observer (see Scott-Saintsbury edition, xviii, 295) shows that this poem was first published about November 30, 1682. Two different issues of it appeared in that year, and a third in 1683; the variations in text are very minute and are probably not due to Dryden. The present edition follows what is apparently the earlier of the two copies of 1682. The early editions contain frequent italics, which are here generally disregarded; and several words printed in capital letters, which are here represented by small capitals.]

THE PREFACE

A POEM with so bold a title, and a name prefix'd from which the handling of so serious a subject would not be expected, may reasonably oblige the author to say somewhat in defense both of himself and of his undertaking. In the first place, if it be objected to me that, being a layman, I ought not to have concern'd myself with speculations which belong to the profession of divinity, I could answer that perhaps laymen, with equal advantages of parts and knowledge, are not the most incompetent judges of sacred things; but, in the due sense of my own weakness and want of learning, I plead not this; I pretend not to make myself a judge of faith in others, but only to make a confession of my own; I lay no unhallowed hand upon the ark, but wait on it, with the reverence that becomes me, at a distance. In the next place I will ingenuously confess that the helps I have us'd in this small treatise were many of them taken from the works of our own reverend divines of the Church of England; so that the weapons with which I combat irreligion are already consecrated; tho' I suppose they may be taken down as lawfully as the sword of Goliath was by David, when they are to be employ'd for the common cause, against the enemies of piety. I intend not by this to intitle them to any of my errors, which yet, I hope, are only those of charity to mankind; and such as my own charity has caus'd me to commit, that of others may more easily excuse. Being naturally inclin'd to scepticism in philosophy, I have no reason to impose my opinions in a subject which is above it; but whatever they are, I submit them with all reverence to my Mother Church, accounting them no further mine, than as they are authoriz'd, or at least uncondemn'd by her. And, indeed, to secure myself on this side, I have us'd the necessary precaution of showing this paper before it was publish'd to a judicious and learned friend, a man indefatigably zealous in the service of the Church and State; and whose writings have highly deserv'd of both. He was pleas'd to approve the body of the discourse, and I hope he is more my friend than to do it out of complaisance. 'Tis true, he had too good a taste to like it all; and amongst some other faults recommended to my second view what I have written, perhaps too boldly, on St. Athanasius, which he advis'd me wholly to omit. I am sensible enough that I had done more prudently to have follow'd his opinion; but then I could not have satisfied myself that I had done honestly not to have written what was my own. It has always been my thought that heathens who never did, nor without miracle could, hear of the name of Christ, were yet in a possibility of salvation. Neither will it enter easily into my belief that, before the coming of our Savior, the whole world, excepting only the Jewish nation, should lie under the inevitable necessity of everlasting punishment, for want of that revelation which was confin'd to so small a spot of ground as that of Palestine. Among the sons of Noah we read of one only who was accurst; and if a blessing in the ripeness of time was reserv'd for Japhet, (of whose progeny we are,) it seems unaccountable to me why so many generations of the same offspring, as preceded our Savior in the flesh, should be all involv'd in one common condemnation, and yet that their posterity should be intitled to the hopes of salvation: as if a bill of exclusion had pass'd only on the fathers, which debarr'd not the sons from their succession. Or that so many ages had been deliver'd over to hell, and so many reserv'd for heaven, and that the Devil had the first choice, and God the next. Truly I am apt to think that the reveal'd religion which was taught by Noah to all his sons might continue for some ages in the whole posterity. That afterwards it was included wholly in the family of Sem is manifest; but when the progenies of Cham and Japhet swarm'd into colonies, and those colonies were subdivided into many others, in process of time their descendants lost by little and little the primitive and purer rites of divine worship, retaining only the notion of one deity; to which succeeding generations added others; for men took their degrees in those ages from conquerors to gods. Revelation being thus eclips'd to almost all mankind, the light of nature, as the next in dignity, was substituted; and that is it which St. Paul concludes to be the rule of the heathens, and by which they are hereafter to be judg'd. If my supposition be true, then the consequence which I have assum'd in my poem may be also true; namely, that Deism, or the principles of natural worship, are only the faint remnants or dying flames of reveal'd religion in the posterity of Noah: and that our modern philosophers, nay, and some of our philosophizing divines, have too much exalted the faculties of our souls, when they have maintain'd that by their force mankind has been able to find out that there is one supreme agent or intellectual being which we call God; that praise and prayer are his due worship; and the rest of those deductions, which I am confident are the remote effects of revelation, and unattainable by our discourse; I mean as simply consider'd, and without the benefit of divine illumination. So that we have not lifted up ourselves to God by the weak pinions of our reason, but he has been pleas'd to descend to us; and what Socrates said of him, what Plato writ, and the rest of the heathen philosophers of several nations, is all no more than the twilight of revelation, after the sun of it was set in the race of Noah. That there is something above us, some principle of motion, our reason can apprehend, tho' it cannot discover what it is, by its own virtue. And indeed 't is very improbable that we, who by the strength of our faculties cannot enter into the knowledge of any being, not so much as of our own, should be able to find out by them that supreme nature, which we cannot otherwise define than by saying it is infinite; as if infinite were definable, or infinity a subject for our narrow understanding. They who would prove religion by reason do but weaken the cause which they endeavor to support: 't is to take away the pillars from our faith, and to prop it only with a twig; 't is to design a tower like that of Babel, which, if it were possible (as it is not) to reach heaven, would come to nothing by the confusion of the workmen. For every man is building a several way; impotently conceited of his own model and his own materials: reason is always striving, and always at a loss; and of necessity it must so come to pass, while 't is exercis'd about that which is not its proper object. Let us be content at last to know God by his own methods; at least, so much of him as he is pleas'd to reveal to us in the sacred Scriptures; to apprehend them to be the word of God is all our reason has to do; for all beyond it is the work of faith, which is the seal of heaven impress'd upon our human understanding.

And now for what concerns the holy bishop Athanasius, the preface of whose creed seems inconsistent with my opinion; which is, that heathens may possibly be sav'd: in the first place I desire it may be consider'd that it is the preface only, not the creed itself, which (till I am better inform'd) is of too hard a digestion for my charity. 'Tis not that I am ignorant how many several texts of Scripture seemingly support that cause; but neither am I ignorant how all those texts may receive a kinder and more mollified interpretation. Every man who is read in Church history knows that belief was drawn up after a long contestation with Arius concerning the divinity of our blessed Savior, and his being one substance with the Father; and that, thus compil'd, it was sent abroad among the Christian churches, as a kind of test, which whosoever took was look'd on as an orthodox believer. 'Tis manifest from hence that the heathen part of the empire was not concern'd in it; for its business was not to distinguish betwixt pagans and Christians, but betwixt heretics and true believers. This, well consider'd, takes off the heavy weight of censure, which I would willingly avoid from so venerable a man; for if this proportion, 'whosoever will be sav'd,' be restrain'd only to those to whom it was intended, and for whom it was compos'd, I mean the Christians; then the anathema reaches not the heathens, who had never heard of Christ, and were nothing interest'd in that dispute. After all, I am far from blaming even that prefatory addition to the creed, and as far from caviling at the continuation of it in the liturgy of the Church, where, on the days appointed, 'tis publicly read: for I suppose there is the same reason for it now, in opposition to the Socinians, as there was then against the Arians; the one being a heresy which seems to have been refin'd out of the other; and with how much more plausibility of reason it combats our religion, with so much more caution to be avoided; and therefore the prudence of our Church is to be commended, which has interpos'd her authority for the recommendation of this creed. Yet, to such as are grounded in the true belief, those explanatory creeds, the Nicene and this of Athanasius, might perhaps be spar'd; for what is supernatural will always be a mystery in spite of exposition, and, for my own part, the plain Apostles' Creed is most suitable to my weak understanding, as the simplest diet is the most easy of digestion.

I have dwelt longer on this subject than I intended, and longer than, perhaps, I ought;

for having laid down, as my foundation, that the Scripture is a rule; that in all things needful to salvation it is clear, sufficient, and ordain'd by God Almighty for that purpose, I have left myself no right to interpret obscure places, such as concern the possibility of eternal happiness to heathens; because whatsoever is obscure is concluded not necessary to be known.

But, by asserting the Scripture to be the canon of our faith, I have unavoidably created to myself two sorts of enemies: the Papists indeed, more directly, because they have kept the Scripture from us, what they could; and have reserv'd to themselves a right of interpreting what they have deliver'd under the pretense of infallibility: and the Fanatics more collaterally, because they have assum'd what amounts to an infallibility in the private spirit; and have detorted those texts of Scripture which are not necessary to salvation, to the damnable uses of sedition, disturbance, and destruction of the civil government. To begin with the Papists, and to speak freely, I think them the less dangerous, at least in appearance, to our present State, for not only the penal laws are in force against them, and their number is contemptible; but also their peerage and commons are excluded from parliaments, and consequently those laws in no probability of being repeal'd. A general and uninterrupted plot of their clergy, ever since the Reformation, I suppose all Protestants believe. For 't is not reasonable to think but that so many of their orders, as were outed from their fat possessions, would endeavor a reëntance against those whom they account heretics. As for the late design, Mr. Coleman's letters, for aught I know, are the best evidence; and what they discover, without wiredrawing their sense, or malicious glosses, all men of reason conclude credible. If there be anything more than this requir'd of me, I must believe it as well as I am able, in spite of the witnesses, and out of a decent conformity to the votes of parliament; for I suppose the Fanatics will not allow the private spirit in this case. Here the infallibility is at least in one part of the government; and our understandings as well as our wills are represented. But to return to the Roman Catholics, how can we be secure from the practice of Jesuited Papists in that religion? For not two or three of that order, as some of them would impose upon us, but almost the whole body of them, are of opinion that their infallible master has a right over kings, not only in spirituals but temporals. Not to name Mariana, Bellarmine, Emanuel Sa, Molina, Santarel, Simancha, and at least twenty others of foreign countries; we can produce, of our own nation, Campian, and Doleman or Parsons, besides many are nam'd whom I have not read, who all of them

attest this doctrine, that the Pope can depose and give away the right of any sovereign prince, si vel paulum deflexerit, if he shall never so little warp; but if he once comes to be excommunicated, then the bond of obedience is taken off from subjects; and they may and ought to drive him, like another Nebuchadnezzar, ex hominum Christianorum dominatu, from exercising dominion over Christians; and to this they are bound by virtue of divine precept, and by all the ties of conscience under no less penalty than damnation. If they answer me (as a learned priest has lately written) that this doctrine of the Jesuits is not de fide; and that consequently they are not oblig'd by it, they must pardon me if I think they have said nothing to the purpose; for 'tis a maxim in their Church, where points of faith are not decided, and that doctors are of contrary opinions, they may follow which part they please; but more safely the most receiv'd and most authoriz'd. And their champion Bellarmine has told the world, in his Apology, that the king of England is a vassal to the Pope, ratione directi domini, and that he holds in vassalage of his Roman landlord. Which is no new claim put in for England. Our chronicles are his authentic witnesses that King John was depos'd by the same plea, and Philip Augustus admitted tenant. And which makes the more for Bellarmine, the French king was again ejected when our king submitted to the Church, and the crown receiv'd under the sordid condition of a vassalage.

'Tis not sufficient for the more moderate and well-meaning Papists (of which I doubt not there are many) to produce the evidences of their loyalty to the late king, and to declare their innocency in this Plot: I will grant their behavior in the first to have been as loyal and as brave as they desire; and will be willing to hold them excus'd as to the second, (I mean when it comes to my turn, and after my betters; for 't is a madness to be sober alone, while the nation continues drunk;) but that saying of their Father Cres. is still running in my head, that they may be dispens'd with in their obedience to an heretic prince, while the necessity of the times shall oblige them to it: for that (as another of them tells us) is only the effect of Christian prudence; but when once they shall get power to shake him off, an heretic is no lawful king, and consequently to rise against him is no rebellion. I should be glad, therefore, that they would follow the advice which was charitably given them by a reverend prelate of our Church; namely. that they would join in a public act of disowning and detesting those Jesuitic principles; and subscribe to all doctrines which deny the Pope's authority of deposing kings, and releasing subjects from their oath of allegiance: to which I should think they might easily be induc'd, if it be true that this present Pope has condemn'd the doctrine of king-killing, (a thesis of the Jesuits,) amongst others, ex cathedra, (as they call it,) or in open consistory.

Leaving them, therefore, in so fair a way (if they please themselves) of satisfying all reasonable men of their sincerity and good meaning to the government, I shall make bold to consider that other extreme of our religion, I mean the Fanatics, or Schismatics, of the English Church. Since the Bible has been translated into our tongue, they have us'd it so, as if their business was not to be sav'd but to be damn'd by its contents. If we consider only them, better had it been for the English nation that it had still remain'd in the original Greek and Hebrew, or at least in the honest Latin of St. Jerome, than that several texts in it should have been prevaricated to the destruction of that government which put it into so ungrateful hands.

How many heresies the first translation of Tyndal produc'd in few years, let my Lord Herbert's history of Henry the Eighth inform you; insomuch that for the gross errors in it, and the great mischiefs it occasion'd, a sentence pass'd on the first edition of the Bible, too shameful almost to be repeated. After the short reign of Edward the Sixth, (who had continued to carry on the Reformation on other principles than it was begun,) everyone knows that not only the chief promoters of that work, but many others whose consciences would not dispense with Popery, were forc'd, for fear of persecution, to change climates: from whence returning at the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign, many of them who had been in France, and at Geneva, brought back the rigid opinions and imperious discipline of Calvin, to graff upon our Reformation. Which, tho' they cunningly conceal'd at first, (as well knowing how nauseously that drug would go down in a lawful monarchy, which was prescrib'd for a rebellious commonwealth,) yet they always kept it in reserve; and were never wanting to themselves either in court or parliament, when either they had any prospect of a numerous party of Fanatic members in the one, or the encouragement of any favorite in the other, whose covetousness was gaping at the patrimony of the Church. They who will consult the works of our venerable Hooker, or the account of his life, or more particularly the letter written to him on this subject by George Cranmer, may see by what gradations they proceeded: from the dislike of cap and surplice, the very next step was admonitions to the parliament against the whole government ecclesiastical; then came out volumes in English and Latin in defense of their tenets ; and immediately practices were set on foot to erect their discipline without authority. Those not succeeding, satire and railing was the next ; and Martin Mar-prelate (the Marvell of those times) was the first Presbyterian scribbler who sanctified libels and scurrility to the use of the Good Old Cause. Which was done (says my author) upon this account ; that (their serious treatises having been fully answer'd and refuted) they might compass by railing what they had lost by reasoning ; and, when their cause was sunk in court and parliament, they might at least hedge in a stake amongst the rabble : for to their ignorance all things are wit which are abusive. But if Church and State were made the theme, then the doctoral degree of wit was to be taken at Billingsgate : even the most saintlike of the party, tho' they durst not excuse this contempt and vilifying of the government, yet were pleas'd, and grinn'd at it with a pious smile, and call'd it a judgment of God against the hierarchy. Thus Sectaries, we may see, were born with teeth, foul-mouth'd and scurrilous from their infancy ; and if spiritual pride, venom, violence, contempt of superiors, and slander, had been the marks of orthodox belief, the Presbytery and the rest of our Schismatics, which are their spawn, were always the most visible Church in the Christian world.

'Tis true, the government was too strong at that time for a rebellion ; but to shew what proficiency they had made in Calvin's school, even then their mouths water'd at it ; for two of their gifted brotherhood, (Hacket and Coppinger,) as the story tells us, got up into a pease-cart and harangued the people, to dispose them to an insurrection, and to establish their discipline by force : so that, however it comes about that now they celebrate Queen Elizabeth's birthnight as that of their saint and patroness, yet then they were for doing the work of the Lord by arms against her ; and, in all probability, they wanted but a Fanatic lord mayor and two sheriffs of their party, to have compass'd it.

Our venerable Hooker, after many admonitions which he had given them, toward the end of his preface breaks out into this prophetic speech : " There is in every one of these considerations most just cause to fear, lest our hastiness to embrace a thing of so perilous consequence " (meaning the Presbyterian discipline) " should cause posterity to feel those evils, which as yet are more easy for us to prevent, than they would be for them to remedy."

How fatally this Cassandra has foretold, we know too well by sad experience : the seeds were sown in the time of Queen Elizabeth, the bloody harvest ripen'd in the reign of King Charles the Martyr ; and, because all the sheaves could not be carried off without shedding some of the loose grains, another crop is too like to follow ; nay, I fear 't is unavoidable if the conventiclers be permitted still to scatter.

A man may be suffer'd to quote an adversary to our religion, when he speaks truth ; and 't is the observation of Maimbourg, in his History of Calvinism, that wherever that discipline was planted and embrac'd, rebellion, civil war, and misery attended it. And how indeed should it happen otherwise ? Reformation of Church and State has always been the ground of our divisions in England. While we were Papists, our Holy Father rid us, by pretending authority out of the Scriptures to depose princes ; when we shook off his authority, the Sectaries furnish'd themselves with the same weapons ; and out of the same magazine, the Bible : so that the Scriptures, which are in themselves the greatest security of governors, as commanding express obedience to them, are now turn'd to their destruction ; and never since the Reformation has there wanted a text of their interpreting to authorize a rebel. And 't is to be noted by the way that the doctrines of king-killing and deposing, which have been taken up only by the worst party of the Papists, the most frontless flatterers of the Pope's authority, have been espous'd, defended, and are still maintain'd by the whole body of Nonconformists and Republicans. 'Tis but dubbing themselves the people of God, which 't is the interest of their preachers to tell them they are, and their own interest to believe ; and after that, they cannot dip into the Bible, but one text or another will turn up for their purpose : if they are under persecution, (as they call it,) then that is a mark of their election ; if they flourish, then God works miracles for their deliverance, and the saints are to possess the earth.

They may think themselves to be too roughly handled in this paper ; but I, who know best how far I could have gone on this subject, must be bold to tell them they are spar'd : tho' at the same time I am not ignorant that they interpret the mildness of a writer to them, as they do the mercy of the government ; in the one they think it fear, and conclude it weakness in the other. The best way for them to confute me is, as I before advis'd the Papists, to disclaim their principles and renounce their practices. We shall all be glad to think them true Englishmen when they obey the king, and true Protestants when they conform to the Church discipline.

It remains that I acquaint the reader that the verses were written for an ingenious young gentleman, my friend, upon his translation of the Critical History of the Old Testament, com-

pos'd by the learned Father Simon: the verses therefore are address'd to the translator of that work, and the style of them is, what it ought to be, epistolary.

If anyone be so lamentable a critic as to require the smoothness, the numbers, and the turn of heroic poetry in this poem, I must tell him that, if he has not read Horace, I have studied him, and hope the style of his Epistles is not ill imitated here. The expressions of a poem design'd purely for instruction ought to be plain and natural, and yet majestic; for here the poet is presum'd to be a kind of lawgiver, and those three qualities which I have nam'd are proper to the legislative style. The florid, elevated, and figurative way is for the passions; for love and hatred, fear and anger, are begotten in the soul by shewing their objects out of their true proportion, either greater than the life, or less; but instruction is to be given by shewing them what they naturally are. A man is to be cheated into passion, but to be reason'd into truth.

RELIGIO LAICI

DIM as the borrow'd beams of moon and stars

To lonely, weary, wand'ring travelers,
Is Reason to the soul; and, as on high
Those rolling fires discover but the sky,
Not light us here, so Reason's glimmering ray

Was lent, not to assure our doubtful way,
But guide us upward to a better day.
And as those nightly tapers disappear,
When day's bright lord ascends our hemi-
sphere;

So pale grows Reason at Religion's sight; 10
So dies, and so dissolves in supernatural light.

Some few, whose lamp shone brighter, have been led

From cause to cause, to nature's secret
head;

And found that one first principle must
be:

But what, or who, that UNIVERSAL HE;
Whether some soul encompassing this ball,
Unmade, unmov'd; yet making, moving
all;

Or various atoms' interfering dance
Leapt into form, (the noble work of chance;) 20
Or this great all was from eternity;
Not ev'n the Stagirite himself could see,
And Epicurus guess'd as well as he:
As blindly grop'd they for a future state;

As rashly judg'd of providence and fate:
But least of all could their endeavors find

Opinions of the several sects of philosophers concerning the Summum Bonum.

What most concern'd the good of humankind;

For happiness was never to be
found,

But vanish'd from 'em like enchanted
ground.

One thought content the good to be enjoy'd;
This every little accident destroy'd: 30

The wiser madmen did for virtue toil,

A thorny, or at best a barren soil;

In pleasure some their glutton souls
would steep,

But found their line too short, the well
too deep,

And leaky vessels which no bliss could keep.

Thus anxious thoughts in endless circles
roll,

Without a center where to fix the soul;

In this wild maze their vain endeavors end:

How can the less the greater comprehend?

Or finite reason reach Infinity? 40

For what could fathom GOD were more than He.

The Deist thinks he stands System of Deism.
on firmer ground;

Cries: "Εἴρεκα, the mighty secret's found:
God is that spr'g of good; supreme and best; e.

We, made to serve, and in that service
blest."

If so, some rules of worship must be given,
Distributed alike to all by Heaven:

Else God were partial, and to some denied
The means his justice should for all provide.

This general worship is to PRAISE and PRAY, 50

One part to borrow blessings, one to pay;

And when frail nature slides into offense,

The sacrifice for crimes is penitence.

Yet, since th' effects of providence, we
find,

Are variously dispens'd to humankind;

That vice triumphs, and virtue suffers here,

(A brand that sovereign justice cannot
bear;)

Our reason prompts us to a future state,

The last appeal from fortune and from fate:

Where God's all-righteous ways will be declar'd, 60

The bad meet punishment, the good reward.

Thus man by his own strength to heaven
 would soar,
 And would not be oblig'd to ^{Of reveal'd} Religion.
 God for more.
 Vain, wretched creature, how art thou misled
 To think thy wit these godlike notions bred !
 These truths are not the product of thy mind,
 But dropp'd from heaven, and of a nobler
 kind.
 Reveal'd Religion first inform'd thy sight,
 And Reason saw not, till Faith sprung the
 light.
 Hence all thy natural worship takes the source: ⁷⁰
 'Tis revelation what thou think'st discourse.
 Else, how com'st thou to see these truths
 so clear,
 Which so obscure to heathens did appear ?
 Not Plato these, nor Aristotle found;
 Nor he whose wisdom oracles ^{Socrates.}
 renown'd.
 Hast thou a wit so deep, or so sublime,
 Or canst thou lower dive, or higher climb ?
 Canst thou, by Reason, more of Godhead
 know
 Than Plutarch, Seneca, or Cicero ?
 Those giant wits, in happier ages born, ^{so} (When arms and arts did Greece and Rome adorn,) Knew no such system; no such piles could raise
 Of natural worship, built on pray'r and
 praise,
 To One Sole God:
 Nor did remorse to expiate sin prescribe,
 But slew their fellow creatures for a bribe:
 The guiltless victim groan'd for their offense,
 And cruelty and blood was penitence.
 If sheep and oxen could atone for men,
 Ah ! at how cheap a rate the rich might sin ! ^{oo}
 And great oppressors might Heaven's wrath
 beguile,
 By offering his own creatures for a spoil !
 Dar'st thou, poor worm, offend Infinity ?
 And must the terms of peace be given by
 thee ?
 Then thou art Justice in the last appeal:
 Thy easy God instructs thee to rebel;
 And, like a king remote, and weak, must take
 What satisfaction thou art pleas'd to make.
 But if there be a pow'r too just and strong

To wink at crimes, and bear unpunish'd wrong; ¹⁰⁰
 Look humbly upward, see his will disclose
 The forfeit first, and then the fine impose:
 A mulet thy poverty could never pay,
 Had not eternal wisdom found the way,
 And with celestial wealth supplied thy
 store:
 His justice makes the fine, his mercy quits
 the score.
 See God descending in thy human frame;
 Th' offended suffer'g in th' offender's
 name;
 All thy misdeeds to him imputed see,
 And all his righteousness devolv'd on thee.
 For granting we have sinn'd, and that
 th' offense ¹¹¹
 Of man is made against Omnipotence,
 Some price that bears proportion must be
 paid,
 And infinite with infinite be weigh'd.
 See then the Deist lost: remorse for vice,
 Not paid; or paid, inadequate in price:
 What farther means can Reason now direct,
 Or what relief from human wit expect ?
 That shews us sick; and sadly are we sure
 Still to be sick, till Heav'n reveal the cure:
 If then Heav'n's will must needs be understood, ¹²¹ (Which must, if we want cure, and Heaven be good,) Let all records of will reveal'd be
 shown;
 With Scripture all in equal balance
 thrown,
 And our one sacred book will be that
 one. }
 Proof needs not here, for whether we compare
 That impious, idle, superstitious ware Of rites, lustrations, offerings, (which be-
 fore,
 In various ages, various countries bore,)
 With Christian faith and virtues, we shall find ¹³⁰
 None answer'g the great ends of human-
 kind,
 But this one rule of life, that shews us
 best
 How God may be appeas'd, and mortals
 blest.
 Whether from length of time its worth we
 draw,
 The world is scarce more ancient than the
 law:

Heav'n's early care prescrib'd for every age;

First, in the soul, and after, in the page.

Or, whether more abstractedly we look,

Or on the writers, or the written book,

Whence, but from heav'n, could men unskill'd in arts,

In several ages born, in several parts,

Weave such agreeing truths? or how, or why,

Should all conspire to cheat us with a lie?

Unask'd their pains, ungrateful their advice,

Starving their gain, and martyrdom their price.

If on the book itself we cast our view,
Concurrent heathens prove the story true;
The doctrine, miracles; which must convince,

For Heav'n in them appeals to human sense:

And tho' they prove not, they confirm the cause,

When what is taught agrees with nature's laws.

Then for the style; majestic and divine,
It speaks no less than God in every line:
Commanding words; whose force is still the same

As the first fiat that produc'd our frame.
All faiths beside or did by arms ascend,
Or sense indulg'd has made mankind their friend:

This only doctrine does our lusts oppose,
Unfed by nature's soil, in which it grows;
Cross to our interests, curbing sense and sin;

Oppress'd without, and undermin'd within,
It thrives thro' pain; its own tormentors tires;

And with a stubborn patience still aspires.
To what can Reason such effects assign,
Transcending nature, but to laws divine?
Which in that sacred volume are contain'd;
Sufficient, clear, and for that use ordain'd.

But stay: the Deist here will urge anew,

No supernatural worship can be true;
Because a general law is that alone
Which must to all, and everywhere, be known:

A style so large as not this book can claim,
Nor aught that bears reveal'd Religion's name.

'Tis said the sound of a Messiah's birth

Is gone thro' all the habitable earth;

But still that text must be confin'd alone

To what was then inhabited, and known:

And what provision could from thence accrue

To Indian souls, and worlds discover'd new?

In other parts it helps, that, ages past,

The Scriptures there were known, and were imbrac'd,

Till Sin spread once again the shades of night:

What's that to these who never saw the light?

Of all objections this indeed is chief

The objection answer'd.

To startle Reason, stagger frail Belief:

We grant, 'tis true, that Heav'n from human sense

Has hid the secret paths of Providence;
But boundless wisdom, boundless mercy, may

Find ev'n for those bewilder'd souls a way:
If from his nature foes may pity claim,
Much more may strangers who ne'er heard his name.

And tho' no name be for salvation known,
But that of his eternal Son's alone;
Who knows how far transcending goodness can

Extend the merits of that Son to man?
Who knows what reasons may his mercy lead,

Or ignorance invincible may plead?
Not only charity bids hope the best,
But more the great apostle has express'd:
That if the Gentiles (whom no law inspir'd)

By nature did what was by law requir'd;
They, who the written rule had never known,

Were to themselves both rule and law alone:

To nature's plain indictment they shall plead,

And by their conscience be condemn'd or freed.

Most righteous doom! because a rule reveal'd

Is none to those from whom it was conceal'd.

Then those who follow'd Reason's dictates right,

Liv'd up, and lifted high their natural light;

With Socrates may see their Maker's
face, 210

While thousand rubric-martyrs want a
place.

Nor does it balk my charity, to find
Th' Egyptian bishop of another mind:
For tho' his creed eternal truth contains,
'Tis hard for man to doom to endless
pains

All who believ'd not all his zeal requir'd,
Unless he first could prove he was inspir'd.
Then let us either think he meant to say
This faith, where publish'd, was the only
way;

Or else conclude that, Arius to confute, 220
The good old man, too eager in dispute,
Flew high; and, as his Christian fury rose,
Damn'd all for heretics who durst oppose.

Thus far my charity this Digression to the translator of Father

ical History of the Old Testament.*
path has tried;
(A much unskilful, but well-meaning guide:)
Yet what they are, ev'n these crude thoughts were
bred

By reading that which better thou hast
read:

Thy matchless author's work; which thou,
my friend,

By well translating better dost commend:
Those youthful hours which of thy equals
most 230

In toys have squander'd, or in vice have
lost,

Those hours hast thou to nobler use em-
ploy'd;

And the severe delights of truth enjoy'd.
Witness this weighty book, in which appears

The crabbed toil of many thoughtful
years,

Spent by thy author in the sifting care
Of Rabbins' old sophisticated ware
From gold divine; which he who well can sort

May afterwards make algebra a sport:
A treasure, which if country curates buy, 240

They Junius and Tremellius may defy;
Save pains in various readings and translations,

And without Hebrew make most learn'd quotations:

A work so full with various learning fraught,

So nicely ponder'd, yet so strongly
wrought,

As nature's height and art's last hand re-
quir'd;

As much as man could compass, uninspir'd.
Where we may see what errors have been
made

Both in the copier's and translator's trade;
How Jewish, Popish interests have pre-
vail'd, 250

And where infallibility has fail'd.

For some, who have his secret meaning guess'd,

Have found our author not too much a priest:

For fashion sake he seems to have recourse
To Pope, and councils, and tradition's force;
But he that old traditions could subdue,
Could not but find the weakness of the new:
If Scripture, tho' deriv'd from heav'nly
birth,

Has been but carelessly preserv'd on earth;
If God's own people, who of God before 260 Knew what we know, and had been prom-is'd more,

In fuller terms, of Heaven's assisting care,
And who did neither time nor study spare
To keep this book untainted, unperplex'd,
Let in gross errors to corrupt the text,
Omitted paragraphs, embroil'd the sense,
With vain traditions stopp'd the gaping
fence,

Which every common hand pull'd up with
ease;

What safety from such brushwood-helps as
these?

If written words from time are not secur'd,
How can we think have oral sounds endur'd? 271

Which thus transmitted, if one mouth has fail'd,

Immortal lies on ages are intail'd;
And that some such have been, is prov'd too plain;

If we consider interest, Church, and gain.

"O, but," says one, "tradi- Of the infallibility of tradition in general.
tion set aside,

Where can we hope for an unerring guide?

For since th' original Scripture has been
lost,

All copies disagreeing, main'd the most,
Or Christian faith can have no certain
ground, 280

Or truth in Church tradition must be found."

Such an omniscient Church we wish indeed;
 'T were worth both Testaments; and cast in the Creed:
 But if this mother be a guide so sure,
 As can all doubts resolve, all truth secure,
 Then her infallibility as well
 Where copies are corrupt or lame can tell;
 Restore lost canon with as little pains,
 As truly explicate what still remains;
 Which yet no council dare pretend to do,
 Unless like Esdras they could write it new: ²⁹¹
 Strange confidence, still to interpret true,
 Yet not be sure that all they have explain'd,
 Is in the blest original contain'd.
 More safe, and much more modest 't is, to say
 God would not leave mankind without a way;
 And that the Scriptures, tho' not everywhere
 Free from corruption, or intire, or clear,
 Are uncorrupt, sufficient, clear, intire,
 In all things which our needful faith require. ³⁰⁰
 If others in the same glass better see,
 'T is for themselves they look, but not for me:
 For MY salvation must its doom receive,
 Not from what OTHERS but what I believe.
 Must all tradition then be set aside? ^{Objection in behalf of tradition, urg'd by Father Simon.}
 This to affirm were ignorance or pride.
 Are there not many points, some needful sure
 To saving faith, that Scripture leaves obscure?
 Which every sect will wrest a several way
 (For what one sect interprets, all sects may):
 We hold, and say we prove from Scripture plain, ³¹¹
 That Christ is God; the bold Socinian
 From the same Scripture urges he 's but MAN.
 Now what appeal can end th' important suit;
 Both parts talk loudly, but the rule is mute?
 Shall I speak plain, and in a nation free
 Assume an honest layman's liberty?
 I think (according to my little skill,
 To my own Mother Church submitting still)
 That many have been sav'd, and many may, ³²⁰

Who never heard this question brought in play.
 Th' unletter'd Christian, who believes in gross,
 Plods on to heaven, and ne'er is at a loss;
 For the strait gate would be made straiter yet,
 Were none admitted there but men of wit.
 The few by nature form'd, with learning fraught,
 Born to instruct, as others to be taught,
 Must study well the sacred page, and see
 Which doctrine, this, or that, does best agree
 With the whole tenor of the work divine, ³³⁰
 And plainliest points to Heaven's reveal'd design;
 Which exposition flows from genuine sense,
 And which is fore'd by wit and eloquence.
 Not that tradition's parts are useless here,
 When general, old, disinteress'd and clear:
 That ancient Fathers thus expound the page
 Gives truth the reverend majesty of age;
 Confirms its force, by biding every test;
 For best authority's next rules are best.
 And still the nearer to the spring we go, ³⁴⁰
 More limpid, more unsoil'd the waters flow.
 Thus, first traditions were a proof alone,
 Could we be certain such they were, so known;
 But since some flaws in long descent may be,
 They make not truth, but probability.
 Even Arius and Pelagius durst provoke
 To what the centuries preceding spoke.
 Such difference is there in an oft-told tale;
 But truth by its own sinews will prevail. ³⁴⁹
 Tradition written therefore more commends
 Authority, than what from voice descends;
 And this, as perfect as its kind can be,
 Rolls down to us the sacred history,
 Which, from the Universal Church receiv'd,
 Is tried, and after for itself believ'd.
 The partial Papists would ^{The second objection.} infer from hence
 Their Church, in last resort, should judge
 the sense;
 But first they would assume, ^{Answer to the objection.}
 with wondrous art,
 Themselves to be the whole, who are but
 part
 Of that vast frame, the Church; yet grant
 they were ³⁶⁰
 The handers down, can they from thence infer

A right t' interpret? or would they alone
Who brought the present, claim it for their
own?

The book's a common largess to mankind,
Not more for them than every man de-
sign'd;

The welcome news is in the letter found;
The carrier's not commission'd to expound.
It speaks itself, and what it does contain,
In all things needful to be known, is plain.

In times o'ergrown with rust and ignorance, ³⁷⁰

A gainful trade their clergy did advance;
When want of learning kept the laymen
low,

And none but priests were authoriz'd to
know;

When what small knowledge was, in them
did dwell,

And he a god who could but read or spell:
Then Mother Church did mightily prevail;
She parcell'd out the Bible by retail;
But still expounded what she sold or gave,
To keep it in her power to damn and save:
Scripture was scarce, and, as the market
went, ³⁸⁰

Poor laymen took salvation on content;
As needy men take money, good or bad:
God's word they had not, but the priest's they had.

Yet, whate'er false conveyances they made,
The lawyer still was certain to be paid.
In those dark times they learn'd their knack so well,

That by long use they grew infallible:
At last, a knowing age began t' enquire
If they the book, or that did them inspire;
And, making narrower search, they found,
tho' late, ³⁹⁰

That what they thought the priest's was their estate,

Taught by the will produc'd, (the written word,)

How long they had been cheated on record.

Then every man who saw the title fair Claim'd a child's part, and put in for a
share;

Consulted soberly his private good,
And sav'd himself as cheap as e'er he could.

'T is true, my friend, (and far be flattery
hence,)

This good had full as bad a consequence:
The book thus put in every vulgar hand, ⁴⁰⁰

Which each presum'd he best could understand,

The common rule was made the common
prey,

And at the mercy of the rabble lay.

The tender page with horny fists was gall'd,

And he was gifted most that loudest
bawl'd:

The spirit gave the doctoral degree;

And every member of a company

Was of his trade and of the Bible free. }

Plain truths enough for needful use they
found,

But men would still be itching to expound: ⁴¹⁰

Each was ambitious of th' obscurest place,
No measure ta'en from knowledge, all from GRACE.

Study and pains were now no more their
care;

Texts were explain'd by fasting and by prayer:

This was the fruit the private spirit
brought,

Occasion'd by great zeal and little thought.
While crowds unlearn'd, with rude devotion warm,

About the sacred viands buzz and swarm,
The fly-blown text creates a crawling brood,

And turns to maggots what was meant for fool. ⁴²⁰

A thousand daily sects rise up and die;
A thousand more the perish'd race supply:
So all we make of Heaven's discover'd will
Is, not to have it, or to use it ill.

The danger's much the same; on several shelves

If others wreck us, or we wreck ourselves.

What then remains, but, waiving each extreme,

The tides of ignorance and pride to stem?
Neither so rich a treasure to forego;

Nor proudly seek beyond our pow'r to know: ⁴³⁰

Faith is not built on disquisitions vain;
The things we must believe are few and
plain:

But since men will believe more than they
need,

And every man will make himself a creed,
In doubtful questions 't is the safest way

To learn what unsuspected ancients say;
For 't is not likely we should higher soar

In search of heav'n, than all the Church
before;
Nor can we be deceiv'd, unless we see
The Scripture and the Fathers disagree. 440
If, after all, they stand suspected still,
(For no man's faith depends upon his will;)
'Tis some relief that points not clearly
known
Without much hazard may be let alone:
And after hearing what our Church can say,
If still our Reason runs another way,
That private Reason 't is more just to curb,

Than by disputes the public peace disturb.
For points obscure are of small use to learn;
But common quiet is mankind's concern. 450
Thus have I made my own opinions clear;
Yet neither praise expect, nor censure fear:
And this unpolish'd, rugged verse, I chose,
As fittest for discourse, and nearest prose;
For while from sacred truth I do not swerve,
Tom Sternhold's, or Tom Sha—ll's rhymes will serve.

POEMS INCLUDED IN MISCELLANY POEMS (THE FIRST MISCELLANY), 1684

[In 1684 there was "printed for Jacob Tonson" a volume with title-page reading, Miscellany Poems, containing a New Translation of Virgills Eclogues, Ovid's Love Elegies, Odes of Horace, and other Authors, with several Original Poems, by the most Eminent Hands; and with the motto:

*Et vos, O lauri, carpat, et te, proximo myrto .
Sic posuit quoniam suavis miscetis odores.*

This book is generally referred to as the First Miscellany. A second edition appeared in 1692, a third in 1702, and a fourth in 1716. (The title-page of the third edition reads, Miscellany Poems, the First Part. . . . Publish'd by Mr. Dryden: that of the fourth edition reads, The First Part of Miscellany Poems. . . . Publish'd by Mr. Dryden.) The collection has no preface and opens with new editions of Mac Flecknoe, Absalom and Achitophel, and The Medal: next come various translations from Greek and Latin authors, mixed with a few original poems; then follows a collection of prologues and epilogues; finally, after a few scattering poems, a translation of Virgil's Eclogues concludes the book. Among the "eminent hands" were Sir Charles Sedley, the Earl of Mulgrave, the Earl of Roscommon, the Earl of Rochester, Otway, Rymer, Tate, Duke, and Creech. Dryden was, however, by far the largest contributor to the volume. In the contents of the third and fourth editions, published after Dryden's death, Tonson, or an editor, made important changes.

The prologues and epilogues by Dryden have already been printed in their chronological order, so far as it could be ascertained. Of Virgil's Eclogues Dryden translated the fourth and ninth. These versions he reprinted, with some revision, in his complete translation of Virgil, published in 1697. They are therefore omitted at this point. The variant readings of the earlier texts are given in the notes to the Virgil. Of Dryden's work only the three following poems remain to be printed as first published in Miscellany Poems, 1684. The text follows the first edition.]

OVID'S ELEGIES

BOOK II, ELEGY XIX

[This translation is from the Amores of Ovid. Dryden later translated two more elegies from the same book: these are given below (pp. 729, 730), under the title of Ovid's Amours.]

IF for thyself thou wilt not watch thy whore,
Watch her for me, that I may love her more.
What comes with ease, we nauseously receive:

Who but a sot would scorn to love with
leave?
With hopes and fears my flames are blown up higher:
Make me despair, and then I can desire.
Give me a jilt to tease my jealous mind;
Deceits are virtues in the female kind.
Corinna my fantastic humor knew,
Play'd trick for trick, and kept herself still
new:
She, that next night I might the sharper
come,
Fell out with me, and sent me fasting home;

Or some pretence to lie alone would take;
Whene'er she pleas'd, her head and teeth
would ache:

Till, having won me to the highest strain,
She took occasion to be sweet again.
With what a gust, ye gods, we then imbrae'd!

How every kiss was dearer than the last!

Thou whom I now adore, be edified;
Take care that I may often be denied. 20 Forget the promis'd hour, or feign some
fright,

Make me lie rough on bulks each other
night.

These are the arts that best secure thy
reign,
And this the food that must my fires maintain.

Gross easy love does, like gross diet, pall,
In squeasy stomachs honey turns to gall.
Had Danae not been kept in brazen tow'rs, Jove had not thought her worth his golden show'rs.

When Juno to a cow turn'd Io's shape, 29
The watchman help'd her to a second leap.
Let him who loves an easy Whetstone whore,
Pluck leaves from trees, and drink the common shore.

The jilting harlot strikes the surest blow,
A truth which I by sad experience know.
The kind poor constant creature we despise;
Man but pursues the quarry while it flies.

But thou, dull husband of a wife too fair,
Stand on thy guard, and watch the precious
ware;

If creaking doors, or barking dogs thou hear,
Or windows scratch'd, suspect a rival there.
An orange-wench would tempt thy wife
abroad; 41

Kick her, for she's a letter-bearing bawd;
In short, be jealous as the Devil in hell!
And set my wit on work to cheat thee well.
The sneaking city-cuckold is my foe;
I scorn to strike, but when he wards the blow.

Look to thy hits, and leave off thy conniv-
ing;

I'll be no drudge to any wittol living;
I have been patient, and forborne thee long,
In hope thou wouldst not pocket up thy
wrong; 50

If no affront can rouse thee, understand
I'll take no more indulgence at thy hand.
What, ne'er to be forbid thy house, and
wife!

Damn him who loves to lead so dull a life.
Now I can neither sigh, nor ~~whine~~, nor pray;
All those occasions thou hast ta'en away.

Why art thou so incorrigibly civil?
Do somewhat I may wish thee at the Devil.
For shame be no accomplice in my treason,
A pimping husband is too much in reason. 60

Once more wear horns, before I quite forsake her,
In hopes whereof, I rest thy cuckold-maker.

AMARYLLIS

OR, THE THIRD IDYLLIUM OF THEOCRITUS, PARAPHRAS'D

To Amaryllis love compels my way;
My browsing goats upon the mountains
stray:

O Tityrus, tend them well, and see them
fed
In pastures fresh, and to their wat'ring
led;
And 'ware the ridgeling with his butting
head.

Ah, beauteous nymph, can you forget your
love,

The conscious grottos, and the shady grove;
Where stretch'd at ease your tender limbs
were laid,

Your nameless beauties nakedly display'd?
Then I was call'd your darling, your desire, 10

With kisses such as set my soul on fire;
But you are chang'd, yet I am still the
same;

My heart maintains for both a double flame;
Griev'd, but unmov'd, and patient of your
scorn:

So faithful I, and you so much forsworn!
I die, and death will finish all my pain;

Yet, ere I die, behold me once again:
Am I so much deform'd, so chang'd of late?

What partial judges are our love and hate!
Ten wildings have I gather'd for my dear; 20
How ruddy like your lips their streaks ap-
pear!

Far off you view'd them with a longing eye Upon the topmost branch (the tree was
high):

Yet nimbly up, from bough to bough I
swerv'd,

And for to-morrow have ten more re-
serv'd.

Look on me kindly, and some pity shew,
Or give me leave at least to look on you.
Some god transform me by his heavenly
pow'r

Ev'n to a bee to buzz within your bow'r,
The winding ivy-chaplet to invade, ³⁰
And folded fern, that your fair forehead
shade.

Now to my cost the force of Love I find;
The heavy hand he bears on humankind.
The milk of tigers was his infant food,
Taught from his tender years the taste
of blood;
His brother whelps and he ran wild about the wood.

Ah nymph, train'd up in his tyrannic court,
To make the suff'rings of your slaves your sport!

Unheeded ruin! treacherous delight!
O polish'd hardness, soften'd to the sight! ⁴⁰
Whose radiant eyes your ebon brows adorn,
Like midnight those, and these like break of morn!

Smile once again, revive me with your
charms;

And let me die contented in your arms.
I would not ask to live another day,
Might I but sweetly kiss my soul away.
Ah, why am I from empty joys debarr'd?
For kisses are but empty when compar'd.
I rave, and in my raging fit shall tear
The garland which I wove for you to wear, ⁵⁰

Of parsley, with a wreath of ivy bound,
And border'd with a rosy edging round.
What pangs I feel, unpitied and unheard!
Since I must die, why is my fate deferr'd!
I strip my body of my shepherd's frock:
Behold that dreadful downfall of a rock,
Where yon old fisher views the waves from
high!

'Tis that convenient leap I mean to try.
You would be pleas'd to see me plunge to
shore,

But better pleas'd, if I should rise no
more. ⁶⁰

I might have read my fortune long ago,
When, seeking my success in love to know,
I tried th' infallible prophetic way,
A poppy-leaf upon my palm to lay:
I struck, and yet no lucky crack did follow;
Yet I struck hard, and yet the leaf lay hollow:

And, which was worse, if any worse could
prove,

The with'ring leaf foreshew'd your with'r-
ing love.

Yet farther (ah, how far a lover dares!)
My last recourse I had to sieve and shears; ⁷⁰

And told the witch Agreo my disease:
(Agreo, that in harvest us'd to lease:
But harvest done, to charwork did aspire;
Meat, drink, and twopence was her daily hire.)

To work she went, her charms she mutter'd o'er,
And yet the resty sieve wagg'd ne'er the
more;
I wept for woe, the testy beldame
swore;
And, foaming with her god, foretold my
fate;

That I was doom'd to love, and you to hate.
A milk-white goat for you I did provide; ⁸⁰
Two milk-white kids run frisking by her
side,

For which the nut-brown lass, Erithacis,
Full often offer'd many a savory kiss.
Hers they shall be, since you refuse the price:

What madman would o'erstand his market
twice?

My right eye itches, some good luck is
near,
Perhaps my Amaryllis may appear;
I'll set up such a note as she shall hear.
What nymph but my melodious voice would move?

She must be flint, if she refuse my love. ⁹⁰
Hippomenes, who ran with noble strife
To win his lady, or to lose his life, (What shift some men will make to get a wife!)

Threw down a golden apple in her way;
For all her haste she could not choose but
stay.

Renown said: "Run;" the glitt'ring bribe cried: "Hold;"

The man might have been hang'd, but for his gold.

Yet some suppose 't was love (some few indeed)

That stopp'd the fatal fury of her speed:
She saw, she sigh'd; her nimble feet refuse ¹⁰⁰

Their wonted speed, and she took pains to lose.

A prophet some, and some a poet cry,
(No matter which, so neither of them lie,)

From steepy Othrys' top to Pylus drove His herd; and for his pains enjoy'd his
love:

If such another wager should be laid,
I'll find the man, if you can find the maid.
Why name I men, when Love extended finds

His pow'r on high, and in celestial minds?
Venus the shepherd's homely habit took, ¹¹⁰
And manag'd something else besides the crook;

Nay, when Adonis died, was heard to roar,
And never from her heart forgave the boar.

How blest is fair Endymion with his Moon,
Who sleeps on Latmos' top from night to noon!

What Jason from Medea's love possess'd,
You shall not hear, but know 'tis like the
rest.

My aching head can scarce support the
pain;

This cursed love will surely turn my brain:
Feel how it shoots, and yet you take no pity; ¹²⁰

Nay, then 'tis time to end my doleful ditty.
A clammy sweat does o'er my temples
creep;

My heavy eyes are urg'd with iron sleep:
I lay me down to gasp my latest breath,
The wolves will get a breakfast by my
death;

Yet scarce enough their hunger to supply,
For love has made me carrion ere I die.

THE TEARS OF AMYN TA, FOR THE DEATH OF DAMON

SONG

On a bank, beside a willow,
Heav'n her cov'ring, earth her pillow,
Sad Amynta sigh'd alone;
From the cheerless dawn of morning
Till the dews of night returning,
Singing thus, she made her moan:
"Hope is banish'd,
Joys are vanish'd,
Damon, my belov'd, is gone!

"Time, I dare thee to discover 10
Such a youth, and such a lover;
O, so true, so kind was he!
Damon was the pride of nature,
Charming in his every feature;
Damon liv'd alone for me:
Melting kisses,
Murmuring blisses;
Who so liv'd and lov'd as we!

"Never shall we curse the morning, 20
Never bless the night returning,
Sweet embraces to restore;
Never shall we both lie dying,
Nature failing, love supplying
All the joys he drain'd before.
Death, come end me,
To befriend me;
Love and Damon are no more."

PROLOGUE TO THE DISAP-POINTMENT

OR, THE MOTHER IN FASHION

SPOKEN BY MR. BETTERTON

[This play, by Southerne, was acted and printed in 1684; it is noted in the Term Catalogue for Trinity Term (June) of that year. The prologue was reprinted in the third edition, 1702, of Miscellany Poems, the First Part, with the heading, A Prologue, spoken by Mr. Betterton, written by Mr. Dryden. The present text follows that printed with the play in 1684. On the epilogue to the same play, see Appendix I, p. 920, below.]

How comes it, gentlemen, that nowadays,
When all of you so shrewdly judge of plays,

Our poets tax you still with want of sense?
All prologues treat you at your own expense.

Sharp citizens a wiser way can go;
They make you fools, but never call you so.
They in good manners seldom make a slip,
But treat a common whore with ladyship;
But here each saucy wit at random writes,
And uses ladies as he uses knights. 10
Our author, young, and grateful in his nature,

Vows that from him no nymph deserves a satire;

Nor will he ever draw — I mean his rhyme,
Against the sweet partaker of his crime.
Nor is he yet so bold an undertaker,
To call men fools: 'tis railing at their Maker.
Besides, he fears to split upon that shelf;

He's young enough to be a fop himself:
And, if his praise can bring you all abed,
He swears such hopeful youth no nation
ever bred. 20

Your nurses, we presume, in such a
case,
Your father chose, because he lik'd the
face;
And, often, they supplied your mother's
place.
The dry nurse was your mother's ancient
maid,
Who knew some former slip she ne'er be-
tray'd.
Betwixt 'em both, for milk and sugar candy,
Your sucking bottles were well stor'd with brandy.

Your father, to initiate your discourse,
Meant to have taught you first to swear
and curse,
But was prevented by each careful nurse.
For, leaving dad and mam, as names too
common, 31
They taught you certain parts of man and woman.

I pass your schools; for there, when first you came,
You would be sure to learn the Latin name.
In colleges you scorn'd their art of think-
ing,
But learn'd all moods and figures of good
drinking:
Thence come to town, you practice play, to
know

The virtues of the high dice, and the low.
Each thinks himself a sharper most pro-
found:

He cheats by pence, is cheated by the
pound. 40

With these perfections, and what else he gleans,
The spark sets up for love behind our scenes;

Hot in pursuit of princesses and queens.
There, if they know their man, with cunning carriage,

Twenty to one but it concludes in marriage.
He hires some homely room, love's fruits to gather,

And garret-high rebels against his father.
But he once dead —
Brings her in triumph, with her portion,
down,

A twillett, dressing box, and half a crown.

Some marry first, and then they fall to scouring, 51

Which is, refining marriage into whoring.
Our women batten well on their good nature;

All they can rap and rend for the dear creature.

But while abroad so liberal the dolt is,
Poor spouse at home as ragged as a colt is.
Last, some there are, who take their first degrees

Of lewdness in our middle galleries;
The doughty bullies enter bloody drunk,
Invade and grabble one another's punk: 61
They caterwaul, and make a dismal rout;
Call sons of whores, and strike, but ne'er
lug out:

Thus, while for paltry punk they roar and stickle,

They make it bawdier than a conventicle.

EPILOGUE TO CONSTANTINE THE GREAT

SPOKEN BY MRS. COOKE

[This tragedy, by Lee, was first printed in 1684. The epilogue is not assigned to Dryden in this edition or in the early collected editions of Lee's works. It appears, however, in the third edition, 1702, of Miscellany Poems, the First Part, with the words, "written by Mr. Dryden," after the title. The present text follows that printed with the play in 1684.]

OUR hero's happy in the play's conclusion;

The holy rogue at last has met confusion:
Tho' Arius all along appear'd a saint,
The last act shew'd him a True Protestant.

Eusebins (for you know I read Greek authors)

Reports that, after all these plots and slaughters,

The court of Constantine was full of glory,
And every Trimmer turn'd Addressing Tory.

They follow'd him in herds as they were
mad;

When Clause was king, then all the world
was glad: 10

Whigs kept the places they possess'd be-
fore,

And most were in a way of getting more;

Which was as much as saying: "Gentlemen,
Here's power and money to be rogues again."

Indeed there were a sort of peaking tools,
(Some call them modest, but I call 'em fools,)

Men much more loyal, tho' not half so loud;

But these poor devils were cast behind the crowd;

For bold knaves thrive without one grain of sense,

But good men starve for want of impudence. ²⁰

Besides all these, there were a sort of wights,

(I think my author calls them Teckelites,)
Such hearty rogues against the king and laws,

They favor'd even a foreign rebel's cause.
When their own damn'd design was quash'd and aw'd,

At least they gave it their good word abroad.

As many a man, who, for a quiet life,
Breeds out his bastard, not to nose his wife;

Thus o'er their darling plot these Trimmers cry,

And tho' they cannot keep it in their eye, ³⁰

They bind it prentice to Count Teckely.
They believe not the last plot: may I be

curst,
If I believe they e'er believ'd the first!

No wonder their own plot no plot they think;

The man that makes it, never smells the stink.

And, now it comes into my head, I'll tell Why these damn'd Trimmers lov'd the Turks so well.

The original Trimmer, tho' a friend to no

man,
Yet in his heart ador'd a pretty woman;

He knew that Mahomet laid up for ever Kind black-ey'd rogues for every true believer; ⁴¹

And, which was more than mortal man e'er

tasted,
One pleasure that for threescore twelve-months lasted.

To turn for this may surely be forgiven:

Who'd not be circumcis'd for such a heav'n!

TO THE EARL OF ROSCOMMON, ON HIS EXCELLENT ESSAY ON TRANSLATED VERSE

[An Essay on Translated Verse, by Wentworth Dillon, Earl of Roscommon, was first published in 1684; a second edition, "corrected and enlarged," appeared the next year. Dryden's poem is prefixed to both editions; in the second it is slightly revised. Dryden several times refers to Roscommon with warm admiration: see his Preface to Ovid's Epistles (p. 90, above), his Preface to Sylvæ (pp. 176, 178, 179, below), and his Dedication of the Æneis (p. 514, below). In 1683 Roscommon prefixed a complimentary poem to the third issue of Religio Laici.

The present text follows the second edition.]

WHETHER the fruitful Nile, or Tyrian shore,
The seeds of arts and infant science bore,

'T is sure the noble plant, translated first,
Advanc'd its head in Grecian gardens nurs'd.

The Grecians added verse; their tuneful tongue

Made nature first and nature's God their song.

Nor stopp'd translation here; for conquering Rome

With Grecian spoils brought Grecian numbers home,

Enrich'd by those Athenian Muses more Than all the vanquish'd world could yield

before; ¹⁰
Till barb'rous nations, and more barb'rous times,

Debas'd the majesty of verse to rhymes;
Those rude at first: a kind of hobbling

prose,
That limp'd along, and tinkled in the close.

But Italy, reviving from the trance
Of Vandal, Goth, and monkish ignorance,

With pauses, cadence, and well-vowel'd words,

And all the graces a good ear affords,
Made rhyme an art, and Dante's polish'd

page ²⁰
Restor'd a silver, not a golden age.

Then Petrarch follow'd, and in him we see What rhyme improv'd in all its height

can be: ³⁰
At best a pleasing sound, and fair barbarity.

The French pursued their steps; and Britain,

last,
In manly sweetness all the rest surpass'd.

The wit of Greece, the gravity of Rome,
Appear exalted in the British loom;
The Muses' empire is restor'd again,
In Charles his reign, and by Roscommon's
pen.

Yet modestly he does his work survey, 30
And calls a finish'd poem an Essay;
For all the needful rules are scatter'd
here;

Truth smoothly told, and pleasantly severe;
So well is art disguis'd, for nature to ap-
pear.

Nor need those rules, to give translation
light:

His own example is a flame so bright,
That he who but arrives to copy well, Unguided will advance, unknowing will excel.

Scarce his own Horace could such rules
ordain,

Or his own Virgil sing a nobler strain. 40
How much in him may rising Ireland boast,
How much in gaining him has Britain
lost!

Their island in revenge has ours reclaim'd;
The more instructed we, the more we still are sham'd.

'Tis well for us his generous blood did
flow,

Deriv'd from British channels long ago;
That here his conquering ancestors were
nurs'd,

And Ireland but translated England first:
By this reprisal we regain our right,
Else must the two contending nations fight;
A nobler quarrel for his native earth, 51
Than what divided Greece for Homer's
birth.

To what perfection will our tongue arrive,

How will invention and translation thrive,
When authors nobly born will bear their
part,

And not disdain th' inglorious praise of
art!

Great generals thus, descending from command,

With their own toil provoke the soldier's
hand.

How will sweet Ovid's ghost be pleas'd to
hear

His fame augmented by an The Earl of English peer; 60, Mulgrave.

How he embellishes his Helen's loves,

Outdoes his softness, and his sense improves?

When these translate, and teach translators
too,

Nor firstling kid, nor any vulgar vow
Should at Apollo's grateful altar stand:
Roscommon writes; to that auspicious
hand,
Muse, feed the bull that spurns the yellow sand:

Roscommon, whom both court and camps
commend,

True to his prince, and faithful to his
friend;

Roscommon, first in fields of honor known,
First in the peaceful triumphs of the gown, 71
Who both Minervas justly makes his
own.

Now let the few belov'd by Jove, and
they

Whom infus'd Titan form'd of better
clay,

On equal terms with ancient wit ingage,
Nor mighty Homer fear, nor sacred Virgil's page:

Our English palace opens wide in state,
And without stooping they may pass the gate.

TO THE MEMORY OF MR. OLDHAM

[John Oldham, after Dryden and Butler the ablest satirist of the Restoration period, died on December 9, 1683, at the age of thirty. To an edition of his Remains in Verse and Prose, published late in the next year. Dryden prefixed the following noble tribute.]

FAREWELL, too little, and too lately known,
Whom I began to think and call my own:
For sure our souls were near allied, and thine

Cast in the same poetic mold with mine.
One common note on either lyre did strike,
And knaves and fools we both abhorr'd alike.

To the same goal did both our studies
drive;

The last set out the soonest did arrive.
Thus Nisus fell upon the slippery place,
While his young friend perform'd and won the race.

O early ripe ! to thy abundant store
 What could advancing age have added
 more ?
 It might (what nature never gives the young)
 Have taught the numbers of thy native
 tongue.
 But satire needs not those, and wit will shine
 Thro' the harsh cadence of a rugged line:
 A noble error, and but seldom made,
 When poets are by too much force be-
 tray'd.

Thy generous fruits, tho' gather'd ere their prime,
 Still shew'd a quickness; and maturing
 time²⁰
 But mellow what we write to the dull sweets of rhyme.
 Once more, hail and farewell; farewell,
 thou young,
 But ah too short, Marcellus of our tongue;
 Thy brows with ivy, and with laurels
 bound;
 But fate and gloomy night encompass thee
 around.

POEMS INCLUDED IN SYLVÆ (THE SECOND MISCELLANY), 1685

[Encouraged by the success of Miscellany Poems, 1684, Tonson and Dryden undertook a second volume of similar character, which was published in 1685 with a title reading, Sylvæ, or The Second Part of Poetical Miscellanies; and with the motto:

— Non deficit alter
Aureus, et simili frondescit virga metallo. — VIRG.

This book is generally referred to as the Second Miscellany. Second, third, and fourth editions followed in the same years as those of its predecessor: 1692, 1702, and 1716. The third edition adds to the title the words, Publish'd by Mr. Dryden; the title of the fourth edition reads, The Second Part of Miscellany Poems. . . . Publish'd by Mr. Dryden. On the Sylvæ a passage in a letter from Dryden to Tonson, dated by Malone (I, 2, 21) in August or September, 1684, is of much interest: "Your opinion of the Miscellanies is likewise mine: I will for once lay by the Religio Laici till another time. But I must also add, that since we are to have nothing but new, I am resolv'd we will have nothing but good, whomever we disoblige. You will have of mine, four Odes of Horace, which I have already translated; another small translation of forty lines from Lucretius; the whole story of Nisus and Eurialus, both in the fifth and the ninth of Virgil's Æneids: and I care not who translates them beside me, for let him be friend or foe, I will please myself, and not give off in consideration of any man. There will be forty lines more of Virgil in another place, to answer those of Lucretius: I meane those very lines which Montagne has compar'd in those two poets; and Homer shall sleep on for me, — I will not now meddle with him." Evidently Tonson proposed that no reprinted work be included in the new volume, and Dryden followed his suggestion.

After Dryden's preface, the Sylvæ opens with his translations from Virgil, Lucretius, Theocritus, and Horace. Other translations, mainly anonymous, with a few original poems, make up the rest of the volume. Among the contributions is a Latin poem, Horti Arlingtoniani, ad Clarissimum Dominum, Henricum, Comitem Arlingtonia, &c., by Charles Dryden, eldest son of the poet. In the contents of the third and fourth editions of the Sylvæ, as of its predecessor, Tonson, or an editor, made important changes.

When Dryden made his complete translation of Virgil, he rewrote thoroughly the episodes from the Æneid included in the Sylvæ. His earlier texts are omitted at the present point, but are given in Appendix II, pp. 921-928, below.]

PREFACE

FOR this last half-year I have been troubled with the disease (as I may call it) of translation. The cold prose fits of it, which are always the most tedious with me, were spent in the History of the Language; the hot, which succeeded them, in this volume of verse miscellanies. The truth is, I fancied to myself a kind of ease in the change of the paroxysm; never suspecting but the humor would have wasted itself in two or three pastorals of Theocritus, and as many odes of Horace. But finding, or at least thinking I found, something that was more pleasing in them than my ordinary productions, I encourag'd myself to renew my old acquaintance with Lucretius and Virgil; and immediately fix'd upon some parts of them, which had most affected me in the reading. These were my natural impulses for the undertaking; but there was an accidental motive which was full as forcible, and God forgive him who was the occasion of it. It was my Lord Roscommon's Essay on Translated Verse; which made me uneasy till I tried whether or no I was capable of following his rules, and of reducing the speculation into practice. For many a fair precept in poetry is like a seeming demonstration in the mathematics, very specious in the diagram, but failing in the mechanic operation. I think I have generally observ'd his instructions; I am sure my reason is sufficiently convinc'd both of their truth and usefulness; which, in other words, is to confess no less a vanity, than to pretend that I have at least in some places made examples to his rules. Yet, withal, I must acknowledge that I have many times exceeded my commission; for I have both added and omitted, and even sometimes very boldly made such expositions of my authors, as no Dutch commentator will forgive me. Perhaps, in such particular passages, I have thought that I discover'd some beauty yet undiscover'd by those pedants, which none but a poet could have found. Where I have taken away some of their expressions, and cut them shorter, it may possibly be on this consideration, that what was beautiful in the Greek or Latin, would not appear so shining in the English; and where I have enlarg'd them, I desire the false critics would not always think that those thoughts are wholly mine, but that either they are secretly in the poet, or may be fairly deduc'd from him; or at least, if both those considerations should fail, that my own is of a piece with his, and that if he were living, and an Englishman, they are such as he would probably have written.

For, after all, a translator is to make his author appear as charming as possibly he can, provided he maintains his character, and makes him not unlike himself. Translation is a kind of drawing after the life, where everyone will acknowledge there is a double sort of likeness, a good one and a bad. 'Tis one thing to draw the outlines true, the features like, the proportions exact, the coloring itself perhaps tolerable; and another thing to make all these graceful, by the posture, the shadowings, and chiefly by the spirit which animates the whole. I cannot, without some indignation, look on an ill copy of an excellent original. Much less can I behold with patience Virgil, Homer, and some others, whose beauties I have been endeavoring all my life to imitate, so abus'd, as I may say, to their faces, by a botching interpreter. What English readers, unacquainted with Greek or Latin, will believe me, or any other man, when we commend those authors, and confess we derive all that is pardonable in us from their fountains, if they take those to be the same poets, whom our Oglebys have translated? But I dare assure them that a good poet is no more like himself, in a dull translation, than his carcass would be to his living body. There are many who understand Greek and Latin, and yet are ignorant of their mother tongue. The proprieties and delicacies of the English are known to few: 'tis impossible even for a good wit to understand and practice them, without the help of a liberal education, long reading, and digesting of those few good authors we have amongst us, the knowledge of men and manners, the freedom of habitudes and conversation with the best company of both sexes; and, in short, without wearing off the rust which he contracted, while he was laying in a stock of learning. Thus difficult it is to understand the purity of English, and critically to discern not only good writers from bad, and a proper style from a corrupt, but also to distinguish that which is pure in a good author, from that which is vicious and corrupt in him. And for want of all these requisites, or the greatest part of them, most of our ingenious young men take up some cried-up English poet for their model, adore him, and imitate him, as they think, without knowing wherein he is defective, where he is boyish and trifling, wherein either his thoughts are improper to his subject, or his expressions unworthy of his thoughts, or the turn of both is unharmonious.

Thus it appears necessary that a man should be a nice critic in his mother tongue, before he attempts to translate a foreign language. Neither is it sufficient that he be able to judge of words and style, but he must be a master of them too; he must perfectly understand his author's tongue, and absolutely command his own. So that, to be a thorough translator, he must be a thorough poet. Neither is it enough to give his author's sense in good English, in poetical expressions, and in musical numbers; for, tho' all these are exceeding difficult to perform, there yet remains a harder task; and 'tis a secret of which few translators have sufficiently thought. I have already hinted a word or two concerning it; that is, the maintaining the character of an author, which distinguishes him from all others, and makes him appear that individual poet whom you would interpret. For example, not only the thoughts, but the style and versification of Virgil and Ovid, are very different: yet I see, even in our best poets who have translated some parts of them, that they have confounded their several talents; and, by endeavoring only at the sweetness and harmony of numbers, have made them both so much alike, that if I did not know the originals, I should never be able to judge by the copies, which was Virgil, and which was Ovid. It was objected against a late noble painter, that he drew many graceful pictures, but few of them were like. And this happen'd to him, because he always studied himself, more than those who sate to him. In such translators I can easily distinguish the hand which perform'd the work, but I cannot distinguish their poet from another. Suppose two authors are equally sweet, yet there is a great distinction to be made in sweetness, as in that of sugar, and that of honey. I can make the difference more plain, by giving you (if it be worth knowing) my own method of proceeding, in my translations out of four several poets in this volume: Virgil, Theocritus, Lucretius, and Horace. In each of these, before I undertook them, I consider'd the genius and distinguishing character of my author. I look'd on Virgil as a succinct, and grave majestic writer; one who weigh'd not only every thought, but every word and syllable: who was still aiming to crowd his sense into as narrow a compass as possibly he could; for which reason he is so very figurative, that he requires (I may almost say) a grammar apart to construe him. His verse is everywhere sounding the very thing in your ears, whose sense it bears; yet the numbers are perpetually varied, to increase the delight of the reader; so that the same sounds are never repeated twice together. On the contrary, Ovid and Claudian, tho' they write in styles differing from each other, yet have each of them but one sort of music in their verses. All the versification and little variety of Claudian is included within the compass of four or five lines, and then he begins again in the same tenor; perpetually closing his sense at the end of a verse, and that verse commonly which they call golden, or two substantives and two adjectives, with a verb betwixt them to keep the peace. Ovid, with all his sweetness, has as little variety of numbers and sound as he; he is always, as it were, upon the hand-gallop, and his verse runs upon carpet-ground. He avoids, like the other, all synalephas, or cutting off one vowel when it comes before another in the following word; so that, minding only smoothness, he wants both variety and majesty. But to return to Virgil: tho' he is smooth where smoothness is requir'd, yet he is so far from affecting it, that he seems rather to disdain it; frequently makes use of synalephas, and concludes his sense in the middle of his verse. He is everywhere above conceits of epigrammatic wit, and gross hyperboles; he maintains majesty in the midst of plainness; he shines, but glares not; and is stately without ambition, which is the vice of Lucan. I drew my definition of poetical wit from my particular consideration of him: for propriety of thoughts and words are only to be found in him; and, where they are proper, they will be delightful. Pleasure follows of necessity, as the effect does the cause; and therefore is not to be put into the definition. This exact propriety of Virgil I particularly regarded, as a great part of his character; but must confess, to my shame, that I have not been able to translate any part of him so well, as to make him appear wholly like himself. For where the original is close, no version can reach it in the same compass. Hannibal Caro's, in the Italian, is the nearest, the most poetical, and the most sonorous of any translation of the Æneids: yet, tho' he takes the advantage of blank verse, he commonly allows two lines for one of Virgil, and does not always hit his sense. Tasso tells us, in his letters, that Sperone Speroni, a great Italian wit, who was his contemporary, observ'd of Virgil and Tully, that the Latin orator endeavor'd to imitate the copiousness of Homer, the Greek poet; and that the Latin poet made it his business to reach the conciseness of Demosthenes, the Greek orator. Virgil, therefore, being so very sparing of his words, and leaving so much to be imagin'd by the reader, can never be translated as he ought in any modern tongue. To make him copious, is to alter his character; and to translate him line for line is impossible, because the Latin is naturally a more succinct language than either the Italian, Spanish, French, or even than the English, which, by reason of its monosyllables, is far the most compendious of them. Virgil is much the closest of any Roman poet, and the Latin hexameter has more feet than the English heroic.

Besides all this, an author has the choice of his own thoughts and words, which a translator has not; he is confin'd by the sense of the inventor to those expressions which are the nearest to it: so that Virgil, studying brevity, and having the command of his own language, could bring those words into a narrow compass, which a translator cannot render without circumlocutions. In short, they who have call'd him the torture of grammarians, might also have call'd him the plague of translators; for he seems to have studied not to be translated. I own that, endeavoring to turn his Nisus and Euryalus as close as I was able, I have perform'd that episode too literally; that, giving more scope to Mezentius and Lausus, that version, which has more of the majesty of Virgil, has less of his conciseness; and all that I can promise for myself is only that I have done both better than Ogleby, and perhaps as well as Caro: So that, methinks, I come like a malefactor, to make a speech upon the gallows, and to warn all other poets, by my sad example, from the sacrilege of translating Virgil. Yet, by considering him so carefully as I did before my attempt, I have made some faint resemblance of him; and, had I taken more time, might possibly have succeeded better; but never so well, as to have satisfied myself.

He who excels all other poets in his own language, were it possible to do him right, must appear above them in our tongue; which, as my Lord Roscommon justly observes, approaches nearest to the Roman in its majesty: nearest indeed, but with a vast interval betwixt them. There is an inimitable grace in Virgil's words, and in them principally consists that beauty which gives so unexpressible a pleasure to him who best understands their force. This diction of his, I must once again say, is never to be copied; and, since it cannot, he will appear but lame in the best translation. The turns of his verse, his breakings, his propriety, his numbers, and his gravity, I have as far imitated as the poverty of our language and the hastiness of my performance would allow. I may seem sometimes to have varied from his sense; but I think the greatest variations may be fairly deduc'd from him; and where I leave his commentators, it may be I understand him better: at least I writ without consulting them in many places. But two particular lines in Mezentius and Lausus I cannot so easily excuse. They are indeed remotely allied to Virgil's sense; but they are too like the trifling tenderness of Ovid, and were printed before I had consider'd them enough to alter them. The first of them I have forgotten, and cannot easily retrieve, because the copy is at the press; the second is this:

When Lausus died, I was already slain.

This appears pretty enough at first sight; but I am convinc'd for many reasons that the expression is too bold; that Virgil would not have said it, tho' Ovid would. The reader may pardon it, if he please, for the freeness of the confession; and instead of that, and the former, admit these two lines, which are more according to the author:

Nor ask I life, nor fought with that design;
As I had us'd my fortune, use thou thine.

Having with much ado got clear of Virgil, I have, in the next place, to consider the genius of Lucretius, whom I have translated more happily in those parts of him which I undertook. If he was not of the best age of Roman poetry, he was at least of that which preceded it; and he himself refin'd it to that degree of perfection, both in the language and the thoughts, that he left an easy task to Virgil; who, as he succeeded him in time, so he copied his excellencies: for the method of the Georgics is plainly deriv'd from him. Lucretius had chosen a subject naturally crabbed; he therefore adorn'd it with poetical descriptions, and precepts of morality, in the beginning and ending of his books, which you see Virgil has imitated with great success, in those four books, which in my opinion are more perfect in their kind than even his divine Æneids. The turn of his verse he has likewise follow'd, in those places which Lucretius has most labor'd, and some of his very lines he has transplanted into his own works, without much variation. If I am not mistaken, the distinguishing character of Lucretius (I mean of his soul and genius) is a certain kind of noble pride, and positive assertion of his opinions. He is everywhere confident of his own reason, and assuming an absolute command, not only over his vulgar reader, but even his patron Memmius. For he is always bidding him attend, as if he had the rod over him, and using a magisterial authority, while he instructs him. From his time to ours, I know none so like him as our poet and philosopher of Malmesbury. This is that perpetual dictatorship which is exercis'd by Lucretius; who, tho' often in the wrong, yet seems to deal bona fide with his reader, and tells him nothing but what he thinks: in which plain sincerity, I believe, he differs from our Hobbes, who could not but be convinc'd, or at least doubt of some eternal truths, which he has oppos'd. But for Lucretius, he seems to disdain all manner of replies, and is so confident of his cause, that he is beforehand with his antagonists; urging for them whatever he imagin'd they could say, and leaving them, as he supposes, without an objection for the future; all this too, with so much scorn and indignation, as if he were assur'd of the triumph, before he enter'd into the lists. From this sublime and daring genius of his, it must of necessity come to pass, that his thoughts must be masculine, full of argumentation, and that sufficiently warm. From the same fiery temper proceeds the loftiness of his expressions, and the perpetual torrent of his verse, where the barrenness of his subject does not too much constrain the quickness of his fancy. For there is no doubt to be made, but that he could have been everywhere as poetical as he is in his descriptions, and in the moral part of his philosophy, if he had not aim'd more to instruct, in his System of Nature, than to delight. But he was bent upon making Memmius a materialist, and teaching him to defy an invisible power. In short, he was so much an atheist, that he forgot sometimes to be a poet. These are the considerations which I had of that author, before I attempted to translate some parts of him. And accordingly I laid by my natural diffidence and scepticism for a while, to take up that dogmatical way of his, which, as I said, is so much his character, as to make him that individual poet. As for his opinions concerning the mortality of the soul, they are so absurd, that I cannot, if I would, believe them. I think a future state demonstrable even by natural arguments; at least, to take away rewards and punishments, is only a pleasing prospect to a man, who resolves beforehand not to live morally. But on the other side, the thought of being nothing after death is a burden unsupportable to a virtuous man, even tho' a heathen. We naturally aim at happiness, and cannot bear to have it confin'd to the shortness of our present being, especially when we consider that virtue is generally unhappy in this world, and vice fortunate: so that 'tis hope of futurity alone that makes this life tolerable, in expectation of a better. Who would not commit all the excesses to which he is prompted by his natural inclinations, if he may do them with security while he is alive, and be incapable of punishment after he is dead! If he be cunning and secret enough to avoid the laws, there is no band of morality to restrain him: for fame and reputation are weak ties; many men have not the least sense of them; powerful men are only aw'd by them, as they conduce to their interest, and that not always, when a passion is predominant; and no man will be contain'd within the bounds of duty, when he may safely transgress them. These are my thoughts abstractedly, and without ent'ring into the notions of our Christian faith, which is the proper business of divines.

But there are other arguments in this poem (which I have turn'd into English) not belonging to the mortality of the soul, which are strong enough to a reasonable man, to make him less in love with life, and consequently in less apprehensions of death: such as are the natural satiety proceeding from a perpetual enjoyment of the same things; the inconveniences of old age, which make him incapable of corporeal pleasures; the decay of understanding and memory, which render him contemptible and useless to others. These, and many other reasons, so pathetically urg'd, so beautifully express'd, so adorn'd with examples, and so admirably rais'd by the prosopopeia of Nature, who is brought in speaking to her children, with so much authority and vigor, deserve the pains I have taken with them, which I hope have not been unsuccessful, or unworthy of my author. At least I must take the liberty to own that I was pleas'd with my own endeavors, which but rarely happens to me, and that I am not dissatisfied upon the review of anything I have done in this author.

'Tis true, there is something, and that of some moment, to be objected against my Englishing the Nature of Love, from the fourth book of Lucretius; and I can less easily answer why I translated it, than why I thus translated it. The objection arises from the obscenity of the subject, which is aggravated by the too lively and alluring delicacy of the verses. In the first place, without the least formality of an excuse, I own it pleas'd me: and let my enemies make the worst they can of this confession; I am not yet so secure from that passion, but that I want my author's antidotes against it. He has given the truest and most philosophical account both of the disease and remedy, which I ever found in any author: for which reasons I translated him. But it will be ask'd why I turn'd him into this luscious English — for I will not give it a worse word. Instead of an answer, I would ask again of my supercilious adversaries, whether I am not bound, when I translate an author, to do him all the right I can, and to translate him to the best advantage? If, to mince his meaning, which I am satisfied was honest and instructive, I had either omitted some part of what he said, or taken from the strength of his expression, I certainly had wrong'd him; and that freeness of thought and words being thus cashier'd in my hands, he had no longer been Lucretius. If nothing of this kind be to be read, physicians must not study nature, anatomies must not be seen, and somewhat I could say of particular passages in books, which, to avoid profaneness, I do not name. But the intention qualifies the act; and both mine and my author's were to instruct as well as please. 'Tis most certain that barefac'd bawdry is the poorest pretense to wit imaginable. If I should say otherwise, I should have two great authorities against me. The one is the Essay on Poetry, which I publicly valued before I knew the author of it, and with the commendation of which my Lord Roscommon so happily begins his Essay on Translated Verse; the other is no less than our admir'd Cowley, who says the same thing in other words: for in his Ode concerning Wit, he writes thus of it:

Much less can that have any place,
At which a virgin hides her face:
Such dross the fire must purge away; 'tis just
The author blush, there where the reader must.

Here indeed Mr. Cowley goes farther than the Essay; for he asserts plainly that obscenity has no place in wit; the other only says, 'tis a poor pretense to it, or an ill sort of wit, which has nothing more to support it than barefac'd ribaldry; which is both unmannerly in itself, and fulsome to the reader. But neither of these will reach my case: for in the first place, I am only the translator, not the inventor; so that the heaviest part of the censure falls upon Lucretius, before it reaches me; in the next place, neither he nor I have us'd the grossest words, but the cleanliest metaphors we could find, to palliate the broadness of the meaning; and, to conclude, have carried the poetical part no farther than the philosophical exacted.

There is one mistake of mine which I will not lay to the printer's charge, who has enough to answer for in false pointings. 'Tis in the word viper; I would have the verse run thus:

The scorpion, love, must on the wound be bruise'd.

There are a sort of blundering half-witted people, who make a great deal of noise about a verbal slip; tho' Horace would instruct them better in true criticism:

— Non ego paucis
Offendor maculis quas aut incuria fudit,
Aut humana parum cavit natura.

True judgment in poetry, like that in painting, takes a view of the whole together, whether it be good or not; and where the beauties are more than the faults, concludes for the poet against the little judge. 'Tis a sign that malice is hard driven, when 'tis forc'd to lay hold on a word or syllable: to arraign a man is one thing, and to cavil at him is another. In the midst of an ill-natur'd generation of scribblers, there is always justice enough left in mankind to protect good writers; and they too are oblig'd, both by humanity and interest, to espouse each other's cause against false critics, who are the common enemies.

This last consideration puts me in mind of what I owe to the ingenious and learned translator of Lucretius. I have not here design'd to rob him of any part of that commendation which he has so justly acquir'd by the whole author, whose fragments only fall to my portion. What I have now perform'd, is no more than I intended above twenty years ago. The ways of our translation are very different; he follows him more closely than I have done, which became an interpreter of the whole poem: I take more liberty, because it best suited with my design, which was to make him as pleasing as I could. He had been too voluminous, had he us'd my method in so long a work; and I had certainly taken his, had I made it my business to translate the whole. The preference then is justly his; and I join with Mr. Evelyn in the confession of it, with this additional advantage to him, that his reputation is already establish'd in this poet, mine is to make its fortune in the world. If I have been anywhere obscure, in following our common author, or if Lucretius himself is to be condemn'd, I refer myself to his excellent annotations, which I have often read, and always with some new pleasure.

My preface begins already to swell upon me, and looks as if I were afraid of my reader, by so tedious a bespeaking of him: and yet I have Horace and Theocritus upon my hands; but the Greek gentleman shall quickly be dispatch'd, because I have more business with the Roman.

That which distinguishes Theocritus from all other poets, both Greek and Latin, and which raises him even above Virgil in his Eclogues, is the inimitable tenderness of his passions, and the natural expression of them in words so becoming of a pastoral. A simplicity shines thro' all he writes; he shows his art and learning by disguising both. His shepherds never rise above their country education in their complaints of love. There is the same difference betwixt him and Virgil, as there is betwixt Tasso's Aminta and the Pastor Fido of Guarini. Virgil's shepherds are too well-read in the philosophy of Epicurus and of Plato, and Guarini's seem to have been bred in courts; but Theocritus and Tasso have taken theirs from cottages and plains. It was said of Tasso, in relation to his similitudes, mai esce del bosco; that he never departed from the woods, that is, all his comparisons were taken from the country. The same may be said of our Theocritus. He is softer than Ovid; he touches the passions more delicately and performs all this out of his own fond, without diving into the arts and sciences for a supply. Even his Doric dialect has an incomparable sweetness in its clownishness, like a fair shepherdess in her country russet, talking in a Yorkshire tone. This was impossible for Virgil to imitate, because the severity of the Roman language denied him that advantage. Spenser has endeavor'd it in his Shepherds' Calendar; but neither will it succeed in English; for which reason I forbore to attempt it. For Theocritus writ to Sicilians, who spoke that dialect; and I direct this part of my translations to our ladies, who neither understand nor will take pleasure in such homely expressions. I proceed to Horace.

Take him in parts, and he is chiefly to be consider'd in his three different talents, as he was a critic, a satirist, and a writer of odes. His morals are uniform, and run thro' all of them; for, let his Dutch commentators say what they will, his philosophy was Epicurean; and he made use of gods and providence only to serve a turn in poetry. But since neither his criticisms, which are the most instructive of any

that are written in this art, nor his satires, which are incomparably beyond Juvenal's, if to laugh and rally is to be preferr'd to railing and declaiming, are any part of my present undertaking, I confine myself wholly to his odes. These are also of several sorts: some of them are panegyric, others moral, the rest jovial, or (if I may so call them) Bacchanalian. As difficult as he makes it, and as indeed it is, to imitate Pindar, yet, in his most elevated flights, and in the sudden changes of his subject with almost imperceptible connections, that Theban poet is his master. But Horace is of the more bounded fancy, and confines himself strictly to one sort of verse, or stanza, in every ode. That which will distinguish his style from all other poets is the elegance of his words, and the numerousness of his verse: there is nothing so delicately turn'd in all the Roman language. There appears in every part of his diction, or (to speak English) in all his expressions, a kind of noble and bold purity. His words are chosen with as much exactness as Virgil's; but there seems to be a greater spirit in them. There is a secret happiness attends his choice, which in Petronius is called curiosa felicitas, and which I suppose he had from the feliciter audere of Horace himself. But the most distinguishing part of all his character seems to me to be his briskness, his jollity, and his good humor; and those I have chiefly endeavor'd to copy. His other excellencies, I confess, are above my imitation. One ode, which infinitely pleas'd me in the reading, I have attempted to translate in Pindaric verse: 't is that which is inscrib'd to the present Earl of Rochester, to whom I have particular obligations, which this small testimony of my gratitude can never pay. 'Tis his darling in the Latin, and I have taken some pains to make it my masterpiece in English; for which reason I took this kind of verse, which allows more latitude than any other. Everyone knows it was introduc'd into our language, in this age, by the happy genius of Mr. Cowley. The seeming easiness of it has made it spread; but it has not been consider'd enough, to be so well cultivated. It languishes in almost every hand but his, and some very few, whom, to keep the rest in countenance, I do not name. He, indeed, has brought it as near perfection as was possible in so short a time. But if I may be allow'd to speak my mind modestly, and without injury to his sacred ashes, somewhat of the purity of English, somewhat of more equal thoughts, somewhat of sweetness in the numbers, in one word, somewhat of a finer turn, and more lyrical verse, is yet wanting. As for the soul of it, which consists in the warmth and vigor of fancy, the masterly figures, and the copiousness of imagination, he has excell'd all others in this kind.

Yet, if the kind itself be capable of more perfection, tho' rather in the ornamental parts of it, than the essential, what rules of morality or respect have I broken, in naming the defects, that they may hereafter be amended? Imitation is a nice point, and there are few poets who deserve to be models in all they write. Milton's Paradise Lost is admirable; but am I therefore bound to maintain that there are no flats amongst his elevations, when 't is evident he creeps along sometimes, for above an hundred lines together? Cannot I admire the height of his invention, and the strength of his expression, without defending his antiquated words, and the perpetual harshness of their sound? 'Tis as much commendation as a man can bear, to own him excellent; all beyond it is idolatry.

Since Pindar was the prince of lyric poets, let me have leave to say that, in imitating him, our numbers should, for the most part, be lyrical. For variety, or rather where the majesty of the thought requires it, they may be stretch'd to the English heroic of five feet, and to the French Alexandrine of six. But the ear must preside, and direct the judgment to the choice of numbers. Without the nicety of this, the harmony of Pindaric verse can never be complete: the cadency of one line must be a rule to that of the next; and the sound of the former must slide gently into that which follows, without leaping from one extreme into another. It must be done like the shadowings of a picture, which fall by degrees into a darker color. I shall be glad, if I have so explain'd myself as to be understood: but if I have not, quod nequeo dicere, et sentio tantum, must be my excuse.

There remains much more to be said on this subject; but, to avoid envy, I will be silent. What I have said is the general opinion of the best judges, and in a manner has been forc'd from me, by seeing a noble sort of poetry so happily restor'd by one man, and so grossly copied by almost all the rest. A musical ear, and a great genius, if another Mr. Cowley could arise, in another age may bring it to perfection. In the mean time:

— Fungar vice cotis, acutum
Reddere quæ ferrum valet, expers ipsa secandi.

I hope it will not be expected from me that I should say anything of my fellow-undertakers in this Miscellany. Some of them are too nearly related to me to be commended without suspicion of partiality: others, I am sure, need it not; and the rest I have not perus'd.

To conclude, I am sensible that I have written this too hastily and too loosely: I fear I have been tedious, and, which is worse, it comes out from the first draught, and uncorrected.

This, I grant, is no excuse; for it may be reasonably urg'd, why did he not write with more leisure, or, if he had it not, (which was certainly my case,) why did he attempt to write on so nice a subject? The objection is unanswerable; but in part of recompense, let me assure the reader, that, in hasty productions, he is sure to meet with an author's present sense, which cooler thoughts would possibly have disguis'd. There is undoubtedly more of spirit, tho' not of judgment, in these incorrect essays, and consequently, tho' my hazard be the greater, yet the reader's pleasure is not the less.

JOHN DRYDEN.

LUCRETIVS

THE BEGINNING OF THE FIRST BOOK

DELIGHT of humankind, and gods above,
Parent of Rome, propitious Queen of Love,
Whose vital pow'r, air, earth, and sea supplies,
And breeds whate'er is born beneath the rolling skies:
For every kind, by thy prolific might,
Springs, and beholds the regions of the light.
Thee, goddess, thee the clouds and tempests fear,
And at thy pleasing presence disappear:
For thee the land in fragrant flow'rs is dress'd;
For thee the ocean smiles, and smooths her wavy breast;
And heav'n itself with more serene and purer light is blest.
For when the rising spring adorns the mead,
And a new scene of nature stands display'd,
When teeming buds and cheerful greens appear,
And western gales unlock the lazy year;
The joyous birds thy welcome first express,
Whose native songs thy genial fire confess;
Then salvage beasts bound o'er their slighted food,
Strook with thy darts, and tempt the raging flood.
All nature is thy gift; earth, air, and sea:
Of all that breathes, the various progeny,
Stung with delight, is goaded on by thee.

O'er barren mountains, o'er the flow'ry plain,
The leavy forest, and the liquid main,
Extends thy uncontroll'd and boundless reign.

Thro' all the living regions dost thou move,
And scatter'st, where thou goest, the kindly seeds of love.

Since then the race of every living thing Obeys thy pow'r; since nothing new can spring

Without thy warmth, without thy influence bear,

Or beautiful, or lovesome can appear;
Be thou my aid, my tuneful song inspire,
And kindle with thy own productive fire;
While all thy province, Nature, I survey,
And sing to Memmius an immortal lay
Of heav'n and earth, and everywhere thy wondrous pow'r display:

To Memmius, under thy sweet influence born,

Whom thou with all thy gifts and graces dost adorn.

The rather, then, assist my Muse and me,
Infusing verses worthy him and thee.

Meantime on land and sea let barb'rous discord cease,

And lull the list'ning world in universal peace.

To thee mankind their soft repose must owe,

For thou alone that blessing canst bestow;

Because the brutal business of the war
Is manag'd by thy dreadful servant's care;

Who oft retires from fighting fields, to prove

The pleasing pains of thy eternal love;
And, panting on thy breast, supinely lies,

While with thy heavenly form he feeds his famish'd eyes;

Sucks in with open lips thy balmy breath,
By turns restor'd to life, and plung'd in pleasing death.

There while thy curling limbs about him move,

Involv'd and fetter'd in the links of love,
When, wishing all, he nothing can deny,

Thy charms in that auspicious moment try;

With winning eloquence our peace implore,

And quiet to the weary world restore.

LUCRETII

THE BEGINNING OF THE SECOND BOOK

Suave mari magno, &c.

'Tis pleasant, safely to behold from shore
The rolling ship, and hear the tempest
 roar:

Not that another's pain is our delight;
But pains unfelt produce the pleasing sight.
'Tis pleasant also to behold from far
The moving legions mingled in the war;
But much more sweet thy lab'ring steps to guide

To virtue's heights, with wisdom well supplied,
And all the magazines of learning fortified:

From thence to look below on humankind,
Bewilder'd in the maze of life, and blind:
To see vain fools ambitiously contend
For wit and pow'r; their lost endeavors bend
T' outshine each other, waste their time and health

In search of honor, and pursuit of wealth.

O wretched man! in what a mist of life,
Inclos'd with dangers and with noisy strife,
He spends his little span, and overfeeds
His cramm'd desires with more than nature needs!

For nature wisely stints our appetite, 20
And craves no more than undisturb'd delight:

Which minds, unmix'd with cares and fears,
 obtain;

A soul serene, a body void of pain.
So little this corporeal frame requires;
So bounded are our natural desires,
That wanting all, and setting pain aside,
With bare privation sense is satisfied.

If golden sconces hang not on the walls,
To light the costly suppers and the balls;
If the proud palace shines not with the
 state 30

Of burnish'd bowls, and of reflected plate;
If well-tun'd harps, nor the more pleasing
 sound

Of voices, from the vaulted roofs rebound;
Yet on the grass, beneath a poplar shade,
By the cool stream our careless limbs are
 laid;

With cheaper pleasures innocently blest,
When the warm spring with gaudy flow'rs is dress'd.

Nor will the raging fever's fire abate
With golden canopies and beds of state;
But the poor patient will as soon be sound
On the hard mattress, or the mother
 ground. 41

Then since our bodies are not eas'd the
 more
By birth, or pow'r, or fortune's wealthy
 store,

'Tis plain, these useless toys of every kind
As little can relieve the lab'ring mind:
Unless we could suppose the dreadful sight
Of marshal'd legions moving to the fight,
Could, with their sound and terrible array, Expel our fears, and drive the thoughts of death away.

But, since the supposition vain appears, 50
Since clinging cares, and trains of inbred
 fears,

Are not with sounds to be affrighted thence,
But in the midst of pomp pursue the prince,
Not aw'd by arms, but in the presence bold,
Without respect to purple or to gold;

Why should not we these pageantries despise,

Whose worth but in our want of reason
 lies?

For life is all in wand'ring errors led;
And just as children are surpris'd with dread,

And tremble in the dark, so riper years 60
Ev'n in broad daylight are possess'd with
 fears,

And shake at shadows fanciful and vain
As those which in the breasts of children
 reign.

These bugbears of the mind, this inward
 hell,

No rays of outward sunshine can dispel;
But nature and right reason must display
Their beams abroad, and bring the dark-some soul to day.

LUCRETII

THE LATTER PART OF THE THIRD BOOK

AGAINST THE FEAR OF DEATH

WHAT has this bugbear death to frighten
 man,

If souls can die, as well as bodies can?
For, as before our birth we felt no pain,
When Punic arms infested land and main,

When heav'n and earth were in confusion
 hurl'd,
 For the debated empire of the world,
 Which aw'd with dreadful expectation lay,
 Sure to be slaves, uncertain who should
 sway:
 So, when our mortal frame shall be dis-
 join'd,
 The lifeless lump uncoupled from the
 mind,
 From sense of grief and pain we shall be
 free;
 We shall not feel, because we shall not be.
 Tho' earth in seas, and seas in heav'n were
 lost,
 We should not move, we only should be
 toss'd.
 Nay, ev'n suppose when we have suffer'd
 fate,
 The soul could feel in her divided state,
 What's that to us? for we are only we
 While souls and bodies in one frame agree.
 Nay, tho' our atoms should revolve by
 chance,
 And matter leap into the former dance; 20
 Tho' time our life and motion could re-
 store,
 And make our bodies what they were be-
 fore,
 What gain to us would all this bustle
 bring?
 The new-made man would be another
 thing.
 When once an interrupting pause is made,
 That individual being is decay'd.
 We, who are dead and gone, shall bear no
 part
 In all the pleasures, nor shall feel the smart
 Which to that other mortal shall accrue, Whom of our matter time shall mold
 anew.
 For backward if you look on that long
 space
 Of ages past, and view the changing face
 Of matter, toss'd and variously combin'd
 In sundry shapes, 't is easy for the mind
 From thence t' infer, that seeds of things have been
 In the same order as they now are seen:
 Which yet our dark remembrance cannot trace,
 Because a pause of life, a gaping space,
 Has come betwixt, where memory lies
 dead,

And all the wand'ring motions from the sense are fled. 40
 For whosoe'er shall in misfortunes live,
 Must be, when those misfortunes shall ar-
 rise;
 And since the man who is not, feels not
 woe,
 (For death exempts him, and wards off the
 blow,
 Which we, the living, only feel and bear,)
 What is there left for us in death to fear?
 When once that pause of life has come between,
 'T is just the same as we had never been.
 And therefore if a man bemoan his lot,
 That after death his mold'ring limbs shall
 rot,
 Or flames, or jaws of beasts devour his mass, 50
 Know, he's an unsincere, unthinking ass.
 A secret sting remains within his mind;
 The fool is to his own east offals kind.
 He boasts no sense can after death re-
 main,
 Yet makes himself a part of life again. }
 As if some other He could feel the pain. }
 If, while he live, this thought molest his
 head,
 What wolf or vulture shall devour me
 dead?
 He wastes his days in idle grief, nor can 60
 Distinguish 'twixt the body and the man;
 But thinks himself can still himself survive;
 And, what when dead he feels not, feels alive.
 Then he repines that he was born to die, .
 Nor knows in death there is no other He,
 No living He remains his grief to vent,
 And o'er his senseless carcass to lament.
 If after death 't is painful to be torn
 By birds, and beasts, then why not so to burn;
 Or, drench'd in floods of honey, to be soak'd; 70
 Imbalm'd, to be at once preserv'd and chok'd;
 Or on an airy mountain's top to lie,
 Expos'd to cold and heav'n's inclemency;
 Or crowded in a tomb to be oppress'd
 With monumental marble on thy breast?
 But to be snatch'd from all thy household joys,
 From thy chaste wife, and thy dear prat-
 tling boys,
 Whose little arms about thy legs are cast,

And climbing for a kiss prevent their mother's haste,
 Inspiring secret pleasure thro' thy breast —
 All these shall be no more: thy friends oppress'd⁸¹ Thy care and courage now no more shall
 free;
 "Ah! wretch!" thou cry'st, "ah! miserable
 me!
 One woful day sweeps children, friends, and
 wife,
 And all the brittle blessings of my life!"
 Add one thing more, and all thou say'st is
 true;
 Thy want and wish of them is vanish'd too:
 Which, well consider'd, were a quick relief
 To all thy vain imaginary grief.
 For thou shalt sleep, and never wake again,⁹⁰
 And, quitting life, shalt quit thy living pain.
 But we, thy friends, shall all those sorrows find,
 Which in forgetful death thou leav'st
 behind;
 No time shall dry our tears, nor drive thee from our mind.
 The worst that can befall thee, measur'd
 right,
 Is a sound slumber, and a long good-night.
 Yet thus the fools, that would be thought the wits,
 Disturb their mirth with melancholy fits:
 When healths go round, and kindly brim-
 mers flow,
 Till the fresh garlands on their foreheads glow,¹⁰⁰
 They whine, and cry: "Let us make haste
 to live.
 Short are the joys that human life can give."
 Eternal preachers, that corrupt the draught,
 And pall the god, that never thinks, with
 thought;
 Idiots with all that thought, to whom the worst
 Of death is want of drink, and endless
 thirst,
 Or any fond desire as vain as these.
 For ev'n in sleep, the body, wrapp'd in ease,
 Supinely lies, as in the peaceful grave;
 And, wanting nothing, nothing can it crave.¹¹⁰
 Were that sound sleep eternal, it were
 death;
 Yet the first atoms then, the seeds of
 breath,

Are moving near to sense; we do but shake
 And rouse that sense, and straight we are awake.

Then death to us, and death's anxiety,
 Is less than nothing, if a less could be.
 For then our atoms, which in order lay,
 Are scatter'd from their heap, and puff'd
 away,

And never can return into their place,
 When once the pause of life has left an empty space.¹²⁰

And last, suppose great Nature's voice should call

To thee, or me, or any of us all:

"What dost thou mean, ungrateful wretch,
 thou vain,

Thou mortal thing, thus idly to complain,
 And sigh and sob that thou shalt be no
 more?

For if thy life were pleasant heretofore,
 If all the bounteous blessings, I could
 give,

Thou hast enjoy'd; if thou hast known
 to live.

And pleasure not leak'd thro' thee like a sieve;

Why dost thou not give thanks as at a plenteous feast,¹³⁰

Cramm'd to the throat with life, and rise and take thy rest?

But if my blessings thou hast thrown away,
 If indigested joys pass'd thro', and would not stay,

Why dost thou wish for more to squander
 still?

If life be grown a load, a real ill,
 And I would all thy cares and labors end,
 Lay down thy burden, fool, and know thy
 friend.

To please thee, I have emptied all my
 store;

I can invent and can supply no more,
 But run the round again, the round I ran before.¹⁴⁰

Suppose thou art not broken yet with
 years,

Yet still the selfsame scene of things appears,

And would be ever, couldst thou ever live;
 For life is still but life, there's nothing new to give."

What can we plead against so just a bill?

We stand convicted, and our cause goes ill.

But if a wretch, a man oppress'd by fate,
 Should beg of Nature to prolong his date,

She speaks aloud to him with more disdain:
 "Be still, thou martyr fool, thou covetous of pain." 150

But if an old decrepit sot lament;
 "What, thou," she cries, "who hast outliv'd
 content !

Dost thou complain, who hast enjoy'd my
 store ?

But this is still th' effect of wishing more.
 Unsatisfied with all that Nature brings;
 Loathing the present, liking absent things;
 From hence it comes, thy vain desires, at
 strife

Within themselves, have tantaliz'd thy
 life;

And ghastly death appear'd before thy
 sight,

Ere thou hadst gorg'd thy soul and senses
 with delight. 160

Now leave those joys, unsuited to thy age,
 To a fresh comer, and resign the stage."

Is Nature to be blam'd if thus she chide ?

No, sure; for 't is her business to provide,
 Against this ever-changing frame's decay,
 New things to come, and old to pass away.
 One being, worn, another being makes;
 Chang'd, but not lost; for Nature gives and takes:

New matter must be found for things to
 come,

And these must waste like those, and follow Nature's doom. 170

All things, like thee, have time to rise and
 rot;

And from each other's ruin are begot:
 For life is not confin'd to him or thee;
 'T is given to all for use, to none for property.

Consider former ages past and gone,
 Whose circles ended long ere thine begun,
 Then tell me, fool, what part in them thou hast.

Thus may'st thou judge the future by the past.

What horror see'st thou in that quiet state ?
 What bugbear dreams to fright thee after
 fate ? 180

No ghost, no goblins, that still passage keep;
 But all is there serene, in that eternal
 sleep.

For all the dismal tales that poets tell
 Are verified on earth, and not in hell.
 No Tantalus looks up with fearful eye,
 Or dreads th' impending rock to crush him
 from on high;

But fear of chance on earth disturbs our easy hours,
 Or vain imagin'd wrath of vain imagin'd
 pow'rs.

No Tityus torn by vultures lies in hell;
 Nor could the lobes of his rank liver
 swell 190

To that prodigious mass for their eternal meal:

Not tho' his monstrous bulk had cover'd
 o'er

Nine spreading acres, or nine thousand
 more;

Not tho' the globe of earth had been the giant's floor:

Nor in eternal torments could he lie,
 Nor could his corpse sufficient food supply.

But he's the Tityus, who by love op-
 press'd,

Or tyrant passion preying on his breast,
 And ever-anxious thoughts, is robb'd of
 rest.

The Sisyphus is he, whom noise and strife
 Seduce from all the soft retreats of life, 201

To vex the government, disturb the laws:
 Drunk with the fumes of popular applause,

He courts the giddy crowd to make him
 great,

And sweats and toils in vain, to mount the sovereign seat.

For still to aim at pow'r, and still to fail,
 Ever to strive, and never to prevail,

What is it, but, in reason's true account,
 To heave the stone against the rising
 mount ?

Which urg'd, and labor'd, and forc'd up with pain, 210

Recoils, and rolls impetuous down, and smokes along the plain.

Then still to treat thy ever-craving mind
 With ev'ry blessing, and of ev'ry kind,

Yet never fill thy rav'ning appetite;
 Tho' years and seasons vary thy delight,

Yet nothing to be seen of all the store,
 But still the wolf within thee barks for
 more;

This is the fable's moral, which they tell
 Of fifty foolish virgins damn'd in hell

To leaky vessels, which the liquor spill; 220
 To vessels of their sex, which none could ever fill.

As for the Dog, the Furies, and their snakes,

The gloomy caverns, and the burning lakes,
 And all the vain infernal trumpery,

They neither are, nor were, nor e'er can be.
But here on earth the guilty have in view
The mighty pains to mighty mischiefs due;
Racks, prisons, poisons, the Tarpeian rock,
Stripes, hangmen, pitch, and suffocating
smoke;

And last, and most, if these were cast behind, ²³⁰

Th' avenging horror of a conscious mind,
Whose deadly fear anticipates the blow,
And sees no end of punishment and woe;
But looks for more, at the last gasp of
breath:

This makes a hell on earth, and life a
death.

Meantime, when thoughts of death disturb thy head;

Consider, Ancus, great and good, is dead;
Ancus, thy better far, was born to die;
And thou, dost thou bewail mortality?
So many monarchs with their mighty state,
Who rul'd the world, were overrul'd by fate. ²⁴¹

That haughty king, who lorded o'er the
main,

And whose stupendous bridge did the wild waves restrain,

(In vain they foam'd, in vain they threat-
en'd wreck,

While his proud legions march'd upon their back,)

Him death, a greater monarch, overcame;
Nor spar'd his guards the more, for their immortal name.

The Roman chief, the Carthaginian dread, }
Scipio, the thunderbolt of war, is dead, }
And, like a common slave, by fate in tri- } umph led. ²⁵⁰

The founders of invented arts are lost;
And wits, who made eternity their boast.
Where now is Homer, who possess'd the
throne?

Th' immortal work remains, the mortal author's gone.

Democritus, perceiving age invade,
His body weaken'd, and his mind decay'd,
Obey'd the summons with a cheerful face;
Made haste to welcome death, and met him half the race.

That stroke ev'n Epicurus could not bar, }
Tho' he in wit surpass'd mankind, as far }
As does the midday sun the midnight }
star. ²⁶¹

And thou, dost thou disdain to yield thy
breath,

Whose very life is little more than death?
More than one half by lazy sleep pos-
sess'd;

And when awake, thy soul but nods at
best,

Day-dreams and sickly thoughts revolving in thy breast.

Eternal troubles haunt thy anxious mind, Whose cause and cure thou never hop'st to
find;

But still uncertain, with thyself at strife,
Thou wander'st in the labyrinth of life. ²⁷⁰

O, if the foolish race of man, who find
A weight of cares still pressing on their
mind,

Could find as well the cause of this unrest,
And all this burden lodg'd within the breast;
Sure they would change their course, nor live as now,

Uncertain what to wish or what to vow.

Uneasy both in country and in town,
They search a place to lay their burden
down.

One, restless in his palace, walks abroad,
And vainly thinks to leave behind the load; ²⁸⁰

But straight returns, for he's as restless
there,

And finds there's no relief in open air.

Another to his villa would retire,

And spurs as hard as if it were on fire;

No sooner enter'd at his country door,

But he begins to stretch, and yawn, and }
snore;

Or seeks the city which he left before. }

Thus every man o'erworks his weary
will,

To shun himself, and to shake off his ill;

The shaking fit returns, and hangs upon him still. ²⁹⁰

No prospect of repose, nor hope of ease;

The wretch is ignorant of his disease;

Which known would all his fruitless trouble spare,

For he would know the world not worth
his care;

Then would he search more deeply for the
cause;

And study nature well, and nature's laws:

For in this moment lies not the debate,

But on our future, fix'd, eternal state;

That never-changing state, which all must
keep,

Whom death has doom'd to everlasting sleep. ³⁰⁰

Why are we then so fond of mortal life,
Beset with dangers, and maintain'd with
strife?

A life which all our care can never save;
One fate attends us, and one common grave.
Besides, we tread but a perpetual round;
We ne'er strike out, but beat the former
ground,
And the same mawkish joys in the same track are found.

For still we think an absent blessing
best,
Which cloy's, and is no blessing when
possess'd;

A new arising wish expels it from the breast. ³¹⁰

The fev'rish thirst of life increases still;
We call for more and more, and never have our fill,

Yet know not what to-morrow we shall try,
What dregs of life in the last draught may
lie:

Nor, by the longest life we can attain,
One moment from the length of death
we gain;

For all behind belongs to his eternal
reign.

When once the Fates have cut the mortal
thread,

The man as much to all intents is dead,
Who dies to-day, and will as long be so, ³²⁰
As he who died a thousand years ago.

LUCRETII

THE FOURTH BOOK

CONCERNING THE NATURE OF LOVE

BEGINNING AT THIS LINE

Sic igitur Veneris qui telis accipit ictum, &c.

THUS, therefore, he who feels the fiery
dart

Of strong desire transfix his amorous
heart,

Whether some beauteous boy's alluring
face,

Or lovelier maid, with unresisted grace,
From her each part the winged arrow
sends,

From whence he first was struck he thither
tends;

Restless he roams, impatient to be freed,
And eager to inject the sprightly seed; 8

For fierce desire does all his mind employ,
And ardent love assures approaching joy.

Such is the nature of that pleasing smart,
Whose burning drops distil upon the heart,
The fever of the soul shot from the fair,
And the cold ague of succeeding care.

If absent, her idea still appears,
And her sweet name is chiming in your ears.

But strive those pleasing phantoms to re-
move,

And shun th' ærial images of love,
That feed the flame: when one molests thy
mind,

Discharge thy loins on all the leaky kind;
For that's a wiser way than to restrain ²¹ Within thy swelling nerves that hoard of
pain.

For every hour some deadlier symptom shows,

And by delay the gath'ring venom grows,
When kindly applications are not us'd;
The viper, love, must on the wound be bruise'd.

On that one object 't is not safe to stay,
But force the tide of thought some other
way;

The squander'd spirits prodigally throw,
And in the common glebe of nature sow. ³⁰
Nor wants he all the bliss that lovers feign,
Who takes the pleasure, and avoids the
pain;

For purer joys in purer health abound,
And less affect the sickly than the sound.

When love its utmost vigor does employ,
Ev'n then 't is but a restless wand'ring joy;
Nor knows the lover in that wild excess,
With hands or eyes, what first he would
possess;

But strains at all, and, fast'ning where he strains, ³⁹

Too closely presses with his frantic pains;
With biting kisses hurts the twining fair,
Which shews his joys imperfect, unsincere:
For, stung with inward rage, he flings
around,

And strives t' avenge the smart on that which gave the wound.

But love those eager bitings does restrain,
And mingling pleasure mollifies the pain.

For ardent hope still flatters anxious grief,
And sends him to his foe to seek relief:

Which yet the nature of the thing denies;
For love, and love alone of all our joys, ⁵⁰
By full possession does but fan the fire;

The more we still enjoy, the more we still desire.

Nature for meat and drink provides a space,
And, when receiv'd, they fill their certain place;

Hence thirst and hunger may be satisfied,
But this repletion is to love denied:
Form, feature, color, whatsoe'er delight
Provokes the lover's endless appetite,
These fill no space, nor can we thence remove

With lips, or hands, or all our instruments of love: 60

In our deluded grasp we nothing find,
But thin ærial shapes, that fleet before the mind.

As he, who in a dream with drought is curst,
And finds no real drink to quench his thirst,
Runs to imagin'd lakes his heat to steep,
And vainly swills and labors in his sleep;
So love with phantoms cheats our longing eyes,

Which hourly seeing never satisfies:
Our hands pull nothing from the parts
they strain,

But wander o'er the lovely limbs in vain.
Nor when the youthful pair more closely
join, 71

When hands in hands they lock, and thighs
in thighs they twine,

Just in the raging foam of full desire,
When both press on, both murmur, both
expire,

They gripe, they squeeze, their humid tongues they dart,

As each would force their way to t'other's
heart:

In vain; they only cruise about the coast;
For bodies cannot pierce, nor be in bodies
lost,

As sure they strive to be, when both engage

In that tumultuous momentary rage; 80
So 'tangled in the nets of love they lie,
Till man dissolves in that excess of joy.

Then, when the gather'd bag has burst its
way,

And ebbing tides the slacken'd nerves betray,

A pause ensues; and nature nods a while,
Till with recruited rage new spirits boil;
And then the same vain violence returns,
With flames renew'd th' erected furnace burns;

Again they in each other would be lost,

But still by adamant bars are cross'd. 90
All ways they try, successless all they
prove,

To cure the secret sore of ling'ring love.

Besides —

They waste their strength in the venereal
strife,

And to a woman's will enslave their life;
Th' estate runs out, and mortgages are
made,

All offices of friendship are decay'd,
Their fortune ruin'd, and their fame be-
tray'd. }

Assyrian ointment from their temples flows,
And diamond buckles sparkle at their shoes; 100

The cheerful emerald twinkles on their
hands,

With all the luxury of foreign lands;
And the blue coat, that with imbroid'ry shines,

Is drunk with sweat of their o'er-labor'd loins.

Their frugal fathers' gains they misemploy,
And turn to point, and pearl, and ev'ry female toy.

French fashions, costly treats are their de-
light;

The park by day, and plays and balls by night.

In vain —

For in the fountain, where their sweets are
sought, 110

Some bitter bubbles up, and poisons all the draught.

First, guilty Conscience does the mirror
bring,

Then sharp Remorse shoots out her angry
sting;

And anxious thoughts, within themselves
at strife,

Upbraid the long misspent, luxurious life.

Perhaps, the fickle fair one proves unkind,
Or drops a doubtful word, that pains his
mind, }

And leaves a rankling jealousy behind.

Perhaps, he watches close her amorous
eyes,

And in the act of ogling does surprise, 120
And thinks he sees upon her cheeks the while

The dimpled tracks of some foregoing
smile;

His raging pulse beats thick, and his pent spirits boil. }

This is the product ev'n of prosp'rous love;
Think then what pangs disastrous passions
prove !

Innumerable ills; disdain, despair,
With all the meager family of care.

Thus, as I said, 't is better to prevent,
Than flatter the disease, and late repent;
Because to shun th' allurements is not hard
To minds resolv'd, forewarn'd, and well
prepar'd; ¹³¹

But wondrous difficult, when once beset,
To struggle thro' the straits, and break th'
involving net.

Yet, thus insnar'd, thy freedom thou may'st
gain,

If, like a fool, thou dost not hug thy chain;
If not to ruin obstinately blind,

And wilfully endeavoring not to find
Her plain defects of body and of mind. }

For thus the Bedlam train of lovers use T' inance the value, and the faults excuse; ¹⁴⁰

And therefore 't is no wonder if we see
They dote on dowdies and deformity.

Ev'n what they cannot praise, they will not
blame,

But veil with some extenuating name.
The sallow skin is for the swarthy put,

And love can make a slattern of a slut;
If cat-ey'd, then a Pallas is their love;

If freckled, she's a party-color'd dove;
If little, then she's life and soul all o'er;

An Amazon, the large two-handed whore.
She stammers: O, what grace in lisp-
ing lies ! ¹⁵¹

If she says nothing, to be sure she's wise.
If shrill, and with a voice to drown a
choir,

Sharp-witted she must be, and full of fire.
The lean, consumptive wench, with coughs decay'd,

Is call'd a pretty, tight, and slender maid;
Th' o'er-grown, a goodly Ceres is express'd,

A bedfellow for Bacchus at the least.
Flat-nose the name of Satyr never misses,

And hanging blobber lips but pout for kisses. ¹⁶⁰

The task were endless all the rest to trace;
Yet grant she were a Venus for her face

And shape, yet others equal beauty share,
And time was you could live without the
fair;

She does no more, in that for which you
woo,

Then homelier women full as well can do.

Besides, she daubs, and stinks so much of paint,

Her own attendants cannot bear the scent,
But laugh behind, and bite their lips to hold. ¹⁶⁹

Meantime, excluded, and expos'd to cold,
The whining lover stands before the gates,

And there with humble adoration waits;
Crowning with flow'rs the threshold and
the floor,

And printing kisses on th' obdurate door;
Who, if admitted in that nick of time,

If some unsav'ry whiff betray the crime,
Invents a quarrel straight, if there be none,

Or makes some faint excuses to be gone;
And calls himself a doting fool to serve,

Ascribing more than woman can deserve.
Which well they understand, like cunning
queans, ¹⁸¹

And hide their nastiness behind the scenes,
From him they have allur'd, and would re-
tain;

But to a piercing eye 't is all in vain:
For common sense brings all their cheats
to view,

And the false light discovers by the true;
Which a wise harlot owns, and hopes to
find

A pardon for defects that run thro' all the
kind.

Nor always do they feign the sweets of
love,

When round the panting youth their pliant limbs they move, ¹⁹⁰

And cling, and heave, and moisten ev'ry kiss;

They often share, and more than share the
bliss:

From every part, ev'n to their inmost soul,
They feel the trickling joys, and run with vigor to the goal.

Stirr'd with the same impetuous desire,
Birds, beasts, and herds, and mares, their males require;

Because the throbbing nature in their veins

Provokes them to assuage their kindly
pains.

The lusty leap th' expecting female stands,
By mutual heat compell'd to mutual bands.

Thus dogs with lolling tongues by love are tied, ²⁰¹

Nor shouting boys nor blows their union
can divide;

At either end they strive the link to loose,

In vain, for stronger Venus holds the noose.
Which never would those wretched lovers
do,

But that the common heats of love they
know;

The pleasure therefore must be shar'd in common too.

And when the woman's more prevailing juice

Sucks in the man's, the mixture will produce

The mother's likeness; when the man prevails, ²¹⁰

His own resemblance in the seed he seals.

But when we see the new-begotten race
Reflect the features of each parent's face,

Then of the father's and the mother's blood
The justly temper'd seed is understood;

When both conspire, with equal ardor bent,
From every limb the due proportion sent,

When neither party foils, when neither foil'd,

This gives the blended features of the child.

Sometimes the boy the grandsire's image
bears; ²²⁰

Sometimes the more remote progenitor he shares;

Because the genial atoms of the seed
Lie long conceal'd ere they exert the breed;

And, after sundry ages past, produce
The tardy likeness of the latent juice.

Hence, families such different figures take,
And represent their ancestors in face, and hair, and make;

Because of the same seed, the voice, and
hair,

And shape, and face, and other members
are,

And the same antique mold the likeness
does prepare. ²³⁰

Thus oft the father's likeness does prevail
In females, and the mother's in the male;

For, since the seed is of a double kind,
From that where we the most resemblance
find,

We may conclude the strongest tincture sent,
And that was in conception prevalent.

Nor can the vain decrees of pow'rs above
Deny production to the act of love,

Or hinder fathers of that happy name,
Or with a barren womb the matron shame;

As many think, who stain with victims'
blood ²⁴¹

The mournful altars, and with incense load,

To bless the show'ry seed with future life,
And to impregnate the well-labor'd wife.

In vain they weary Heav'n with prayer, or
fly

To oracles, or magic numbers try;

For barrenness of sexes will proceed

Either from too condens'd, or wat'ry seed:

The wat'ry juice too soon dissolves away,

And in the parts projected will not stay; ²⁵⁰

The too condens'd, unsoul'd, unwieldy mass,
Drops short, nor carries to the destin'd

place;

Nor pierces to the parts, nor, tho' injected
home,

Will mingle with the kindly moisture of the womb.

For nuptials are unlike in their success;
Some men with fruitful seed some women

bless,
And from some men some women fruitful
are,

Just as their constitutions join or jar:

And many seeming barren wives have been,

Who after, match'd with more prolific men,

Have fill'd a family with prattling boys; ²⁶¹

And many, not supplied at home with joys,

Have found a friend abroad to ease their
smart,

And to perform the sapless husband's part.
So much it does import that seed with seed

Should of the kindly mixture make the
breed;

And thick with thin, and thin with thick
should join,

So to produce and propagate the line.

Of such concernment too is drink and food,
T' incrassate, or attenuate the blood. ²⁷⁰

Of like importance is the posture too,

In which the genial feat of love we do;

For, as the females of the four-foot kind

Receive the leaping of their males behind,

So the good wives, with loins uplifted high,

And leaning on their hands, the fruitful stroke may try:

For in that posture will they best conceive;
Not when, supinely laid, they frisk and heave;

For active motions only break the blow,
And more of strumpets than of wives
they show, ²⁸⁰

When, answering stroke with stroke, the mingled liquors flow.

Endearments eager, and too brisk a bound,

Throws off the plowshare from the furrow'd
ground.

But common harlots in conjunction heave,
Because 't is less their business to conceive
Than to delight, and to provoke the deed;
A trick which honest wives but little need.
Nor is it from the gods, or Cupid's dart,
That many a homely woman takes the heart,

But wives well-humor'd, dutiful, and } chaste, }
And clean, will hold their wand'ring hus- } bands fast; }
Such are the links of love, and such a } love will last. }

For what remains, long habitude, and use,
Will kindness in domestic bands produce;
For custom will a strong impression leave.
Hard bodies, which the lightest stroke receive,
In length of time will molder and decay,
And stones with drops of rain are wash'd away.

LUCRETIVS

FROM BOOK THE FIFTH

Tum porro puer, &c.

THUS, like a sailor by the tempest hurl'd
Ashore, the babe is shipwreck'd on the world:

Naked he lies, and ready to expire;
Helpless of all that human wants require;
Expos'd upon unhospitable earth,
From the first moment of his hapless birth.
Straight with foreboding cries he fills the room;

Too true presages of his future doom.
But flocks and herds, and every savage beast,

By more indulgent nature are increas'd. 10
They want no rattles for their froward mood,

Nor nurse to reconcile them to their food,
With broken words; nor winter blasts they fear,

Nor change their habits with the changing year;

Nor, for their safety, citadels prepare,
Nor forge the wicked instruments of war:
Unlabor'd Earth her bounteous treasure grants,

And Nature's lavish hand supplies their common wants.

THEOCRITUS: IDYLLIUM THE EIGHTEENTH

THE

EPITHALAMIUM OF HELEN AND MENELAUS

TWELVE Spartan virgins, noble, young, and fair,

With violet wreaths adorn'd their flowing hair,

And to the pompons palace did resort,
Where Menelaus kept his royal court.

There hand in hand a comely choir they led;

To sing a blessing to his nuptial bed,
With curious needles wrought, and painted flowers bespread.

Jove's beauteous daughter now his bride must be,

And Jove himself was less a god than he:
For this their artful hands instruct the lute to sound,

Their feet assist their hands, and justly beat the ground. 10

This was their song:

"Why, happy bridegroom, why,
Ere yet the stars are kindled in the sky,
Ere twilight shades, or evening dewes are shed,

Why dost thou steal so soon away to bed?

Has Somnus brush'd thy eyelids with his rod,

Or do thy legs refuse to bear their load
With flowing bowls of a more generous god?

If gentle slumber on thy temples creep,
(But, naughty man, thou dost not mean to sleep,) 20

Betake thee to thy bed, thou drowsy drone,
Sleep by thyself, and leave thy bride alone:
Go, leave her with her maiden mates to play
At sports more harmless, till the break of day:

Give us this evening; thou hast morn and night,

And all the year before thee, for delight.
O happy youth! to thee, among the crowd
Of rival princes, Cupid sneez'd aloud;

And every lucky omen sent before,
To meet thee landing on the Spartan shore.
Of all our heroes thou canst boast alone 31
That Jove, whene'er he thunders, calls thee

Betwixt two sheets thou shalt enjoy her
 bare,
 With whom no Grecian virgin can compare;
 So soft, so sweet, so balmy, and so fair.
 A boy, like thee, would make a kingly line;
 But O, a girl like her must be divine.
 Her equals we, in years, but not in face,
 Twelvescore viragoes of the Spartan race,
 While naked to Eurotas' banks we bend, 40
 And there in manly exercise contend,
 When she appears, are all eclips'd and lost,
 And hide the beauties that we made our
 boast.
 So, when the night and winter disappear,
 The purple Morning, rising with the year,
 Salutes the Spring, as her celestial eyes Adorn the world, and brighten all the
 skies:
 So beauteous Helen shines among the rest,
 Tall, slender, straight, with all the graces
 blest.
 As pines the mountains, or as fields the corn, 50
 Or as Thessalian steeds the race adorn;
 So rosy-color'd Helen is the pride
 Of Lacedæmon, and of Greece beside.
 Like her no nymph can willing osiers
 bend
 In basket-works, which painted streaks
 commend;
 With Pallas in the loom she may con-
 tend.
 But none, ah none can animate the lyre,
 And the mute strings with vocal souls inspire!
 Whether the learn'd Minerva be her theme,
 Or chaste Diana bathing in the stream; 60
 None can record their heavenly praise so
 well
 As Helen, in whose eyes ten thousand Cupids dwell.
 O fair, O graceful! yet with maids inroll'd,
 But whom to-morrow's sun a matron shall
 behold;
 Yet ere to-morrow's sun shall show his
 head,
 The dewy paths of meadows we will tread,
 For crowns and chaplets to adorn thy
 head;
 Where all shall weep, and wish for thy
 return,
 As bleating lambs their absent mother
 mourn.

Our noblest maids shall to thy name bequeath 70
 The boughs of lotos, form'd into a wreath.
 This monument, thy maiden beauties' due,
 High on a plane tree shall be hung to view;
 On the smooth rind the passenger shall see Thy name ingrav'd, and worship Helen's
 tree;
 Balm, from a silver box distill'd around,
 Shall all bedew the roots, and scent the sacred ground.
 The balm, 'tis true, can aged plants pro-
 long,
 But Helen's name will keep it ever young.
 "Hail bride, hail bridegroom, son-in-law to Jove! 80
 With fruitful joys Latona bless your love!
 Let Venus furnish you with full desires, Add vigor to your wills, and fuel to your fires!
 Almighty Jove augment your wealthy
 store,
 Give much to you, and to his grandsons
 more!
 From generous loins a generous race will
 spring;
 Each girl, like her, a queen; each boy, like you, a king.
 Now sleep, if sleep you can; but while you
 rest,
 Sleep close, with folded arms, and breast to
 breast.
 Rise in the morn; but O! before you
 rise, 90
 Forget not to perform your morning sacrifice.
 We will be with you ere the crowing cock Salutes the light, and struts before his feather'd flock.
 Hymen, O Hymen, to thy triumphs run,
 And view the mighty spoils thou hast in battle won."

THEOCRITUS: IDYLLIUM THE TWENTY-THIRD

THE DESPAIRING LOVER

WITH inauspicious love, a wretched swain Pursued the fairest nymph of all the
 plain.
 Fairest indeed, but prouder far than fair,
 She plung'd him hopeless in a deep despair:
 Her heavenly form too haughtily she priz'd,

His person hated, and his gifts despis'd;
 Nor knew the force of Cupid's cruel darts,
 Nor fear'd his awful pow'r on human hearts;
 But either from her hopeless lover fled,
 Or with disdainful glances shot him dead. 10
 No kiss, no look, to cheer the drooping boy;
 No word she spoke, she scorn'd ev'n to deny.
 But, as a hunted panther casts about Her glaring eyes, and pricks her list'ning ears to scout,
 So she, to shun his toils, her cares im-
 ploy'd,
 And fiercely in her savage freedom joy'd.
 Her mouth she writh'd, her forehead taught to frown,
 Her eyes to sparkle fires to love unknown:
 Her sallow cheeks her envious mind did
 show,
 And every feature spoke aloud the curstness of a shrew. 20
 Yet could not he his obvious fate escape;
 His love still dress'd her in a pleasing shape;
 And every sullen frown, and bitter scorn,
 But fann'd the fuel that too fast did burn.
 Long time, unequal to his mighty pain,
 He strove to curb it, but he strove in vain:
 At last his woes broke out, and begg'd relief
 With tears, the dumb petitioners of grief;
 With tears so tender, as adorn'd his love,
 And any heart, but only hers, would
 move. 30
 Trembling before her bolted doors he stood,
 And there pour'd out th' unprofitable flood:
 Staring his eyes, and haggard was his look;
 Then, kissing first the threshold, thus he
 spoke:
 "Ah, nymph, more cruel than of human
 race!
 Thy tigress heart belies thy angel face:
 Too well thou show'st thy pedigree from
 stone;
 Thy grandame's was the first by Pyrrha
 thrown:
 Unworthy thou to be so long desir'd;
 But so my love, and so my fate requir'd.
 I beg not now (for 't is in vain) to live; 41
 But take this gift, the last that I can give.
 This friendly cord shall soon decide the
 strife
 Betwixt my ling'ring love and loathsome
 life:
 This moment puts an end to all my pain;
 I shall no more despair, nor thou disdain.

Farewell, ungrateful and unkind! I go Condemn'd by thee to those sad shades below.

I go th' extremest remedy to prove, 49
 To drink oblivion, and to drench my love;
 There happily to lose my long desires —
 But ah! what draught so deep to quench my fires?

Farewell, ye never-opening gates, ye stones,
 And threshold guilty of my midnight
 moans!

What I have suffer'd here ye know too
 well;

What I shall do the gods and I can tell.
 The rose is fragrant, but it fades in time;
 The violet sweet, but quickly past the prime;
 White lilies hang their heads, and soon decay,

And whiter snow in minutes melts away: 60
 Such is your blooming youth, and withering
 so;

The time will come, it will, when you shall
 know

The rage of love; your haughty heart shall burn

In flames like mine, and meet a like return.

"Obdurate as you are, O hear at least
 My dying prayers, and grant my last request!

When first you ope your doors, and, passing by,

The sad ill-omen'd object meets your eye,
 Think it not lost, a moment if you stay;
 The breathless wretch, so made by you,
 survey: 70

Some cruel pleasure will from thence arise,
 To view the mighty ravage of your eyes.

I wish (but O! my wish is vain, I fear)
 The kind oblation of a falling tear:

Then loose the knot, and take me from the
 place,

And spread your mantle o'er my grisly face;
 Upon my livid lips bestow a kiss:

O envy not the dead, they feel not bliss!
 Nor fear your kisses can restore my breath;
 Even you are not more pitiless than
 death. 80

Then for my corpse a homely grave provide,

Which love and me from public scorn may
 hide;

Thrice call upon my name, thrice beat your
 breast,

And hail me thrice to everlasting rest;

Last let my tomb this sad inscription
bear:

'A wretch whom love has kill'd lies buried here;

O passengers, Amynta's eyes beware.'"

Thus having said, and furious with his love,
He heav'd with more than human force to
move

A weighty stone, (the labor of a team,) ⁹⁰
And rais'd from thence he reach'd the neighboring beam;

Around its bulk a sliding knot he throws,
And fitted to his neck the fatal noose;
Then, spurning backward, took a swing,
till death

Crept up, and stopp'd the passage of his breath.

The bounce burst ope the door; the scornful fair

Relentless look'd, and saw him beat his quivering feet in air;

Nor wept his fate, nor cast a pitying eye,
Nor took him down, but brush'd regardless
by;

And, as she pass'd, her chance or fate was such, ¹⁰⁰

Her garments touch'd the dead, polluted by the touch:

Next to the dance, thence to the bath did
move —

The bath was sacred to the God of Love;
Whose injur'd image, with a wrathful eye,
Stood threat'ning from a pedestal on high:
Nodding a while, and watchful of his blow,
He fell; and falling crush'd th' ungrateful nymph below.

Her gushing blood the pavement all be-smeared;

And this her last expiring voice was heard:
"Lovers, farewell, revenge has reach'd
my scorn: ¹¹⁰

Thus warn'd, be wise, and love for love
return."

DAPHNIS

FROM THEOCRITUS: IDYLLIUM THE TWENTY-SEVENTH

DAPHNIS

THE shepherd Paris bore the Spartan bride
By force away, and then by force enjoy'd;
But I by free consent can boast a bliss,
A fairer Helen, and a sweeter kiss.

CHLORIS

Kisses are empty joys, and soon are o'er.

DAPHNIS

A kiss betwixt the lips is something more.

CHLORIS

I wipe my mouth, and where's your kissing
then?

DAPHNIS

I swear you wipe it to be kiss'd again.

CHLORIS

Go, tend your herd, and kiss your cows at
home;

I am a maid, and in my beauty's bloom. ¹⁰

DAPHNIS

'Tis well remember'd; do not waste your
time,

But wisely use it ere you pass your prime.

CHLORIS

Blown roses hold their sweetness to the last,
And raisins keep their luscious native taste.

DAPHNIS

The sun's too hot; those olive shades are
near;

I fain would whisper something in your ear.

CHLORIS

'Tis honest talking where we may be
seen;

God knows what secret mischief you may mean;

I doubt you'll play the wag, and kiss
again.

DAPHNIS

At least beneath you elm you need not fear;
My pipe's in tune, if you're dispos'd to hear. ²¹

CHLORIS

Play by yourself, I dare not venture thither;
You, and your naughty pipe, go hang together.

DAPHNIS

Coy nymph, beware, lest Venus you offend.

CHLORIS

I shall have chaste Diana still to friend.

DAPHNIS

You have a soul, and Cupid has a dart.

CHLORIS

Diana will defend, or heal my heart.
Nay, fie, what mean you in this open place ?
Unhand me, or, I swear, I 'll scratch your
face.

Let go for shame; you make me mad for
spite;

My mouth's my own; and, if you kiss, I 'll bite.

DAPHNIS

Away with your dissembling female tricks;
What, would you 'scape the fate of all your sex ?

CHLORIS

I swear, I 'll keep my maidenhead till death,
And die as pure as Queen Elizabeth.

DAPHNIS

Nay, mum for that; but let me lay thee
down;

Better with me than with some nauseous clown.

CHLORIS

I 'd have you know, if I were so inclin'd,
I have bin woo'd by many a wealthy
hind;
But never found a husband to my mind.

DAPHNIS

But they are absent all, and I am here.

CHLORIS

The matrimonial yoke is hard to bear,
And marriage is a woful word to hear.

DAPHNIS

A scarecrow, set to frighten fools away;
Marriage has joys, and you shall have assay.

CHLORIS

Sour sauce is often mix'd with our de-
light;
You kick by day more than you kiss by
night.

DAPHNIS

Sham stories all; but say the worst you
can,
A very wife fears neither God nor man.

CHLORIS

But childbirth is, they say, a deadly pain;
It costs at least a month to knit again.

DAPHNIS

Diana cures the wounds Lucina made;
Your goddess is a midwife by her trade.

CHLORIS

But I shall spoil my beauty, if I bear.

DAPHNIS

But Mam and Dad are pretty names to hear.

CHLORIS

But there's a civil question us'd of late;
Where lies my jointure, where your own estate ?

DAPHNIS

My flocks, my fields, my wood, my pastures
take,
With settlement as good as law can make.

CHLORIS

Swear then you will not leave me on the common,
But marry me, and make an honest woman.

DAPHNIS

I swear by Pan, (tho' he wears horns you 'll
say,)
Cudgell'd and kick'd, I 'll not be forc'd away.

CHLORIS

I bargain for a wedding bed at least,
A house, and handsome lodging for a guest.

DAPHNIS

A house well furnish'd shall be thine to
keep;
And, for a flock bed, I can shear my sheep.

CHLORIS

What tale shall I to my old father tell ?

DAPHNIS

'T will make him chuckle thou 'rt bestow'd
so well.

CHLORIS

But, after all, in troth I am to blame
To be so loving, ere I know your name;
A pleasant-sounding name's a pretty thing.

DAPHNIS

Faith, mine's a very pretty name to sing.
 They call me Daphnis; Lycidas my sire:
 Both sound as well as woman can desire.
 Nomæa bore me; farmers in degree;
 He a good husband, a good housewife she.

CHLORIS

Your kindred is not much amiss, 't is true;
 Yet I am somewhat better born than you.

DAPHNIS

I know your father, and his family; 80
 And, without boasting, am as good as he:
 Menalcas; and no master goes before.

CHLORIS

Hang both our pedigrees! not one word
 more;
 But if you love me, let me see your living,
 Your house, and home; for seeing is believing.

DAPHNIS

See first you cypress grove, a shade from noon.

CHLORIS

Browse on, my goats; for I'll be with you soon.

DAPHNIS

Feed well, my bulls, to whet your appetite,
 That each may take a lusty leap at night.

CHLORIS

What do you mean, uncivil as you are, 90
 To touch my breasts, and leave my bosom bare?

DAPHNIS

These pretty bobbies, first, I make my own.

CHLORIS

Pull out your hand, I swear, or I shall swoon.

DAPHNIS

Why does thy ebbing blood forsake thy face?

CHLORIS

Throw me at least upon a cleaner place;
 My linen ruffled, and my waistcoat soiling—
 What, do you think new clothes were made for spoiling?

DAPHNIS

I'll lay my lambskins underneath thy back.

CHLORIS

My headgear's off; what filthy work you
 make.

DAPHNIS

To Venus, first, I lay these off'rings by. 100

CHLORIS

Nay, first look round, that nobody be nigh:
 Methinks I hear a whispering in the grove.

DAPHNIS

The cypress trees are telling tales of love.

CHLORIS

You tear off all behind me, and before me;
 And I'm as naked as my mother bore me.

DAPHNIS

I'll buy thee better clothes than these I
 tear,
 And lie so close I'll cover thee from air.

CHLORIS

Y'are liberal now; but when your turn is
 sped,
 You'll wish me chok'd with every crust of bread.

DAPHNIS

I'll give thee more, much more than I have told; 110
 Would I could coin my very heart to gold!

CHLORIS

Forgive thy handmaid, huntress of the wood!
 I see there's no resisting flesh and blood!

DAPHNIS

The noble deed is done! My herds I'll cull; Cupid, be thine a calf; and, Venus, thine a bull.

CHLORIS

A maid I came, in an unlucky hour,
 But hence return without my virgin flow'r.

DAPHNIS

A maid is but a barren name at best;
 If thou canst hold, I bid for twins at least.

Thus did this happy pair their love dispense 120
 With mutual joys, and gratified their
 sense:
 The God of Love was there, a bidden
 guest,
 And present at his own mysterious feast.
 His azure mantle underneath he spread,
 And scatter'd roses on the nuptial-bed;
 While folded in each other's arms they
 lay,
 He blew the flames, and furnish'd out the
 play,
 And from their foreheads wip'd the balmy sweat away.
 First rose the maid, and with a glowing
 face,
 Her downcast eyes beheld her print upon the grass; 130
 Thence to her herd she sped herself in
 haste:
 The bridegroom started from his trance
 at last,
 And piping homeward jocundly he pass'd.]

HORACE

THE THIRD ODE OF THE FIRST BOOK

INSCRIB'D TO THE EARL OF ROSCOMMON, ON HIS INTENDED VOYAGE TO IRELAND

So may th' auspicious Queen of Love,
 And the Twin Stars, (the seed of Jove,)
 And he who rules the raging wind,
 To thee, O sacred ship, be kind;
 And gentle breezes fill thy sails,
 Supplying soft Etesian gales:
 As thou, to whom the Muse commends
 The best of poets and of friends,
 Dost thy committed pledge restore,
 And land him safely on the shore; 10
 And save the better part of me
 From perishing with him at sea;
 Sure he, who first the passage tried,
 In harden'd oak his heart did hide,
 And ribs of iron arm'd his side! }
 Or his at least, in hollow wood
 Who tempted first the briny flood;
 Nor fear'd the winds' contending roar,
 Nor billows beating on the shore;
 Nor Hyades portending rain; 20
 Nor all the tyrants of the main.
 What form of death could him affright,

Who unconcern'd, with steadfast sight,
 Could view the surges mounting steep,
 And monsters rolling in the deep!
 Could thro' the ranks of ruin go,
 With storms above, and rocks below!
 In vain did Nature's wise command
 Divide the waters from the land,
 If daring ships and men profane 30
 Invade th' inviolable main;
 Th' eternal fences overleap,
 And pass at will the boundless deep.
 No toil, no hardship can restrain Ambitious man, inur'd to pain;
 The more confin'd, the more he tries,
 And at forbidden quarry flies.
 Thus bold Prometheus did aspire,
 And stole from heaven the seed of fire:
 A train of ills, a ghastly crew, 40
 The robber's blazing track pursue;
 Fierce Famine with her meager face,
 And Fevers of the fiery race,
 In swarms th' offending wretch surround,
 All brooding on the blasted ground:
 And limping Death, lash'd on by Fate,
 Comes up to shorten half our date.
 This made not Dedalus beware
 With borrow'd wings to sail in air;
 To hell Alcides forc'd his way, 50
 Plung'd thro' the lake, and snatch'd the
 prey.
 Nay, scarce the gods, or heav'nly climes,
 Are safe from our audacious crimes;
 We reach at Jove's imperial crown,
 And pull the unwilling thunder down.

HORACE

THE NINTH ODE OF THE FIRST BOOK

I

BEHOLD yon mountain's hoary height,
 Made higher with new mounts of snow;
 Again behold the winter's weight
 Oppress the lab'ring woods below;
 And streams, with icy fetters bound,
 Benumb'd and cramp'd to solid ground.

II

With well-heap'd logs dissolve the cold,
 And feed the genial hearth with fires;
 Produce the wine, that makes us bold,
 And sprightly wit and love inspires: 10
 For what hereafter shall betide,
 God, if 't is worth his care, provide.

III

Let him alone, with what he made,
 To toss and turn the world below;
 At his command the storms invade;
 The winds by his commission blow;
 Till with a nod he bids 'em cease,
 And then the calm returns, and all is peace.

IV

To-morrow and her works defy,
 Lay hold upon the present hour, 20
 And snatch the pleasures passing by,
 To put them out of Fortune's pow'r:
 Nor love, nor love's delights disdain;
 Whate'er thou gett'st to-day is gain.

V

Secure those golden early joys
 That youth unsour'd with sorrow bears,
 Ere with'ring time the taste destroys,
 With sickness and unwieldy years.
 For active sports, for pleasing rest,
 This is the time to be possess'd; 30
 The best is but in season best.

VI

The pointed hour of promis'd bliss,
 The pleasing whisper in the dark,
 The half-unwilling willing kiss,
 The laugh that guides thee to the mark,
 When the kind nymph would coyness
 feign,
 And hides but to be found again;
 These, these are joys the gods for youth
 ordain.

HORACE

THE TWENTY-NINTH ODE OF THE THIRD BOOK

PARAPHRAS'D IN PINDARIC VERSE, AND IN-SCRIB'D TO THE RIGHT HONORABLE LAU-RENCE, EARL OF ROCHESTER

I

DESCENDED of an ancient line,
 That long the Tuscan scepter sway'd,
 Make haste to meet the generous wine,
 Whose piercing is for thee delay'd:
 The rosy wreath is ready made;
 And artful hands prepare
 The fragrant Syrian oil, that shall perfume thy hair.

II

When the wine sparkles from afar,
 And the well-natur'd friend cries,
 "Come away!"
 Make haste, and leave thy business and thy
 care;
 No mortal int'rest can be worth thy stay.

III

Leave for a while thy costly country seat;
 And, to be great indeed, forget
 The nauseous pleasures of the great:
 Make haste and come;
 Come, and forsake thy cloying store;
 Thy turret that surveys, from high,
 The smoke, and wealth, and noise of Rome;
 And all the busy pageantry
 That wise men scorn, and fools adore: 20 Come, give thy soul a loose, and taste the pleasures of the poor.

IV

Sometimes 'tis grateful to the rich to try
 A short vicissitude, and fit of poverty:
 A savory dish, a homely treat,
 Where all is plain, where all is neat,
 Without the stately spacious room,
 The Persian carpet, or the Tyrian loom,
 Clear up the cloudy foreheads of the great.

V

The sun is in the Lion mounted high;
 The Syrian star 30
 Barks from afar,
 And with his sultry breath infects the
 sky;
 The ground below is parch'd, the heav'ns above us fry.
 The shepherd drives his fainting flock
 Beneath the covert of a rock,
 And seeks refreshing rivulets nigh:
 The sylvans to their shades retire,
 Those very shades and streams new shades
 and streams require,
 And want a cooling breeze of wind to fan
 the raging fire.

VI

Thou, what befits the new Lord May'r, 40
 And what the city faction dare,
 And what the Gallic arms will do,
 And what the quiver-bearing foe,
 Art anxiously inquisitive to know;

But God has, wisely, hid from human sight
 The dark decrees of future fate,
 And sown their seeds in depth of night:
 He laughs at all the giddy turns of state,
 When mortals search too soon, and fear too late.

VII

Enjoy the present smiling hour, 50
 And put it out of Fortune's pow'r;
 The tide of bus'ness, like the running stream,
 Is sometimes high, and sometimes low,
 A quiet ebb, or a tempestuous flow,
 And always in extreme.
 Now with a noiseless gentle course
 It keeps within the middle bed;
 Anon it lifts aloft the head,
 And bears down all before it with impetu-ous force; 59
 And trunks of trees come rolling down,
 Sheep and their folds together drown:
 Both house and homestead into seas are
 borne;
 And rocks are from their old foundations
 torn,
 And woods, made thin with winds, their scatter'd honors mourn.

VIII

Happy the man, and happy he alone,
 He, who can call to-day his own;
 He who, secure within, can say:
 "To-morrow do thy worst, for I have liv'd to-day.
 Be fair, or foul, or rain, or shine,
 The joys I have possess'd, in spite of fate, are mine. 70
 Not Heav'n itself upon the past has
 pow'r;
 But what has been, has been, and I have had my hour."

IX

Fortune, that with malicious joy
 Does man her slave oppress,
 Proud of her office to destroy,
 Is seldom pleas'd to bless:
 Still various, and unconstant still,
 But with an inclination to be ill,
 Promotes, degrades, delights in strife,
 And makes a lottery of life. 80
 I can enjoy her while she's kind;
 But when she dances in the wind,
 And shakes her wings, and will not stay,
 I puff the prostitute away:

The little or the much she gave is quietly
 resign'd;
 Content with poverty, my soul I arm;
 And virtue, tho' in rags, will keep me
 warm.

X

What is 't to me,
 Who never sail in her unfaithful sea, 89
 If storms arise, and clouds grow black;
 If the mast split, and threaten wreck?
 Then let the greedy merchant fear
 For his ill-gotten gain;
 And pray to gods that will not hear,
 While the debating winds and billows bear
 His wealth into the main.
 For me, secure from Fortune's blows,
 (Secure of what I cannot lose,)
 In my small pinnace I can sail,
 Contemning all the blust'ring roar; 100
 And running with a merry gale,
 With friendly stars my safety seek,
 Within some little winding creek;
 And see the storm ashore.

HORACE

THE SECOND EPODE

"How happy in his low degree,
 How rich in humble poverty, is he,
 Who leads a quiet country life;
 Discharg'd of business, void of strife,
 And from the griping scrivener free!
 (Thus, ere the seeds of vice were sown,
 Liv'd men in better ages born,
 Who plow'd with oxen of their own
 Their small paternal field of corn.) 10
 Nor trumpets summon him to war,
 Nor drums disturb his morning sleep,
 Nor knows he merchants' gainful care,
 Nor fears the dangers of the deep.
 The clamors of contentious law,
 And court and state, he wisely shuns,
 Nor brib'd with hopes, nor dar'd with awe,
 To servile salutations runs;
 But either to the clasping vine
 Does the supporting poplar wed,
 Or with his pruning-hook disjoin 20
 Unbearing branches from their head,
 And grafts more happy in their stead;
 Or, climbing to a hilly steep,
 He views his herds in vales afar,

Or shears his overburden'd sheep,
 Or mead for cooling drink prepares,
 Of virgin honey in the jars.
 Or, in the now declining year,
 When bounteous Autumn rears his
 head,
 He joys to pull the ripen'd pear, 30
 And clust'ring grapes with purple spread.
 The fairest of his fruit he serves,
 Priapus, thy rewards:
 Sylvanus too his part deserves,
 Whose care the fences guards.
 Sometimes beneath an ancient oak
 Or on the matted grass he lies:
 No god of sleep he need invoke;
 The stream, that o'er the pebbles flies,
 With gentle slumber crowns his eyes. 40
 The wind, that whistles thro' the sprays,
 Maintains the consort of the song;
 And hidden birds, with native lays,
 The golden sleep prolong.
 But when the blast of winter blows,
 And hoary frost inverts the year,
 Into the naked woods he goes,
 And seeks the tusky boar to rear,
 With well-mouth'd hounds and pointed spear;
 Or spreads his subtle nets from sight, 50
 With twinkling glasses, to betray
 The larks that in the meshes light,
 Or makes the fearful hare his prey.
 Amidst his harmless easy joys
 No anxious care invades his health,
 Nor love his peace of mind destroys,
 Nor wicked avarice of wealth.
 But if a chaste and pleasing wife,
 To ease the business of his life,
 Divides with him his household care, 60
 Such as the Sabine matrons were,
 Such as the swift Apulian's bride,
 Sunburnt and swarthy tho' she be,
 Will fire for winter nights provide,
 And without noise will oversee
 His children and his family;
 And order all things till he come,
 Sweaty and overlabor'd, home;
 If she in pens his flocks will fold,
 And then produce her dairy store, 70
 With wine to drive away the cold,
 And unbought dainties of the poor;
 Not oysters of the Lucrine lake
 My sober appetite would wish,
 Nor turbet, or the foreign fish
 That rolling tempests overtake,
 And hither waft the costly dish.

Not heathpout, or the rarer bird
 Which Phasis or Ionia yields,
 More pleasing morsels would afford 80
 Than the fat olives of my fields;
 Than shards or mallows for the pot,
 That keep the loosen'd body sound,
 Or than the lamb, that falls by lot
 To the just guardian of my ground.
 Amidst these feasts of happy swains,
 The jolly shepherd smiles to see
 His flock returning from the plains;
 The farmer is as pleas'd as he
 To view his oxen, sweating smoke, 90
 Bear on their necks the loosen'd yoke:
 To look upon his menial crew,
 That sit around his cheerful hearth,
 And bodies spent in toil renew
 With wholesome food and country mirth."
 This Morecraft said within himself,
 Resolv'd to leave the wicked town,
 And live retir'd upon his own.
 He call'd his money in;
 But the prevailing love of pelf 100
 Soon split him on the former shelf,
 And put it out again.

A NEW SONG

[This song was printed anonymously in the Sylvæ: it is first attributed to Dryden in the folio edition of his Poems and Translations, 1701.]

I

SYLVIA, the fair, in the bloom of fifteen, Felt an innocent warmth as she lay on the
 green;
 She had heard of a pleasure, and something
 she guess'd
 By the towzing, and tumbling, and touching her breast.
 She saw the men eager, but was at a loss,
 What they meant by their sighing, and kissing so close;
 By their praying and whining,
 And clasping and twining,
 And panting and wishing,
 And sighing and kissing, 10
 And sighing and kissing so close.

II

"Ah!" she cried, "ah! for a languishing
 maid,
 In a country of Christians, to die without aid!
 Not a Whig, or a Tory, or Trimmer at least,

Or a Protestant parson, or Catholic priest,
To instruct a young virgin, that is at a loss,
What they meant by their sighing, and kissing
so close !

By their praying and whining,
And clasping and twining,
And panting and wishing, 20
And sighing and kissing,
And sighing and kissing so close."

III

Cupid, in shape of a swain, did appear,
He saw the sad wound, and in pity drew near;

Then show'd her his arrow, and bid her not fear,
For the pain was no more than a maiden
may bear.

When the balm was infus'd, she was not at a loss,

What they meant by their sighing, and kissing
so close;

By their praying and whining, 30
And clasping and twining,
And panting and wishing,
And sighing and kissing,
And sighing and kissing so close.

FOUR SONGS

[The following songs were not published until after Dryden's death, and their authenticity is not above suspicion. If genuine, they may have been written at almost any time in Dryden's long literary career. They are grouped in the present place for convenience in printing.]

THE FAIR STRANGER

[The following song was first printed in A New Miscellany of Original Poems. London, printed for Peter Buck . . . and George Strahan . . . 1701, where it is ascribed to Dryden. Derrick stated, in his edition of Dryden (1760), that these verses celebrated the arrival in England in 1670, in the suite of the Duchess of Orleans, of Louise de Kéroualle, afterwards mistress of Charles II and Duchess of Portsmouth. This assertion has been often repeated by editors of Dryden. Christie notes that the poem would apply equally well to the Duchess of Mazarin, who arrived in England in January, 1676; but he adds pertinently: "There is no proof that the song was composed in honor of any great lady."]

I

HAPPY and free, securely blest,
No beauty could disturb my rest;
My amorous heart was in despair
To find a new victorious fair:

II

Till you descending on our plains,
With foreign force renew my chains;
Where now you rule without control
The mighty sovereign of my soul.

III

Your smiles have more of conquering charms
Than all your native country's arms: 10

Their troops we can expel with ease,
Who vanquish only when we please.

IV

But in your eyes, O there's the spell !
Who can see them, and not rebel ?
You make us captives by your stay,
Yet kill us if you go away.

SONG

[This song was first printed in the folio edition of Dryden's Poems and Translations, 1701. It also appears, but without being ascribed to Dryden, in the fourth edition, 1716, of the Second Part of Miscellany Poems.]

I

Go tell Amynta, gentle swain,
I would not die, nor dare complain:
Thy tuneful voice with numbers join,
Thy words will more prevail than mine.
To souls oppress'd, and dumb with grief,
The gods ordain this kind relief;
That music should in sounds convey
What dying lovers dare not say.

II

A sigh or tear, perhaps, she'll give,
But love on pity cannot live. 10
Tell her that hearts for hearts were made,
And love with love is only paid.

Tell her my pains so fast encrease,
That soon they will be past redress;
But ah ! the wretch that speechless lies Attends but death to close his eyes.

A SONG

[This song was first printed in Poetical Miscellanies, the Fifth Part, 1704.]

I

FAIR, sweet, and young, receive a prize
Reserv'd for your victorious eyes:
From crowds, whom at your feet you see,
O pity, and distinguish me !
As I from thousand beauties more Distinguish you, and only you adore.

II

Your face for conquest was design'd,
Your ev'ry motion charms my mind;
Angels, when you your silence break,
Forget their hymns, to hear you speak; 10
But when at once they hear and view,
Are loth to mount, and long to stay with
you.

III

No graces can your form improve,
But all are lost, unless you love;
While that sweet passion you disdain,
Your veil and beauty are in vain.

In pity then prevent my fate,
For after dying all reprieve's too late.

SONG

[This song was first printed in Poetical Miscellanies, the Fifth Part, 1704, where it is ascribed to Dryden. It also occurs, under the title, An Ayre on a Ground, in the fourth edition, 1716, of the Second Part of Miscellany Poems, but with a different arrangement of lines and with no indication of the author.]

HIGH state and honors to others impart,
But give me your heart:
That treasure, that treasure alone,
I beg for my own.
So gentle a love, so fervent a fire,
My soul does inspire;
That treasure, that treasure alone,
I beg for my own.

Your love let me crave;
Give me in possessing 10
So matchless a blessing;
That empire is all I would have.

Love's my petition,
All my ambition;
If e'er you discover
So faithful a lover,
So real a flame,
I'll die, I'll die,
So give up my game.

THRENODIA AUGUSTALIS

A

FUNERAL-PINDARIC
POEMSACRED TO THE HAPPY MEMORY
OF
KING CHARLES II

BY JOHN DRYDEN

SERVANT TO HIS LATE MAJESTY, AND TO THE PRESENT KING

Fortunati ambo, si quid mea carmina possunt, Nulla dies unquam memori vos eximet ævo ! — VIRG.

[Charles II died on February 6, 1685, and this poem was published about a month later. A second edition, with some changes of text, followed almost immediately. Advertisements in the Observer (see Scott-Saintsbury edition, xviii, 295) show that the first edition appeared about March 14 and the second about March 25. Of the first edition two issues are known. The poem was also published in Dublin in 1685. It was not again reprinted until it was included in Poems and Translations, 1701. The present text follows the second edition.]

I

THUS long my grief has kept me dumb:
 Sure there's a lethargy in mighty woe,
 Tears stand congeal'd and cannot flow;
 And the sad soul retires into her inmost
 room;
 Tears, for a stroke foreseen, afford relief;
 But, unprovided for a sudden blow,
 Like Niobe we marble grow,
 And petrify with grief.
 Our British heav'n was all serene,
 No threat'ning cloud was nigh, 10
 Not the least wrinkle to deform the sky;
 We liv'd as unconcern'd and happily
 As the first age in nature's golden scene;
 Supine amidst our flowing store,
 We slept securely, and we dreamt of more:
 When suddenly the thunderclap was
 heard,
 It took us unprepar'd and out of guard,
 Already lost before we fear'd.
 Th' amazing news of Charles at once were
 spread,
 At once the general voice declar'd, 20
Our gracious prince was dead.
 No sickness known before, no slow disease,
 To soften grief by just degrees;
 But like an hurricane on Indian seas
 The tempest rose;
 An unexpected burst of woes,
 With scarce a breathing space betwixt,
 This now becalm'd, and perishing the next.
 As if great Atlas from his height
 Should sink beneath his heavenly weight, 30
 And with a mighty flaw, the flaming wall
 (As once it shall)
 Should gape immense, and rushing down,
 o'erwhelm this nether ball;
 So swift and so surprising was our fear:
 Our Atlas fell indeed, but Hercules was near.

II

His pious brother, sure the best
 Who ever bore that name,
 Was newly risen from his rest,
 And, with a fervent flame,
 His usual morning vows had just address'd
 For his dear sovereign's health; 41

And hop'd to have 'em heard,
 In long increase of years,
 In honor, fame, and wealth:
 Guiltless of greatness thus he always pray'd,
 Nor knew nor wish'd those vows he
 made
 On his own head should be repaid.
 Soon as th' ill-omen'd rumor reach'd his
 ear,
 (Ill news is wing'd with fate, and flies apace,) 50
 Who can describe th' amazement in his
 face!
 Horror in all his pomp was there,
 Mute and magnificent without a tear:
 And then the hero first was seen to fear.
 Half unarray'd he ran to his relief,
 So hasty and so artless was his grief:
 Approaching greatness met him with her
 charms
 Of pow'r and future state;
 But look'd so ghastly in a brother's fate,
 He shook her from his arms.
 Arriv'd within the mournful room, he saw
 A wild distraction, void of awe, 61
 And arbitrary grief unbounded by a law.
 God's image, God's anointed lay
 Without motion, pulse, or breath,
 A senseless lump of sacred clay,
 An image, now, of death:
 Amidst his sad attendants' groans and
 cries,
 The lines of that ador'd, forgiving face,
 Distorted from their native grace; 69
 An iron slumber sate on his majestic eyes.
 The pious duke — forbear, audacious Muse,
 No terms thy feeble art can use
 Are able to adorn so vast a woe:
 The grief of all the rest like subject-grief
 did show,
 His like a sovereign did transcend;
 No wife, no brother, such a grief could
 know,
 Nor any name, but friend.

III

O wondrous changes of a fatal scene,
 Still varying to the last!
 Heav'n, tho' its hard decree was past, 80

Seem'd pointing to a gracious turn again:
 And death's uplifted arm arrested in its
 haste.
 Heav'n half repented of the doom,
 And almost griev'd it had foreseen,
 What by foresight it will'd eternally to
 come.
 Mercy above did hourly plead
 For her resemblance here below,
 And mild forgiveness intercede
 To stop the coming blow.
 New miracles approach'd th' ethereal throne,
 Such as his wondrous life had oft and lately
 known, ⁹¹
 And urg'd that still they might be shown.
 On earth his pious brother pray'd and vow'd,
 Renouncing greatness at so dear a
 rate,
 Himself defending, what he could,
 From all the glories of his future
 fate.
 With him th' innumerable crowd
 Of armed prayers
 Knock'd at the gates of heav'n, and knock'd aloud;
 The first, well-meaning, rude petitioners. ¹⁰⁰
 All for his life assail'd the throne,
 All would have brib'd the skies by off'ring up their own.
 So great a throng not heav'n itself could
 bar;
 'T was almost borne by force, as in the giants' war.
 The pray'rs, at least, for his reprieve were
 heard;
 His death, like Hezekiah's, was deferr'd:
 Against the sun the shadow went;
 Five days, those five degrees, were
 lent
 To form our patience and prepare th'
 event.
 The second causes took the swift command, ¹¹⁰
 The med'cinal head, the ready hand,
 All eager to perform their part;
 All but eternal doom was conquer'd by their art:
 Once more the fleeting soul came back
 T' inspire the mortal frame;
 And in the body took a doubtful stand,
 Doubtful and hov'ring like expiring flame,
 That mounts and falls by turns, and trembles o'er the brand.

IV

The joyful short-liv'd news soon spread
 around,
 Took the same train, the same impetuous bound: ¹²⁰
 The drooping town in smiles again was
 dress'd,
 Gladness in every face express'd,
 Their eyes before their tongues confess'd.
 Men met each other with erected look,
 The steps were higher that they took,
 Friends to congratulate their friends made
 haste,
 And long-inveterate foes saluted as they
 pass'd:
 Above the rest heroic James appear'd
 Exalted more, because he more had fear'd;
 His manly heart, whose noble pride ¹³⁰
 Was still above
 Dissembled hate or varnish'd love,
 Its more than common transport could not
 hide;
 But like an eagle ¹ rode in triumph o'er the
 tide.
 Thus, in alternate course,
 The tyrant passions, hope and fear,
 Did in extremes appear,
 And flash'd upon the soul with equal force.
 Thus, at half ebb, a rolling sea
 Returns and wins upon the shore; ¹⁴⁰
 The wat'ry herd, affrighted at the roar,
 Rest on their fins a while, and stay,
 Then backward take their wond'ring way:
 The prophet wonders more than they,
 At prodigies but rarely seen before,
 And cries, a king must fall, or kingdoms change their sway.
 Such were our counter-tides at land, and so
 Presaging of the fatal blow,
 In their prodigious ebb and flow.
 The royal soul, that like the laboring moon, ¹⁵⁰
 By charms of art was hurried down, Fore'd with regret to leave her native
 sphere,
 Came but a while on liking here:
 Soon weary of the painful strife,
 And made but faint essays of life:
 An evening light
 Soon shut in night;
 A strong distemper, and a weak relief, Short intervals of joy, and long returns of grief.

¹ An eagle is a tide swelling above another tide,
 which I have myself observ'd on the river Trent.

V

The sons of art all med'cines tried, 160
 And every noble remedy applied;
 With emulation each essay'd
 His utmost skill, nay more, they pray'd:
 Never was losing game with better conduct
 play'd.

Death never won a stake with greater toil,
 Nor e'er was fate so near a foil;
 But, like a fortress on a rock,
 Th' impregnable disease their vain attempts did mock.

They min'd it near, they batter'd from afar
 With all the cannon of the med'cinal war;
 No gentle means could be essay'd, 171
 'T was beyond parley when the siege was
 laid.

Th' extremest ways they first ordain,
 Prescribing such intolerable pain,
 As none but Cæsar could sustain:
 Undaunted Cæsar underwent
 The malice of their art, nor bent Beneath whate'er their pious rigor could invent.

In five such days he suffer'd more Than any suffer'd in his reign before; 180
 More, infinitely more, than he Against the worst of rebels could decree,
 A traitor, or twice pardon'd enemy.
 Now art was tir'd without success,
 No racks could make the stubborn malady
 confess.

The vain insurancers of life,
 And he who most perform'd and promis'd
 less,
 Even Short himself forsook th' unequal
 strife.

Death and despair was in their looks,
 No longer they consult their memories or books; 190
 Like helpless friends, who view from shore
 The laboring ship, and hear the tempest
 roar;

So stood they with their arms across;
 Not to assist, but to deplore
 Th' inevitable loss.

VI

Death was denounc'd; that frightful sound
 Which ev'n the best can hardly bear,
 He took the summons void of fear;
 And, unconcern'dly, cast his eyes around,
 As if to find and dare the grisly challenger. 200

What death could do he lately tried,

When in four days he more then died.
 The same assurance all his words did grace;
 The same majestic mildness held its place;
 Nor lost the monarch in his dying face.
 Intrepid, pious, merciful, and brave,
 He look'd as when he conquer'd and forgave.

VII

As if some angel had been sent
 To lengthen out his government,
 And to foretell as many years again, 210
 As he had number'd in his happy reign;
 So cheerfully he took the doom
 Of his departing breath;

Nor shrunk nor stepp'd aside for death;
 But with unalter'd pace kept on;

Providing for events to come,
 When he resign'd the throne.
 Still he maintain'd his kingly state;
 And grew familiar with his fate.
 Kind, good, and gracious, to the last, 220
 On all he lov'd before his dying beams he cast:

O truly good, and truly great,
 For glorious as he rose, benignly so he set!

All that on earth he held most dear,
 He recommended to his care,

To whom both Heav'n,
 The right had giv'n,
 And his own love bequeath'd supreme command:

He took and press'd that ever-loyal hand,
 Which could in peace secure his reign, 230
 Which could in wars his pow'r maintain,
 That hand on which no plighted vows were ever vain.

Well for so great a trust, he chose
 A prince who never disobey'd;
 Not when the most severe commands
 were laid;

Nor want, nor exile with his duty
 weigh'd:

A prince on whom, if Heav'n its eyes could
 close,
 The welfare of the world it safely might repose.

VIII

That king who liv'd to God's own heart,
 Yet less serenely died than he: 240
 Charles left behind no harsh decree
 For schoolmen with laborious art
 To salve from cruelty:

Those, for whom love could no excuses
frame,

He graciously forgot to name.

Thus far my Muse, tho' rudely, has design'd
Some faint resemblance of his godlike mind;
But neither pen nor pencil can express
The parting brothers' tenderness;

Tho' that's a term too mean and low; ²⁵⁰
(The blest above a kinder word may know:)

But what they did, and what they said,
The monarch who triumphant went,

The militant who stay'd,
Like painters, when their height'ning arts are spent,

I cast into a shade.

That all-forgiving king,

The type of him above,

That inexhausted spring

Of clemency and love; ²⁶⁰

Himself to his next self accus'd,

And ask'd that pardon which he ne'er re-
fus'd:

For faults not his, for guilt and crimes
Of godless men, and of rebellious times;

For an hard exile, kindly meant,

When his ungrateful country sent

Their best Camillus into banishment,

And forc'd their sov'reign's act, they could not his consent.

O how much rather had that injur'd chief
Repeated all his sufferings past, ²⁷⁰

Then hear a pardon begg'd at last,
Which giv'n could give the dying no relief!

He bent, he sunk beneath his grief;

His dauntless heart would fain have held

From weeping, but his eyes rebell'd.

Perhaps the godlike hero in his breast

Disdain'd, or was asham'd, to show

So weak, so womanish a woe

Which yet the brother and the friend so plenteously confess'd.

IX

Amidst that silent show'r, the royal mind

An easy passage found, ²⁸¹

And left its sacred earth behind;

Nor murmur'ing groan express'd, nor laboring sound,

Nor any least tumultuous breath:

Calm was his life, and quiet was his death.

Soft as those gentle whispers were,

In which th' Almighty did appear:

By the still voice the prophet knew him
there.

That peace which made thy prosperous reign to shine,

That peace thou leav'st to thy imperial line, ²⁹⁰

That peace, O happy shade, be ever thine!

X

For all those joys thy restoration brought,
For all the miracles it wrought,

For all the healing balm thy mercy
pour'd

Into the nation's bleeding wound,
And care that after kept it sound,

For numerous blessings yearly show'r'd,
And property with plenty crown'd;

For freedom, still maintain'd alive,

Freedom, which in no other land will thrive, ³⁰⁰

Freedom, an English subject's sole prerogative,

Without whose charms ev'n peace would be
But a dull quiet slavery:

For these, and more, accept our pious
praise;

'Tis all the subsidy

The present age can raise,

The rest is charg'd on late posterity.

Posterity is charg'd the more,

Because the large abounding store
To them and to their heirs is still entail'd
by thee. ³¹⁰

Succession of a long descent

Which chastely in the channels ran,

And from our demigods began,

Equal almost to time in its extent—

Thro' hazards numberless and great,

Thou hast deriv'd this mighty blessing
down,

And fix'd the fairest gem that decks
th' imperial crown:

Not faction, when it shook thy regal seat,

Not senates, insolently loud,

(Those echoes of a thoughtless crowd,) ³²⁰

Not foreign or domestic treachery,

Could warp thy soul to their unjust decree.

So much thy foes thy manly mind mistook,

Who judg'd it by the mildness of thy look;

Like a well-temper'd sword, it bent at will,

But kept the native toughness of the steel.

XI

Be true, O Clio, to thy hero's name!

But draw him strictly so,

That all who view, the piece may
know;

He needs no trappings of fictitious fame: 330
 The load 's too weighty; thou may'st choose
 Some parts of praise, and some refuse:
 Write, that his annals may be thought more lavish than the Muse.

In scanty truth thou hast confin'd
 The virtues of a royal mind, Forgiving, bounteous, humble, just, and
 kind:

His conversation, wit, and parts,
 His knowledge in the noblest, useful arts,
 Were such, dead authors could not give;
 But habitudes of those who live; 340
 Who, lighting him, did greater lights receive:

He drain'd from all, and all they knew;
 His apprehension quick, his judgment true;
 That the most learn'd, with shame, confess
 His knowledge more, his reading only less.

XII

Amidst the peaceful triumphs of his reign,
 What wonder if the kindly beams he
 shed

Reviv'd the drooping arts again;
 If Science rais'd her head,
 And soft Humanity that from rebellion fled ! 350

Our isle, indeed, too fruitful was before;
 But all uncultivated lay
 Out of the solar walk and heav'n's high
 way;

With rank Geneva weeds run o'er,
 And cockle, at the best, amidst the corn it
 bore.

The royal husbandman appear'd,
 And plow'd, and sow'd, and till'd;
 The thorns he rooted out, the rubbish
 clear'd,

And bless'd th' obedient field:
 When, straight, a double harvest rose; 360
 Such as the swarthy Indian mows;
 Or happier climates near the line,
 Or Paradise manur'd and dress'd by hands divine.

XIII

As when the newborn Phoenix takes his
 way,

His rich paternal regions to survey,
 Of airy choristers a numerous train
 Attend his wondrous progress o'er the plain;
 So, rising from his father's urn,
 So glorious did our Charles return:
 Th' officious Muses came along, 370

A gay harmonious choir, like angels ever
 young;

(The Muse that mourns him now, his happy triumph sung.)

Even they could thrive in his auspicious
 reign;

And such a plenteous crop they bore
 Of purest and well-winnow'd grain,
 As Britain never knew before.

Tho' little was their hire, and light their
 gain,

Yet somewhat to their share he threw;
 Fed from his hand, they sung and flew,
 Like birds of Paradise, that liv'd on morning dew. 380

O never let their lays his name forget !
 The pension of a prince's praise is great.
 Live then, thou great encourager of arts,
 Live ever in our thankful hearts;
 Live blest above, almost invok'd below;
 Live and receive this pious vow,
 Our patron once, our guardian angel now.
 Thou Fabius of a sinking state,
 Who didst by wise delays divert our fate,
 When faction like a tempest rose, 390

In death's most hideous form,
 Then art to rage thou didst oppose,
 To weather out the storm:
 Not quitting thy supreme command,
 Thou held'st the rudder with a steady hand,
 Till safely on the shore the bark did land;
 The bark that all our blessings brought,
 Charg'd with thyself and James, a doubly royal fraud.

XIV

O frail estate of human things,
 And slippery hopes below ! 400
 Now to our cost your emptiness we
 know,

(For 't is a lesson dearly bought,) Assurance here is never to be sought.
 The best, and best belov'd of kings,
 And best deserving to be so,
 When scarce he had escap'd the fatal blow
 Of faction and conspiracy,
 Death did his promis'd hopes destroy:
 He toil'd, he gain'd, but liv'd not to enjoy.
 What mists of Providence are these 410

Thro' which we cannot see !
 So saints, by supernatural pow'r set
 free,

Are left at last in martyrdom to die;
 Such is the end of oft-repeated miracles.
 Forgive me, Heav'n, that impious thought,

'T was grief for Charles, to madness wrought,

That question'd thy supreme decree !
Thou didst his gracious reign prolong,
Even in thy saints' and angels' wrong,

His fellow-citizens of immortality: 420
For twelve long years of exile borne,
Twice twelve we number'd since his blest
return:

So strictly wert thou just to pay,
Even to the driblet of a day.
Yet still we murmur, and complain,
The quails and manna should no longer rain:
Those miracles 't was needless to renew;
The chosen flock has now the promis'd land
in view.

XV

A warlike prince ascends the regal state,
A prince long exercis'd by fate: 430
Long may he keep, tho' he obtains it late.
Heroes in Heaven's peculiar mold are cast,
They and their poets are not form'd in
haste;

Man was the first in God's design, and man was made the last.

False heroes, made by flattery so, Heav'n can strike out, like sparkles, at a
blow;

But ere a prince is to perfection brought,
He costs Omnipotence a second thought.

With toil and sweat, 439
With hard'ning cold, and forming heat,
The Cyclops did their strokes repeat,
Before th' impenetrable shield was wrought.
It looks as if the Maker would not own
The noble work for his,
Before 't was tried and found a masterpiece.

XVI

View then a monarch ripen'd for a throne.
Alcides thus his race began;
O'er infancy he swiftly ran;
The future god at first was more than man:
Dangers and toils, and Juno's hate 450
Even o'er his cradle lay in wait;
And there he grappled first with fate:
In his young hands the hissing snakes he
press'd,

So early was the deity confess'd;
Thus, by degrees, he rose to Jove's imperial seat;
Thus difficulties prove a soul legitimately
great.

Like his, our hero's infancy was tried:
Betimes the Furies did their snakes provide,

And to his infant arms oppose
His father's rebels, and his brother's foes;
The more oppress'd, the higher still he
rose. 461

Those were the preludes of his fate,
That form'd his manhood, to subdue
The Hydra of the many-headed hissing crew.

XVII

As after Numa's peaceful reign,
The martial Ancus did the scepter
wield,

Furbish'd the rusty sword again,
Resum'd the long-forgotten shield,
And led the Latins to the dusty field;

So James the drowsy genius wakes 470
Of Britain long entranc'd in charms,
Restiff and slumb'ring on its arms:

'Tis rous'd, and with a new-strung nerve,
the spear already shakes.

No neighing of the warrior steeds,
No drum, or louder trumpet, needs
T' inspire the coward, warm the cold;
His voice, his sole appearance makes 'em
bold.

Gaul and Batavia dread th' impending blow;
Too well the vigor of that arm they know;
They lick the dust, and crouch beneath their fatal foe. 480

Long may they fear this awful prince,
And not provoke his ling'ring sword;
Peace is their only sure defense,
Their best security his word:

In all the changes of his doubtful state,
His truth, like Heav'n's, was kept inviolate,
For him to promise is to make it fate.
His valor can triumph o'er land and main;
With broken oaths his fame he will not
stain;

With conquest basely bought, and with inglorious gain. 490

XVIII

For once, O Heav'n, unfold thy adamantine book;

And let his wond'ring senate see,
If not thy firm, immutable decree,
At least the second page of strong contingency;

Such as consists with wills originally
free:

Let them with glad amazement look
 On what their happiness may be;
 Let them not still be obstinately blind,
 Still to divert the good thou hast design'd,
 Or with malignant penury, ⁵⁰⁰
 To sterve the royal virtues of his mind.
 Faith is a Christian's and a subject's test;
 O give them to believe, and they are surely
 blest.

They do; and with a distant view I see
 Th' amended vows of English loyalty;
 And all beyond that object, there appears
 The long retinue of a prosperous reign,

A series of successful years,
 In orderly array, a martial, manly
 train.

Behold ev'n to remoter shores, ⁵¹⁰
 A conquering navy proudly spread;
 The British cannon formidably roars,
 While starting from his oozy bed,
 Th' asserted ocean rears his reverend head,

To view and recognise his ancient lord
 again;

And, with a willing hand, restores
 The fascies of the main.

PROLOGUE AND EPILOGUE TO ALBION AND ALBANUS

[Of this, his first opera, Dryden says in his preface: "It was all compos'd, and was just ready to have been perform'd, when he, in honor of whom it was principally made, was taken from us." After a slight alteration, made necessary by changed circumstances, the opera was presented early in June, 1685. It was published in the same year; the prologue and epilogue were also printed as a broadside. The texts below follow those printed with the first edition of the opera.]

PROLOGUE

FULL twenty years and more, our lab'ring
 stage

Has lost, on this incorrigible age;
 Our poets, the John Ketches of the nation,
 Have seem'd to lash ye, ev'n to excoria-
 tion:

But still no sign remains; which plainly
 notes,

You bore like heroes, or you brib'd like Oates.

What can we do, when mimicking a fop,
 Like beating nut trees, makes a larger crop?

Faith, we'll e'en spare our pains; and, to content you,

Will fairly leave you what your Maker meant you. ¹⁰

Satire was once your physic, wit your food;
 One nourish'd not, and t' other drew no
 blood:

We now prescribe, like doctors in despair,
 The diet your weak appetites can bear.
 Since hearty beef and mutton will not do,

Here's julep dance, ptisan of song and
 show:

Give you strong sense, the liquor is too
 heady;

You're come to farce, that's asses' milk,
 already.

Some hopeful youths there are, of callow
 wit,

Who one day may be men, if Heav'n think fit; ²⁰

Sound may serve such, ere they to sense are grown,

Like leading strings, till they can walk
 alone.

But yet, to keep our friends in count'nance,
 know,

The wise Italians first invented show;

Thence into France the noble pageant
 pass'd:

'Tis England's credit to be cozen'd last.

Freedom and zeal have chous'd you o'er and o'er;

Pray give us leave to bubble you once
 more;

You never were so cheaply fool'd before.

We bring you change, to humor your disease; ³⁰

Change for the worse has ever us'd to
 please:

Then, 'tis the mode of France; without whose rules

None must presume to set up here for fools.

In France, the oldest man is always
 young,

Sees operas daily, learns the tunes so
 long,

Till foot, hand, head, keep time with ev'ry song;

Each sings his part, echoing from pit and box,
With his hoarse voice, half harmony, half pox.

Le plus grand roi du monde is always ring-
ing,

They show themselves good subjects by their singing. 40

On that condition, set up every throat:
You Whigs may sing, for you have chang'd your note.

Cits and citesses, raise a joyful strain,
'Tis a good omen to begin a reign;
Voices may help your charter to restoring,
And get by singing what you lost by roaring.

EPILOGUE

AFTER our Æsop's fable shown to-day,
I come to give the moral of the play.

Feign'd Zeal, you saw, set out the speedier
pace;

But, the last heat, Plain Dealing won the
race:

Plain Dealing for a jewel has been known,
But ne'er till now the jewel of a crown.

When Heav'n made man, to show the work
divine,

Truth was his image, stamp'd upon the coin:

And, when a king is to a god refin'd,
On all he says and does he stamps his
mind: 10

This proves a soul without alloy, and pure;
Kings, like their gold, should every touch endure.

To dare in fields is valor; but how few
Dare be so thoroughly valiant, to be true!
The name of great let other kings affect:
He's great indeed, the prince that is direct.
His subjects know him now, and trust him
more

Than all their kings, and all their laws before.

What safety could their public acts afford?
Those he can break; but cannot break his word. 20

So great a trust to him alone was due;
Well have they trusted whom so well they
knew.

The saint, who walk'd on waves, securely
trod,

While he believ'd the beck'ning of his God;
But, when his faith no longer bore him out,

Began to sink, as he began to doubt.
Let us our native character maintain;
'Tis of our growth, to be sincerely plain.

T' excel in truth we loyally may strive,
Set privilege against prerogative: 30
He plights his faith, and we believe him
just;

His honor is to promise, ours to trust.
Thus Britain's basis on a word is laid,
As by a word the world itself was made.

TO MY FRIEND, MR. J. NORTH-LEIGH

AUTHOR OF THE PARALLEL, ON HIS TRI-UMPH OF THE BRITISH MONARCHY

[John Northleigh (1657-1705) published, in 1682, The Parallel, or the new specious Association an old rebellious Covenant; and, in 1685, The Triumph of our Monarchy over the Plots and Principles of our Rebels and Republicans. To the latter work Dryden prefixed the following verses.]

So Joseph, yet a youth, expounded well
The boding dream, and did th' event fore-
tell;

Judged by the past, and drew the parallel. }

Thus early Solomon the truth explor'd,
The right awarded, and the babe restor'd.

Thus Daniel, ere to prophecy he grew,
The perjurd presbyters did first subdue,
And freed Susanna from the canting crew. }

Well may our monarchy triumphant stand, While warlike James protects both sea and
land; 10

And, under covert of his sev'nfold shield,
Thou send'st thy shafts to scour the distant field.

By law thy powerful pen has set us free;
Thou studi'st that, and that may study
thee.

TO THE PIOUS MEMORY OF THE ACCOMPLISH'D YOUNG LADY,
MRS. ANNE KILLIGREW

EXCELLENT IN THE TWO SISTER-ARTS
OF POESY AND PAINTING, AN ODE

[Anne Killigrew, daughter of Henry Killi-grew, divine, and niece of the dramatists
Thomas and William Killigrew, was born in 1660, and died in June, 1685. An edition of her Poems was licensed for the press on September 30 of that year; and, as is shown by an advertisement in the Observer (see Scott-Saintsbury edition, xviii, 295), was published about November 2, although it is dated 1686. The frontispiece of the volume is a mezzotint made from a painting of the poetess by herself. The title-page bears the motto Immodicis brevis est ætas, et rara senectus (Martial, vi. 29), to which Dryden refers in lines 147, 148 below. Dryden's Ode was first published in this volume; it was reprinted, with some changes of text, in Examen Poeticum, 1693. The later text is here followed.]

I

THOU youngest virgin-daughter of the
skies,

Made in the last promotion of the blest;
Whose palms, new pluck'd from paradise,
In spreading branches more sublimely rise,
Rich with immortal green above the rest:
Whether, adopted to some neighboring

star,

Thou roll'st above us, in thy wand'ring
race,

Or, in procession fix'd and regular,
Mov'd with the heavens' majestic pace;
Or, call'd to more superior bliss,

Thou tread'st, with seraphims, the vast abyss:

Whatever happy region is thy place,
Cease thy celestial song a little space; (Thou wilt have time enough for hymns
divine,

Since heav'n's eternal year is thine.)
Hear then a mortal Muse thy praise rehearse,

In no ignoble verse;

But such as thy own voice did practice
here,

When thy first fruits of poesy were giv'n,
To make thyself a welcome inmate there; 20

While yet a young probationer,
And candidate of heav'n.

II

If by traduction came thy mind,

Our wonder is the less to find

A soul so charming from a stock so good;
Thy father was transfus'd into thy blood:
So wert thou born into the tuneful strain,
(An early, rich, and inexhausted vein.)

But if thy preëxisting soul

Was form'd, at first, with myriads more,

It did thro' all the mighty poets roll, 31
Who Greek or Latin laurels wore,
And was that Sappho last, which once it was before.

If so, then cease thy flight, *O heav'n-born
mind!*

Thou hast no dross to purge from thy rich ore;

Nor can thy soul a fairer mansion find,
Than was the beauteous frame she left behind: }

Return, to fill or mend the choir of thy celestial kind. }

III

May we presume to say, that at thy birth
New joy was sprung in heav'n, as well as here on earth?

For sure the milder planets did com- 40
bine

On thy auspicious horoscope to shine,
And ev'n the most malicious were in trine. }

Thy brother-angels at thy birth
Strung each his lyre, and tun'd it high,
That all the people of the sky

Might know a poetess was born on earth.
And then, if ever, mortal ears

Had heard the music of the spheres!

And if no clust'ring swarm of bees 50
On thy sweet mouth distill'd their golden
dew,

'T was that such vulgar miracles
Heav'n had not leisure to renew:

For all the blest fraternity of love Solemniz'd there thy birth, and kept thy holiday above.

IV

O gracious God! how far have we Profan'd thy heav'nly gift of poesy!
Made prostitute and profligate the Muse,
Debas'd to each obscene and impious use,
Whose harmony was first ordain'd above 60
For tongues of angels, and for hymns of
love!

O wretched we! why were we hurried
down

This lubric and adult'rate age,
(Nay, added fat pollutions of our own,)

T' increase the steaming ordures of the stage?

What can we say t' excuse our second fall?
Let this thy vestal, Heav'n, atone for all:
Her Arethusian stream remains unsoil'd,

Unmix'd with foreign filth, and undefil'd;
Her wit was more than man, her innocence
a child!

70

V

Art she had none, yet wanted none;
For nature did that want supply:
So rich in treasures of her own,
She might our boasted stores defy:
Such noble vigor did her verse adorn
That it seem'd borrow'd, where 't was only
born.

Her morals too were in her bosom bred,
By great examples daily fed,
What in the best of books, her father's life, she read.

And to be read herself she need not fear;
Each test, and ev'ry light, her Muse will
bear,

81

Tho' Epictetus with his lamp were there.
Ev'n love (for love sometimes her Muse express'd)

Was but a lambent flame which play'd about her breast,

Light as the vapors of a morning dream:
So cold herself, whilst she such warmth
express'd,

'T was Cupid bathing in Diana's stream.

VI

Born to the spacious empire of the Nine,
One would have thought she should have been content

To manage well that mighty government;
But what can young ambitious souls confine?

91

To the next realm she stretch'd her
sway,

For painture near adjoining lay,
A plenteous province, and alluring prey.

A chamber of dependences was fram'd,
(As conquerors will never want pretense,

When arm'd, to justify th' offense,)
And the whole fief in right of poetry she claim'd.

The country open lay without defense;
For poets frequent inroads there had made,
And perfectly could represent 101

The shape, the face, with ev'ry linea-
ment;

And all the large remains which the Dumb
Sister sway'd,

All bow'd beneath her government;
Receiv'd in triumph wheresoe'er she went.

Her pencil drew whate'er her soul design'd,
And oft the happy draught surpass'd the image in her mind.

The sylvan scenes of herds and flocks,
And fruitful plains and barren rocks,
Of shallow brooks that flow'd so clear 110
The bottom did the top appear;
Of deeper too and ampler floods,
Which, as in mirrors, shew'd the woods;
Of lofty trees, with sacred shades,
And perspectives of pleasant glades,
Where nymphs of brightest form ap-
pear,

And shaggy satyrs standing near,
Which them at once admire and fear:
The ruins too of some majestic piece,
Boasting the pow'r of ancient Rome, or Greece,

120

Whose statues, friezes, columns broken
lie,

And, tho' defac'd, the wonder of the eye:
What nature, art, bold fiction, e'er durst
frame,

Her forming hand gave feature to the
name.

So strange a concourse ne'er was seen
before,

But when the peopled ark the whole creation bore.

VII

The scene then chang'd: with bold erected look

Our martial king the sight with reverence
strook;

For, not content t' express his outward part,
Her hand call'd out the image of his
heart:

130

His warlike mind, his soul devoid of
fear,

His high-designing thoughts were fig-
ur'd there,

As when, by magic, ghosts are made ap-
pear.

Our Phoenix queen was portray'd too so
bright,

Beauty alone could beauty take so right:
Her dress, her shape, her matchless grace,
Were all observ'd, as well as heav'nly
face.

With such a peerless majesty she stands,
As in that day she took the crown from sacred hands;

Before a train of heroines was seen, 140
In beauty foremost, as in rank the queen.

Thus nothing to her genius was denied,
 But like a ball of fire the further thrown,
 Still with a greater blaze she shone,
 And her bright soul broke out on ev'ry
 side.
 What next she had design'd, Heaven only
 knows;
 To such immod'rate growth her conquest
 rose
 That fate alone its progress could oppose.

VIII

Now all those charms, that blooming
 grace,
 The well-proportion'd shape, and beau-
 teous face, ¹⁵⁰
 Shall never more be seen by mortal eyes:
 In earth the much-lamented virgin lies!
 Not wit, nor piety could fate prevent;
 Nor was the cruel Destiny content
 To finish all the murder at a blow,
 To sweep at once her life and beauty too;
 But, like a harden'd felon, took a pride
 To work more mischievously slow,
 And plunder'd first, and then destroy'd.
 O double sacrilege on things divine, ¹⁶⁰
 To rob the relic, and deface the shrine!
 But thus Orinda died:
 Heav'n, by the same disease, did both trans-
 late;
 As equal were their souls, so equal was their fate.

IX

Meantime her warlike brother on the seas
 His waving streamers to the winds displays,
 And vows for his return, with vain devotion, pays.
 Ah, generous youth, that wish forbear,
 The winds too soon will waft thee here!
 Slack all thy sails, and fear to come, ¹⁷⁰
 Alas, thou know'st not, thou art wreck'd
 at home!
 No more shalt thou behold thy sister's face,
 Thou hast already had her last embrace.
 But look aloft, and if thou kenn'st from far
 Among the Pleiads a new kindled star;
 If any sparkles than the rest more bright,
 'Tis she that shines in that propitious light.

When in mid-air the golden trump shall
 sound,
 To raise the nations under ground;

When in the Valley of Jehosaphat ¹⁸⁰
 The judging God shall close the book of
 fate,
 And there the last assizes keep
 For those who wake and those who
 sleep;
 When rattling bones together fly
 From the four corners of the sky;
 When sinews o'er the skeletons are spread,
 Those cloth'd with flesh, and life inspires
 the dead;
 The sacred poets first shall hear the sound,
 And foremost from the tomb shall bound,
 For they are cover'd with the lightest ground; ¹⁹⁰
 And straight, with inborn vigor, on the
 wing,
 Like mounting larks, to the new morning
 sing.
 There thou, sweet saint, before the choir
 shalt go,
 As harbinger of heav'n, the way to show,
 The way which thou so well hast learn'd
 below.

A LETTER TO SIR GEORGE ETHEREGE

[Sir George Etherege, to whose comedy, The Man of Mode, Dryden had contributed an epilogue (see p. 78, above), was appointed in 1685 English minister to Ratisbon. On January 9, 1686, he sent a poetical epistle to the Secretary of State, the Earl of Middleton, who seems to have requested Dryden to write a reply in the same vein. Etherege's letter and Dryden's answer were published together in the third edition, 1702, of Sylvæ, or The Second Part of Poetical Miscellanies.]

To you who live in chill degree,
 As map informs, of fifty-three,
 And do not much for cold atone,
 By bringing thither fifty-one,
 Methinks all climes should be alike,
 From tropic ev'n to pole artique;
 Since you have such a constitution
 As nowhere suffers diminution.
 You can be old in grave debate,
 And young in love-affairs of state; ¹⁰
 And both to wives and husbands show
 The vigor of a plenipo.
 Like mighty missionary you come Ad Partes Infidelium.
 A work of wondrous merit sure,

So far to go, so much t' indure;
 And all to preach to German dame,
 Where sound of Cupid never came.
 Less had you done, had you been sent,
 As far as Drake or Pinto went, 20
 For cloves and nutmegs to the line-a,
 Or even for oranges to China.
 That had indeed been charity;
 Where lovesick ladies helpless lie, }
 Chapp'd, and for want of liquor dry.
 But you have made your zeal appear
 Within the circle of the Bear.
 What region of the earth's so dull,
 That is not of your labors full?
 Triptolemus (so sung the Nine) 30
 Strew'd plenty from his cart divine.
 But spite of all these fable-makers,
 He never sow'd on Almain acres:
 No, that was left by fate's decree,
 To be perform'd and sung by thee.
 Thou break'st thro' forms with as much ease
 As the French king thro' articles.
 In grand affairs thy days are spent, }
 In waging weighty compliment,
 With such as monarchs represent. 40
 They who such vast fatigues attend,
 Want some soft minutes to unbend,
 To show the world that now and then
 Great ministers are mortal men.
 Then Rhenish rummers walk the round;
 In bumpers ev'ry king is crown'd;
 Besides three holy miter'd Hectors,
 And the whole college of Electors.
 No health of potentate is sunk,
 That pays to make his envoy drunk. 50
 These Dutch delights, I mention'd last,
 Suit not, I know, your English taste:
 For wine to leave a whore or play
 Was ne'er your Excellency's way.
 Nor need this title give offense,
 For here you were your Excellence,
 For gaming, writing, speaking, keeping,
 His Excellence for all but sleeping.
 Now if you tope in form, and treat, }
 'Tis the sour sauce to the sweet meat, 60
 The fine you pay for being great.
 Nay, here's a harder imposition,
 Which is indeed the court's petition,
 That setting worldly pomp aside,
 Which poet has at font denied,
 You would be pleas'd in humble way
 To write a trifle call'd a play.
 This truly is a degradation, }
 But would oblige the crown and nation 70
 Next to your wise negotiation.

If you pretend, as well you may,
 Your high degree, your friends will say, }
 The Duke St. Aignan made a play.
 If Gallic wit convince you scarce,
 His Grace of Bucks has made a farce,
 And you, whose comic wit is terse all,
 Can hardly fall below Rehearsal.
 Then finish what you have began,
 But scribble faster if you can;
 For yet no George, to our discerning, 80
 Has writ without a ten years' warning.

TO MY INGENIOUS FRIEND, MR.
 HENRY HIGDEN, ESQ.

ON HIS TRANSLATION OF THE TENTH
 SATIRE OF JUVENAL

[The following verses were prefixed to A Modern Essay on the Tenth Satyr of Juvenal, by Henry Higden, a lawyer. The book was licensed for the press June 2, 1686; it is dated 1687. The title-page bears the motto ridendo monet.]

THE Grecian wits, who satire first began,
 Were pleasant pasquins on the life of
 man:
 At mighty villains, who the State op- }
 press'd,
 They durst not rail; perhaps, they laugh'd }
 at least,
 And turn'd 'em out of office with a jest. }
 No fool could peep abroad, but ready stand
 The drolls, to clap a bauble in his hand.
 Wise legislators never yet could draw
 A fop within the reach of common law;
 For posture, dress, grimace, and affecta- }
 tion, 10
 Tho' foes to sense, are harmless to the nation.
 Our last redress is dint of verse to try,
 And satire is our Court of Chancery.
 This way took Horace to reform an age
 Not bad enough to need an author's rage.
 But yours,* who liv'd in more * Juvenal.
 degen'rate times,
 Was forc'd to fasten deep, and worry
 crimes.
 Yet you, my friend, have temper'd him so
 well,
 You make him smile in spite of all his zeal:
 An art peculiar to yourself alone, 20

To join the virtues of two styles in one.

O! were your author's principle re-
ceiv'd,
Half of the lab'ring world would be re-
liev'd;
For not to wish, is not to be deceiv'd.
Revenge would into charity be chang'd,
Because it costs too dear to be reveng'd:
It costs our quiet and content of mind,
And when 'tis compass'd, leaves a sting
behind.

Suppose I had the better end o' th' staff,
Why should I help th' ill-natur'd world to laugh? 30

'Tis all alike to them, who gets the day;

They love the spite and mischief of the fray.

No: I have cur'd myself of that disease;
Nor will I be provok'd, but when I please:
But let me half that cure to you restore;
You gave the salve, I laid it to the sore.

Our kind relief against a rainy day,
Beyond a tavern, or a tedious play,
We take your book, and laugh our spleen away.

If all your tribe (too studious of debate) 40
Would cease false hopes and titles to create,

Led by the rare example you begun,
Clients would fail, and lawyers be undone.

THE HIND AND THE PANTHER

A POEM IN THREE PARTS

— Antiquam exquisitè matrem. } VIRG.
Et vera, incessu, patuit dea. —

[The Hind and the Panther was published in the spring of 1687, being licensed for the press on April 11. Two more editions appeared in the same year; a fourth (miscalled the third) was included in the folio Poems and Translations, 1701. An edition was also published at Edinburgh in 1687. Though Dryden's name did not appear on the original title-pages, his authorship of the poem was no secret. He apparently made a few corrections in the second edition, which is taken as the basis of the following text.]

TO THE READER

THE nation is in too high a ferment for me to expect either fair war, or even so much as fair quarter, from a reader of the opposite party. All men are engag'd either on this side or that; and tho' conscience is the common word which is given by both, yet if a writer fall among enemies, and cannot give the marks of their conscience, he is knock'd down before the reasons of his own are heard. A preface, therefore, which is but a bespeaking of favor, is altogether useless. What I desire the reader should know concerning me, he will find in the body of the poem, if he have but the patience to peruse it. Only this advertisement let him take beforehand, which relates to the merits of the cause. No general characters of parties (call 'em either sects or churches) can be so fully and exactly drawn, as to comprehend all the several members of 'em; at least all such as are receiv'd under that denomination. For example, there are some of the Church by law establish'd who envy not liberty of conscience to Dissenters; as being well satisfied that, according to their own principles, they ought not to persecute them. Yet these, by reason of their fewness, I could not distinguish from the numbers of the rest, with whom they are embodied in one common name. On the other side, there are many of our sects, and more indeed than I could reasonably have hop'd, who have withdrawn themselves from the communion of the Panther, and embrac'd this gracious indulgence of his Majesty in point of toleration. But neither to the one nor the other of these is this satire any way intended: 'tis aim'd only at the refractory and disobedient on either side; for those who are come over to the royal party are consequently suppos'd to be out of gunshot. Our physicians have observ'd that, in process of time, some diseases have abated of their virulence, and have in a manner worn out their malignity, so as to be no longer mortal; and why may not I suppose the same concerning some of those who have formerly been enemies to kingly government, as well as Catholic religion? I hope they have now another notion of both, as having found, by comfortable experience, that the doctrine of persecution is far from being an article of our faith.

"T is not for any private man to censure the proceedings of a foreign prince; but, without suspicion of flattery, I may praise our own, who has taken contrary measures, and those more suitable to the spirit of Christianity. Some of the Dissenters, in their addresses to his Majesty, have said, that he has restor'd God to his empire over conscience. I confess I dare not stretch the figure to so great a boldness; but I may safely say that conscience is the royalty and prerogative of every private man. He is absolute in his own breast, and accountable to no earthly power for that which passes only betwixt God and him. Those who are driven into the fold are, generally speaking, rather made hypocrites than converts.

This indulgence being granted to all the sects, it ought in reason to be expected that they should both receive it, and receive it thankfully. For at this time of day to refuse the benefit, and adhere to those whom they have esteem'd their persecutors, what is it else, but publicly to own, that they suffer'd not before for conscience sake, but only out of pride and obstinacy, to separate from a Church for those impositions, which they now judge may be lawfully obey'd? After they have so long contended for their classical ordination, (not to speak of rites and ceremonies,) will they at length submit to an episcopal? If they can go so far out of complaisance to their old enemies, methinks a little reason should persuade 'em to take another step, and see whether that would lead 'em.

Of the receiving this toleration thankfully I shall say no more, than that they ought, and I doubt not they will consider from what hands they receiv'd it. 'T is not from a Cyrus, a heathen prince, and a foreigner, but from a Christian king, their native sovereign; who expects a return in specie from them, that the kindness which he has graciously shown them may be retaliated on those of his own persuasion.

As for the poem in general, I will only thus far satisfy the reader, that it was neither impos'd on me, nor so much as the subject given me by any man. It was written during the last winter and the beginning of this spring, tho' with long interruptions of ill health and other hindrances. About a fortnight before I had finish'd it, his Majesty's Declaration for Liberty of Conscience came abroad: which if I had so soon expected, I might have spar'd myself the labor of writing many things which are contain'd in the third part of it. But I was always in some hope that the Church of England might have been persuaded to have taken off the penal laws and the Test, which was one design of the poem when I propos'd to myself the writing of it.

'T is evident that some part of it was only occasional, and not first intended. I mean that defense of myself to which every honest man is bound, when he is injuriously attack'd in print; and I refer myself to the judgment of those who have read the Answer to the Defense of the late King's Papers, and that of the Duchess, (in which last I was concern'd,) how charitably I have been represented there. I am now inform'd both of the author and supervisors of his pamphlet, and will reply when I think he can affront me; for I am of Socrates's opinion, that all creatures cannot. In the mean time let him consider, whether he deserv'd not a more severe reprehension than I gave him formerly, for using so little respect to the memory of those whom he pretended to answer; and, at his leisure, look out for some original Treatise of Humility, written by any Protestant in English, (I believe I may say in any other tongue :) for the magnified piece of Duncomb on that subject, which either he must mean, or none, and with which another of his fellows has upbraided me, was translated from the Spanish of Rodriguez; tho' with the omission of the seventeenth, the twenty-fourth, the twenty-fifth, and the last chapter, which will be found in comparing of the books.

He would have insinuated to the world that her late Highness died not a Roman Catholic. He declares himself to be now satisfied to the contrary, in which he has giv'n up the cause: for matter of fact was the principal debate betwixt us. In the mean time, he would dispute the motives of her change; how preposterously, let all men judge, when he seem'd to deny the subject of the controversy, the change itself. And because I would not take up this ridiculous challenge, he tells the world I cannot argue; but he may as well infer, that a Catholic cannot fast, because he will not take up the cudgels against Mrs. James, to confute the Protestant religion.

I have but one word more to say concerning the poem as such, and abstracting from the matters, either religious or civil, which are handled in it. The first part, consisting most in general characters and narration, I have endeavor'd to raise, and give it the majestic turn of heroic poesy. The second, being matter of dispute, and chiefly concerning Church authority, I was oblig'd to make as plain and perspicuous as possibly I could; yet not wholly neglecting the numbers, tho' I had not frequent occasions for the magnificence of verse. The third, which has more of the nature of domestic conversation, is, or ought to be, more free and familiar than the two former.

There are in it two episodes, or fables, which are interwoven with the main design; so that they are properly parts of it, tho' they are also distinct stories of themselves. In both of these I have made use of the commonplaces of satire, whether true or false, which are urg'd by the members of the one Church against the other: at which I hope no reader of either party will be scandaliz'd, because they are not of my invention, but as old, to my knowledge, as the times of Boccace and Chaucer on the one side, and as those of the Reformation on the other.

THE HIND AND THE PANTHER

THE FIRST PART

A MILK-WHITE Hind, immortal and unchang'd,
Fed on the lawns, and in the forest rang'd;
Without unspotted, innocent within,
She fear'd no danger, for she knew no sin.
Yet had she oft been chas'd with horns and hounds
And Scythian shafts; and many winged wounds
Aim'd at her heart; was often fore'd to fly,
And doom'd to death, tho' fated not to die.
Not so her young; for their unequal line
Was hero's make, half human, half divine. 10
Their earthly mold obnoxious was to fate,
Th' immortal part assum'd immortal state.
Of these a slaughter'd army lay in blood,
Extended o'er the Caledonian wood,
Their native walk; whose vocal blood arose,
And cried for pardon on their perjur'd foes.
Their fate was fruitful, and the sanguine seed,
Endued with souls, encreas'd the sacred breed.
So captive Israel multiplied in chains,
A numerous exile, and enjoy'd her pains. 20
With grief and gladness mix'd, their mother view'd
Her martyr'd offspring, and their race renew'd;
Their corps to perish, but their kind to last,
So much the deathless plant the dying fruit surpass'd.
Panting and pensive now she rang'd alone,
And wander'd in the kingdoms, once her own.
The common hunt, tho' from their rage restrain'd
By sov'reign pow'r, her company disdain'd;

Grinn'd as they pass'd, and with a glaring eye

Gave gloomy signs of secret enmity. 30
'Tis true, she bounded by, and tripp'd so light,

They had not time to take a steady sight;
For Truth has such a face and such a mien,
As to be lov'd needs only to be seen.

The bloody Bear, an Independent beast,
Unlick'd to form, in groans her hate express'd.

Among the timorous kind the Quaking Hare

Profess'd neutrality, but would not swear.
Next her the buffoon Ape, as atheists use,
Mimick'd all sects, and had his own to choose: 40

Still when the Lion look'd, his knees he bent,

And paid at church a courtier's compliment.

The bristled Baptist Boar, impure as he,
(But whiten'd with the foam of sanctity,)
With fat pollutions fill'd the sacred place,

And mountains level'd in his furious race:

So first rebellion founded was in grace. }
But since the mighty ravage which he made

In German forests had his guilt betray'd,
With broken tusks, and with a borrow'd name, 50

He shunn'd the vengeance, and conceal'd the shame;

So lurk'd in sects unseen. With greater guile

False Reynard fed on consecrated spoil:
The graceless beast by Athanasius first
Was chas'd from Nice; then, by Socinus nurs'd,

His impious race their blasphemy renew'd,
And nature's King thro' nature's optics view'd.

Revers'd, they view'd him lessen'd to their eye,

Nor in an infant could a God descry:
New swarming sects to this obliquely tend,
Hence they began, and here they all will end. 61

What weight of ancient witness can prevail,

If private reason hold the public scale?
But, gracious God, how well dost thou provide

For erring judgments an unerring guide !
Thy throne is darkness in th' abyss of
light,

A blaze of glory that forbids the sight.
O teach me to believe thee thus conceal'd,
And search no farther than thyself reveal'd;

But her alone for my director take, 70
Whom thou hast promis'd never to forsake !

My thoughtless youth was wing'd with vain desires,

My manhood, long misled by wand'ring
fires,

Follow'd false lights; and, when their glimpse was gone,

My pride struck out new sparkles of her
own.

Such was I, such by nature still I am;
Be thine the glory, and be mine the shame.
Good life be now my task: my doubts are
done:

(What more could fright my faith, than three in one ?)

Can I believe eternal God could lie 80
Disguis'd in mortal mold and infancy ?
That the great Maker of the world could die ?

And after that trust my imperfect sense,
Which calls in question his omnipotence ?

Can I my reason to my faith compel,
And shall my sight, and touch, and taste
rebel ?

Superior faculties are set aside;
Shall their subservient organs be my guide ?
Then let the moon usurp the rule of day,
And winking tapers shew the sun his
way; 90

For what my senses can themselves perceive,

I need no revelation to believe.
Can they who say the host should be deserved

By sense, define a body glorified ?
Impassible, and penetrating parts ?
Let them declare by what mysterious arts
He shot that body thro' th' opposing might
Of bolts and bars impervious to the light,
And stood before his train confess'd in open sight.

For since thus wondrously he pass'd, 'tis
plain, 100

One single place two bodies did contain.
And sure the same Omnipotence as well
Can make one body in more places dwell.

Let Reason then at her own quarry fly,
But how can finite grasp infinity ?

'Tis urg'd again that faith did first commence

By miracles, which are appeals to sense,
And thence concluded, that our sense must
be

The motive still of credibility.

For latter ages must on former wait, 110
And what began belief, must propagate.

But winnow well this thought, and you shall find

'Tis light as chaff that flies before the
wind.

Were all those wonders wrought by pow'r
divine,

As means or ends of some more deep design ?

Most sure as means, whose end was this
alone,

To prove the Godhead of th' eternal Son.

God thus asserted: man is to believe

Beyond what sense and reason can conceive,

And for mysterious things of faith rely 120
On the proponent, Heav'n's authority.

If then our faith we for our guide admit,
Vain is the farther search of human wit;

As, when the building gains a surer stay,
We take th' unuseful scaffolding away.

Reason by sense no more can understand;
The game is play'd into another hand.

Why choose we then like bilanders to
creep

Along the coast, and land in view to keep,
When safely we may launch into the deep ? 130

In the same vessel which our Savior bore,
Himself the pilot, let us leave the shore,
And with a better guide a better world
explore.

Could he his Godhead veil with flesh and
blood,

And not veil these again to be our food ?
His grace in both is equal in extent,

The first affords us life, the second nourish-
ment.

And if he can, why all this frantic pain
To construe what his clearest words contain,

And make a riddle what he made so
plain ? 140

To take up half on trust, and half to
try,

Name it not faith, but bungling bigotry.

Both knave and fool the merchant we may call,
 To pay great sums, and to compound the
 small:
 For who would break with Heav'n, and would not break for all?
 Rest then, my soul, from endless anguish
 freed:
 Nor sciences thy guide, nor sense thy creed.
 Faith is the best ensurer of thy bliss;
 The bank above must fail before the venture miss.
 But heav'n and heav'n-born faith are far
 from thee, 150
 Thou first apostate to divinity.
 Unkennel'd range in thy Polonian plains;
 A fiercer foe th' insatiate Wolf remains.
 Too boastful Britain, please thyself no
 more,
 That beasts of prey are banish'd from thy
 shore:
 The Bear, the Boar, and every salvage
 name,
 Wild in effect, tho' in appearance tame,
 Lay waste thy woods, destroy thy blissful
 bow'r,
 And, muzzled tho' they seem, the mutes
 devour.
 More haughty than the rest, the wolfish
 race 160
 Appear with belly gaunt, and famish'd
 face:
 Never was so deform'd a beast of grace.
 His ragged tail betwixt his legs he wears,
 Close clapp'd for shame; but his rough crest he rears,
 And pricks up his predestinating ears.
 His wild disorder'd walk, his haggard eyes,
 Did all the bestial citizens surprise.
 Tho' fear'd and hated, yet he rul'd a while,
 As captain or companion of the spoil.
 Full many a year his hateful head had
 been 170
 For tribute paid, nor since in Cambria seen:
 The last of all the litter scap'd by chance,
 And from Geneva first infested France.
 Some authors thus his pedigree will trace,
 But others write him of an upstart race;
 Because of Wycliffe's brood no mark he brings,
 But his innate antipathy to kings.
 These last deduce him from th' Helvetian
 kind,
 Who near the Leman lake his consort lin'd:
 That fi'ry Zuinglius first th' affection bred,

And meager Calvin bless'd the nuptial bed.
 In Israel some believe him whelp'd long since, 182
 When the proud Sanhedrim op- Vid. pref. to press'd the prince, Heyl. Hist.
 Or, since he will be Jew, derive of Presb.
 him high'r,
 When Corah with his brethren did conspire
 From Moses' hand the sov'reign sway to wrest,
 And Aaron of his ephod to devest:
 Till opening earth made way for all to pass,
 And could not bear the burden of a class.
 The Fox and he came shuffled in the dark, 190
 If ever they were stow'd in Noah's ark:
 Perhaps not made; for all their barking
 train
 The Dog (a common species) will contain.
 And some wild curs, who from their masters ran,
 Abhorring the supremacy of man,
 In woods and caves the rebel-race began.
 O happy pair, how well have you en-
 creas'd!
 What ills in Church and State have you
 redress'd!
 With teeth untried, and rudiments of claws,
 Your first essay was on your native laws: 200
 Those having torn with ease, and trampled down,
 Your fangs you fasten'd on the miter'd
 crown,
 And freed from God and monarchy your
 town.
 What tho' your native kennel still be small,
 Bounded betwixt a puddle and a wall;
 Yet your victorious colonies are sent
 Where the north ocean girds the continent.
 Quicken'd with fire below, your monsters
 breed
 In fenny Holland, and in fruitful Tweed:
 And, like the first, the last effects to be 210
 Drawn to the dregs of a democracy.
 As, where in fields the fairy rounds are seen,
 A rank sour herbage rises on the green;
 So, springing where these midnight elves
 advance,
 Rebellion prints the footsteps of the dance.
 Such are their doctrines, such contempt
 they show
 To Heav'n above, and to their prince be-
 low,
 As none but traitors and blasphemers
 know.

God, like the tyrant of the skies, is plac'd,
And kings, like slaves, beneath the crowd
debas'd. ²²⁰

So fulsome is their food that flocks refuse

To bite, and only dogs for physic use.

As, where the lightning runs along the
ground,

No husbandry can heal the blasting wound;
Nor bladed grass, nor bearded corn succeeds,

But scales of scurf and putrefaction breeds:
Such wars, such waste, such fiery tracks of dearth

Their zeal has left, and such a teemless
earth.

But, as the poisons of the deadliest kind
Are to their own unhappy coasts confin'd; ²³⁰

As only Indian shades of sight deprive,
And magic plants will but in Colchos thrive;
So Presbyt'ry and pestilential zeal
Can only flourish in a commonweal.

From Celtic woods is chas'd the wolfish
crew;

But ah! some pity e'en to brutes is due:
Their native walks, methinks, they might enjoy,

Curb'd of their native malice to destroy.

Of all the tyrannies on humankind,
The worst is that which persecutes the mind. ²⁴⁰

Let us but weigh at what offense we strike;
'T is but because we cannot think alike.

In punishing of this, we overthrow

The laws of nations and of nature too.

Beasts are the subjects of tyrannic sway,
Where still the stronger on the weaker
prey;

Man only of a softer mold is made,
Not for his fellows' ruin, but their aid:
Created kind, beneficent, and free,
The noble image of the Deity. ²⁵⁰

One portion of informing fire was giv'n
To brutes, th' inferior family of heav'n:
The smith divine, as with a careless beat,
Struck out the mute creation at a heat;
But, when arriv'd at last to human race,
The Godhead took a deep consid'ring space;
And, to distinguish man from all the
rest,

Unlock'd the sacred treasures of his breast;
And mercy mix'd with reason did impart,
One to his head, the other to his heart: ²⁶⁰
Reason to rule, but mercy to forgive;
The first is law, the last prerogative.

And like his mind his outward form ap-
pear'd,

When, issuing naked to the wond'ring
herd,

He charm'd their eyes; and, for they lov'd, they fear'd:

Not arm'd with horns of arbitrary might,
Or claws to seize their furry spoils in
fight,

Or with increase of feet t' o'ertake 'em
in their flight;

Of easy shape, and pliant ev'ry way;
Confessing still the softness of his clay, ²⁷⁰

And kind as kings upon their coronation
day;

With open hands, and with extended space
Of arms, to satisfy a large embrace.

Thus kneaded up with milk, the new-made
man

His kingdom o'er his kindred world began;
Till knowledge misapplied, misunderstood,
And pride of empire sour'd his balmy blood.
Then, first rebelling, his own stamp he coins;

The murth'rer Cain was latent in his loins:
And blood began its first and loudest cry ²⁸⁰
For diff'ring worship of the Deity.

Thus persecution rose, and farther space
Produc'd the mighty hunter of his race.

Not so the blessed Pan his flock increas'd, Content to fold 'em from the famish'd
beast:

Mild were his laws; the Sheep and harmless Hind

Were never of the persecuting kind.

Such pity now the pious Pastor shows, }
Such mercy from the British Lion flows, } That both provide protection for their foes. ²⁹⁰

O happy regions, Italy and Spain,
Which never did those monsters entertain!
The Wolf, the Bear, the Boar, can there
advance

No native claim of just inheritance.

And self-preserving laws, severe in show,
May guard their fences from th' invading
foe.

Where birth has plac'd 'em, let 'em safely
share

The common benefit of vital air.

Themselves unarm'd, let them live un-harm'd;

Their jaws disabled, and their claws disarm'd: ³⁰⁰

Here, only in nocturnal howlings bold,

They dare not seize the Hind, nor leap the fold.

More pow'rful, and as vigilant as they,
The Lion awfully forbids the prey.

Their rage repress'd, tho' pinch'd with famine sore,

They stand aloof, and tremble at his
roar:

Much is their hunger, but their fear is
more.

These are the chief; to number o'er the
rest,

And stand, like Adam, naming ev'ry beast,
Were weary work: nor will the Muse describe 310

A slimy-born and sun-begotten tribe;
Who, far from steeples and their sacred
sound,

In fields their sullen conventicles found.

These gross, half-animated lumps I leave;
Nor can I think what thoughts they can conceive.

But if they think at all, 't is sure no high'r
Than matter, put in motion, may aspire:

Souls that can scarce ferment their mass
of clay:

So drossy, so divisible are they,
As would but serve pure bodies for al-
lay: 320

Such souls as shards produce, such beetle
things

As only buzz to heav'n with ev'ning wings;
Strike in the dark, offending but by chance,
Such are the blindfold blows of ignorance.

They know not beings, and but hate a
name;

To them the Hind and Panther are the
same.

The Panther, sure the noblest, next the Hind,

And fairest creature of the spotted kind;
O, could her inborn stains be wash'd away,
She were too good to be a beast of prey!

How can I praise, or blame, and not offend, 331

Or how divide the frailty from the friend!
Her faults and virtues lie so mix'd that she Nor wholly stands condemn'd, nor wholly
free.

Then, like her injur'd Lion, let me speak;
He cannot bend her, and he would not break.

Unkind already, and estrang'd in part,
The Wolf begins to share her wand'ring
heart.

Tho' unpolluted yet with actual ill,
She half commits, who sins but in her will.
If, as our dreaming Platonists report, 341
There could be spirits of a middle sort,
Too black for heav'n, and yet too white for
hell,

Who just dropp'd halfway down, nor lower
fell;

So pois'd, so gently she descends from
high,

It seems a soft dismissal from the sky.
Her house not ancient, whatsoe'er pretense
Her clergy heralds make in her defense;
A second century not halfway run,
Since the new honors of her blood begun.

A Lion, old, obscene, and furious made 351
By lust, compress'd her mother in a shade;
Then, by a left-hand marriage, weds the
dame,

Cov'ring adult'ry with a specious name:
So Schism begot; and Sacrilege and she,
A well-match'd pair, got graceless Heresy.
God's and kings' rebels have the same good cause,

To trample down divine and human laws;
Both would be call'd reformers, and their
hate

Alike destructive both to Church and
State: 360

The fruit proclaims the plant; a lawless
prince

By luxury reform'd incontinence;
By ruins, charity; by riots, abstinence.
Confessions, fasts, and penance set aside;
O, with what ease we follow such a guide,

Where souls are starv'd, and senses
gratified;

Where marriage pleasures midnight
pray'r supply,
And matin bells (a melancholy cry)
Are tun'd to merrier notes, encrease and multiply!

Religion shows a rosy-color'd face; 370
Not hatter'd out with drudging works of
grace:

A downhill reformation rolls apace.
What flesh and blood would crowd the narrow gate,

Or, till they waste their pamper'd
paunches, wait?

All would be happy at the cheapest rate.
Tho' our lean faith these rigid laws has
giv'n,

The full-fed Mussulman goes fat to heav'n;

For his Arabian prophet with delights
Of sense allur'd his Eastern proselytes.
The jolly Luther, reading him, began 380
T' interpret Scriptures by his Alcoran;
To grub the thorns beneath our tender
feet,

And make the paths of paradise more sweet:

Bethought him of a wife ere halfway gone,
(For 't was uneasy travailing alone;)

And, in this masquerade of mirth and
love,

Mistook the bliss of heav'n for Bacchanals
above.

Sure he presum'd of praise, who came to stock

Th' ethereal pastures with so fair a flock, Burnish'd, and batt'ning on their food, to
show 390

The diligence of careful herds below.

Our Panther, tho' like these she chang'd
her head,

Yet, as the mistress of a monarch's bed,
Her front erect with majesty she bore,
The crosier wielded, and the miter wore.

Her upper part of decent discipline
Shew'd affectation of an ancient line;
And Fathers, councils, Church and Church's
head,

Were on her reverend phylacteries read.
But what disgrac'd and disavow'd the rest,
Was Calvin's brand, that stigmatiz'd the beast. 401

Thus, like a creature of a double kind,
In her own labyrinth she lives confin'd;
To foreign lands no sound of her is come,
Humbly content to be despis'd at home.
Such is her faith; where good cannot be had,

At least she leaves the refuse of the bad:
Nice in her choice of ill, tho' not of best,
And least deform'd, because reform'd the least.

In doubtful points betwixt her diff'ring
friends, 410

Where one for substance, one for sign contends,

Their contradicting terms she strives to
join;

Sign shall be substance, substance shall be
sign.

A real presence all her sons allow,
And yet 't is flat idolatry to bow,
Because the Godhead's there they know } not how.

Her novices are taught that bread and
wine

Are but the visible and outward sign, Receiv'd by those who in communion
join;

But th' inward grace, or the thing signified, 420

His blood and body, who to save us died:

The faithful this thing signified receive.

What is 't those faithful then partake or leave?

For what is signified and understood,

Is, by her own confession, flesh and blood.

Then, by the same acknowledgment, we
know

They take the sign, and take the substance
too.

The lit'ral sense is hard to flesh and blood,
But nonsense never can be understood.

Her wild belief on ev'ry wave is
toss'd; 430

But sure no Church can better morals
boast:

True to her king her principles are found;
O that her practice were but half so sound!

Steadfast in various turns of state she
stood,

And seal'd her vow'd affection with her
blood:

Nor will I meanly tax her constancy,
That int'rest or obligation made the tie (Bound to the fate of murder'd monarchy.)

Before the sounding ax so falls the vine,
Whose tender branches round the poplar
twine. 440

She chose her ruin, and resign'd her life,

In death undaunted as an Indian wife:

A rare example! but some souls we see

Grow hard, and stiffen with adversity:

Yet these by fortune's favors are undone;

Resolv'd, into a baser form they run,

And bore the wind, but cannot bear the
sun.

Let this be Nature's frailty, or her fate,

Or * Isgrim's counsel, her new-chosen mate; • The Wolf.

Still she's the fairest of the fallen crew, 450
No mother more indulgent, but the true.

Fierce to her foes, yet fears her force to
try,

Because she wants innate aucturity;

For how can she constrain them to obey,

Who has herself cast off the lawful sway?

Rebellion equals all, and those who toil

In common theft will share the common spoil.

Let her produce the title and the right
Against her old superiors first to fight;
If she reform by text, ev'n that's as
plain 460

For her own rebels to reform again.
As long as words a diff'rent sense will bear,
And each may be his own interpreter,
Our airy faith will no foundation find;
The word's a weathercock for ev'ry wind:
The Bear, the Fox, the Wolf, by turns prevail;

The most in pow'r supplies the present
gale.

The wretched Panther cries aloud for aid
To Church and councils, whom she first be-
tray'd;

No help from Fathers or tradition's
train: 470

Those ancient guides she taught us to dis-
dain,

And by that Scripture which she once
abus'd

To reformation stands herself accus'd.
What bills for breach of laws can she prefer,

Expounding which she owns herself may err?

And, after all her winding ways are
tried,

If doubts arise, she slips herself aside,
And leaves the private conscience for the guide.

If then that conscience set th' offender
free,

It bars her claim to Church aucturity. 480
How can she censure, or what crime pre-
tend,

But Scripture may be construed to defend?
Ev'n those whom for rebellion she transmits

To civil pow'r, her doctrine first acquits;
Because no disobedience can ensue,
Where no submission to a judge is due;
Each judging for himself, by her consent, Whom thus absolv'd she sends to punishment.

Suppose the magistrate revenge her cause,
'Tis only for transgressing human laws. 490
How ans'ring to its end a Church is made, Whose pow'r is but to counsel and persuade?

O solid rock, on which secure she stands!
Eternal house, not built with mortal hands!

O sure defense against th' infernal gate,
A patent during pleasure of the State!

Thus is the Panther neither lov'd nor
fear'd,

A mere mock queen of a divided herd, Whom soon by lawful pow'r she might control,

Herself a part submitted to the whole. 500
Then, as the moon who first receives the
light

By which she makes our nether regions
bright,

So might she shine, reflecting from afar
The rays she borrow'd from a better star;
Big with the beams which from her mother
flow,

And reigning o'er the rising tides below:
Now, mixing with a salvage crowd, she goes,

And meanly flatters her invet'rate foes;
Rul'd while she rules, and losing ev'ry
hour

Her wretched remnants of precarious
pow'r. 510

One evening, while the cooler shade she
sought,

Revolving many a melancholy thought,
Alone she walk'd, and look'd around in
vain,

With rueful visage, for her vanish'd train:
None of her sylvan subjects made their
court;

Levées and couchées pass'd without resort.
So hardly can usurpers manage well

Those whom they first instructed to rebel:
More liberty begets desire of more;

The hunger still encreases with the store. 520 Without respect they brush'd along the
wood,

Each in his clan, and, fill'd with loath-
some food,

Ask'd no permission to the neighb'ring
flood.

The Panther, full of inward discontent,
Since they would go, before 'em wisely
went;

Supplying want of pow'r by drinking first,
As if she gave 'em leave to quench their thirst.

Among the rest, the Hind, with fearful
face,

Beheld from far the common wat'ring
place,

Nor durst approach; till with an awful
roar 530

The sovereign Lion bade her fear no more.
Encourag'd thus she brought her younglings nigh,

Watching the motions of her patron's eye,
And drank a sober draught; the rest amaz'd Stood mutely still, and on the stranger
gaz'd;

Survey'd her part by part, and sought to
find

The ten-horn'd monster in the harmless
Hind,

Such as the Wolf and Panther had de-
sign'd.

They thought at first they dream'd; for 't was offense

With them to question certitude of sense, ⁵⁴⁰
Their guide in faith; but nearer when they drew,

And had the faultless object full in view,
Lord, how they all admir'd her heav'nly hue!

Some, who before her fellowship dis-
dain'd,

Scarce, and but scarce, from inborn rage
restrain'd,

Now frisk'd about her, and old kindred feign'd.

Whether for love or int'rest, ev'ry sect
Of all the salvage nation shew'd respect:
The viceroy Panther could not awe the
herd;

The more the company, the less they fear'd. ⁵⁵⁰

The surly Wolf with secret envy burst, Yet could not howl; the Hind had seen him first:

But what he durst not speak, the Panther
durst.

For when the herd, suffis'd, did late repair

To ferny heaths, and to their forest lair,
She made a mannerly excuse to stay, Proff'ring the Hind to wait her half the
way;

That, since the sky was clear, an hour of talk

Might help her to beguile the tedious walk.
With much good will the motion was em-brac'd, ⁵⁶⁰

To chat a while on their adventures pass'd;
Nor had the grateful Hind so soon forgot

Her friend and fellow-suff'rer in the Plot.
Yet wond'ring how of late she grew es-trang'd,

Her forehead cloudy, and her count'nance
chang'd,

She thought this hour th' occasion would present

To learn her secret cause of discontent,
Which well she hop'd might be with ease
redress'd,

Consid'ring her a well-bred civil beast,
And more a gentlewoman than the rest. ⁵⁷⁰

After some common talk what rumors ran,
The lady of the spotted muff began.

THE SECOND PART

"Dame," said the Panther, "times are
mended well,

Since late among the Philistines you fell.
The toils were pitch'd, a spacious tract of
ground

With expert huntsmen was encompass'd
round;

Th' enclosure narrow'd; the sagacious
pow'r

Of hounds and death drew nearer ev'ry
hour.

'Tis true, the younger Lion scap'd the
snare,

But all your priestly calves lay struggling
there, ⁵⁸⁰

As sacrifices on their altars laid;
While you, their careful mother, wisely
fled,

Not trusting destiny to save your head.
For, whate'er promises you have applied

To your unfailing Church, the surer
side

Is four fair legs in danger to provide.
And whate'er tales of Peter's chair you
tell,

Yet, saving reverence of the miracle,
The better luck was yours to scape so
well."

"As I remember," said the sober Hind,
"Those toils were for your own dear self

design'd, ⁵⁹¹

As well as me; and with the selfsame
throw,

To catch the quarry and the vermin too: (Forgive the sland'rous tongues that call'd you so.)

Howe'er you take it now, the common
cry

Then ran you down for your rank loyalty.
Besides, in Popery they thought you nurs'd,

(As evil tongues will ever speak the worst,) Because some forms, and ceremonies some You kept, and stood in the main question dumb. ⁶⁰⁰

Dumb you were born indeed; but, thinking long,

The Test it seems at last has loos'd your tongue.

And, to explain what your forefathers meant,

By real presence in the sacrament, (After long fencing, push'd against a wall,)

Your salvo comes, that he 's not there at all:

There chang'd your faith, and what may change may fall.

Who can believe what varies every day, Nor ever was, nor will be at a stay?"

"Tortures may force the tongue untruths to tell, ⁶¹⁰

And I ne'er own'd myself infallible,"

Replied the Panther: "grant such presence were,

Yet in your sense I never own'd it there.

A real virtue we by faith receive,

And that we in the sacrament believe."

"Then," said the Hind, "as you the matter state,

Not only Jesuits can equivocate;

For real as you now the word expound,

From solid substance dwindles to a sound.

Methinks an Æsop's fable you repeat; ⁶²⁰

You know who took the shadow for the meat:

Your Church's substance thus you change at will,

And yet retain your former figure still.

I freely grant you spoke to save your life,

For then you lay beneath the butcher's knife.

Long time you fought, redoubled batt'ry bore,

But, after all, against yourself you swore:

Your former self; for ev'ry hour your form

Is chop'p'd and chang'd, like winds before a storm.

Thus fear and int'rest will prevail with some; ⁶³⁰

For all have not the gift of martyrdom."

The Panther grinn'd at this, and thus replied:

"That men may err was never yet denied.

But, if that common principle be true,

The cannon, dame, is level'd full at you.

But, shunning long disputes, I fain would see

That wondrous wight Infallibility.

Is he from heav'n, this mighty champion, come,

Or lodg'd below in subterranean Rome?

First, seat him somewhere, and derive his race, ⁶⁴⁰

Or else conclude that nothing has no place."

"Suppose, (tho' I disown it,)" said the Hind,

"The certain mansion were not yet assign'd;

The doubtful residence no proof can bring Against the plain existence of the thing.

Because philosophers may disagree, }

If sight b' emission or reception be, }

Shall it be thence inferr'd, I do not see? }

But you require an answer positive, }

Which yet, when I demand, you dare not give; ⁶⁵⁰

For fallacies in universals live.

I then affirm that this unailing guide

In Pope and gen'ral councils must reside;

Both lawful, both combin'd: what one decrees }

By numerous votes, the other ratifies: }

On this undoubted sense the Church relies. }

'T is true, some doctors in a scantier space,

I mean, in each apart, contract the place.

Some, who to greater length extend the line,

The Church's after-acceptation join. ⁶⁶⁰

This last circumference appears too wide;

The Church diffus'd is by the council tied;

As members by their representatives

Oblig'd to laws which prince and senate gives.

Thus some contract, and some enlarge the space; }

In Pope and council who denies the place, }

Assisted from above with God's unailing grace? }

Those canons all the needful points contain;

Their sense so obvious, and their words so plain,

That no disputes about the doubtful text ⁶⁷⁰

Have, hitherto, the lab'ring world perplex'd.

If any should in aftertimes appear,

New councils must be call'd, to make the meaning clear;

Because in them the pow'r supreme resides,

And all the promises are to the guides.

This may be taught with sound and safe defense;

But mark how sandy is your own pretense,
Who, setting councils, Pope, and Church
aside,

Are ev'ry man his own presuming guide.
The sacred books, you say, are full and plain, ⁶⁸⁰

And ev'ry needful point of truth contain:
All, who can read, interpreters may be.
Thus, tho' your sev'ral Churches disagree,
Yet ev'ry saint has to himself alone
The secret of this philosophic stone.

These principles your jarring sects unite,
When diff'ring doctors and disciples fight.
Tho' Luther, Zuingleus, Calvin, holy chiefs,
Have made a battle-royal of beliefs;
Or, like wild horses, sev'ral ways have whirl'd ⁶⁹⁰

The tortur'd text about the Christian world;
Each Jehu lashing on with furious force,
That Turk or Jew could not have us'd it
worse;

No matter what dissension leaders make,
Where ev'ry private man may save a
stake:

Rul'd by the Scripture and his own advice,

Each has a blind by-path to Paradise;
Where, driving in a circle, slow or fast,
Opposing sects are sure to meet at last.

A wondrous charity you have in store ⁷⁰⁰
For all reform'd to pass the narrow door;
So much, that Mahomet had scarcely
more: }

For he, kind prophet, was for damning none;
But Christ and Moses were to save their
own:

Himself was to secure his chosen race, Tho' reason good for Turks to take the
place,

And he allow'd to be the better man,
In virtue of his holier Alcoran."

"True," said the Panther, "I shall ne'er
deny

My brethren may be sav'd as well as I: ⁷¹⁰
Tho' Huguenots condemn our ordination, Succession, ministerial vocation;
And Luther, more mistaking what he read,
Misjoins the sacred body with the bread:

Yet, lady, still remember I maintain,
The word in needful points is only plain."

"Needless, or needful, I not now con-
tend,

For still you have a loophole for a friend;"

Rejoin'd the matron: "but the rule you
lay

Has led whole flocks, and leads them still astray ⁷²⁰

In weighty points, and full damnation's
way. }

For did not Arius first, Socinus now,
The Son's eternal Godhead disavow?
And did not these by gospel texts alone Condemn our doctrine, and maintain their
own?

Have not all heretics the same pretense
To plead the Scriptures in their own defense?

How did the Nicene Council then decide That strong debate? was it by Scripture
tried?

No, sure to those the rebel would not yield; ⁷³⁰

Squadrons of texts he marshal'd in the
field;

That was but civil war, an equal set,
Where piles with piles, and eagles eagles
met.

With texts point-blank and plain he fac'd
the foe:

And did not Sathan tempt our Savior so?
The good old bishops took a simpler way;
Each ask'd but what he heard his father
say,

Or how he was instructed in his youth,
And by tradition's force upheld the truth."

The Panther smil'd at this: "And when," said she, ⁷⁴⁰
"Were those first councils disallow'd by
me?"

Or where did I at sure tradition strike, Provided still it were apostolic?"

"Friend," said the Hind, "you quit
your former ground,

Where all your faith you did on Scripture
found:

Now 't is tradition join'd with Holy Writ;
But thus your memory betrays your wit."

"No," said the Panther, "for in that I
view

When your tradition's forg'd, and when 't is
true.

I set 'em by the rule, and, as they square, ⁷⁵⁰

Or deviate from undoubted doctrine
there, }

This oral fiction, that old faith declare."

(Hind.) "The Council steer'd, it seems,
a diff'rent course;

They tried the Scripture by tradition's
force:

But you tradition by the Scripture try;
Pursued by sects, from this to that you
fly,

Nor dare on one foundation to rely.
The word is then depos'd, and in this view
You rule the Scripture, not the Scripture
you."

Thus said the dame, and, smiling, thus pursued: 760

"I see, tradition then is disallow'd,
When not evinc'd by Scripture to be true,
And Scripture, as interpreted by you.
But here you tread upon unfaithful
ground;

Unless you could infallibly expound:
Which you reject as odious Popery,
And throw that doctrine back with scorn
on me.

Suppose we on things traditive divide,
And both appeal to Scripture to decide;
By various texts we both uphold our
claim, 770

Nay, often ground our titles on the same:
After long labor lost, and time's expense,
Both grant the words, and quarrel for the
sense.

Thus all disputes for ever must depend,
For no dumb rule can controversies end.
Thus, when you said tradition must be
tried

By Sacred Writ, whose sense yourselves decide,

You said no more, but that yourselves must be

The judges of the Scripture sense, not we.
Against our Church-tradition you declare, 780

And yet your clerks would sit in Moses'
chair:

At least 't is prov'd against your argument,
The rule is far from plain, where all dis-
sent."

"If not by Scriptures, how can we be sure,"

Replied the Panther, "what tradition's
pure?

For you may palm upon us new for old:
All, as they say, that glitters is not gold."

"How but by following her," replied the
dame,

"To whom deriv'd from sire to son they
came;

Where ev'ry age does on another move, 790

And trusts no farther than the next above;
Where all the rounds like Jacob's ladder
rise,

The lowest hid in earth, the topmost in the
skies."

Sternly the salvage did her answer mark,
Her glowing eyeballs glitt'ring in the dark,
And said but this: "Since lucre was your
trade,

Succeeding times such dreadful gaps have
made,

'T is dangerous climbing: to your sons and
you

I leave the ladder, and its omen too."

(Hind.) "The Panther's breath was ever fam'd for sweet; 800

But from the Wolf such wishes oft I meet:
You learn'd this language from the Blatant Beast,

Or rather did not speak, but were possess'd.
As for your answer, 't is but barely urg'd:
You must evince tradition to be forg'd;

Produce plain proofs; unblemish'd authors
use,

As ancient as those ages they accuse;
Till when, 't is not sufficient to defame:
An old possession stands, till elder quits
the claim.

Then for our int'rest, which is nam'd
alone 810

To load with envy, we retort your own.
For when traditions in your faces fly,
Resolving not to yield, you must decry.
As, when the cause goes hard, the guilty
man

Excepts, and thins his jury all he can;
So, when you stand of other aid bereft,
You to the twelve apostles would be left.

Your friend the Wolf did with more craft provide

To set those toys, traditions, quite aside;
And Fathers too, unless when, reason
spent, 820

He cites 'em but sometimes for ornament.
But, madam Panther, you, tho' more sincere,

Are not so wise as your adulterer:
The private spirit is a better blind
Than all the dodging tricks your authors
find.

For they, who left the Scripture to the
crowd,

Each for his own peculiar judge allow'd;
The way to please 'em was to make 'em
proud.

Thus, with full sails, they ran upon the shelf:

Who could suspect a cozenage from himself? ⁸³⁰

On his own reason safer 't is to stand,
Than be deceiv'd and damn'd at second hand.

But you, who Fathers and traditions take,
And garble some, and some you quite forsake,

Pretending Church aucturity to fix,
And yet some grains of private spirit mix,
Are like a mule made up of diff'ring seed,
And that's the reason why you never breed;
At least not propagate your kind abroad,
For home dissenters are by statutes aw'd.

And yet they grow upon you ev'ry day,
While you (to speak the best) are at a stay, ⁸⁴²

For sects that are extremes abhor a middle way.

Like tricks of state, to stop a raging flood,

Or mollify a mad-brain'd senate's mood,
Of all expedients never one was good.

Well may they argue, (nor can you deny,)
If we must fix on Church aucturity,

Best on the best, the fountain, not the flood;
That must be better still, if this be good.

Shall she command, who has herself rebell'd? ⁸⁵¹

Is Antichrist by Antichrist expell'd?

Did we a lawful tyranny displace,
To set aloft a bastard of the race?

Why all these wars to win the Book, if we Must not interpret for ourselves, but she? ⁸⁶⁰

Either be wholly slaves, or wholly free.
For purging fires traditions must not fight,

But they must prove episcopacy's right.
Thus those led horses are from service freed;

You never mount 'em but in time of need.
Like mercenaries, hir'd for home defense,

They will not serve against their native prince.

Against domestic foes of hierarchy
These are drawn forth, to make Fanatics fly;

But, when they see their countrymen at hand,

Marching against 'em under Church command,

Straight they forsake their colors, and disband."

Thus she, nor could the Panther well enlarge

With weak defense against so strong a charge; ⁸⁷⁰

But said: "For what did Christ his word provide,

If still his Church must want a living guide?

And if all saving doctrines are not there,
Or sacred penmen could not make 'em clear,

From after ages we should hope in vain
For truths which men inspir'd could not explain."

"Before the word was written," said the Hind,

"Our Savior preach'd his faith to human-kind:

From his apostles the first age receiv'd
Eternal truth, and what they taught believ'd. ⁸⁸⁰

Thus by tradition faith was planted first;
Succeeding flocks succeeding pastors nurs'd.

This was the way our wise Redeemer chose,

(Who sure could all things for the best dispose.)

To fence his fold from their encroaching foes.

He could have writ himself, but well fore-saw

Th' event would be like that of Moses' law;

Some difference would arise, some doubts remain,

Like those which yet the jarring Jews maintain.

No written laws can be so plain, so pure,
But wit may gloss, and malice may obscure;

Not those indited by his first command —
A prophet grav'd the text, an angel held his hand.

Thus faith was ere the written word appear'd,

And men believ'd, not what they read, but heard.

But since th' apostles could not be confin'd
To these, or those, but severally design'd

Their large commission round the world to blow,

To spread their faith, they spread their labors too.

Yet still their absent flock their pains did share;

⁹⁰⁰

They hearken'd still, for love produces care.
 And, as mistakes arose, or discords fell,
 Or bold seducers taught 'em to rebel;
 As charity grew cold, or faction hot,
 Or long neglect their lessons had forgot;
 For all their wants they wisely did provide,
 And preaching by epistles was supplied:
 So great physicians cannot all attend,
 But some they visit, and to some they send.
 Yet all those letters were not writ to all;
 Nor first intended, but occasional, ⁹¹¹
 Their absent sermons; nor if they contain
 All needful doctrines, are those doctrines
 plain.

Clearness by frequent preaching must be
 wrought,

They writ but seldom, but they daily taught.
 And what one saint has said of holy Paul,
He darkly writ, is true applied to all.

For this obscurity could Heav'n provide }
 More prudently than by a living guide, }
 As doubts arose, the difference to decide ? }
 A guide was therefore needful, therefore made; ⁹²¹

And, if appointed, sure to be obey'd.
 Thus, with due rev'rence to th' apostles' writ,
 By which my sons are taught, to which submit;

I think, those truths their sacred works contain,

The Church alone can certainly explain;
 That following ages, leaning on the past,
 May rest upon the primitive at last.
 Nor would I thence the word no rule infer,
 But none without the Church interpreter;
 Because, as I have urg'd before, 't is mute,
 And is itself the subject of dispute. ⁹³²

But what th' apostles their successors
 taught,

They to the next, from them to us is
 brought,

Th' undoubted sense which is in Scripture sought.

From hence the Church is arm'd, when errors rise,

To stop their entrance, and prevent surprise;

And, safe entrench'd within, her foes
 without defies.

By these all fest'ring sores her counsels heal,

Which time or has disclos'd, or shall reveal; ⁹⁴⁰

For discord cannot end without a last appeal.

Nor can a council national decide,
 But with subordination to her guide:
 (I wish the cause were on that issue tried.) }

Much less the Scripture; for suppose debate
 Betwixt pretenders to a fair estate,
 Bequeath'd by some legator's last intent;
 (Such is our dying Savior's testament:)
 The will is prov'd, is open'd, and is read;
 The doubtful heirs their diff'ring titles plead: ⁹⁵⁰

All vouch the words their int'rest to main-
 tain,

And each pretends by those his cause is
 plain.

Shall then the testament award the right ?
 No, that's the Hungary for which they
 fight;

The field of battle, subject of debate;
 The thing contended for, the fair estate.
 The sense is intricate, 't is only clear
 What vowels and what consonants are there.
 Therefore 't is plain, its meaning must be
 tried

Before some judge appointed to decide." ⁹⁶⁰

"Suppose," the fair apostate said, "I grant
 The faithful flock some living guide should
 want,

Your arguments an endless chase pursue: }
 Produce this vaunted leader to our view, }
 This mighty Moses of the chosen crew."

The dame, who saw her fainting foe re-
 tir'd,

With force renew'd, to victory aspir'd;
 And, looking upward to her kindred sky, }
 As once our Savior own'd his deity, } Pronounc'd his words — She whom ye seek am I. ⁹⁷⁰

Nor less amaz'd this voice the Panther
 heard,

Than were those Jews to hear a god de-clar'd.

Then thus the matron modestly renew'd:
 "Let all your prophets and their sects be view'd,

And see to which of 'em yourselves think fit
 The conduct of your conscience to submit:

Each proselyte would vote his doctor best,
 With absolute exclusion to the rest;

Thus would your Polish diet disagree,
 And end, as it began, in anarchy. ⁹⁸⁰

Yourself the fairest for election stand,
 Because you seem crown-gen'ral of the land;

But soon against your superstitious lawn
 Some Presbyterian saber would be drawn:

In your establish'd laws of sov'reignty
 The rest some fundamental flaw would
 see,
 And call rebellion gospel-liberty.
 To Church decrees your articles require Submission modified, if not entire;
 Homage denied, to censures you proceed: 990
 But when Curtana will not do the deed,
 You lay that pointless clergy-weapon by,
 And to the laws, your sword of justice,
 fly.
 Now this your sects the more unkindly take,
 (Those prying varlets hit the blots you
 make,)
 Because some ancient friends of yours declare,
 Your only rule of faith the Scriptures are,
 Interpreted by men of judgment sound,
 Which ev'ry sect will for themselves ex-
 pound;
 Nor think less rev'rence to their doctors
 due 1000
 For sound interpretation, than to you.
 If then by able heads are understood
 Your brother prophets, who reform'd abroad,
 Those able heads expound a wiser way,
 That their own sheep their shepherd should
 obey.
 But if you mean yourselves are only
 sound,
 That doctrine turns the Reformation
 round,
 And all the rest are false reformers
 found;
 Because in sundry points you stand alone,
 Not in communion join'd with any
 one; 1010
 And therefore must be all the Church, or none.
 Then, till you have agreed whose judge is
 best,
 Against this fore'd submission they protest:
 While sound and sound a diff'rent sense ex-
 plains,
 Both play at hardhead till they break their
 brains;
 And from their chairs each other's force defy,
 While unregarded thunders vainly fly.
 I pass the rest, because your Church alone
 Of all usurpers best could fill the throne.
 But neither you, nor any sect beside, 1020
 For this high office can be qualified With necessary gifts requir'd in such a guide.

For that which must direct the whole
 must be
 Bound in one bond of faith and unity,
 But all your sev'ral Churches disagree.
 The consubstantiating Church and priest
 Refuse communion to the Calvinist:
 The French reform'd from preaching you restrain,
 Because you judge their ordination vain;
 And so they judge of yours, but donors
 must ordain. 1030
 In short, in doctrine, or in discipline,
 Not one reform'd can with another join:
 But all from each as from damnation fly;
 No union they pretend, but in non-Popery.
 Nor, should their members in a synod meet,
 Could any Church presume to mount the seat
 Above the rest, their discords to decide; None would obey, but each would be the
 guide;
 And face to face dissensions would en-
 crease,
 For only distance now preserves the peace.
 All in their turns accusers, and accus'd, 1041
 Babel was never half so much confus'd.
 What one can plead, the rest can plead
 as well;
 For amongst equals lies no last appeal,
 And all confess themselves are fallible.
 Now since you grant some necessary guide,
 All who can err are justly laid aside:
 Because a trust so sacred to confer
 Shows want of such a sure interpreter;
 And how can he be needful who can
 err? 1050
 Then, granting that unerring guide we want,
 That such there is you stand oblig'd to grant:
 Our Savior else were wanting to supply
 Our needs, and obviate that necessity.
 It then remains, that Church can only be
 The guide, which owns unfailling certainty;
 Or else you slip your hold, and change your
 side,
 Relapsing from a necessary guide.
 But this annex'd condition of the crown,
 Immunity from errors, you disown; 1060
 Here then you shrink, and lay your weak pretensions down.
 For petty royalties you raise debate,
 But this unfailling universal State
 You shun, nor dare succeed to such a glorious weight;
 And for that cause those promises detest,

With which our Savior did his Church invest;
 But strive t' evade, and fear to find 'em true,
 As conscious they were never meant to you:
 All which the Mother Church asserts her own,
 And with unrival'd claim ascends the throne. ¹⁰⁷⁰

So when of old th' Almighty Father sate
 In council, to redeem our ruin'd state,
 Millions of millions, at a distance round,
 Silent the sacred consistory crown'd,
 To hear what mercy mix'd with justice could propound;
 All prompt, with eager pity, to fulfil
 The full extent of their Creator's will:
 But when the stern conditions were declar'd,
 A mournful whisper thro' the host was heard,
 And the whole hierarchy, with heads hung down, ¹⁰⁸⁰
 Submissively declin'd the pond'rous proffer'd crown.
 Then, not till then, th' eternal Son from high
 Rose in the strength of all the Deity;
 Stood forth t' accept the terms, and underwent
 A weight which all the frame of heav'n had bent,
 Nor he himself could bear, but as omnipotent.
 Now, to remove the least remaining doubt,
 That ev'n the blear-ey'd sects may find her out,
 Behold what heav'nly rays adorn her brows,
 What from his wardrobe her belov'd allows ¹⁰⁹⁰
 To deck the wedding day of his unspotted spouse.
 Behold what marks of majesty she brings;
 Richer than ancient heirs of Eastern kings:
 Her right hand holds the scepter and the keys,
 To shew whom she commands, and who obeys;
 With these to bind, or set the sinner free,
 With that t' assert spiritual royalty.
 "One in herself, not rent by schism,
 but sound,

Entire, one solid shining diamond;
 Not sparkles shatter'd into sects like you: ¹¹⁰⁰ Marks of the Catholic Church from the Nicene Creed.
 One is the Church, and must be to be true;
 One central principle of unity.
 "As undivided, so from errors free,
 As one in faith, so one in sanctity.
 Thus she, and none but she, th' insulting rage
 Of heretics oppos'd from age to age:
 Still when the giant-brood invades her throne,
 She stoops from heav'n, and meets 'em halfway down,
 And with paternal thunder vindicates her crown. ¹¹⁰⁹
 But like Egyptian sorcerers you stand,
 And vainly lift aloft your magic wand,
 To sweep away the swarms of vermin from the land:
 You could, like them, with like infernal force,
 Produce the plague, but not arrest the course.
 But when the boils and botches, with disgrace
 And public scandal, sat upon the face,
 Themselves attack'd, the Magi strove no more,
 They saw God's finger, and their fate deplore;
 Themselves they could not cure of the dishonest sore.
 "Thus one, thus pure, behold her largely spread, ¹¹²⁰
 Like the fair ocean from her mother-bed;
 From east to west triumphantly she rides,
 All shores are water'd by her wealthy tides:
 The gospel-sound diffus'd from pole to pole,
 Where winds can carry, and where waves can roll;
 The selfsame doctrine of the sacred page
 Convey'd to ev'ry clime, in ev'ry age.
 "Here let my sorrow give my satire place,
 To raise new blushes on my British race;
 Our sailing ships like common shores we use, ¹¹³⁰
 And thro' our distant colonies diffuse
 The draughts of dungeons, and the stench of stews;
 Whom, when their home-bred honesty is lost,
 We disembody on some far Indian coast:

Thieves, panders, palliards, sins of ev'ry
sort;

Those are the manufactures we export;
And these the missioners our zeal has
made:

For, with my country's pardon be it said,
Religion is the least of all our trade.

"Yet some improve their traffic more than we; ¹¹⁴⁰

For they on gain, their only god, rely;
And set a public price on piety.

Industrious of the needle and the chart,
They run full sail to their Japonian mart;
Prevention fear, and, prodigal of fame,
Sell all of Christian to the very name;
Nor leave enough of that to hide their naked shame.

"Thus, of three marks, which in the Creed we view,

Not one of all can be applied to you:
Much less the fourth; in vain, alas, you seek ¹¹⁵⁰

Th' ambitious title of apostolic:
Godlike descent! 't is well your blood can
be

Prov'd noble in the third or fourth degree:
For all of ancient that you had before (I mean what is not borrow'd from our store)

Was error fulminated o'er and o'er;
Old heresies condemn'd in ages past,
By care and time recover'd from the blast.

"T is said with ease, but never can be
prov'd,

The Church her old foundations has re-mov'd, ¹¹⁶⁰

And built new doctrines on unstable sands:
Judge that, ye winds and rains; you prov'd
her, yet she stands.

Those ancient doctrines, charg'd on her for
new,

Shew when, and how, and from what hands
they grew.

We claim no pow'r, when heresies grow
bold,

To coin new faith, but still declare the
old.

How else could that obscene disease be purg'd,

When controverted texts are vainly urg'd?
To prove tradition new, there's somewhat
more

Requir'd, than saying: 'T was not us'd before.' ¹¹⁷⁰

Those monumental arms are never stirr'd,

Till schism or heresy call down Goliah's
sword.

"Thus, what you call corruptions are, in truth,

The first plantations of the gospel's youth;
Old standard faith; but cast your eyes
again,

And view those errors which new sects
maintain,

Or which of old disturb'd the Church's peaceful reign;

And we can point each period of the time,
When they began, and who begot the crime; ¹¹⁷⁹

Can calculate how long th' eclipse endur'd,
Who interpos'd, what digits were obscur'd:
Of all which are already pass'd away,

We know the rise, the progress, and decay.

"Despair at our foundations then to strike,

Till you can prove your faith apostolic;
A limpid stream drawn from the native
source;

Succession lawful in a lineal course.

Prove any Church, oppos'd to this our head,
So one, so pure, so unconfin'dly spread,

Under one chief of the spiritual State, ¹¹⁹⁰
The members all combin'd, and all subordinate.

Shew such a seamless coat, from schism
so free,

In no communion join'd with heresy.

If such a one you find, let truth prevail;

Till when, your weights will in the balance fail:

A Church unprincipled kicks up the scale.

"But if you cannot think (nor sure you can

Suppose in God what were unjust in man)
That he, the fountain of eternal grace,

Should suffer falsehood, for so long a space, ¹²⁰⁰

To banish Truth, and to usurp her place;

That sev'n successive ages should be lost,
And preach damnation at their proper cost;

That all your erring ancestors should die,
Drown'd in th' abyss of deep idolatry;

If piety forbid such thoughts to rise,

Awake, and open your unwilling eyes:

God has left nothing for each age undone,
From this to that wherein he sent his Son:

Then think but well of him, and half your work is done. ¹²¹⁰

"See how his Church, adorn'd with ev'ry grace,
 With open arms, a kind forgiving face,
 Stands ready to prevent her long-lost sons' embrace.
 Not more did Joseph o'er his brethren weep,
 Nor less himself could from discovery
 keep,
 When in the crowd of suppliant they were
 seen,
 And in their crew his best-beloved Benjamin.
 That pious Joseph in the Church behold,
 To feed your famine, and refuse your gold;
 The Joseph you exil'd, the Joseph whom you
 sold."

 ciation of the

 to the Abbey Lands.

1220

Thus, while with heav'nly charity she
 spoke,
 A streaming blaze the silent shadows
 broke;
 Shot from the skies a cheerful azure
 light;
 The birds obscene to forests wing'd their
 flight,
 And gaping graves receiv'd the wand'ring guilty sprite.
 Such were the pleasing triumphs of the sky

For James his late nocturnal victory;
 The pledge of his Almighty Patron's love,
 The fireworks which his angel made above.
 I saw myself the lambent easy Posta light loquitur.

1230

Gild the brown horror, and dispel the
 night.

The messenger with speed the tidings
 bore;
 News which three lab'ring nations did
 restore;
 But heav'n's own nuntius was arriv'd
 before.

By this, the Hind had reach'd her lonely
 cell,
 And vapors rose, and dews unwholesome
 fell.

When she, by frequent observation wise,
 As one who long on heav'n had fix'd her
 eyes,
 Discern'd a change of weather in the
 skies.

The western borders were with crimson spread,

1240

The moon descending look'd all flaming red;

She thought good manners bound her to invite

The stranger dame to be her guest that
 night.

'Tis true, coarse diet, and a short repast,
 (She said,) were weak inducements to the taste

Of one so nicely bred, and so unus'd to
 fast;

But what plain fare her cottage could afford,

A hearty welcome at a homely board,
 Was freely hers; and, to supply the rest,
 An honest meaning, and an open breast:
 Last, with content of mind, the poor man's wealth,

1251

A grace cup to their common patron's health.

This she desir'd her to accept, and stay,
 For fear she might be wilder'd in her way,
 Because she wanted an unerring guide;
 And then the dewdrops on her silken hide
 Her tender constitution did declare,
 Too lady-like a long fatigue to bear,
 And rough inclemencies of raw nocturnal
 air.

But most she fear'd that, traveling so
 late,

1260

Some evil-minded beasts might lie in
 wait,

And without witness wreak their hidden
 hate.

The Panther, tho' she lent a list'ning ear,
 Had more of Lion in her than to fear:

Yet wisely weighing, since she had to deal
 With many foes, their numbers might prevail,

Return'd her all the thanks she could afford,

And took her friendly hostess at her word;
 Who, ent'ring first her lowly roof, (a
 shed

With hoary moss and winding ivy spread,

1270

Honest enough to hide an humble her-mit's head,)

Thus graciously bespoke her welcome
 guest:

"So might these walls, with your fair presence blest,

Become your dwelling place of everlasting rest,

Not for a night, or quick revolving year;

Welcome an owner, not a sojourner.
This peaceful seat my poverty secures;
War seldom enters but where wealth allures:

Nor yet despise it; for this poor abode
Has oft receiv'd, and yet receives a god;
A god victorious of the Stygian race ¹²⁸¹
Here laid his sacred limbs, and sanctified
the place.

This mean retreat did mighty Pan contain:

Be emulous of him, and pomp disdain,
And dare not to debase your soul to gain."

The silent stranger stood amaz'd to see
Contempt of wealth, and wilful poverty;
And, tho' ill habits are not soon controll'd,
Awhile suspended her desire of gold;
But civilly drew in her sharpen'd paws,
Not violating hospitable laws, ¹²⁹¹
And pacified her tail, and lick'd her frothy jaws.

The Hind did first her country cates provide;

Then couch'd herself securely by her side.

THE THIRD PART

Much malice mingled with a little wit,
Perhaps, may censure this mysterious writ;
Because the Muse has peopled Caledon With Panthers, Bears, and Wolves, and beasts unknown,
As if we were not stock'd with monsters
of our own.

Let Æsop answer, who has set to view ¹³⁰⁰
Such kinds as Greece and Phrygia never
knew;

And Mother Hubbard, in her homely dress,
Has sharply blam'd a British Lioness,
That queen, whose feast the factious rabble keep,

Expos'd obscenely naked and asleep.
Led by those great examples, may not I
The wanted organs of their words supply?
If men transact like brutes, 't is equal then
For brutes to claim the privilege of men.

Others our Hind of folly will endite, ¹³¹⁰
To entertain a dang'rous guest by night.
Let those remember that she cannot die
Till rolling time is lost in round eternity;
Nor need she fear the Panther, tho' untam'd,

Because the Lion's peace was now proclaim'd:

The wary salvage would not give offense,

To forfeit the protection of her prince;
But watch'd the time her vengeance to complete,

When all her furry sons in frequent senate met;

Meanwhile she quench'd her fury at the flood, ¹³²⁰

And with a lenten salad cool'd her blood.

Their commons, tho' but coarse, were nothing scant,

Nor did their minds an equal banquet want.

For now the Hind, whose noble nature strove

T' express her plain simplicity of love,
Did all the honors of her house so well,
No sharp debates disturb'd the friendly meal.

She turn'd the talk, avoiding that extreme,
To common dangers past, a sadly pleasing theme;

Rememb'ring ev'ry storm which toss'd the State, ¹³³⁰

When both were objects of the public hate,

And dropp'd a tear betwixt for her own children's fate.

Nor fail'd she then a full review to make
Of what the Panther suffer'd for her sake:
Her lost esteem, her truth, her loyal care,
Her faith unshaken to an exil'd heir,
Her strength t' endure, her courage to defy;
Her choice of honorable infamy.

On these, prolixly thankful, she enlarg'd;
Then with acknowledgments herself she charg'd; ¹³⁴⁰

For friendship, of itself an holy tie,

Is made more sacred by adversity.

Now should they part, malicious tongues would say,

They met like chance companions on the way,

Whom mutual fear of robbers had possess'd:
While danger lasted, kindness was profess'd;
But that once o'er, the short-liv'd union ends;

The road divides, and there divide the friends.

The Panther nodded when her speech was done,

And thank'd her coldly in a hollow tone, ¹³⁵⁰
But said her gratitude had gone too far

For common offices of Christian care:

If to the lawful heir she had been true,
She paid but Cæsar what was Cæsar's due.

"I might," she added, "with like praise describe
Your suff'ring sons, and so return your bribe;
But incense from my hands is poorly priz'd,
For gifts are scorn'd where givers are de-spis'd.

I serv'd a turn, and then was cast away;
You, like the gaudy fly, your wings display, ¹³⁶⁰
And sip the sweets, and bask in your great patron's day."

This heard, the matron was not slow to
find

What sort of malady had seiz'd her mind:
Disdain, with gnawing envy, fell despite,
And canker'd malice stood in open sight;
Ambition, int'rest, pride without control,
And jealousy, the jaundice of the soul;
Revenge, the bloody minister of ill,
With all the lean tormentors of the will.
'T was easy now to guess from whence arose ¹³⁷⁰

Her new-made union with her ancient foes,
Her forc'd civilities, her faint embrace,
Affected kindness with an alter'd face:
Yet durst she not too deeply probe the
wound,

As hoping still the nobler parts were sound;
But strove with anodynes t' assuage the
smart,

And mildly thus her med'cine did impart.
"Complaints of lovers help to ease their
pain;

It shows a rest of kindness to complain,
A friendship loth to quit its former hold,
And conscious merit may be justly bold.
But much more just your jealousy would show, ¹³⁸²

If others' good were injury to you:
Witness, ye heav'ns, how I rejoice to see
Rewarded worth and rising loyalty.
Your warrior offspring that upheld the
crown,

The scarlet honors of your peaceful gown,
Are the most pleasing objects I can find,
Charms to my sight, and cordials to my
mind:

When virtue spooms before a prosp'rous
gale, ¹³⁹⁰

My heaving wishes help to fill the sail;
And if my pray'rs for all the brave were
heard,

Cæsar should still have such, and such should still reward.

"The labor'd earth your pains have sow'd and till'd;

'T is just you reap the product of the field:
Yours be the harvest; 't is the beggar's
gain

To glean the fallings of the loaded wain.
Such scatter'd ears as are not worth your
care

Your charity for alms may safely spare,
And alms are but the vehicles of pray'r.
My daily bread is lit'rally implor'd; ¹⁴⁰¹

I have no barns nor granaries to hoard;
If Cæsar to his own his hand extends,
Say which of yours his charity offends:
You know he largely gives to more than are his friends.

Are you defrauded when he feeds the poor?
Our mite decreases nothing of your store.
I am but few, and by your fare you see
My crying sins are not of luxury.

Some juster motive sure your mind withdraws, ¹⁴¹⁰
And makes you break our friendship's
holy laws;

For barefac'd envy is too base a cause.
"Show more occasion for your discon-
tent;

Your love, the Wolf, would help you to invent:

Some German quarrel, or, as times go now,
Some French, where force is uppermost,
will do.

When at the fountain's head, as merit ought To claim the place, you take a swilling
draught,

How easy 't is an envious eye to throw,
And tax the sheep for troubling streams
below; ¹⁴²⁰

Or call her (when no farther cause you
find)

An enemy profess'd of all your kind.
But then, perhaps, the wicked world would think

The Wolf design'd to eat as well as drink."

This last allusion gall'd the Panther more,
Because indeed it rubb'd upon the sore.

Yet seem'd she not to winch, tho' shrewdly
pain'd,

But thus her passive character maintain'd.

"I never grudg'd, whate'er my foes report,

Your flaunting fortune in the Lion's court. ¹⁴³⁰

You have your day, or you are much be-
lied,

But I am always on the suff'ring side:
You know my doctrine, and I need not say
I will not, but I cannot disobey.

On this firm principle I ever stood;
He of my sons who fails to make it good,
By one rebellious act renounces to my
blood."

"Ah," said the Hind, "how many sons have you

Who call you mother, whom you never knew!

But most of them who that relation plead,
Are such ungracious youths as wish you
dead.

They gape at rich revenues which you hold,
And fain would nibble at your grandame
gold;

Enquire into your years, and laugh to find Your crazy temper shews you much de-clin'd.

Were you not dim, and doted, you might
see

A pack of cheats that claim a pedigree,
No more of kin to you, than you to me.
Do you not know, that for a little coin
Heralds can foist a name into the line; ¹⁴⁴

They ask you blessing but for what you
have,

But once possess'd of what with care you
save,

The wanton boys would piss upon your grave.

"Your sons of latitude that court your
grace,

Tho' most resembling you in form and
face,

Are far the worst of your pretended race.

And, but I blush your honesty to blot,
Pray God you prove 'em lawfully begot:

For in some Popish libels I have read,
The Wolf has been too busy in your bed; ¹⁴⁵

At least their hinder parts, the belly-piece,
The paunch, and all that Scorpio claims,
are his.

Their malice too a sore suspicion brings;
For, tho' they dare not bark, they snarl at
kings:

Nor blame 'em for intruding in your line;
Fat bishoprics are still of right divine.

"Think you your new French proselytes are come

To starve abroad, because they starv'd at
home?

Your benefices twinkled from afar;
They found the new Messiah by the star: ¹⁴⁷

Those Swisses fight on any side for pay,
And 't is the living that conforms, not they.
Mark with what management their tribes
divide;

Some stick to you, and some to t'other
side,

That many Churches may for many mouths provide.

More vacant pulpits would more converts
make;

All would have latitude enough to take:
The rest unbenefic'd your sects main-
tain;

For ordinations without cures are vain,
And chamber practice is a silent gain. ¹⁴⁸

Your sons of breadth at home are much like these;

Their soft and yielding metals run with
ease:

They melt, and take the figure of the mold,
But harden and preserve it best in gold."

"Your Delphic sword," the Panther then replied,

"Is double-edg'd, and cuts on either side.
Some sons of mine, who bear upon their shield

Three steeples argent in a sable field,
Have sharply tax'd your converts, who, un-
fed,

Have follow'd you for miracles of bread; ¹⁴⁹
Such who themselves of no religion are,

Allur'd with gain, for any will declare.
Bare lies with bold assertions they can face,

But dint of argument is out of place.
The grim logician puts 'em in a fright;

'T is easier far to flourish than to fight.
Thus our eighth Henry's marriage they defame;

They say the schism of beds began the
game,

Divorcing from the Church to wed the
dame:

Tho' largely prov'd, and by himself pro-fess'd, ¹⁵⁰

That conscience, conscience would not let him rest;

I mean, not till possess'd of her he lov'd,
And old, uncharming Catherine was remov'd.

For sundry years before did he complain,
And told his ghostly confessor his pain.

With the same impudence, without a
ground,

They say, that look the Reformation
round,

No Treatise of Humility is found.

But if none were, the gospel does not want;
 Our Savior preach'd it, and I hope you grant,
 The Sermon in the Mount was Protestant.¹⁵¹⁰

"No doubt," replied the Hind, "as sure as all
 The writings of Saint Peter and Saint Paul:
 On that decision let it stand or fall.
 Now for my converts, who, you say, unfed,
 Have follow'd me for miracles of bread;
 Judge not by hearsay, but observe at least,
 If since their change their loaves have been increas'd.
 The Lion buys no converts; if he did,
 Beasts would be sold as fast as he could bid.¹⁵²⁰
 Tax those of int'rest who conform for gain,
 Or stay the market of another reign:
 Your broad-way sons would never be too nice
 To close with Calvin, if he paid their price;
 But rais'd three steeples high'r, would change their note,
 And quit the cassock for the canting-coat.
 Now, if you damn this censure as too bold,
 Judge by yourselves, and think not others sold.
 "Meantime my sons accus'd, by fame's report,
 Pay small attendance at the Lion's court,
 Nor rise with early crowds, nor flatter late;¹⁵³¹
 (For silently they beg who daily wait.)
 Preferment is bestow'd that comes unsought;
 Attendance is a bribe, and then 't is bought.
 How they should speed, their fortune is untried;
 For not to ask is not to be denied.
 For what they have, their God and king they bless,
 And hope they should not murmur, had they less.
 But, if reduc'd subsistence to implore,
 In common prudence they would pass your door.¹⁵⁴⁰
 Unpitied Hudibras, your champion friend,
 Has shown how far your charities extend.
 This lasting verse shall on his tomb be read,
He sham'd you living, and upbraids you dead.

"With odious atheist names you load your foes;
 Your lib'ral clergy why did I expose?
 It never fails in charities like those.
 In climes where true religion is profess'd,
 That imputation were no laughing jest.
 But imprimatur, with a chaplain's name,
 Is here sufficient license to defame.¹⁵⁵¹
 What wonder is 't that black detraction thrives?
 The homicide of names is less than lives,
 And yet the perjurd murderer survives."

This said, she paus'd a little, and suppress'd
 The boiling indignation of her breast;
 She knew the virtue of her blade, nor would Pollute her satire with ignoble blood:
 Her panting foes she saw before her lie,
 And back she drew the shining weapon dry.¹⁵⁶⁰

So, when the gen'rous Lion has in sight
 His equal match, he rouses for the fight;
 But when his foe lies prostrate on the plain,
 He sheathes his paws, uncurls his angry mane,
 And, pleas'd with bloodless honors of the day,
 Walks over and disdains th' inglorious prey.
 So JAMES, if great with less we may compare,
 Arrests his rolling thunderbolts in air;
 And grants ungrateful friends a lengthen'd space,
 T' implore the remnants of long-suff'ring grace.¹⁵⁷⁰

This breathing-time the matron took;
 and then
 Resum'd the thrird of her discourse again.
 "Be vengeance wholly left to pow'rs divine,
 And let Heav'n judge betwixt your sons and mine:
 If joys hereafter must be purchas'd here
 With loss of all that mortals hold so dear,
 Then welcome infamy and public shame,
 And, last, a long farewell to worldly fame.
 'Tis said with ease, but, O, how hardly tried
 By haughty souls to human honor tied!
 O sharp convulsive pangs of agonizing pride!¹⁵⁸¹

Down then, thou rebel, never more to
rise,
And what thou didst, and dost, so dearly
prize,
That fame, that darling fame, make that thy sacrifice.
'Tis nothing thou hast giv'n, then add thy tears
For a long race of unrepenting years:
'Tis nothing yet, yet all thou hast to
give;
Then add those may-be years thou hast to
live:
Yet nothing still; then poor and naked
come,
Thy father will receive his unthrift
home,
And thy blest Savior's blood discharge
the mighty sum.
"Thus," she pursued, "I discipline a
son,
Whose uncheck'd fury to revenge would
run;
He champs the bit, impatient of his loss,
And starts aside, and flounders at the cross.
Instruct him better, gracious God, to know,
As thine is vengeance, so forgiveness too:
That, suff'ring from ill tongues, he bears no
more
Than what his sovereign bears, and what his Savior bore.
"It now remains for you to school your
child,
And ask why God's anointed he revil'd;
A king and princess dead! Did Shimei
worse?
The curser's punishment should fright the
curse:
Your son was warn'd, and wisely gave it
o'er,
But he who counsel'd him has paid the
score:
The heavy malice could no higher tend,
But woe to him on whom the weights descend.
So to permitted ills the dæmon flies;
His rage is aim'd at him who rules the
skies:
Constrain'd to quit his cause, no succor
found,
The foe discharges ev'ry tire around,
In clouds of smoke abandoning the fight;
But his own thund'ring peals proclaim his
flight.

"In Henry's change his charge as ill succeeds;
To that long story little answer needs;
Confront but Henry's words with Henry's
deeds.
Were space allow'd, with ease it might be prov'd
What springs his blessed Reformation
mov'd.
The dire effects appear'd in open sight,
Which from the cause he calls a distant
flight,
And yet no larger leap than from the sun to light.
"Now last your sons a double pæan
sound,
A Treatise of Humility is found.
'Tis found, but better it had ne'er been
sought,
Than thus in Protestant procession brought.
The fam'd original thro' Spain is known,
Rodriguez' work, my celebrated son,
Which yours by ill translating made his
own;
Conceal'd its author, and usurp'd the name,
The basest and ignoblest theft of fame.
My altars kindled first that living coal;
Restore, or practice better what you stole:
That virtue could this humble verse in-
spire,
'Tis all the restitution I require."
Glad was the Panther that the charge
was clos'd,
And none of all her fav'rite sons expos'd.
For laws of arms permit each injur'd man
To make himself a savor where he can.
Perhaps the plunder'd merchant cannot tell
The names of pirates in whose hands he
fell;
But at the den of thieves he justly flies,
And ev'ry Algerine is lawful prize.
No private person in the foe's estate
Can plead exemption from the public fate.
Yet Christian laws allow not such redress;
Then let the greater supersede the less.
But let th' abettors of the Panther's crime
Learn to make fairer wars another time.
Some characters may sure be found to
write
Among her sons; for 't is no common
sight,
A spotted dam, and all her offspring
white.
The salvage, tho' she saw her plea con-
troll'd,

Yet would not wholly seem to quit her hold,
But offer'd fairly to compound the strife,
And judge conversion by the convert's life.
"T is true," she said, "I think it somewhat strange,

So few should follow profitable change;
For present joys are more to flesh and
blood,

Than a dull prospect of a distant good.
'T was well alluded by a son of mine, ¹⁶⁶⁰
(I hope to quote him is not to purloin.)
Two magnets, heav'n and earth, allure to
bliss;

The larger loadstone that, the nearer this:
The weak attraction of the greater fails;
We nod a while, but neighborhood prevails;
But when the greater proves the nearer too,
I wonder more your converts come so slow.
Methinks in those who firm with me re-
main,

It shows a nobler principle than gain."

"Your inf'rence would be strong," the Hind replied, ¹⁶⁷⁰

"If yours were in effect the suff'ring side:
Your clergy sons their own in peace possess,

Nor are their prospects in reversion less.
My proselytes are struck with awful dread;
Your bloody comet-laws hang blazing o'er
their head:

The respite they enjoy but only lent,
The best they have to hope, protracted punishment.

Be judge yourself, if int'rest may prevail,
Which motives, yours or mine, will turn the scale.

While pride and pomp allure, and plenteous ease, ¹⁶⁸⁰
That is, till man's predominant passions
cease,

Admire no longer at my slow encrease.

"By education most have been misled;
So they believe, because they so were bred.
The priest continues what the nurse began,
And thus the child imposes on the man.
The rest I nam'd before, nor need repeat;
But int'rest is the most prevailing cheat,
The sly seducer both of age and youth:
They study that, and think they study truth. ¹⁶⁹⁰

When int'rest fortifies an argument, Weak reason serves to gain the will's as-
sent;

For souls already warp'd receive an easy
bent.

"Add long prescription of establish'd
laws,

And pique of honor to maintain a cause,
And shame of change, and fear of future
ill,

And zeal, the blind conductor of the will;
And chief, among the still-mistaking
crowd,

The fame of teachers obstinate and
proud,

And, more than all, the private judge al-low'd; ¹⁷⁰⁰

Disdain of Fathers, which the daunce began,

And last, uncertain whose the narrower
span,

The clown unread, and half-read gentleman."

To this the Panther, with a scornful smile:
"Yet still you travail with unwearied toil,
And range around the realm without control,

Among my sons for proselytes to prole,
And here and there you snap some silly
soul.

You hinted fears of future change in state;
Pray Heav'n you did not prophesy your fate! ¹⁷¹⁰

Perhaps you think your time of triumph
near,

But may mistake the season of the year;
The Swallows' fortune gives you cause to
fear."

"For charity," replied the matron, "tell What sad mischance those pretty birds be-
fell."

"Nay, no mischance," the salvage dame replied,

"But want of wit in their unerring guide,
And eager haste, and gaudy hopes, and giddy pride.

Yet, wishing timely warning may prevail,
Make you the moral, and I'll tell the tale. ¹⁷²⁰

"The Swallow, privileg'd above the rest
Of all the birds, as man's familiar guest,
Pursues the sun in summer brisk and bold,
But wisely shuns the persecuting cold:
Is well to chancels and to chimneys known,
Tho' 't is not thought she feeds on smoke
alone.

From hence she has been held of heav'nly
line,

Endued with particles of soul divine.
This merry chorister had long possess'd

Her summer seat, and feather'd well her nest: 1730

Till frowning skies began to change their
cheer,

And time turn'd up the wrong side of the
year;

The shedding trees began the ground to strow

With yellow leaves, and bitter blasts to
blow.

Sad auguries of winter thence she drew,
Which by instinct, or prophecy, she knew:

When prudence warn'd her to remove be-
times,

And seek a better heav'n and warmer climes.

"Her sons were summon'd on a steeple's height,

And, call'd in common council, vote a flight;
The day was nam'd, the next that should be fair; 1741

All to the gen'ral rendezvous repair;
They try their flutt'ring wings, and trust
themselves in air,

But whether upward to the moon they go,
Or dream the winter out in caves below,

Or hawk at flies elsewhere, concerns not us to know.

"Southwards, you may be sure, they bent
their flight,

And harbor'd in a hollow rock at night:

Next morn they rose, and set up ev'ry sail;

The wind was fair, but blew a mack'rel gale:

The sickly young sat shiv'ring on the shore,

Abhorr'd salt water never seen before, 1752

And pray'd their tender mothers to delay

The passage, and expect a fairer day.

"With these the Martin readily con-curr'd,

A church-begot, and church-believing bird;

Of little body, but of lofty mind,

Round-bellied, for a dignity design'd,

And much a dunce, as Martins are by
kind:

Yet often quoted canon-laws, and code,

And Fathers which he never understood; 1761

But little learning needs in noble blood.

For, sooth to say, the Swallow brought him
in,

Her household chaplain, and her next of kin;

In superstition silly to excess,

And casting schemes by planetary guess:

In fine, short-wing'd, unfit himself to fly,

His fear foretold foul weather in the sky.

"Besides, a Raven from a wither'd oak, Left of their lodging, was observ'd to croak. 1770

That omen lik'd him not; so his advice
Was present safety, bought at any price;
(A seeming pious care that cover'd cowardice.)

To strengthen this, he told a boding dream
Of rising waters and a troubled stream,
Sure signs of anguish, dangers, and distress;
With something more, not lawful to express,

By which he slyly seem'd to intimate
Some secret revelation of their fate.

For, he concluded, once upon a time, 1780

He found a leaf inscrib'd with sacred
rhyme,

Whose antique characters did well denote

The Sibyl's hand of the Cumæan grot:

The mad divineress had plainly writ,

A time should come (but many ages yet)

In which, sinister destinies ordain,

A dame should drown with all her fea-ther'd train,

And seas from thence be call'd the Chelidonian main.

At this, some shook for fear; the more devout

Arose, and bless'd themselves from head to foot. 1790

"'Tis true, some stagers of the wiser
sort

Made all these idle wonderments their sport:

They said, their only danger was delay,
And he who heard what ev'ry fool could

say,
Would never fix his thoughts, but trim
his time away.

The passage yet was good; the wind, 't is
true,

Was somewhat high, but that was nothing new,

Nor more than usual equinoxes blew.

The sun (already from the Scales declin'd)

Gave little hopes of better days behind,

But change from bad to worse of weather and of wind. 1801

Nor need they fear the dampness of the
sky

Should flag their wings, and hinder them
to fly,

'T was only water thrown on sails too dry.

But, least of all, philosophy presumes

Of truth in dreams, from melancholy fumes:

Perhaps the Martin, hous'd in holy ground, Might think of ghosts that walk their midnight round,

Till grosser atoms, tumbling in the stream
Of fancy, madly met, and clubb'd into a dream: 1810

As little weight his vain presages bear
Of ill effect to such alone who fear.
Most prophecies are of a piece with these;
Each Nostradamus can foretell with ease:
Not naming persons, and confounding
times,

One casual truth supports a thousand lying
rhymes.

"Th' advice was true; but fear had seiz'd
the most,

And all good counsel is on cowards lost.
The question crudely put, to shun delay,
'T was carried by the major part to stay. 1820

"His point thus gain'd, Sir Martin dated thence

His pow'r, and from a priest became a prince.

He order'd all things with a busy care, }
And cells and refectories did prepare, }
And large provisions laid of winter fare: }
But now and then let fall a word or two } Of hope that Heav'n some miracle might }
show, }

And, for their sakes, the sun should backward go;

Against the laws of nature upward climb,
And, mounted on the Ram, renew the
prime: 1830

For which two proofs in sacred story lay,
Of Ahaz' dial, and of Joshua's day.

In expectation of such times as these,
A chapel hous'd 'em, truly call'd of ease:
For Martin much devotion did not ask;
They pray'd sometimes, and that was all their task.

"It happen'd (as beyond the reach of wit Blind prophecies may have a lucky hit)
That this accomplish'd, or at least in part,
Gave great repute to their new Merlin's
art. 1840

Some * Swifts, the giants of } the swallow kind, } Large-limb'd, stout-hearted, }
but of stupid mind, } (For Swisses, or for Gibe- } onites design'd,) }

These lubbers, peeping thro' a broken pane,
To suck fresh air, survey'd the neighboring plain,

* Otherwise call'd Mart-lets.

And saw (but scarcely could believe their
eyes)

New blossoms flourish, and new flow'rs
arise;

As God had been abroad, and, walking
there,

Had left his footsteps, and reform'd the
year;

The sunny hills from far were seen to
glow 1850

With glittering beams, and in the meads
below

The burnish'd brooks appear'd with liquid
gold to flow.

At last they heard the foolish Cuckow sing, Whose note proclaim'd the holiday of
spring.

"No longer doubting, all prepare to fly,
And repossess their patrimonial sky.

The priest before 'em did his wings dis-
play;

And that good omens might attend their
way,

As luck would have it, 't was St. Martin's
day.

"Who but the Swallow now triumphs
alone? 1860

The canopy of heaven is all her own;
Her youthful offspring to their haunts re-
pair,

And glide along in glades, and skim in air,
And dip for insects in the purling springs,
And stoop on rivers to refresh their wings.
Their mothers think a fair provision made,
That ev'ry son can live upon his trade:

And, now the careful charge is off their
hands,

Look out for husbands, and new nuptial
bands:

The youthful widow longs to be supplied; 1870

But first the lover is by lawyers tied
To settle jointure-chimneys on the bride.

So thick they couple, in so short a space,
That Martin's marriage-off'rings rise apace;

Their ancient houses, running to decay,
Are furbish'd up, and cemented with clay:

They teem already; store of eggs are laid,
And brooding mothers call Lucina's aid.

Fame spreads the news, and foreign fowls appear

In flocks to greet the new returning
year, 1880

To bless the founder, and partake the
cheer.

"And now 't was time (so fast their numbers rise)
 To plant abroad, and people colonies.
 The youth drawn forth, as Martin had de-sir'd,
 (For so their cruel destiny requir'd,)
 Were sent far off on an ill-fated day;
 The rest would need conduct 'em on their way,
 And Martin went, because he fear'd alone to stay.
 "So long they flew with inconsiderate
 haste 1889
 That now their afternoon began to waste;
 And, what was ominous, that very morn
 The sun was enter'd into Capricorn;
 Which, by their bad astronomer's account,
 That week the Virgin Balance should re-
 mount;
 An infant moon eclips'd him in his way,
 And hid the small remainders of his day.
 The crowd, amaz'd, pursned no certain mark;
 But birds met birds, and justled in the dark:
 Few mind the public in a panic fright; 1899
 And fear increas'd the horror of the night.
 Night came, but unattended with repose;
 Alone she came, no sleep their eyes to
 close:
 Alone, and black she came; no friendly stars arose.
 "What should they do, beset with dangers round,
 No neigh'ring dorp, no lodging to be
 found,
 But bleaky plains, and bare unhospitable
 ground.
 The latter brood, who just began to fly,
 Sick-feather'd, and unpraetic'd in the sky,
 For succor to their helpless mother call;
 She spread her wings; some few beneath
 'em crawl; 1910
 She spread 'em wider yet, but could not cover all.
 T' augment their woes, the winds began to
 move
 Debate in air, for empty fields above,
 Till Boreas got the skies, and pour'd amain
 His rattling hailstones mix'd with snow and rain.
 "The joyless morning late arose, and
 found
 A dreadful desolation reign around,
 Some buried in the snow, some frozen to
 the ground.

The rest were struggling still with death,
 and lay,
 The Crows' and Ravens' rights, an undefended prey: 1920
 Excepting Martin's race; for they and he Had gain'd the shelter of a hollow tree:
 But, soon discover'd by a sturdy clown,
 He headed all the rabble of a town,
 And finish'd 'em with bats, or poll'd 'em
 down.
 Martin himself was caught alive, and
 tried
 For treas'nous crimes, because the laws provide
 No Martin there in winter shall abide.
 High on an oak, which never leaf shall
 bear, 1929
 He breath'd his last, expos'd to open air;
 And there his corps, unblest, are hanging
 still,
 To show the change of winds with his prophetic bill."
 The patience of the Hind did almost fail,
 For well she mark'd the malice of the tale:
 Which ribald art their Church to Luther
 owes;
 In malice it began, by malice grows:
 He sow'd the serpent's teeth, an iron harvest rose.
 But most in Martin's character and fate
 She saw her slander'd sons, the Panther's
 hate,
 The people's rage, the persecuting State:
 Then said: "I take th' advice in friendly
 part; 1941
 You clear your conscience, or at least your
 heart:
 Perhaps you fail'd in your foreseeing skill,
 For Swallows are unlucky birds to kill.
 As for my sons, the family is blest,
 Whose ev'ry child is equal to the rest;
 No Church reform'd can boast a blameless
 line;
 Such Martins build in yours, and more than
 mine:
 Or else an old Fanatic author lies,
 Who summ'd their scandals up by centuries. 1950
 But thro' your parable I plainly see
 The bloody laws, the crowd's barbarity;
 The sunshine that offends the purblind
 sight—
 Had some their wishes, it would soon be
 night.

Mistake me not: the charge concerns not
you;

Your sons are malecontents, but yet are
true,

As far as nonresistance makes 'em so;

But that's a word of neutral sense, you
know,

A passive term, which no relief will bring,
But trims betwixt a rebel and a king." 1900

"Rest well assur'd," the Pardelis replied,

"My sons would all support the regal
side,

Tho' Heav'n forbid the cause by battle should be tried."

The matron answer'd with a loud
Amen,

And thus pursued her argument again:

"If, as you say, and as I hope no less,
Your sons will practice what yourself profess,

What angry pow'r prevents our present
peace?

The Lion, studious of our common good, Desires (and kings' desires are ill withstood) 1970

To join our nations in a lasting love;
The bars betwixt are easy to remove,
For sanguinary laws were never made
above.

If you condemn that prince of tyranny,
Whose mandate forc'd your Gallic friends
to fly,

Make not a worse example of your own;
Or cease to rail at causeless rigor shown,
And let the guiltless person throw the stone.

His blunted sword your suff'ring brotherhood

Have seldom felt; he stops it short of
blood: 1980

But you have ground the persecuting knife,
And set it to a razor-edge on life.

Curst be the wit which cruelty refines,
Or to his father's rod the scorpion joins;
Your finger is more gross than the great monarch's loins.

But you, perhaps, remove that bloody
note,

And stick it on the first Reformers' coat.
O let their crime in long oblivion sleep:

'Twas theirs indeed to make, 't is yours to
keep.

Unjust, or just, is all the question now; 1990
'T is plain that, not repealing, you allow.

"To name the Test would put you in a
rage;

You charge not that on any former age,
But smile to think how innocent you stand,
Arm'd by a weapon put into your hand.

Yet still remember that you wield a sword
Forg'd by your foes against your Sovereign
Lord;

Design'd to hew th' imperial cedar down,
Defraud succession, and disheir the crown.
T' abhor the makers, and their laws ap-
prove, 2000

Is to hate traitors, and the treason love.
What means it else, which now your children say,

'We made it not, nor will we take away'?

"Suppose some great oppressor had by slight

Of law disseiz'd your brother of his

right,

Your common sire surrend'ring in a

fright;

Would you to that unrighteous title stand,

Left by the villain's will to heir the land?

More just was Judas, who his Savior sold;

The sacrilegious bribe he could not hold,

Nor hang in peace before he render'd

back the gold. 2011

What more could you have done than now

you do,

Had Oates and Bedloe, and their Plot been

true?

Some specious reasons for those wrongs

were found;

The dire magicians threw their mists

around,

And wise men walk'd as on enchanted

ground.

But now, when Time has made th' imposture plain,

(Late tho' he follow'd Truth, and limp-ing held her train,)

What new delusion charms your cheated eyes again?

The painted harlot might a while bewitch,

But why the hag unceas'd, and all obscene

with it? 2021

"The first Reformers were a modest race;

Our peers possess'd in peace their native

place;

And when rebellious arms o'erturn'd the

State,

They suffer'd only in the common fate:

But now the sov'reign mounts the regal

chair,

And miter'd seats are full, yet David's bench is bare.

Your answer is, they were not dispossess'd;
They need but rub their metal on the Test
To prove their ore: 't were well if gold
alone

Were touch'd and tried on your discerning
stone;

But that unfaithful Test unfound will pass
The dross of atheists, and sectarian brass:
As if th' experiment were made to hold
For base productions, and reject the gold.
Thus men ungodded may to places rise,
And sects may be preferr'd without disguise:
No danger to the Church or State from
these;

The Papist only has his writ of ease.
No gainful office gives him the pretense
To grind the subject, or defraud the prince.
Wrong conscience, or no conscience, may deserve

To thrive, but ours alone is privileg'd to sterve.

" ' Still thank yourselves,' you cry; ' your noble race

We banish not, but they forsake the place:
Our doors are open.' True, but ere they
come,

You toss your censuring Test, and fume the
room;

As if 't were Toby's rival to expel,
And fright the fiend who could not bear the smell."

To this the Panther sharply had replied;

But, having gain'd a verdict on her side,
She wisely gave the loser leave to chide;
Well satisfied to have the 'butt and
peace,'

And for the plaintiff's cause she car'd the
less,

Because she sued in forma pauperis ;
Yet thought it decent something should be
said;

For secret guilt by silence is betray'd:
So neither granted all, nor much denied,
But answer'd with a yawning kind of pride.
" Methinks such terms of proffer'd peace
you bring,

As once Æneas to th' Italian king:
By long possession all the land is mine;
You strangers come with your intruding
line,

To share my scepter, which you call to
join.

You plead like him an ancient pedigree,
And claim a peaceful seat by fate's decree.

In ready pomp your sacrificer stands,
T' unite the Trojan and the Latin bands,
And, that the league more firmly may be tied,

Demand the fair Lavinia for your bride.
Thus plausibly you veil th' intended wrong,
But still you bring your exil'd gods along;
And will endeavor, in succeeding space,
Those household poppits on our hearths to
place.

Perhaps some barb'rous laws have been preferr'd;

I spake against the Test, but was not heard;
These to rescind, and peerage to restore,
My gracious sov'reign would my vote
implore:

I owe him much, but owe my conscience
more."

" Conscience is then your plea," replied
the dame,

" Which, well inform'd, will ever be the
same.

But yours is much of the chameleon hue,
To change the dye with ev'ry diff'rent view.
When first the Lion sat with awful sway,
Your conscience taught you duty to obey:
He might have had your statutes and your Test;

No conscience but of subjects was profess'd.
He found your temper, and no farther tried,
But on that broken reed, your Church, relied.

In vain the sects assay'd their utmost
art,

With offer'd treasure to espouse their
part;

Their treasures were a bribe too mean to move his heart.

But when by long experience you had
prov'd,

How far he could forgive, how well he lov'd;
A goodness that excell'd his godlike race,
And only short of Heav'n's unbounded
grace;

A flood of mercy that o'erflow'd our isle,
Calm in the rise, and fruitful as the Nile;
Forgetting whence your Egypt was supplied,

You thought your sov'reign bound to send the tide;

Nor upward look'd on that immortal spring,
But vainly deem'd, he durst not be a king.

Then Conscience, unrestrain'd by fear, began

To stretch her limits, and extend the span;
Did his indulgence as her gift dispose,
And made a wise alliance with her foes.
Can Conscience own th' associating name,
And raise no blushes to conceal her shame?

For sure she has been thought a bashful dame.

But if the cause by battle should be tried,

You grant she must espouse the regal side:

O Proteus Conscience, never to be tied!
What Phœbus from the tripod shall disclose

Which are, in last resort, your friends or foes?

Homer, who learn'd the language of the sky,

The seeming Gordian knot would soon untie;

Immortal pow'rs the term of Conscience know,

But Int'rest is her name with men below."

"Conscience or Int'rest be 't, or both in one,"

The Panther answer'd in a surly tone, ²¹²⁰
"The first commands me to maintain the crown,

The last forbids to throw my barriers down.
Our penal laws no sons of yours admit,
Our Test excludes your tribe from benefit.
These are my banks your ocean to withstand,

Which proudly rising overlooks the land;
And, once let in, with unresisted sway,
Would sweep the pastors and their flocks away.

Think not my judgment leads me to comply

With laws unjust, but hard necessity: ²¹³⁰
Imperious need, which cannot be withstood,
Makes ill authentic, for a greater good.

Possess your soul with patience, and attend:
A more auspicious planet may ascend;
Good fortune may present some happier time,

With means to cancel my unwilling crime
(Unwilling, witness all ye pow'rs above);
To mend my errors, and redeem your love:
That little space you safely may allow;
Your all-dispensing pow'r protects you now."

2140

"Hold," said the Hind, "'t is needless to explain;

You would postpone me to another reign;
Till when you are content to be unjust:
Your part is to possess, and mine to trust.
A fair exchange propos'd of future chance,
For present profit and inheritance.

Few words will serve to finish our dispute;
Who will not now repeal, would persecute:
To ripen green revenge your hopes attend,
Wishing that happier planet would ascend.

2150

For shame, let Conscience be your plea no more;

To will hereafter, proves she might before;

But she's a bawd to Gain, and holds the door.

"Your care about your banks infers a fear

Of threat'ning floods and inundations near;
If so, a just reprise would only be
Of what the land usurp'd upon the sea;
And all your jealousies but serve to show
Your ground is, like your neighbor nation, low.

T' intrench in what you grant unrighteous laws,

2160

Is to distrust the justice of your cause,
And argues that the true religion lies
In those weak adversaries you despise.

"Tyrannic force is that which least you fear;

The sound is frightful in a Christian's ear:

Avert it, Heav'n! nor let that plague be sent

To us from the dispeopled continent.

"But piety commands me to refrain;

Those pray'rs are needless in this monarch's reign.

Behold, how he protects your friends oppress'd,

2170

Receives the banish'd, succors the distress'd!

Behold, for you may read an honest open breast.

He stands in daylight, and disdains to hide

An act to which by honor he is tied,
A generous, laudable, and kingly pride.

Your Test he would repeal, his peers restore;

This when he says he means, he means no more."

"Well," said the Panther, "I believe him just,
And yet —"

"And yet, 't is but because you must;
You would be trusted, but you would not trust."

The Hind thus briefly; and disdain'd t' inlarge
On pow'r of kings, and their superior charge,

As Heav'n's trustees before the people's choice:

Tho' sure the Panther did not much rejoice

To hear those echoes giv'n of her once loyal voice.

The matron woo'd her kindness to the last,

But could not win; her hour of grace was past.

Whom, thus persisting, when she could not bring

To leave the Wolf, and to believe her king,

She gave her up, and fairly wish'd her joy

Of her late treaty with her new ally:
Which well she hop'd would more successful prove

Than was the Pigeons' and the Buzzard's love.

The Panther ask'd what concord there could be

Between two kinds whose natures disagree.

The dame replied: "'T is sung in ev'ry street,

The common chat of gossips when they meet;

But, since unheard by you, 't is worth your while

To take a wholesome tale, tho' told in homely style.

"A plain good man, whose name is understood,

(So few deserve the name of plain and good,) Of three fair lineal lordships stood possess'd,

And liv'd, as reason was, upon the best.

Inur'd to hardships from his early youth,
Much had he done and suffer'd for his truth:

At land and sea, in many a doubtful fight,
Was never known a more advent'rous knight,

Who oft'ner drew his sword, and always for the right.

"As fortune would, (his fortune came, tho' late,)

He took possession of his just estate; 2210
Nor rack'd his tenants with increase of rent,

Nor liv'd too sparing, nor too largely spent;

But overlook'd his hinds; their pay was just,

And ready, for he scorn'd to go on trust:
Slow to resolve, but in performance quick;

So true, that he was awkward at a trick,
For little souls on little shifts rely,

And coward arts of mean expedients try;

The noble mind will dare do anything but lie.

False friends, (his deadliest foes,) could find no way 2220

But shows of honest bluntness, to betray:
That unsuspected plainness he believ'd;

He look'd into himself, and was deceiv'd.
Some lucky planet sure attends his birth,

Or Heav'n would make a miracle on earth;
For prosperous honesty is seldom seen

To bear so dead a weight, and yet to win.
It looks as fate with nature's law would strive,

To shew plain-dealing once an age may thrive;

And, when so tough a frame she could not bend, 2230

Exceeded her commission to befriend.

"This grateful man, as Heav'n encreas'd his store,

Gave God again, and daily fed his poor.
His house with all convenience was purvey'd;

The rest he found, but rais'd the fabric where he pray'd;

And in that sacred place his beauteous wife
Employ'd her happiest hours of holy life.

"Nor did their alms extend to those alone

Whom common faith more strictly made their own;

A sort of Doves were hous'd too near their hall, 2240

Who cross the proverb, and abound with gall.

Tho' some, 't is true, are passively inclin'd,
The greater part degenerate from their kind;

Voracious birds, that hotly bill and breed,
And largely drink, because on salt they feed.

Small gain from them their bounteous
owner draws;
Yet, bound by promise, he supports their
cause,
As corporations privileg'd by laws.
"That house which harbor to their kind affords
Was built, long since, God knows, for better
birds;
But flutt'ring there, they nestle near the
throne,
And lodge in habitations not their own,
By their high crops and corny gizzards
known.
Like Harpies, they could scent a plenteous
board,
Then to be sure they never fail'd their lord:
The rest was form, and bare attendance
paid;
They drunk, and eat, and grudgingly obey'd.
The more they fed, they raven'd still for
more;
They drain'd from Dan, and left Beersheba
poor.
All this they had by law, and none repin'd;
The preference was but due to Levi's kind;
But when some lay-preferment fell by
chance,
The gourmands made it their inheritance.
When once possess'd, they never quit their
claim;
For then 't is sanctified to Heav'n's high
name;
And, hallow'd thus, they cannot give consent
The gift should be profan'd by worldly management.
"Their flesh was never to the table serv'd;
Tho' 't is not thence inferr'd the birds were starv'd;
But that their master did not like the food,
As rank, and breeding melancholy blood.
Nor did it with his gracious nature suit,
Ev'n tho' they were not Doves, to persecute; Yet he refus'd (nor could they take offense)
Their glutton kind should teach him abste-nence.
Nor consecrated grain their wheat he
thought,
Which, new from treading, in their bills
they brought;
But left his hinds each in his private pow'r,
That those who like the bran might leave the flour.

He for himself, and not for others, chose,
Nor would he be impos'd on, nor impose;
But in their faces his devotion paid,
And sacrifice with solemn rites was made,
And sacred incense on his altars laid.
"Besides these jolly birds, whose crops
impure Repaid their commons with their salt manure,
Another farm he had behind his house,
Not overstock'd, but barely for his use;
Wherein his poor domestic poultry fed,
And from his pious hands receiv'd their
bread.
Our pumper'd Pigeons, with malignant
eyes,
Beheld these inmates, and their nurseries:
Tho' hard their fare, at ev'ning and at morn,
A cruse of water and an ear of corn;
Yet still they grudg'd that modicum, and
thought
A sheaf in ev'ry single grain was brought:
Fain would they filch that little food away,
While unrestrain'd those happy gluttons
prey.
And much they griev'd to see so nigh their hall
The bird that warn'd St. Peter of his fall;
That he should raise his miter'd crest on
high,
And clap his wings, and call his family
To sacred rites; and vex th' ethereal pow'rs
With midnight matins at uncivil hours:
Nay more, his quiet neighbors should molest,
Just in the sweetness of their morning rest.
"Beast of a bird, supinely when he might
Lie snug and sleep, to rise before the light!
What if his dull forefathers us'd that cry,
Could he not let a bad example die?
The world was fall'n into an easier way;
This age knew better than to fast and pray.
Good sense in sacred worship would appear
So to begin, as they might end the year.
Such feats in former times had wrought
the falls
Of crowing Chanticleers in cloister'd walls.
Expell'd for this, and for their lands,
they fled;
And sister Partlet, with her hooded head,
Was hooted hence, because she would not pray abed.
The way to win the restiff world to God,
Was to lay by the disciplining rod,

Unnatural fasts, and foreign forms of
pray'r:

Religion frights us with a mien severe.
'Tis prudence to reform her into ease,
And put her in undress to make her pleas:
A lively faith will bear aloft the mind,
And leave the luggage of good works behind.

"Such doctrines in the Pigeon-house were taught:

You need not ask how wondrously they wrought; ²³²⁹

But sure the common cry was all for these,
Whose life and precept both encourag'd
ease.

Yet fearing those alluring baits might fail,
And holy deeds o'er all their arts prevail;
(For vice, tho' frontless, and of harden'd
face,

Is daunted at the sight of awful grace,)
An hideous figure of their foes they drew, Nor lines, nor looks, nor shades, nor colors true;

And this grotesque design expos'd to public view.

One would have thought it some Egyptian piece,

With garden-gods, and barking deities,
More thick than Ptolemy has stuck the skies. ²³⁴¹

All so perverse a draught, so far unlike,
It was no libel where it meant to strike:
Yet still the daubing pleas'd, and great and small,

To view the monster, crowded Pigeon-hall.
There Chanticleer was drawn upon his knees
Adoring shrines, and stocks of sainted trees;

And by him, a misshapen, ugly race;
The curse of God was seen on ev'ry face:
No Holland emblem could that malice mend, ²³⁵⁰

But still the worse the look, the fitter for a fiend.

"The master of the farm, displeas'd to
find

So much of rancor in so mild a kind,
Enquir'd into the cause, and came to know
The Passive Church had struck the foremost blow;

With groundless fears, and jealousies
possess'd,

As if this troublesome intruding guest Would drive the birds of Venus from their nest:

A deed his inborn equity abhorr'd;

But Int'rest will not trust, tho' God should plight his word. ²³⁶⁰

"A law, the source of many future harms,
Had banish'd all the poultry from the farms;
With loss of life, if any should be found
To crow or peck on this forbidden ground.
That bloody statute chiefly was design'd
For Chanticleer the white, of clergy kind;
But after-malice did not long forget

The lay that wore the robe and coronet.
For them, for their inferiors and allies,
Their foes a deadly shibboleth devise: ²³⁷⁰

By which unrighteously it was decreed
That none to trust, or profit, should succeed,

Who would not swallow first a poisonous
wicked weed;

Or that, to which old Socrates was curst,
Or henbane juice to swell 'em till they burst.

The patron (as in reason) thought it hard
To see this inquisition in his yard,
By which the sovereign was of subjects'
use debarr'd.

"All gentle means he tried, which might withdraw

Th' effects of so unnatural a law; ²³⁸⁰
But still the Dove-house obstinately stood Deaf to their own, and to their neighbors'
good;

And which was worse (if any worse could be),
Repented of their boasted loyalty:

Now made the champions of a cruel cause,
And drunk with fumes of popular applause;

For those whom God to ruin has design'd,
He fits for fate, and first destroys their
mind.

"New doubts indeed they daily strove to
raise,

Suggested dangers, interpos'd delays; ²³⁹⁰
And emissary Pigeons had in store,

Such as the Meccan prophet us'd of yore,
To whisper counsels in their patron's ear;
And veil'd their false advice with zealous
fear.

The master smil'd to see 'em work in vain
To wear him out, and make an idle reign:
He saw, but suffer'd their protractive arts,
And strove by mildness to reduce their
hearts;

But they abus'd that grace to make allies,
And fondly clos'd with former enemies;
For fools are double fools, endeav'ring to be wise. ²⁴⁰¹

"After a grave consult what course were
 best,
 One, more mature in folly than the rest,
 Stood up, and told 'em, with his head aside,
 That desp'rate cures must be to desp'rate ills applied;
 And therefore, since their main impending
 fear
 Was from th' encreasing race of Chanticleer,
 Some potent bird of prey they ought to find
 A foe profess'd to him and all his kind:
 Some haggard Hawk, who had her eyry
 nigh,
 Well pounc'd to fasten, and well wing'd to
 fly;
 One they might trust their common wrongs
 to wreak:
 The Musket, and the Coystrel were too weak,
 Too fierce the Falcon. — 'But, above the
 rest,
 The noble Buzzard ever pleas'd me best;
 Of small renown, 't is true; for, not to lie,
 We call him but a Hawk by courtesy.
 I know he haunts the Pigeon-house and farm,
 And more, in time of war, has done us
 harm;
 But all his hate on trivial points depends:
 Give up our forms, and we shall soon be
 friends.
 For Pigeons' flesh he seems not much to
 care;
 Cramm'd Chickens are a more delicious
 fare.
 On this high potentate, without delay,
 I wish you would confer the sovereign
 sway:
 Petition him t' accept the government,
 And let a splendid embassy be sent.'
 "This pithy speech prevail'd, and all agreed,
 Old enmities forgot, the Buzzard should succeed.
 "Their welcome suit was granted soon
 as heard,
 His lodgings furnish'd, and a train pre-
 par'd,
 With B's upon their breast, appointed for his guard.
 He came, and, crown'd with great solemnity,
 'God save King Buzzard!' was the gen'ral
 cry.
 "A portly prince, and goodly to the sight,

He seem'd a son of Anak for his height:
 Like those whom stature did to crowns prefer;
 Black-brow'd, and bluff, like Homer's
 Jupiter;
 Broad-back'd, and brawny-built for love's
 delight,
 A prophet form'd to make a female prose-lyte.
 A theologue more by need than genial bent;
 By breeding sharp, by nature confident.
 Int'rest in all his actions was discern'd;
 More learn'd than honest, more a wit than learn'd;
 Or forc'd by fear, or by his profit led,
 Or both conjoin'd, his native clime he fled;
 But brought the virtues of his heav'n along,
 A fair behavior, and a fluent tongue.
 And yet with all his arts he could not thrive;
 The most unlucky parasite alive.
 Loud praises to prepare his paths he sent,
 And then himself pursued his compliment;
 But, by reverse of fortune chas'd away,
 His gifts no longer than their author stay:
 He shakes the dust against th' ungrateful
 race,
 And leaves the stench of ordures in the
 place.
 Oft has he flatter'd and blasphem'd the
 same,
 For in his rage he spares no sov'reign's
 name;
 The hero and the tyrant change their style
 By the same measure that they frown or smile.
 When well receiv'd by hospitable foes,
 The kindness he returns, is to expose:
 For courtesies, tho' undeserv'd and great,
 No gratitude in felon-minds beget;
 As tribute to his wit, the churl receives the treat.
 His praise of foes is venomously nice;
 So touch'd, it turns a virtue to a vice:
 A Greek, and bountiful, forewarns us twice.
 Sev'n sacraments he wisely does disown,
 Because he knows confession stands for
 one;
 Where sins to sacred silence are convey'd,
 And not for fear, or love, to be betray'd:
 But he, uncall'd, his patron to control,
 Divulg'd the secret whispers of his soul;
 Stood forth th' accusing Sathan of his
 crimes,
 And offer'd to the Moloch of the times.

Prompt to assail, and careless of defense,
Invulnerable in his impudence,
He dares the world; and, eager of a name,
He thrusts about, and justles into fame.
Frontless and satire-proof he scours the streets,

2481

And runs an Indian muck at all he meets.
So fond of loud report, that not to miss
Of being known (his last and utmost bliss)
He rather would be known for what he is.

"Such was, and is the Captain of the Test,

Tho' half his virtues are not here ex-
press'd;

The modesty of fame conceals the rest.
The spleenful Pigeons never could create A prince more proper to revenge their hate:

2490

Indeed, more proper to revenge, than save;
A king whom in his wrath th' Almighty
gave:

For all the grace the landlord had allow'd,
But made the Buzzard and the Pigeons
proud;

Gave time to fix their friends, and to seduce the crowd.

They long their fellow-subjects to in-thral,

Their patron's promise into question call,
And vainly think he meant to make 'em lords of all.

"False fears their leaders fail'd not to suggest,

As if the Doves were to be dispossest'd;
Nor sighs, nor groans, nor goggling eyes
did want,

2501

For now the Pigeons too had learn'd to cant.
The house of pray'r is stock'd with large
encrease;

Nor doors, nor windows can contain the
press:

For birds of ev'ry feather fill th' abode;
Ev'n atheists out of envy own a God:

And, reeking from the stews, adult'ers
come,

Like Goths and Vandals to demolish Rome.
That Conscience which to all their crimes
was mute

Now calls aloud, and cries to persecute;
No rigor of the laws to be releas'd,

2511

And much the less, because it was their lord's request:

They thought it great their sov'reign to
control,

And nam'd their pride, nobility of soul.

"Tis true, the Pigeons, and their prince elect,

Were short of pow'r their purpose to effect;
But with their quills did all the hurt they
could,

And cuff'd the tender Chickens from their food:

And much the Buzzard in their cause did stir,

Tho' naming not the patron, to infer, ²⁵²⁰
With all respect, he was a gross idolater.

"But when th' imperial owner did espy
That thus they turn'd his grace to villainy,
Not suffering wrath to discompose his
mind,

He strove a temper for th' extremes to
find,

So to be just, as he might still be kind;
Then, all maturely weigh'd, pronounc'd a doom

Of sacred strength for ev'ry age to come.
By this the Doves their wealth and state
possess,

No rights infrin'd, but license to oppress:

2530

Such pow'r have they as factious lawyers
long

To crowns ascrib'd, that kings can do no
wrong.

But, since his own domestic birds have tried
The dire effects of their destructive pride,
He deems that proof a measure to the
rest,

Concluding well within his kingly breast,
His fowl of nature too unjustly were op-
press'd.

He therefore makes all birds of ev'ry
sect

Free of his farm, with promise to respect
Their sev'ral kinds alike, and equally protect.

2540

His gracious edict the same franchise yields

To all the wild encrease of woods and fields,

And who in rocks aloof, and who in steeples builds;

To Crows the like impartial grace affords,
And Choughs and Daws, and such republic
birds;

Secur'd with ample privilege to feed,

Each has his district, and his bounds de-
creed:

Combin'd in common int'rest with his own,
But not to pass the Pigeons' Rubicon.

"Here ends the reign of this pretended Dove; ²⁵⁵⁰
 All prophecies accomplish'd from above,
 For Shiloh comes the scepter to remove.
 Reduc'd from her imperial high abode,
 Like Dionysius to a private rod,
 The Passive Church, that with pretended grace
 Did her distinctive mark in duty place,
 Now touch'd, reviles her Maker to his face.
 "What after happen'd is not hard to guess:
 The small beginnings had a large increase,
 And arts and wealth succeed (the secret spoils of peace). ²⁵⁶⁰
 'T is said, the Doves repented, tho' too late,
 Become the smiths of their own foolish fate:
 Nor did their owner hasten their ill hour;
 But, sunk in credit, they decreas'd in pow'r;
 Like snows in warmth that mildly pass away,
 Dissolving in the silence of decay.
 "The Buzzard, not content with equal place,
 Invites the feather'd Nimrods of his race,
 To hide the thinness of their flock from sight,
 And all together make a seeming goodly flight: ²⁵⁷⁰

But each have sep'rate int'rests of their own;
 Two Czars are one too many for a throne.
 Nor can th' usurper long abstain from food;
 Already he has tasted Pigeons' blood,
 And may be tempted to his former fare,
 When this indulgent lord shall late to heav'n repair.
 Bare bending times, and molting months may come,
 When, lagging late, they cannot reach their home;
 Or rent in schism (for so their fate decrees)
 Like the tumultuous college of the bees, ²⁵⁸⁰
 They fight their quarrel, by themselves oppress'd:
 The tyrant smiles below, and waits the falling feast."
 Thus did the gentle Hind her fable end,
 Nor would the Panther blame it, nor commend;
 But, with affected yawnings at the close,
 Seem'd to require her natural repose:
 For now the streaky light began to peep,
 And setting stars admonish'd both to sleep.
 The dame withdrew, and, wishing to her guest
 The peace of heav'n, betook herself to rest. ²⁵⁹⁰
 Ten thousand angels on her slumbers wait,
 With glorious visions of her future state.

A SONG FOR ST. CECILIA'S DAY, 1687

[About 1683 a musical society in London began the custom of celebrating November 22, the Feast of St. Cecilia, the patroness of music, by a public concert. Dryden wrote the following ode, which was set to music by an Italian composer, Giovanni Battista Draghi, for the performance of 1687. So far as is known, this ode was first printed in Examen Poeticum, 1693. It seems possible, however, that it was published earlier, as a broadside, like its greater successor, Alexander's Feast.]

I

FROM harmony, from heav'nly harmony
 This universal frame began:
 When Nature underneath a heap
 Of jarring atoms lay,
 And could not heave her head,
 The tuneful voice was heard from high:
 "Arise, ye more than dead."

Then cold, and hot, and moist, and dry,
 In order to their stations leap,
 And Music's pow'r obey. ¹⁰
 From harmony, from heav'nly harmony
 This universal frame began:
 From harmony to harmony
 Thro' all the compass of the notes it ran,
 The diapason closing full in Man.

II

What passion cannot Music raise and quell!
 When Jubal struck the corded shell,
 His list'ning brethren stood around,
 And, wond'ring, on their faces fell
 To worship that celestial sound. ²⁰ Less than a god they thought there could not dwell
 Within the hollow of that shell
 That spoke so sweetly and so well.
 What passion cannot Music raise and quell!

III

The Trumpet's loud clangor
 Excites us to arms,
 With shrill notes of anger,
 And mortal alarms.
 The double double double beat
 Of the thund'ring Drum 30
 Cries: "Hark! the foes come;
 Charge, charge, 't is too late to retreat."

IV

The soft complaining Flute
 In dying notes discovers
 The woes of hopeless lovers,
 Whose dirge is whisper'd by the warbling Lute.

V

Sharp Violins proclaim
 Their jealous pangs, and desperation,
 Fury, frantic indignation,
 Depth of pains, and height of passion, 40
 For the fair, disdainful dame.

VI

But O! what art can teach,
 What human voice can reach,
 The sacred Organ's praise?
 Notes inspiring holy love,
 Notes that wing their heav'nly ways
 To mend the choirs above.

VII

Orpheus could lead the savage race;
 And trees unrooted left their place,

Sequacious of the lyre; 50
 But bright Cecilia rais'd the wonder high'r:
 When to her Organ vocal breath was
 giv'n,
 An angel heard, and straight appear'd,
 Mistaking earth for heav'n.

GRAND CHORUS

*As from the pow'r of sacred lays
 The spheres began to move,
 And sung the great Creator's praise
 To all the blest above;
 So, when the last and dreadful hour
 This crumbling pageant shall devour, 60
 The Trumpet shall be heard on high,
 The dead shall live, the living die,
 And Music shall untune the sky.*

EPIGRAM ON MILTON

[This epigram is engraved, without the name of the author, beneath the portrait of Milton which forms the frontispiece to Tonson's folio edition of Paradise Lost, 1688. Dryden's name is first joined to it in the second edition, 1716, of the Sixth Part of Miscellany Poems.]

THREE poets, in three distant ages born,
 Greece, Italy, and England did adorn.
 The first in loftiness of thought surpass'd,
 The next in majesty, in both the last:
 The force of Nature could no farther go;
 To make a third, she join'd the former two.

BRITANNIA REDIVIVA

A POEM ON THE PRINCE, BORN ON THE TENTH OF JUNE, 1688

*Dni Patrii Indigetes, et Romule, Vestaque Mater, Quæ Tuscum Tiberim, et Romana Palatia servas,
 Hunc saltem everso Puerum succurrere sæclo
 Ne prohibete: satis jam pridem sanguine nostro Laomedontæc huius perfuræ Trojæ. — VIRG. Georg. I.*

[This poem celebrates the birth of a son to James II on Trinity Sunday, June 10, 1688. It was prepared in haste and licensed for the press on June 19. Two editions, one in folio and one in quarto, were published by Tonson in 1688; a third, in quarto, was printed in Edinburgh in the same year. After the Revolution the poem was not reprinted until it was included in the folio Poems and Translations, 1701.]

OUR vows are heard betimes! and Heaven takes care
 To grant, before we can conclude the pray'r:

Preventing angels met it half the way,
 And sent us back to praise, who came to pray.

Just on the day, when the high-mounted
sun

Did farthest in his northern progress run,
He bended forward, and ev'n stretch'd the
sphere

Beyond the limits of the lengthen'd year,
To view a brighter son in Britain born;
That was the bus'ness of his longest
morn;

The glorious object seen, 't was time to
turn.

Departing Spring could only stay to
shed

Her bloomy beauties on the genial bed,
But left the manly Summer in her stead,
With timely fruit the longing land to cheer,
And to fulfil the promise of the year.

Betwixt two seasons comes th' auspicious
heir,

This age to blossom, and the next to bear.

(a) Last solemn Sabbath saw the Church
attend;

The Paraclete in fiery pomp descend;
But when his wondrous (b) octave roll'd
again,

He brought a royal infant in his train.
So great a blessing to so good a king,
None but th' Eternal Comforter could
bring.

Or did the mighty Trinity conspire,
As once, in council to create our sire?
It seems as if they sent the newborn guest
To wait on the procession of their feast;
And on their sacred anniverse decreed
To stamp their image on the promis'd seed.
Three realms united, and on one bestow'd,
An emblem of their mystic union show'd:
The Mighty Trine the triple empire shar'd,
As every person would have one to guard.

Hail, son of pray'rs, by holy violence
Drawn down from heav'n; but long be ban-ish'd thence,

And late to thy paternal skies retire!
To mend our crimes whole ages would require;

To change th' inveterate habit of our sins,
And finish what thy godlike sire begins.
Kind Heav'n, to make us Englishmen again,
No less can give us than a patriarch's reign.

The sacred cradle to your charge receive,
Ye seraphs, and by turns the guard relieve;
Thy father's angel, and thy father join,
To keep possession, and secure the line;

(a) Whit Sunday.

(b) Trinity Sunday.

But long defer the honors of thy fate:
Great may they be like his, like his be late;
That James this running century may view,
And give his son an auspice to the new.

Our wants exact at least that moderate
stay:

For see the (c) Dragon winged on his
way,

To watch the (d) travail, and devour the
prey.

Or, if allusions may not rise so high,
Thus, when Alcides rais'd his infant cry,
The snakes besieg'd his young divinity;
But vainly with their forked tongues they threat,

For opposition makes a hero great.

To needful succor all the good will run,
And Jove assert the godhead of his son.

O still repining at your present state,
Grudging yourselves the benefits of fate,
Look up, and read in characters of light
A blessing sent you in your own despite.
The manna falls, yet that celestial bread
Like Jews you munch, and murmur while you feed.

May not your fortune be like theirs, exil'd,
Yet forty years to wander in the wild;
Or if it be, may Moses live at least,

To lead you to the verge of promis'd rest.
Tho' poets are not prophets, to fore-
know

What plants will take the blight, and what will grow,

By tracing Heav'n his footsteps may be
found:

Behold! how awfully he walks the round!
God is abroad, and, wondrous in his ways,
The rise of empires and their fall surveys;
More (might I say) than with an usual
eye,

He sees his bleeding Church in ruin lie,
And hears the souls of saints beneath his altar cry.

Already has he lifted high the (e) sign,
Which crown'd the conquering arms of Constantine:

The (f) moon grows pale at that presaging
sight,

And half her train of stars have lost their
light.

(c) Alluding only to the Commonwealth party, here and in other places of the poem.

(d) Rev. xii, 4.

(e) The cross.

(f) The crescent, which the Turks bear for their arms.

Behold another (g) Sylvester, to bless
The sacred standard, and secure success;
Large of his treasures, of a soul so great,
As fills and crowds his universal seat.

Now view at home a (h) second Constantine;
(The former, too, was of the British line;)
Has not his healing balm your breaches clos'd,⁹⁰
Whose exile many sought, and few oppos'd?
Or did not Heav'n by its eternal doom Permit those evils, that this good might
come?

So manifest, that ev'n the moon-ey'd sects
See whom and what this Providence protects.

Methinks, had we within our minds no
more

Than that one shipwrack on the fatal
(i) ore,

That only thought may make us think
again,

What wonders God reserves for such a
reign.

To dream that chance his preservation wrought,¹⁰⁰

Were to think Noah was preserv'd for naught;

Or the surviving eight were not design'd
To people earth, and to restore their kind.

When humbly on the royal babe we gaze,
The manly lines of a majestic face
Give awful joy: 't is paradise to look
On the fair frontispiece of Nature's book;
If the first opening page so charms the sight,
Think how th' unfolded volume will de-
light!

See how the venerable infant lies¹¹⁰
In early pomp; how thro' the mother's
eyes

The father's soul, with an undaunted view, Looks out, and takes our homage as his
due.

See on his future subjects how he smiles,
Nor meanly flatters, nor with craft beguiles;

But with an open face, as on his throne,
Assures our birthrights and assumes his
own.

Born in broad daylight, that th' ungrateful rout

May find no room for a remaining doubt;

(g) The Pope in the time of Constantine the Great,
alluding to the present Pope.

(h) King James the Second.

(i) The Lemmon Ore.

Truth, which itself is light, does darkness
shun,¹²⁰

And the true eaglet safely dares the sun.

(j) Fain would the fiends have made a dubious birth,

Loth to confess the godhead cloth'd in
earth;

But sicken'd, after all their baffled lies,
To find an heir apparent of the skies,

Abandon'd to despair, still may they
grudge,

And, owning not the Savior, prove the judge.

Not great (k) Æneas stood in plainer
day,

When, the dark mantling mist dissolv'd away,¹²⁹

He to the Tyrians shew'd his sudden face,
Shining with all his goddess mother's grace;
For she herself had made his count'nance
bright,

Breath'd honor on his eyes, and her own purple light.

If our victorious (l) Edward, as they say,
Gave Wales a prince on that propitious day,
Why may not years revolving with his fate
Produce his like, but with a longer date?

One who may carry to a distant shore
The terror that his fam'd forefather bore?
But why should James or his young hero
stay¹⁴⁰

For slight presages of a name or day?

We need no Edward's fortune to adorn

That happy moment when our prince was
born:

Our prince adorns his day, and ages hence Shall wish his birthday for some future
prince.

(m) Great Michael, prince of all th' ethereal hosts,

And whate'er inborn saints our Britain boasts;

And thou, (n) th' adopted patron of our
isle,

With cheerful aspects on this infant smile:
The pledge of Heav'n, which, dropping from above,¹⁵⁰

Secures our bliss, and reconciles his love.

Enough of ills our dire rebellion wrought,
When, to the dregs, we drank the bitter
draught;

(j) Alluding to the temptations in the wilderness.

(k) Virgil, Æneid l.

(l) Edward the Black Prince, born on Trinity Sunday.

(m) The motto of the poem explain'd.

(n) St. George.

Then airy atoms did in plagues conspire,
Nor did th' avenging angel yet retire,
But purg'd our still encreasing crimes with fire.

Then perjurd Plots, the still impending
Test,

And worse — but charity conceals the rest:
Here stop the current of the sanguine flood;
Require not, gracious God, thy martyrs'
blood;

But let their dying pangs, their living toil,
Spread a rich harvest thro' their native soil:
A harvest ripening for another reign,
Of which this royal babe may reap the grain.

Enough of early saints one womb has
giv'n;

Enough encreas'd the family of heav'n:
Let them for his and our atonement go;
And reigning blest above, leave him to rule
below.

Enough already has the year foreslow'd
His wonted course, the seas have over-flow'd,

The meads were floated with a weeping
spring,
And frighten'd birds in woods forgot to
sing;

The strong-limb'd steed beneath his harness
faints,
And the same shiv'ring sweat his lord at-taints.

When will the minister of wrath give o'er?
Behold him, at (o) Araunah's threshing-
floor:

He stops, and seems to sheathe his flaming
brand,

Pleas'd with burnt incense from our David's
hand.

David has bought the Jebusite's abode,
And rais'd an altar to the living God.

Heav'n, to reward him, make his joys sincere;

No future ills nor accidents appear,
To sully and pollute the sacred infant's
year!

Five months to discord and debate were
giv'n:

He sanctifies the yet remaining sev'n.
Sabbath of months! henceforth in him be
blest,

And prelude to the realm's perpetual rest!
Let his baptismal drops for us atone;

(o) Alluding to the passage in the First Book of Kings
xxiv, 20.

Lustrations for (p) offenses not his own.
Let Conscience, which is int'rest ill dis-
guis'd,

In the same font be cleans'd, and all the land baptiz'd.

(q) Unnam'd as yet; at least unknown to
fame:

Is there a strife in heav'n about his name?
Where every famous predecessor vies,
And makes a faction for it in the skies?
Or must it be reserv'd to thought alone?

Such was the sacred (r) Tetragrammaton.
Things worthy silence must not be reveal'd:
Thus the true name of (s) Rome was kept conceal'd,

To shun the spells and sorceries of those Who durst her infant Majesty oppose.
But when his tender strength in time shall
rise

To dare ill tongues, and fascinating eyes;
This isle, which hides the little thund'rer's
fame,

Shall be too narrow to contain his name:
Th' artillery of heav'n shall make him
known;

(t) Crete could not hold the god, when Jove was grown.

As Jove's (u) increase, who from his brain was born,

Whom arms and arts did equally adorn,
Free of the breast was bred, whose milky
taste

Minerva's name to Venus had debas'd;

So this imperial babe rejects the food
That mixes monarchs' with plebeian blood:
Food that his inborn courage might control,
Extinguish all the father in his soul,

And, for his Estian race, and Saxon strain, Might reproduce some second Richard's
reign.

Mildness he shares from both his parents'
blood,

But kings too tame are despicably good:
Be this the mixture of this regal child,
By nature manly, but by virtue mild.

Thus far the furious transport of the news

Had to prophetic madness fir'd the Muse;

(p) Original sin.

(q) The prince christen'd, but not nam'd.

(r) Jehovah, or the name of God, unlawful to be pro-nounc'd by the Jews.

(s) Some authors say that the true name of Rome was kept a secret: Ne hostes incantamenta deos elicerent.

(t) Candie, where Jupiter was born and bred secretly.

(u) Pallas, or Minerva, said by the poets to have been bred up by hand.

Madness ungovernable, uninspir'd,
Swift to foretell whatever she desir'd.
Was it for me the dark abyss to tread,
And read the book which angels cannot
read?

How was I punish'd, when the (v) sudden
blast

The face of heav'n and our young sun o'er-
cast!

Fame, the swift ill, encreasing as she roll'd,
Disease, despair, and death, at three reprises told: ²³¹

At three insulting strides she stalk'd the
town,

And, like contagion, struck the loyal down.
Down fell the winnow'd wheat; but,
mounted high,

The whirlwind bore the chaff, and hid the
sky.

Here black rebellion shooting from be-
low,

(As earth's (w) gigantic brood by moments grow,)

And here the sons of God are petrified with woe:

An apoplex of grief! so low were driv'n
The saints, as hardly to defend their heav'n.

As, when pent vapors run their hollow round, ²⁴¹

Earthquakes, which are convulsions of the
ground,

Break bellowing forth, and no confinement
brook,

Till the third settles what the former shook;
Such heavings had our souls; till, slow and
late,

Our life with his return'd, and faith prevail'd on fate:

By prayers the mighty blessing was im-
plor'd,

To pray'rs was granted, and by pray'rs re-
stor'd.

So, ere the (x) Shunammite a son con-
ceiv'd,

The prophet promis'd, and the wife be-liev'd. ²⁵⁰

A son was sent, the son so much desir'd;
But soon upon the mother's knees expir'd.

The troubled Seer approach'd the mournful door,

Ran, pray'd, and sent his past'ral staff be-
fore,

(v) The sudden false report of the prince's death.
(w) Those giants are feign'd to have grown fifteen ells
every day.

(x) In the Second Book of Kings iv.

Then stretch'd his limbs upon the child, and
mourn'd,

Till warmth, and breath, and a new soul
return'd.

Thus Mercy stretches out her hand, and saves

Desponding Peter sinking in the waves.

As when a sudden storm of hail and rain
Beats to the ground the yet unbearded grain, ²⁶⁰

Think not the hopes of harvest are destroy'd
On the flat field, and on the naked void;

The light, unloaded stem, from tempest
freed,

Will raise the youthful honors of his head;
And, soon restor'd by native vigor, bear
The timely product of the bounteous year.

Nor yet conclude all fiery trials past:
For Heav'n will exercise us to the last;

Sometimes will check us in our full career,
With doubtful blessings, and with mingled fear; ²⁷⁰

That, still depending on his daily grace,
His every mercy for an alms may pass;

With sparing hands will diet us to good,
Preventing surfeits of our pamper'd blood.

So feeds the mother bird her craving young
With little morsels, and delays 'em long.

True, this last blessing was a royal feast;
But where's the wedding garment on the guest?

Our manners, as religion were a dream,
Are such as teach the nations to blaspheme.

In lusts we wallow, and with pride we swell,
And injuries with injuries repel; ²⁸²

Prompt to revenge, not daring to forgive,
Our lives unteach the doctrine we believe.

Thus Israel sinn'd, impenitently hard,
And vainly thought the (y) present ark
their guard;

But when the haughty Philistines appear,
They fled, abandon'd to their foes and fear;

Their God was absent, tho' his ark was
there.

Ah! lest our crimes should snatch this pledge away ²⁹⁰

And make our joys the blessing of a day!
For we have sinn'd him hence, and that he lives,

God to his promise, not our practice gives.
Our crimes would soon weigh down the guilty scale,

But James, and Mary, and the Church prevail.

Nor (z) Amalek can rout the chosen bands,
While Hur and Aaron hold up Moses' hands.

By living well, let us secure his days,
Mod'rate in hopes, and humble in our ways.
No force the freeborn spirit can constrain,
But charity and great examples gain. ³⁰¹
Forgiveness is our thanks for such a day,
'T is godlike God in his own coin to pay.

But you, propitious queen, translated
here,
From your mild heav'n, to rule our rugged sphere,
Beyond the sunny walks, and circling
year:

You, who your native climate have bereft
Of all the virtues, and the vices left;
Whom piety and beauty make their boast,
Tho' beautiful is well in pious lost; ³¹⁰
So lost, as starlight is dissolv'd away,
And melts into the brightness of the day;
Or gold about the regal diadem,
Lost to improve the luster of the gem:
What can we add to your triumphant
day?

Let the great gift the beauteous giver pay.
For, should our thanks awake the rising
sun,
And lengthen, as his latest shadows run,
That, tho' the longest day, would soon,
too soon be done.

Let angels' voices with their harps conspire, ³²⁰
But keep th' auspicious infant from the choir;

Late let him sing above, and let us know
No sweeter music than his cries below.

Nor can I wish to you, great monarch,
more

Than such an annual income to your store;
The day which gave this unit did not shine
For a less omen, than to fill the trine.

After a prince, an admiral beget;
The Royal Sov'reign wants an anchor yet.

Our isle has younger titles still in store,
And when th' exhausted land can yield
no more, ³³¹
Your line can force them from a foreign
shore.

The name of Great your martial mind
will suit,
But justice is your darling attribute:
Of all the Greeks, 't was but (a) one hero's
due,

And in him Plutarch prophesied of you.
A prince's favors but on few can fall,
But justice is a virtue shar'd by all.

Some kings the name of conquerors have assum'd, ³³⁹
Some to be great, some to be gods presum'd;
But boundless pow'r, and arbitrary lust,
Made tyrants still abhor the name of just;
They shunn'd the praise this godlike virtue gives,

And fear'd a title that reproach'd their lives.
The pow'r, from which all kings derive their state,

Whom they pretend, at least, to imitate,
Is equal both to punish and reward;
For few would love their God, unless they fear'd.

Resistless force and immortality
Make but a lame, imperfect deity; ³⁵⁰
Tempests have force unbounded to destroy,
And deathless being ev'n the damn'd enjoy;
And yet Heav'n's attributes, both last and
first,

One without life, and one with life accurst;
But justice is Heav'n's self, so strictly he,
That, could it fail, the Godhead could not be.

This virtue is your own; but life and state
Are one to fortune subject, one to fate:

Equal to all, you justly frown or smile;
Nor hopes nor fears your steady hand
beguile; ³⁶⁰

Yourselves our balance hold, the world's,
our isle.

POEMS WRITTEN BETWEEN 1689 AND 1691

PROLOGUE AND EPILOGUE TO DON SEBASTIAN, KING OF PORTUGAL

[Dryden bestowed much labor upon this tragedy, the first play that he wrote on his

(z) Exod. xvii, 8.

return to dramatic work after the Revolution. Though of great literary merit, it seems from the author's preface to have had at first only moderate success on the stage. It was probably acted in the autumn of 1689; it was published in January, 1690. (See reference to the London Gazette in Scott-Saintsbury edition, xviii, 296.) The book was printed "for Jo. Hindmarsh," instead of for Tonson. The title-page bears the apt motto :

(a) Aristides. See his life in Plutarch.

— Nec tarda senectus
Debilitat vires animi mutatque vigorem.
VIRGIL, Æneid, ix, 610, 611.

The epilogue is closely connected with the play. The amour of Antonio, "a young, noble, amorous Portuguese," and the Mufti's daughter Morayma, who steals her father's jewel casket for her lover's sake, furnishes the secondary, comic intrigue of the drama, of which the love of Sebastian and Almeyda, "a captive queen of Barbary," later discovered to be Sebastian's sister, is the main plot. The true relation of Sebastian and Almeyda is disclosed by "an old counselor," Alvarez. The rest may be understood from hints in the epilogue itself.]

PROLOGUE

SPOKEN BY A WOMAN

THE judge remov'd, tho' he's no more my lord,
May plead at bar, or at the council board:
So may cast poets write; there's no pretension
To argue loss of wit, from loss of pension.
Your looks are cheerful; and in all this place
I see not one that wears a damning face.
The British nation is too brave, to show
Ignoble vengeance on a vanquish'd foe.
At least be civil to the wretch imploring,
And lay your paws upon him without roaring.
Suppose our poet was your foe before,
Yet now, the bus'ness of the field is o'er;
'Tis time to let your civil wars alone,
When troops are into winter quarters gone.
Jove was alike to Latian and to Phrygian;
And you well know, a play's of no religion.
Take good advice, and please yourselves
this day
No matter from what hands you have the
play.
Among good fellows ev'ry health will pass,
That serves to carry round another glass:
When with full bowls of Burgundy you
dine,
Tho' at the mighty monarch you repine,
You grant him still Most Christian in his
wine.
Thus far the poet; but his brains grow
addle,
And all the rest is purely from this noddle.

You've seen young ladies at the senate door

Prefer petitions, and your grace implore:
However grave the legislators were,
Their cause went ne'er the worse for being
fair.

Reasons as weak as theirs, perhaps, I
bring;

But I could bribe you with as good a thing.
I heard him make advances of good nature;

That he, for once, would sheathe his cutting satire.

Sign but his peace, he vows he'll ne'er
again

The sacred names of fops and beaux profane.

Strike up the bargain quickly; for I swear,
As times go now, he offers very fair.

Be not too hard on him with statutes neither;

Be kind; and do not set your teeth together,

To stretch the laws, as cobblers do their leather.

Horses by Papists are not to be ridden,
But sure the Muses' horse was ne'er for-bidden;

For in no rate-book it was ever found
That Pegasus was valued at five pound;
Fine him to daily drudging and inditing,
And let him pay his taxes out in writing.

EPILOGUE

SPOKEN BETWIXT ANTONIO AND MORAYMA

Mor. I quak'd at heart, for fear the royal fashion
Should have seduc'd us two to separation:

To be drawn in, against our own desire,
Poor I to be a nun, poor you a friar.

Ant. I trembled, when the old man's hand was in,

He would have prov'd we were too near of
kin,

Discovering old intrigues of love, like
t'other,

Betwixt my father and thy sinful mother,
To make us sister Turk and Christian brother.

Mor. Excuse me there; that league should have been rather

Betwixt your mother and my Mufti father;

'Tis for my own and my relations' credit,
Your friends should bear the bastard, mine should get it.

Ant. Suppose us two Almeyda and Sebastian

With incest prov'd upon us —

Mor. Without question
Their conscience was too queasy of digestion.

Ant. Thou wouldst have kept the counsel of thy brother,
And sinn'd till we repented of each other.

Mor. Beast as you are, on nature's laws to trample!

'T were fitter that we follow'd their example;

And, since all marriage in repentance ends,
'Tis good for us to part while we are friends.

To save a maid's remorse and confusions, E'en leave me now before we try conclusions.

Ant. To copy their example, first make certain

Of one good hour, like theirs, before our parting;

Make a debauch o'er night of love and madness;

And marry, when we wake, in sober sadness.

Mor. I'll follow no new sects of your inventing;

One night might cost me nine long months'
repenting.

First wed; and, if you find that life a fetter, Die when you please; the sooner, sir, the better.

My wealth would get me love ere I could ask it:

O! there's a strange temptation in the casket.

All these young sharpers would my grace
importune,

And make me thund'ring votes of lives and fortune.

PROLOGUE TO THE PRO- PHETESS

SPOKEN BY MR. BETTERTON

[Dryden wrote the following prologue for a revival of Fletcher's Prophetess, "with alterations and additions after the manner of an opera" (as the title-page has it) by Betterton, and with music by Purcell (see Downes). The date is fixed with some accuracy by the references to King William's campaign in Ireland, from June 4 to September 8, 1690, during which time Queen Mary acted as regent. The prologue gave offense by its political references; and, as Cibber tells us in his Apology,

"was forbid by the Lord Dorset after the first day of its being spoken." "It must be confessed," Cibber adds, "that this prologue had some familiar, metaphorical sneers at the Revolution itself; and as the poetry of it was good, the offense of it was less pardonable."

This prologue was not printed with The Prophetess on its publication in 1690; it first appeared in the second edition, 1708, of The Annual Miscellany for the Year 1694 (the Fourth Miscellany).]

WHAT Nostradame, with all his art, can guess

The fate of our approaching Prophetess?

A play, which, like a prospective set right,
Presents our vast expenses close to sight;
But turn the tube, and there we sadly view
Our distant gains; and those uncertain too:
A sweeping tax, which on ourselves we
raise,

And all, like you, in hopes of better days.
When will our losses warn us to be wise?
Our wealth decreases, and our charges rise.
Money, the sweet allurer of our hopes, ¹¹
Ebbs out in oceans and comes in by drops.
We raise new objects to provoke delight,
But you grow sated ere the second sight.
False men, ev'n so you serve your mistresses:

They rise three stories in their tow'ring
dress;

And, after all, you love not long enough
To pay the rigging, ere you leave 'em off:
Never content with what you had before,
But true to change, and Englishmen all o'er. ²⁰

Now honor calls you hence, and all your
care

Is to provide the horrid pomp of war.
In plume and scarf, jack boots, and Bilbo blade,

Your silver goes, that should support our
trade.

Go, unkind heroes, leave our stage to
mourn,

Till rich from vanquish'd rebels you return;

And the fat spoils of Teague in triumph
draw,

His firkin butter, and his usquebaugh.
 Go, conqu'rors of your male and female
 foes;
 Men without hearts, and women without hose.
 Each bring his love a Bogland captive
 home;
 Such proper pages will long trains become;
 With copper collars, and with brawny backs,
 Quite to put down the fashion of our blacks.
 Then shall the pious Muses pay their vows,
 And furnish all their laurels for your brows;
 Their tuneful voice shall rise for your delights;
 We want not poets fit to sing your flights.
 But you, bright beauties, for whose only
 sake
 These doughty knights such dangers undertake,
 When they with happy gales are gone }
 away,
 With your propitious presence grace our }
 play,
 And with a sigh their empty seats sur- } vey:
 Then think: "On that bare bench my serv-vant sate;
 I see him ogle still, and hear him chat,
 Selling facetious bargains, and propounding
 That witty recreation, call'd dumfounding."
 Their loss with patience we will try to
 bear;
 And would do more, to see you often here !
 That our dead stage, reviv'd by your fair
 eyes,
 Under a female regency may rise.

PROLOGUE, EPILOGUE, AND SONGS FROM AMPHITRYON

OR, THE TWO SOSIAS

[Dryden based his Amphitryon on the comedy of the same name by Molière, but borrowed some traits from Plautus and added important features of his own invention. (See Philipp Ott: Über das Verhältniß des Lustspiel-Dichters Dryden zu . . . Molière. Landshut, 1888.) The play was probably acted in the spring of 1690; it was published in October of that year. (See reference to the London Gazette in Scott-Saintsbury edition, xviii, 296.)]

PROLOGUE

SPOKEN BY MRS. BRACEGIRDLE

THE lab'ring bee, when his sharp sting is
 gone,
 Forgets his golden work, and turns a drone:
 Such is a satire, when you take away
 That rage in which his noble vigor lay.
 What gain you by not suffering him to tease ye ?
 He neither can offend you, now, nor please
 ye.
 The honey-bag and venom lay so near,
 That both together you resolv'd to tear;
 And lost your pleasure, to secure your
 fear.
 How can he show his manhood, if you bind
 him
 To box, like boys, with one hand tied behind him ?
 This is plain leveling of wit, in which The poor has all th' advantage, not the rich.
 The blockhead stands excus'd for wanting
 sense,
 And wits turn blockheads in their own defense.
 Yet, tho' the stage's traffic is undone,
 Still Julian's interloping trade goes on:
 Tho' satire on the theater you smother,
 Yet, in lampoons, you libel one another.
 The first produces still a second jig;
 You whip 'em out, like schoolboys, till they gig,
 And with the same success, we readers
 guess,
 For ev'ry one still dwindles to a less;
 And much good malice is so meanly dress'd,
 That we would laugh, but cannot find the jest.
 If no advice your rhyming rage can stay,
 Let not the ladies suffer in the fray:
 Their tender sex is privileg'd from war;
 'T is not like knights, to draw upon the fair.
 What fame expect you from so mean a
 prize ?
 We wear no murd'ring weapons but our
 eyes.
 Our sex, you know, was after yours de-
 sign'd;
 The last perfection of the Maker's mind:
 Heav'n drew out all the gold for us, and left your dross behind.

Beauty for valor's best reward he chose;
 Peace, after war; and after toil, repose.
 Hence, ye profane, excluded from our sights;
 And, charm'd by day with honor's vain
 delights,
 Go, make your best of solitary nights.
 Recant betimes, 't is prudence to submit; 40
 Our sex is still your overmatch in wit:
 We never fail with new, successful arts,
 To make fine fools of you, and all your parts.

EPILOGUE

SPOKEN BY PHÆDRA, MRS. MOUNTFORT

I'M thinking (and it almost makes me mad)
 How sweet a time those heathen ladies had.
 Idolatry was ev'n their gods' own trade;
 They worship'd the fine creatures they had
 made.

Cupid was chief of all the deities,
 And love was all the fashion in the skies.
 When the sweet nymph held up the lily
 hand,

Jove was her humble servant at command.
 The treasury of heav'n was ne'er so bare,
 But still there was a pension for the fair. 10
 In all his reign adult'ry was no sin,
 For Jove the good example did begin.

Mark, too, when he usurp'd the husband's
 name,

How civilly he sav'd the lady's fame.
 The secret joys of love he wisely hid;
 But you, sirs, boast of more than e'er you did.

You tease your cuckolds; to their face torment 'em:

But Jove gave his new honors to content 'em;
 And, in the kind remembrance of the fair,
 On each exalted son bestow'd a star. 20

For those good deeds, as by the date appears,

His godship flourish'd full two thousand years.

At last, when he and all his priests grew
 old,

The ladies grew in their devotion cold,
 And that false worship would no longer
 hold.

Severity of life did next begin,
 (And always does, when we no more can sin.)
 That doctrine, too, so hard in practice lies,

That the next age may see another rise. 29
 Then pagan gods may once again succeed,
 And Jove or Mars be ready, at our need,
 To get young godlings, and so mend our breed.

SONGS

I

SONG

I

CELIA, that I once was blest,
 Is now the torment of my breast,
 Since, to curse me, you bereave me
 Of the pleasures I possess'd:
 Cruel creature, to deceive me!
 First to love, and then to leave me!

II

Had you the bliss refus'd to grant,
 Then I had never known the want;
 But possessing once the blessing
 Is the cause of my complaint: 10
 Once possessing is but tasting;
 'T is no bliss that is not lasting.

III

Celia now is mine no more;
 But I am hers, and must adore,
 Nor to leave her will endeavor:
 Charms that captiv'd me before
 No unkindness can dis sever;
 Love that's true, is love forever.

II

MERCURY'S SONG TO PHÆDRA

I

FAIR Iris I love, and hourly I die,
 But not for a lip, nor a languishing eye:
 She's fickle and false, and there we agree,
 For I am as false and as fickle as she.
 We neither believe what either can say;
 And, neither believing, we neither betray.

II

'T is civil to swear, and say things of course;
 We mean not the taking for better for worse.
 When present, we love; when absent, agree:
 I think not of Iris, nor Iris of me. 10
 The legend of love no couple can find,
 So easy to part, or so equally join'd.

III

A PASTORAL DIALOGUE BETWIXT THYRSIS AND IRIS

I

Thyrsis. FAIR Iris and her swain
Were in a shady bow'r;
Where Thyrsis long in vain
Had sought the shepherd's hour:
At length his hand advancing upon her snowy breast,
He said: "O kiss me longer,
And longer yet and longer,
If you will make me blest."

II

Iris. An easy yielding maid
By trusting is undone; 10
Our sex is oft betray'd
By granting love too soon.
If you desire to gain me, your suff'rings to redress,
Prepare to love me longer,
And longer yet, and longer,
Before you shall possess.

III

Thyrsis. The little care you show
Of all my sorrows past
Makes death appear too slow
And life too long to last. 20
Fair Iris, kiss me kindly, in pity of my fate;
And kindly still, and kindly,
Before it be too late.

IV

Iris. You fondly court your bliss,
And no advances make;
'Tis not for maids to kiss,
But 't is for men to take.
So you may kiss me kindly, and I will not rebel;
And kindly still, and kindly,
But kiss me not and tell. 30

V

A RONDEAU

Chorus. Thus at the height we love and
live,
And fear not to be poor:
We give, and give, and give, and
give,
Till we can give no more;

But what to-day will take away,
To-morrow will restore.
Thus at the height we love and live,
And fear not to be poor.

PROLOGUE TO THE MISTAKES

OR, THE FALSE REPORT

[This play, a tragi-comedy by Joseph Harris, a comic actor of no great note, was probably acted in 1690; it was published early in 1691, being entered in the Term Catalogue for Hilary Term (February). According to Giles Jacob, in The Poetical Register, or The Lives and Characters of all the English Poets, 1723, this play was "originally composed by another person; but being put into his [Harris's] hands, he, by altering, spoiled it."]

Enter MR. BRIGHT

GENTLEMEN, we must beg your pardon; here's no prologue to be had to-day; our new play is like to come on without a frontispiece, as bald as one of you young beaux without your periwig. I left our young poet sniveling and sobbing behind the scenes, and cursing somebody that has deceiv'd him.

Enter MR. BOWEN

Hold your prating to the audience: here's honest Mr. Williams, just come in, half mellow, from the Rose Tavern. He swears he is inspir'd with claret, and will come on, and that extempore too, either with a prologue of his own or something like one. O here he comes to his trial, at all adventures; for my part I wish him a good deliverance.

[Exeunt Mr. Bright and Mr. Bowen.]

Enter MR. WILLIAMS

Save ye, sirs, save ye! I am in a } hopeful way, }
I should speak something, in rhyme, }
now, for the play: }
But the deuce take me, if I know what } to say. }
I'll stick to my friend the author, that I can tell ye,
To the last drop of claret in my belly.
So far I'm sure 't is rhyme — that needs
no granting:

And, if my verses' feet stumble — you see my own are wanting.
 Our young poet has brought a piece of work,
 In which, tho' much of art there does not lurk,
 It may hold out three days — and that's as long as Cork.¹⁰
 But, for this play — (which till I have done, we show not)
 What may be its fortune — by the Lord —
 I know not.
 This I dare swear, no malice here is writ:
 'Tis innocent of all things; ev'n of wit.
 He's no high-flyer; he makes no sky-rockets,
 His squibs are only level'd at your pockets.
 And if his crackers light among your pelf,
 You are blown up; if not, then he's blown up himself.
 By this time, I'm something recover'd of my fluster'd madness:
 And now a word or two in sober sadness.²⁰
 Ours is a common play; and you pay
 down
 A common harlot's price — just half a
 crown.
 You'll say, I play the pimp on my friend's score;
 But since 'tis for a friend, your gibes give o'er:
 For many a mother has done that be-
 fore.
 How's this, you cry? an actor write? —
 we know it;
 But Shakespeare was an actor and a poet.
 Has not great Jonson's learning often
 fail'd?
 But Shakespeare's greater genius still pre-
 vail'd.
 Have not some writing actors, in this age,³⁰
 Deserv'd and found success upon the stage?
 To tell the truth, when our old wits are
 tir'd,
 Not one of us but means to be inspir'd.
 Let your kind presence grace our homely
 cheer;
 'Peace and the butt' is all our bus'ness
 here:
 So much for that — and the Devil take small beer.

PROLOGUE, EPILOGUE, AND SONGS FROM KING ARTHUR

OR, THE BRITISH WORTHY

[This opera Dryden originally designed as a sequel to Albion and Albanus. He had nearly completed it before the death of Charles II in February, 1685. The opera was finally acted, with many alterations from the original plan, in 1690 or 1691, and published in the latter year. Some copies of the first edition lack the prologue and the epilogue.]

PROLOGUE

SPOKEN BY MR. BETTERTON

SURE there's a dearth of wit in this dull
 town,
 When silly plays so savorly go down;
 As, when clipp'd money passes, 'tis a sign
 A nation is not over-stock'd with coin.
 Happy is he who, in his own defense,
 Can write just level to your humble sense;
 Who higher than your pitch can never
 go;
 And, doubtless, he must creep, who writes
 below.
 So have I seen, in hall of knight, or lord,
 A weak arm throw on a long shovel-board;
 He barely lays his piece, bar rubs and knocks,¹¹
 Secur'd by weakness not to reach the box.
 A feeble poet will his bus'ness do,
 Who, straining all he can, comes up to
 you;
 For, if you like yourselves, you like him
 too.
 An ape his own dear image will embrace;
 An ugly beau adores a hatchet face:
 So, some of you, on pure instinct of nature,
 Are led, by kind, t' admire your fellow creature.
 In fear of which, our house has sent this day,²⁰
 T'insure our new-built vessel, call'd a play;
 No sooner nam'd, than one cries out:
 "These stagers
 Come in good time, to make more work for wagers."
 The town divides, if it will take or no;
 The courtiers bet, the cits, the merchants
 too;
 A sign they have but little else to do.

Bets, at the first, were fool-traps; where the wise,
Like spiders, lay in ambush for the flies:
But now they're grown a common trade
for all,
And actions by the news-book rise and
fall;
Wits, cheats, and fops, are free of wager-
hall.

One policy as far as Lyons carries;
Another, nearer home, sets up for Paris.
Our bets, at last, would ev'n to Rome extend,

But that the Pope has prov'd our trusty friend.

Indeed, it were a bargain worth our money,
Could we insure another Ottobuoni.

Among the rest there are a sharpening set,
That pray for us, and yet against us bet.
Sure Heav'n itself is at a loss to know
If these would have their pray'rs be heard,
or no:

For in great stakes, we piously suppose,
Men pray but very faintly they may lose.
Leave off these wagers; for, in conscience
speaking,

The city needs not your new tricks for breaking:

And if you gallants lose, to all appearing,
You'll want an equipage for volunteering;
While thus, no spark of honor left within
ye,

When you should draw the sword, you draw the guinea.

EPILOGUE

SPOKEN BY MRS. BRACEGIRDLE

I've had to-day a dozen billets-doux
From fops, and wits, and cits, and Bow Street beaux;

Some from Whitehall, but from the Temple
more:

A Covent Garden porter brought me four.
I have not yet read all; but, without feigning,
We maids can make shrewd guesses at your meaning.

What if, to shew your styles, I read 'em
here?

Methinks I hear one cry: "O Lord, for-
bear!

No, madam, no; by Heav'n, that's too severe."

Well then, be safe —

But swear henceforwards to renounce all writing,

And take this solemn oath of my in-diting,

As you love ease, and hate campaigns and fighting.

Yet, faith, 't is just to make some few examples:

What if I shew'd you one or two for samples?

(Pulls one out.) Here's one desires my ladyship to meet

At the kind couch above in Bridges Street.
O sharpening knave! that would have you know what,

For a poor sneaking treat of chocolate.

(Pulls out another.) Now, in the name of luck, I'll break this open,

Because I dreamt last night I had a token:
The superscription is exceeding pretty:

To the desire of all the town and city.
Now, gallants, you must know, this precious fop

Is foreman of a haberdasher's shop:
One who devoutly cheats, demure in carriage,

And courts me to the holy bands of marriage;

But with a civil innuendo too,

My overplus of love shall be for you.

(Reads.) "Madam, I swear your looks are so divine,

When I set up, your face shall be my sign:
Tho' times are hard, to shew how I adore you,
Here's my whole heart, and half a guinea
for you.

But have a care of beaux; they're false,
my honey;

And, which is worse, have not one rag of money."

See how maliciously the rogue would wrong ye!

But I know better things of some among ye.
My wisest way will be to keep the stage,

And trust to the good nature of the age;
And he that likes the music and the play

Shall be my favorite gallant to-day.

SONG OF TRIUMPH OF THE BRITONS

"COME if you dare," our trumpets sound;
"Come if you dare," the foes rebound:

"We come, we come, we come, we come,"
Says the double, double, double beat of the thund'ring drum.

Now they charge on amain,
Now they rally again:
The gods from above the mad labor be-
hold,
And pity mankind that will perish for
gold.

The fainting Saxons quit their ground;
Their trumpets languish in the sound; 10
They fly, they fly, they fly, they fly:
"Victoria, Victoria!" the bold Britons cry.

Now the victory's won,
To the plunder we run:
We return to our lasses like fortunate traders,
Triumphant with spoils of the vanquish'd invaders.

II

SONG

Man sings. O SIGHT, the mother of desires,
What charming objects dost thou yield!
'Tis sweet, when tedious night expires,
To see the rosy morning gild
The mountain-tops, and paint the field!
But when Clorinda comes in sight,
She makes the summer's day more bright;
And when she goes away, 'tis night.
Chorus. When fair Clorinda comes in sight, &c.

Woman sings. 'Tis sweet the blushing morn to view; 10
And plains adorn'd with pearly dew;
But such cheap delights to see,
Heaven and nature
Give each creature;
They have eyes, as well as we;
This is the joy, all joys above,
To see, to see,
That only she,
That only she we love! 19
Chorus. This is the joy, all joys above, &c.

Man sings. And, if we may discover,
What charms both nymph and lover,
'Tis when the fair at mercy lies,

With kind and amorous anguish,
To sigh, to look, to languish,
On each other's eyes.

Chorus of all men and wo- } And, if we may discover, &c.
men.

III

SONG

I

How happy the lover,
How easy his chain,
How pleasing his pain,
How sweet to discover,
He sighs not in vain!
For love every creature
Is form'd by his nature;
No joys are above
The pleasures of love.

II

In vain are our graces, 10
In vain are your eyes,
If love you despise;
When age furrows faces,
'Tis time to be wise.
Then use the short blessing
That flies in possessing:
No joys are above
The pleasures of love.

HARVEST SONG

Comus. YOUR hay it is mow'd, and your corn is reap'd;
Your barns will be full, and your hovels
heap'd:
Come, my boys, come;
Come, my boys, come;
And merrily roar out harvest-home;
Harvest-home,
Harvest-home;
And merrily roar out harvest-home.
Chorus. Come, my boys, come, &c.

First Man. We ha' cheated the parson,
we'll cheat him again, 10
For why should a blockhead ha' one in ten?
One in ten,
One in ten;
For why should a blockhead ha' one in ten?
Chorus. One in ten,
One in ten;
For why should a blockhead ha' one in ten?

Second Man. For prating so long like a book-learn'd sot,
 Till pudding and dumplin burn to pot;
 Burn to pot, 20
 Burn to pot;
 Till pudding and dumplin burn to pot.
Chorus. Burn to pot, &c.

Third Man. We'll toss off our ale till we canno' stand,
 And hoigh for the honor of old England;
 Old England,
 Old England;
 And hoigh for the honor of old Eng-
 land.
Chorus. Old England, &c.

SONG SUNG BY VENUS IN HONOR OF BRITANNIA

I

FAIREST isle, all isles excelling,
 Seat of pleasures and of loves;
 Venus here will choose her dwelling,
 And forsake her Cyprian groves.

II

Cupid from his fav'rite nation Care and envy will remove;
 Jealousy, that poisons passion,
 And despair, that dies for love.

III

Gentle murmurs, sweet complaining,
 Sighs that blow the fire of love; 10
 Soft repulses, kind disdaining, Shall be all the pains you prove.

IV

Every swain shall pay his duty,
 Grateful every nymph shall prove;
 And as these excel in beauty,
 Those shall be renown'd for love.

VI

SONG

I

She. You say 't is love creates the pain
 Of which so sadly you complain,
 And yet would fain engage my heart
 In that uneasy cruel part:

But how, alas, think you that I
 Can bear the wound of which you die?

II

He. 'T is not my passion makes my care,
 But your indiff'rence gives despair;
 The lusty sun begets no spring,
 Till gentle show'rs assistance bring: 10
 So love that scorches and destroys,
 Till kindness aids, can cause no joys.

III

She. Love has a thousand ways to please,
 But more to rob us of our ease:
 For wakeful nights and careful days
 Some hours of pleasure he repays;
 But absence soon, or jealous fears,
 O'erflow the joys with floods of tears.

IV

He. By vain and senseless forms betray'd, Harmless love's th' offender made, 20
 While we no other pains endure,
 Than those that we ourselves procure:
 But one soft moment makes amends
 For all the torment that attends.

V

Chorus of Both. Let us love, let us love,
 and to happiness haste;
 Age and wisdom come too fast:
 Youth for loving was design'd.
He alone. I'll be constant, you be kind.
She alone. You be constant, I'll be kind.
Both. Heav'n can give no greater blessing
 Than faithful love, and kind possessing. 31

AN EPITAPH ON THE LADY WHITMORE

[These lines were written in honor of Frances, fourth daughter of Sir William Brooke (alias Cobham) and sister of the second wife of Sir John Denham, the poet. The lady married, first (before May, 1665), Sir Thomas Whitmore of Bridgenorth and Buddwas, who died in 1682; and, second, Matthew Harvey, Esq., of Twickenham, who died in 1693: she herself died in 1690. (See G. E. C.: Complete Peerage of England, etc., ii, 320, 321.) The Reverend Henry P. Prosser, vicar of Twickenham, writes to the present editor as follows:

"There is in the lobby of our church a massive monument, a pedestal with an urn upon it. On one side of the base it is thus inscribed, Here lyeth ye Body of Matthew Harvie Esq^r, he dyed ye 14th of Janu^r, 1693. On the opposite side to this inscription are Dryden's lines to Lady Whitmore, whose name does not occur on the monument at all."

Dryden's verses were first printed in Examen Poeticum, 1693. The text is essentially the same as that on the monument.]

FAIR, kind, and true, a treasure each alone;
A wife, a mistress, and a friend in one;
Rest in this tomb, rais'd at thy husband's
cost,
Here sadly summing what he had, and lost.
Come, virgins, ere in equal bands you
join,
Come first, and offer at her sacred shrine;
Pray but for half the virtues of this wife,
Compound for all the rest with longer life;
And wish your vows like hers may be re-
turn'd,
So lov'd when living, and when dead so
mourn'd.

EPITAPH ON THE POET'S NEPHEW, ERASMUS LAWTON

[On a mural tablet in the church of Great Catworth, Huntingdonshire, there is the following inscription. The date of the verses contained in it cannot be determined: they are placed here for convenience.]

THE LADY'S SONG

[This song is printed, with title, The Lady's Song, by Mr. Dryden, in Poetical Miscellanies, the Fifth Part, 1704, from which the present text is taken. It also appears, with the heading, The Beautiful Lady of the May, written by Mr. Dryden in the year 1691, in a volume of Miscellaneous Works, written by his Grace, George, late Duke of Buckingham . . . the second edition . . . printed for S. Briscoe, 1704, to which is added a collection of State Poems . . . by several Hands. The song obviously refers to the banishment of James II and his queen.]

I

A CHOIR of bright beauties in spring did
appear,
To choose a May-lady to govern the year;
All the nymphs were in white, and the shepherds in green;
The garland was giv'n, and Phyllis was queen:
But Phyllis refus'd it, and sighing did say:
"I'll not wear a garland while Pan is
away."

II

While Pan and fair Syrinx are fled from our shore,
The Graces are banish'd, and Love is no
more:
The soft god of pleasure, that warm'd our desires,
Has broken his bow, and extinguish'd his
fires;
And vows that himself and his mother will
mourn,
Till Pan and fair Syrinx in triumph return.

III

Forbear your addresses, and court us no
more,
For we will perform what the deity swore;
But if you dare think of deserving our
charms,
Away with your sheephooks, and take to your arms:
Then laurels and myrtles your brows shall
adorn,
When Pan, and his son, and fair Syrinx
return.

EPITAPH ON JOHN GRAHAM OF CLAVERHOUSE, VISCOUNT DUNDEE

[John Graham of Claverhouse, created Viscount Dundee in 1688, perhaps the most famous of the Scotch Jacobite leaders, was killed at the battle of Killiecrankie, July 17, 1689. In his honor Dr. Archibald Pitcairne, a noted physician and Latin poet, composed the following epitaph, which is printed, together with the free translation by Dryden given below, in Poems on Affairs of State, vol. iii, 1704.

Ultime Scotorum, potuit quo sospite solo
Libertas patriæ salva fuisse tunc :
Te moriente novos accepit Scotia cives,
Accipitque novos te moriente deos.
Illa nequit superesse tibi, tu non potes illi,
Ergo Calidonis nomen inane vale ;
Tuque vale nostræ gentis fortissime duxor,
Optime Scotorum atque ultime Grahme vale.

Dryden's lines are also printed, in an inferior text, under the title, Upon the Death of the Earl of Dundee, in Poetical Miscellanies, the Fifth Part, 1704. The date of composition is unknown. It seems appropriate to print this Jacobite epitaph immediately after The Lady's Song.]

O LAST and best of Scots ! who didst maintain

Thy country's freedom from a foreign reign ;
New people fill the land now thou art gone,
New gods the temples, and new kings the throne.

Scotland and thou did each in other live ;
Thou wouldst not her, nor could she thee survive.

Farewell, who living didst support the State,
And couldst not fall but with thy country's fate.

ELEONORA

A PANEGYRICAL POEM DEDICATED TO THE MEMORY OF THE LATE COUNTESS OF ABINGDON

— *Superas evadere ad auras,
Hoc opus, hic labor est. Pauci, quos æquus amat it Supplex, aut ardens exivit ad æthera virtus, Dis geniti potuere.*

VIRGIL, Æneid, vi, 128-131.

[The following poem was written in memory of Eleonora, Countess of Abingdon, who died on May 31, 1691. Dryden, as he tells us in his dedication, was requested by the Earl of Abingdon, with whom he was not personally acquainted, to write an elegy upon his deceased wife, whom the poet had never seen. Eleonora was first published in March, 1692 (see reference to the London Gazette in Scott-Saintsbury edition, xviii, 296), and was not reprinted until it was included in the folio Poems and Translations, 1701.]

THE EARL OF ABINGDON, &c.

MY LORD,

THE commands with which you honor'd me some months ago are now perform'd : they had been sooner ; but betwixt ill health, some business, and many troubles, I was forc'd to defer them till this time. Ovid, going to his banishment, and writing from on shipboard to his friends, excus'd the faults of his poetry by his misfortunes ; and told them that good verses never flow but from a serene and compos'd spirit. Wit, which is a kind of Mercury, with wings fasten'd to his head and heels, can fly but slowly in a damp air. I therefore chose rather to obey you late than ill : if at least I am capable of writing anything, at any time, which is worthy your perusal and your patronage. I cannot say that I have escap'd from a shipwreck ; but have only gain'd a rock by hard swimming, where I may pant a while and gather breath ; for the doctors give me a sad assurance, that my disease never took its leave of any man, but with a purpose to return. However, my Lord, I have laid hold on the interval, and menag'd the small stock which age has left me, to the best advantage, in performing this inconsiderable service to my Lady's memory. We, who are priests of Apollo, have not the inspiration when we please ; but must wait till the god comes rushing on us, and invades us with a fury which we are not able to resist: which gives us double strength while the fit continues, and leaves us languishing and spent, at its departure. Let me not seem to boast, my Lord, for I have really felt it on this occasion, and prophesied beyond my natural power. Let me add, and hope to be believ'd, that the excellency of the subject contributed much to the happiness of the execution; and that the weight of thirty years was taken off me, while I was writing. I swam with the tide, and the water under me was buoyant. The reader will easily observe, that I was transported by the multitude and variety of my similitudes; which are generally the product of a luxuriant fancy, and the wantonness of wit. Had I call'd in my judgment to my assistance, I had certainly retrench'd many of them. But I defend them not; let them pass for beautiful faults amongst the better sort of critics: for the whole poem, tho' written in that which they call heroic verse, is of the Pindaric nature, as well in the thought as the expression; and, as such, requires the same grains of allowance for it. It was intended, as your Lordship sees in the title, not for an elegy, but a panegyric: a kind of apotheosis, indeed, if a heathen word may be applied to a Christian use. And on all occasions of praise, if we take the ancients for our patterns, we are bound by prescription to employ the magnificence of words, and the force of figures, to adorn the sublimity of thoughts. Isocrates amongst the Grecian orators, and Cicero, and the younger Pliny, amongst the Romans, have left us their precedents for our security: for I think I need not mention the inimitable Pindar, who stretches on these pinions out of sight, and is carried upward, as it were, into another world.

This, at least, my Lord, I may justly plead, that, if I have not perform'd so well as I think I have, yet I have us'd my best endeavors to excel myself. One disadvantage I have had; which is, never to have known or seen my Lady; and to draw the lineaments of her mind, from the description which I have receiv'd from others, is for a painter to set himself at work without the living original before him: which, the more beautiful it is, will be so much the more difficult for him to conceive, when he has only a relation given him of such and such features by an acquaintance or a friend, without the nice touches which give the best resemblance and make the graces of the picture. Every artist is apt enough to flatter himself (and I amongst the rest) that their own ocular observations would have discover'd more perfections, at least others, than have been deliver'd to them: tho' I have receiv'd mine from the best hands, that is, from persons who neither want a just understanding of my Lady's worth nor a due veneration for her memory.

Doctor Donne, the greatest wit, tho' not the greatest poet of our nation, acknowledges, that he had never seen Mrs. Drury, whom he has made immortal in his admirable Anniversaries. I have had the same fortune, tho' I have not succeeded to the same genius. However, I have follow'd his footsteps in the design of his panegyric; which was to raise an emulation in the living, to copy out the example of the dead. And therefore it was, that I once intended to have call'd this poem The Pattern: and tho', on a second consideration, I chang'd the title into the name of that illustrious person, yet the design continues, and Eleonora is still the pattern of charity, devotion, and humility; of the best wife, the best mother, and the best of friends.

And now, my Lord, tho' I have endeavor'd to answer your commands, yet I could not answer it to the world, nor to my conscience, if I gave not your Lordship my testimony of being the best husband now living: I say my testimony only; for the praise of it is given you by yourself. They who despise the rules of virtue both in their practice and their morals, will think this a very trivial commendation. But I think it the peculiar happiness of the Countess of Abingdon, to have been so truly lov'd by you, while she was living, and so gratefully honor'd after she was dead. Few there are who have either had, or could have, such a loss; and yet fewer who carried their love and constancy beyond the grave. The exteriors of mourning, a decent funeral, and black habits, are the usual stints of common husbands; and perhaps their wives deserve no better than to be mourn'd with hypocrisy, and forgot with ease. But you have distinguish'd yourself from ordinary lovers, by a real and lasting grief for the deceas'd; and by endeavoring to raise for her the most durable monument, which is that of verse. And so it would have prov'd, if the workman had been equal to the work, and your choice of the artificer as happy as your design. Yet as Phidias, when he had made the statue of Minerva, could not forbear to engrave his own name, as author of the piece: so give me leave to hope that, by subscribing mine to this poem, I may live by the goddess, and transmit my name to posterity by the memory of hers. 'Tis no flattery to assure your Lordship that she is remember'd, in the present age, by all who have had the honor of her conversation and acquaintance; and that I have never been in any company since the news of her death was first brought me, where they have not extoll'd her virtues, and even spoken the same things of her in prose, which I have done in verse.

I therefore think myself oblig'd to thank your Lordship for the commission which you have given me: how I have acquitted myself of it, must be left to the opinion of the world, in spite of any protestation which I can enter against the present age, as incompetent or corrupt judges. For my comfort, they are but Englishmen, and, as such, if they think ill of me to-day, they are inconstant enough to think well of me to-morrow. And, after all, I have not much to thank my fortune that I was born amongst them. The good of both sexes are so few, in England, that they stand like exceptions against general rules: and tho' one of them has deserv'd a greater commendation than I could give her, they have taken care that I should not tire my pen with frequent exercise on the like subjects; that praises, like taxes, should be appropriated, and left almost as individual as the person. They say, my talent is satire: if it be so, 't is a fruitful age, and there is an extraordinary crop to gather. But a single hand is insufficient for such a harvest: they have sown the dragon's teeth themselves, and 't is but just they should reap each other in lampoons. You, my Lord, who have the character of honor, tho' 't is not my happiness to know you, may stand aside, with the small remainders of the English nobility, truly such, and, unhurt yourselves, behold the mad combat. If I have pleas'd you, and some few others, I have obtain'd my end. You see I have disabled myself, like an elected Speaker of the House; yet like him I have undertaken the charge, and find the burden sufficiently recompens'd by the honor. Be pleas'd to accept of these my unworthy labors, this paper monument; and let her pious memory, which I am sure is sacred to you, not only plead the pardon of my many faults, but gain me your protection, which is ambitiously sought by,

My Lord,
Your Lordship's
Most Obedient Servant,
JOHN DRYDEN.

ELEANORA

As, when some great and gracious monarch dies,
Soft whispers, first, and mourn- The introduc-ful murmurs rise tion.
Among the sad attendants; then the sound
Soon gathers voice, and spreads the news
around Thro' town and country, till the dreadful blast
Is blown to distant colonies at last;

Who, then, perhaps, were offering vows in vain,

For his long life, and for his happy reign:
So slowly, by degrees, unwilling fame
Did matchless Eleonora's fate proclaim, ¹⁰
Till public as the loss the news became. }

The nation felt it in th' extremest parts,
With eyes o'erflowing, and with bleeding
hearts;

But most the poor, whom daily Of her charity.
she supplied,

Beginning to be such, but when she died.
For, while she liv'd, they slept in peace by
night,

Secure of bread, as of returning light;
And with such firm dependence on the day,
That need grew pamp'rd, and forgot to
pray:

So sure the dole, so ready at their call, ²⁰
They stood prepar'd to see the manna fall.

Such multitudes she fed, she cloth'd, she
nurs'd,

That she herself might fear her wanting
first.

Of her five talents, other five she made;
Heav'n, that had largely giv'n, was largely
paid:

And in few lives, in wondrous few, we find
A fortune better fitted to the mind.

Nor did her alms from ostentation fall,
Or proud desire of praise; the soul gave
all:

Unbrib'd it gave; or, if a bribe appear, ³⁰
No less than heav'n, to heap huge treasures there.

Want pass'd for merit at her open door:
Heav'n saw, he safely might increase his
poor,

And trust their sustenance with her so
well,

As not to be at charge of miracle.
None could be needy, whom she saw, or
knew;

All in the compass of her sphere she drew:
He, who could touch her garment, was as sure,

As the first Christians of th' apostles' cure.
The distant heard, by fame, her pious deeds, ⁴⁰

And laid her up for their extremest needs;
A future cordial for a fainting mind;

For, what was ne'er refus'd, all hop'd to
find,

Each in his turn: the rich might freely
come,

As to a friend; but to the poor, 't was home.
 As to some holy house th' afflicted came,
 The hunger-starv'd, the naked and the lame;
 Want and diseases fled before her name.
 For zeal like hers her servants were too slow;
 She was the first, where need requir'd,
 to go; ⁵⁰
 Herself the foundress and attendant too.

Sure she had guests sometimes to entertain,
 Guests in disguise, of her great Master's train.

Her Lord himself might come, for aught we know,

Since in a servant's form he liv'd below:
 Beneath her roof he might be pleas'd to stay;

Or some benighted angel, in his way,
 Might ease his wings, and, seeing heav'n appear

In its best work of mercy, think it there,
 Where all the deeds of charity and love ⁶⁰
 Were in as constant method, as above,
 All carried on; all of a piece with theirs;
 As free her alms, as diligent her cares;
 As loud her praises, and as warm her pray'rs.

Yet was she not profuse; but fear'd to waste,
 And wisely manag'd, that the ^{Of her prudent management.} stock might last;
 That all might be supplied, and she not grieve,
 When crowds appear'd, she had not to relieve:

Which to prevent, she still increas'd her store;
 Laid up, and spar'd, that she might give ⁷⁰
 the more.

So Pharaoh, or some greater king than he,
 Provided for the sev'nth necessity;
 Taught from above his magazines to frame,
 That famine was prevented ere it came.
 Thus Heav'n, tho' all-sufficient, shows a thrift

In his economy, and bounds his gift:
 Creating, for our day, one single light;
 And his reflection too supplies the night.
 Perhaps a thousand other worlds, that lie
 Remote from us, and latent in the sky, ⁸⁰
 Are lighten'd by his beams, and kindly nurs'd;

Of which our earthly dunghill is the worst.

Now, as all virtues keep the middle line,
 Yet somewhat more to one extreme incline,
 Such was her soul; abhorring avarice,
 Bounteous, but almost bounteous to a vice:
 Had she giv'n more, it had profusion been,
 And turn'd th' excess of goodness into sin.

These virtues rais'd her fabric to the sky;
 For that, which is next heav'n, ^{Of her humility.} is charity.

But, as high turrets, for their airy steep, ⁹⁰
 Require foundations, in proportion deep;
 And lofty cedars as far upward shoot,
 As to the nether heav'ns they drive the root:

So low did her secure foundation lie,
 She was not humble, but Humility.

Scarcely she knew that she was great, or fair,

Or wise, beyond what other women are,
 Or, which is better, knew, but never durst compare.

For to be conscious of what all admire, ¹⁰⁰
 And not be vain, advances virtue high'r.
 But still she found, or rather thought she found,

Her own worth wanting, others' to abound;
 Ascrib'd above their due to ev'ry one,
 Unjust and scanty to herself alone.

Such her devotion was, as might give rules

Of speculation to disputing ^{Of her piety.}
 schools,

And teach us equally the scales to hold
 Betwixt the two extremes of hot and cold;
 That pious heat may mod'rately prevail, ¹¹⁰
 And we be warm'd, but not be scorcht with zeal.

Business might shorten, not disturb her pray'r;

Heav'n had the best, if not the greater share.

An active life long oraisons forbids;

Yet still she pray'd, for still she pray'd by deeds.

Her ev'ry day was Sabbath; only free
 From hours of pray'r, for hours of charity:
 Such as the Jews from servile toil releas'd,
 Where works of mercy were a part of rest;
 Such as blest angels exercise above, ¹²⁰
 Varied with sacred hymns and acts of love:
 Such Sabbaths as that one she now enjoys,
 Ev'n that perpetual one, which she employs (For such vicissitudes in heav'n there are)
 In praise alternate, and alternate pray'r.

All this she practis'd here; that when she sprung
 Amidst the choirs, at the first sight she
 sung:

Sung, and was sung herself in angels' lays;
 For, praising her, they did her Maker
 praise.

All offices of heav'n so well she knew, 130
 Before she came, that nothing there was
 new;

And she was so familiarly receiv'd,
 As one returning, not as one arriv'd.

Muse, down again precipitate thy flight:
 For how can mortal eyes sus- Of her various tain immortal light! virtues.

But as the sun in water we can bear,
 Yet not the sun, but his reflection there,
 So let us view her, here, in what she
 was,

And take her image in this wat'ry glass:
 Yet look not ev'ry lineament to see; 140
 Some will be cast in shades, and some will be

So lamely drawn, you'll scarcely know
 't is she.

For where such various virtues we recite,
 'T is like the Milky Way, all over bright,
 But sown so thick with stars, 't is undistinguish'd light.

Her virtue, not her virtues, let us call;
 For one heroic comprehends 'em all:

One, as a constellation is but one,
 Tho' 't is a train of stars, that, rolling on,
 Rise in their turn, and in the zodiac
 run: 150

Ever in motion; now 't is Faith ascends,
 Now Hope, now Charity, that upward
 tends,

And downwards with diffusive good descends.

As in perfumes compos'd with art and
 cost,

'T is hard to say what scent is uppermost;
 Nor this part musk or civet can we call,
 Or amber, but a rich result of all;
 So she was all a sweet, whose ev'ry part,
 In due proportion mix'd, proclaim'd the Maker's art.

No single virtue we could most commend,
 Whether the wife, the mother, or the
 friend; 161

For she was all, in that supreme degree,
 That, as no one prevail'd, so all was she.
 The sev'ral parts lay hidden in the piece;
 Th' occasion but exerted that, or this.

A wife as tender, and as true withal,
 As the first woman was before Of her conju-

Made for the man, of whom she was a
 part;

Made to attract his eyes, and keep his
 heart.

A second Eve, but by no crime accurs'd; 170
 As beauteous, not as brittle as the first.

Had she been first, still Paradise had bin,
 And death had found no entrance by her
 sin:

So she not only had preserv'd from ill
 Her sex and ours, but liv'd their pattern
 still.

Love and obedience to her lord she bore;
 She much obey'd him, but she lov'd him
 more:

Not aw'd to duty by superior sway,
 But taught by his indulgence to obey.
 Thus we love God, as author of our good;
 So subjects love just kings, or so they should. 181

Nor was it with ingratitude return'd;
 In equal fires the blissful couple burn'd;
 One joy possess'd 'em both, and in one grief they mourn'd.

His passion still improv'd; he lov'd so
 fast,

As if he fear'd each day would be her last:
 Too true a prophet to foresee the fate
 That should so soon divide their happy
 state;

When he to heav'n entirely must restore That love, that heart, where he went halves before. 190

Yet as the soul is all in ev'ry part,
 So God and he might each have all her
 heart.

So had her children too; for Charity
 Was not more fruitful, or more kind than she:

Each under other by degrees Of her love they grew; to her children.

A goodly perspective of distant view.
 Anchises look'd not with so pleas'd a face,
 In numb'ring o'er his future Roman race,
 And marshaling the heroes of his name,
 As, in their order, next to light they came:
 Nor Cybele with half so kind an eye 201 Survey'd her sons and daughters of the
 sky —

Proud, shall I say, of her immortal fruit?
 As far as pride with heav'nly minds may suit.

Her pious love excell'd to all she bore;
New objects only multiplied it
more.

And as the chosen found the <sup>Her care of their education.</sup> pearly grain

As much as ev'ry vessel could contain;
As in the blissful vision each shall share
As much of glory as his soul can bear;
So did she love, and so dispense her care. ²¹¹

Her eldest thus, by consequence, was best,
As longer cultivated than the rest.
The babe had all that infant care beguiles,
And early knew his mother in her smiles:
But when dilated organs let in day
To the young soul, and gave it room to
play,

At his first aptness, the maternal love
Those rudiments of reason did improve.
The tender age was pliant to command;
Like wax it yielded to the forming hand:
True to th' artificer, the labor'd mind ²²²
With ease was pious, generous, just, and
kind;

Soft for impression from the first, prepar'd,
Till virtue with long exercise grew hard:
With ev'ry act confirm'd, and made at last
So durable as not to be effac'd,
It turn'd to habit; and, from vices free,
Goodness resolv'd into necessity.

Thus fix'd she Virtue's image, that's her own, ²³⁰
Till the whole mother in the children shone;
For that was their perfection: she was such,
They never could express her mind too
much.

So unexhausted her perfections were,
That, for more children, she had more to
spare;

For souls unborn, whom her untimely death
Depriv'd of bodies, and of mortal breath;
And (could they take th' impressions of her
mind)

Enough still left to sanctify her kind. ²³⁹

Then wonder not to see this soul extend
The bounds, and seek some <sup>Of her friendship.</sup>
other self, a friend.

As swelling seas to gentle rivers glide,
To seek repose, and empty out the tide;
So this full soul, in narrow limits pent,
Unable to contain her, sought a vent,
To issue out, and in some friendly breast
Discharge her treasures, and securely rest:
T' unbosom all the secrets of her heart,
Take good advice, but better to impart.

For 'tis the bliss of friendship's holy state, ²⁵⁰
To mix their minds, and to communicate;
Tho' bodies cannot, souls can penetrate. }
Fix'd to her choice, inviolably true,
And wisely choosing, for she chose but few:
Some she must have; but in no one could
find

A tally fitted for so large a mind.

The souls of friends like kings in progress are;

Still in their own, tho' from the palace
far:

Thus her friend's heart her country dwelling was,

A sweet retirement to a coarser place; ²⁶⁰
Where pomp and ceremonies enter'd not,
Where greatness was shut out, and bus'ness well forgot.

This is th' imperfect draught; but } short as far

As the true height and bigness of a star
Exceeds the measures of th' astronomer. }

She shines above, we know; but in what
place,

How near the throne, and Heav'n's imperial
face,

By our weak optics is but vainly guess'd;
Distance and altitude conceal the rest. ²⁶⁹

Tho' all these rare endowments of the
mind

Were in a narrow space of life <sup>Reflections on the shortness of her life.</sup> confin'd,

The figure was with full perfection crown'd;

Tho' not so large an orb, as truly round.

As when in glory, thro' the public place,
The spoils of conquer'd nations were to
pass,

And but one day for triumph was allow'd,
The consul was constrain'd his pomp to
crowd;

And so the swift procession hurried on,
That all, tho' not distinctly, might be
shown:

So, in the straiten'd bounds of life confin'd, ²⁸⁰

She gave but glimpses of her glorious mind;
And multitudes of virtues pass'd along,
Each pressing foremost in the mighty
throng,

Ambitious to be seen, and then make room
For greater multitudes that were to come.

Yet unemploy'd no minute slipp'd away;
Moments were precious in so short a stay.

The haste of heav'n to have her was so great,
 That some were single acts, tho' each complete;
 But ev'ry act stood ready to repeat. ²⁹⁰

Her fellow-saints with busy care will look
 For her blest name in fate's eternal book;
 And, pleas'd to be outdone, with joy will
 see

Numberless virtues, endless charity:
 But more will wonder at so short an age,
 To find a blank beyond the thirtieth page;
 And with a pious fear begin to doubt

She died in her thirty-third year.

The piece imperfect, and the rest torn out.

But 't was her Savior's time; and, could there be

A copy near th' original, 't was she. ³⁰⁰
 As precious gums are not for lasting
 fire —

They but perfume the temple, and expire:
 So was she soon exhal'd, and vanish'd hence;
 A short sweet odor, of a vast expense.
 She vanish'd, we can scarcely say she died;
 For but a now did heav'n and earth divide:
 She pass'd serenely with a single breath;
 This moment perfect health, the next was
 death.

One sigh did her eternal bliss The manner of assure; her death.

So little penance needs, when souls are almost pure. ³¹⁰

As gentle dreams our waking thoughts
 pursue;

Or, one dream pass'd, we slide into a new;
 So close they follow, such wild order keep,
 We think ourselves awake, and are asleep:
 So softly death succeeded life in her:

She did but dream of heav'n, and she was
 there.

No pains she suffer'd, nor expir'd with
 noise;

Her soul was whisper'd out with God's still
 voice;

As an old friend is beckon'd to a feast,
 And treated like a long familiar guest. ³²⁰
 He took her as he found, but found her so,
 As one in hourly readiness to Her prepared-go: ness to die.

Ev'n on that day, in all her trim prepar'd;
 As early notice she from heav'n had heard,
 And some descending courtier from above
 Had giv'n her timely warning to remove;
 Or counsel'd her to dress the nuptial room,

For on that night the bridegroom was to
 come.

He kept his hour, and found her where she lay ³²⁹

Cloth'd all in white, the liv'ry of the

 or word, or act;

Unless omissions were to pass for fact;
 That hardly death a consequence could draw,
 To make her liable to nature's law.

And, that she died, we only have to show
 The mortal part of her she left below;

The rest (so smooth, so suddenly she went)

Look'd like translation thro' the firma-
 ment,

Or like the fiery car on the third errand sent. ³³⁹

O happy soul! if thou canst view from

Where thou art all intelligence, *Apostrophe

 all eye,

If looking up to God, or down to us,
 Thou find'st that any way be pervious,
 Survey the ruins of thy house, and see
 Thy widow'd, and thy orphan family:

Look on thy tender pledges left behind;
 And, if thou canst a vacant minute find
 From heav'nly joys, that interval afford

To thy sad children, and thy mourning lord.
 See how they grieve, mistaken in their love, ³⁵⁰

And shed a beam of comfort from above;
 Give 'em, as much as mortal eyes can bear,

A transient view of thy full glories there;
 That they with mod'rate sorrow may sus-
 tain

And mollify their losses in thy gain.
 Or else divide the grief; for such thou wert,

That should not all relations bear a part,
 It were enough to break a single heart.

Let this suffice: nor thou, great saint,

 gar Muse;

Who, not by cares, or wants, or age de-press'd, ³⁶¹

Stems a wild deluge with a dauntless
 breast;

And dares to sing thy praises in a clime
 Where vice triumphs, and virtue is a crime;

Where ev'n to draw the picture of thy
 mind

Is satire on the most of humankind:
Take it, while yet 'tis praise; before my
rage,

Unsafely just, break loose on this bad age;
So bad, that thou thyself hadst no defense
From vice, but barely by departing hence.

Be what, and where thou art: to wish thy place

371

Were, in the best, presumption more than
grace.

Thy relics (such thy works of mercy are)
Have, in this poem, been my holy care.
As earth thy body keeps, thy soul the sky,
So shall this verse preserve thy memory:
For thou shalt make it live, because it sings of thee.

ON THE DEATH OF A VERY YOUNG GENTLEMAN

[This elegy was first printed in Poetical Miscellanies, the Fifth Part, 1704. Christie infers, because of the resemblance of certain lines in this poem to passages in Eleonora (see notes), that the two pieces were written at about the same time.]

HE who could view the book of destiny,
And read whatever there was writ of thee,
O charming youth, in the first op'ning page,
So many graces in so green an age,
Such wit, such modesty, such strength of
mind,

A soul at once so manly, and so kind;
Would wonder, when he turn'd the volume
o'er,

And after some few leaves should find no
more,

Naught but a blank remain, a dead void
space,

A step of life that promis'd such a race. 10
We must not, dare not think, that Heav'n began

A child, and could not finish him a man;
Reflecting what a mighty store was laid
Of rich materials, and a model made;
The cost already furnish'd; so bestow'd,
As more was never to one soul allow'd:
Yet after this profusion spent in vain,
Nothing but mold'ring ashes to remain.
I guess not, lest I split upon the shelf,
Yet durst I guess, Heav'n kept it for himself;

20

And giving us the use, did soon recall,
Ere we could spare, the mighty principal.

Thus then he disappear'd, was rarified;
For 't is improper speech to say he died:
He was exhal'd; his great Creator drew
His spirit, as the sun the morning dew.
'T is sin produces death; and he had none,
But the taint Adam left on ev'ry son.
He added not, he was so pure, so good,

'T was but th' original forfeit of his blood; 30
And that so little, that the river ran
More clear than the corrupted fount began.
Nothing remain'd of the first muddy clay;
The length of course had wash'd it in the
way:

So deep, and yet so clear, we might behold
The gravel bottom, and that bottom gold.

As such we lov'd, admir'd, almost ador'd,
Gave all the tribute mortals could afford.
Perhaps we gave so much, the pow'rs above
Grew angry at our superstitious love; 40
For when we more than human homage pay,
The charming cause is justly snatch'd away.

Thus was the crime not his, but ours }
alone;

And yet we murmur that he went so soon, }
Tho' miracles are short and rarely shown. }

Hear then, ye mournful parents, and divide

That love in many, which in one was tied.
That individual blessing is no more,
But multiplied in your remaining store.
The flame's dispers'd, but does not all expire; 50

The sparkles blaze, tho' not the globe of
fire.

Love him by parts, in all your num'rous race,
And from those parts form one collected
grace;

Then, when you have refin'd to that degree,
Imagine all in one, and think that one is he.

ON THE DEATH OF AMYNTAS

A PASTORAL ELEGY

[Nothing is known of the date or occasion of the following poem, which was first published in Poetical Miscellanies, the Fifth Part, 1704. It seems convenient to place it here, after another elegy, first printed in the same collection.]

'T WAS on a joyless and a gloomy morn, Wet was the grass, and hung with pearls
 the thorn;
 When Damon, who design'd to pass the day
 With hounds and horns, and chase the flying prey,
 Rose early from his bed; but soon he }
 found
 The welkin pitch'd with sullen clouds }
 around,
 An eastern wind, and dew upon the ground. }
 Thus while he stood, and sighing did survey
 The fields, and curs'd th' ill omens of the
 day,
 He saw Menalcas come with heavy pace; 10
 Wet were his eyes, and cheerless was his
 face:
 He wrung his hands, distracted with his
 care,
 And sent his voice before him from afar.
 "Return," he cried, "return, unhappy
 swain,
 The spongy clouds are fill'd with gath'ring
 rain;
 The promise of the day not only cross'd,
 But ev'n the spring, the spring itself is
 lost.
 Amyntas — O!" — he could not speak the
 rest,
 Nor needed, for presaging Damon guess'd.
 Equal with Heav'n young Damon lov'd the boy, 20
 The boast of nature, both his parents'
 joy.
 His graceful form revolving in his mind;
 So great a genius, and a soul so kind,
 Gave sad assurance that his fears were true;
 Too well the envy of the gods he knew:
 For when their gifts too lavishly are plac'd,
 Soon they repent, and will not make them
 last.
 For, sure, it was too bountiful a dole,
 The mother's features, and the father's
 soul.
 Then thus he cried: "The Morn bespoke
 the news; 30
 The Morning did her cheerful light dif-
 fuse;
 But see how suddenly she chang'd her
 face,
 And brought on clouds and rain, the day's disgrace:
 Just such, Amyntas, was thy promis'd
 race!

What charms adorn'd thy youth, where nature smil'd,
 And more than man was giv'n us in a child!
 His infancy was ripe; a soul sublime
 In years so tender that prevented time:
 Heav'n gave him all at once; then }
 snatch'd away,
 Ere mortals all his beauties could survey, 40
 Just like the flow'r that buds and withers in a day."

MENALCAS

The mother, lovely, tho' with grief op-
 press'd,
 Reclin'd his dying head upon her breast.
 The mournful family stood all around; }
 One groan was heard, one universal
 sound:
 All were in floods of tears and endless sorrow drown'd.
 So dire a sadness sate on ev'ry look,
 Ev'n Death repented he had giv'n the stroke.
 He griev'd his fatal work had been or-
 dain'd,
 But promis'd length of life to those who yet remain'd. 50
 The mother's and her eldest daughter's
 grace,
 It seems, had brib'd him to prolong their
 space.
 The father bore it with undaunted soul,
 Like one who durst his destiny control;
 Yet with becoming grief he bore his part,
 Resign'd his son, but not resign'd his heart:
 Patient as Job; and may he live to see,
 Like him, a new increasing family!

DAMON

Such is my wish, and such my prophecy, }
 For yet, my friend, the beauteous mold remains; 60
 Long may she exercise her fruitful pains!
 But, ah! with better hap, and bring a race
 More lasting, and endued with equal grace!
 Equal she may, but farther none can go;
 For he was all that was exact below.

MENALCAS

Damon, behold yon breaking purple cloud;
 Hear'st thou not hymns and songs divinely loud?
 There mounts Amyntas; the young cherubs
 play

About their godlike mate, and sing him on his way.

He cleaves the liquid air, behold, he flies, 70
And every moment gains upon the skies.

The new-come guest admires th' ethereal
state,

The sapphire portal, and the golden gate;
And now admitted in the shining throng,
He shows the passport which he brought along.

His passport is his innocence and grace,
Well known to all the natives of the place.
Now sing, ye joyful angels, and admire
Your brother's voice that comes to mend your choir:

Sing you, while endless tears our eyes bestow; 80

TO MR. SOUTHERNE. ON HIS COMEDY CALL'D THE WIVES' EXCUSE

[After The Loyal Brother and The Disappointment (see pp. 122, 171, above), Southerne brought out Sir Anthony Love, or The Rambling Lady (1691) and The Wives' Excuse, or Cuckolds Make Themselves (1692). This last play had poor success on the stage. When it was published, early in 1692 — it is entered in the Term Catalogue for Hilary Term (February) — Dryden prefixed to it the following poem; and in his Epistle Dedicatory Southerne boasts as follows:

"If Mr. Dryden's judgment goes for anything, I have it on my side: for, speaking of this play, he has publicly said, the town was kind to Sir Anthony Love, I needed 'em only to be just to this; and to prove there was more than friendship in his opinion, upon the credit of this play with him, falling sick last summer, he bequeathed to my care the writing of half the last act of his tragedy of Cleomenes, which, when it comes into the world, you will find to be so considerable a trust, that all the town will pardon me for defending this play, that preferred me to it. If modesty be sometimes a weakness, what I say can hardly be a crime. In a fair English trial both parties are allowed to be heard; and, without this vanity of mentioning Mr. Dryden, I had lost the best evidence of my cause."]

SURE there's a fate in plays, and 't is in
vain

To write, while these malignant planets
reign:

Some very foolish influence rules the pit,
Not always kind to sense, or just to wit;
And whilst it lasts, let buffoonry succeed,
To make us laugh; for never was more
need.

Farce, in itself, is of a nasty scent;
But the gain smells not of the excrement.
The Spanish nymph, a wit and beauty too,
With all her charms, bore but a single
show; 10

But let a monster Muscovite appear,
He draws a crowded audience round the
year.

Maybe thou hast not pleas'd the box
and pit,
Yet those who blame thy tale commend thy wit;

So Terence plotted, but so Terence writ. }
Like his thy thoughts are true, thy language clean;

Ev'n lewdness is made moral in thy scene.
The hearers may for want of Nokes re-
pine;

But rest secure, the readers will be thine.
Nor was thy labor'd drama damn'd or hiss'd, 20

But with a kind civility dismiss'd;

With such good manners, as * The Wife in the * Wife did use, the play, Mrs.

Who, not accepting, did but Friendall.
just refuse.

There was a glance at parting; such a look,
As bids thee not give o'er, for one rebuke.
But if thou wouldst be seen, as well as
read,

Copy one living author, and one dead:
The standard of thy style let Etherege be;
For wit, th' immortal spring of Wycherley.
Learn, after both, to draw some just design, 30

And the next age will learn to copy thine.

PROLOGUE, EPILOGUE, AND SONG FROM CLEOMENES, THE SPARTAN HERO

[This tragedy, written by Dryden with some aid from Southerne (see headnote to the preceding piece), was performed, after some opposition from the government, in May, 1692. (Malone, I, 1, 213, on the authority of Mot-teux's Gentleman's Journal.) The plot, of an exiled king seeking help in a foreign country, seemed capable of a political application. The play was first published in 1692.]

PROLOGUE

SPOKE BY MR. MOUNTFORT

I THINK, or hope at least, the coast is clear;
That none but men of wit and sense are
here;
That our Bear Garden friends are all away,
Who bounce with hands and feet, and cry:
"Play, play,"
Who, to save coach hire, trudge along the
street,
Then print our matted seats with dirty feet;
Who, while we speak, make love to orange-wenches,
And, between acts, stand strutting on the benches;
Where got a-cock-horse, making vile grimaces, 9
They to the boxes show their booby faces.
A merry-andrew such a mob will serve,
And treat 'em with such wit as they deserve.
Let 'em go people Ireland, where there's
need
Of such new planters to repair the breed;
Or to Virginia or Jamaica steer,
But have a care of some French privateer;
For, if they should become the prize of battle,
They'll take 'em, black and white, for Irish cattle.
Arise, true judges, in your own defense,
Control those foplings, and declare for sense:
For, should the fools prevail, they stop not
there, 21
But make their next descent upon the fair.
Then rise, ye fair; for it concerns you most,
That fools no longer should your favors
boast;
'Tis time you should renounce 'em, for we
find
They plead a senseless claim to womankind:
Such squires are only fit for country towns,
To stink of ale, and dust a stand with clowns;
Who, to be chosen for the land's protectors,
Tope and get drunk before their wise electors. 30
Let not farce-lovers your weak choice upbraid,
But turn 'em over to the chambermaid;
Or, if they come to see our tragic scenes,
Instruct them what a Spartan hero means:
Teach 'em how manly passions ought to
move,

For such as cannot think, can never love;
And, since they needs will judge the poet's
art,
Point 'em with fescues to each shining part.
Our author hopes in you, but still in pain;
He fears your charms will be employ'd in
vain. 40
You can make fools of wits, we find each
hour;
But to make wits of fools, is past your power.

EPILOGUE

SPOKE BY MRS. BRACEGIRDLE

THIS day the poet, bloodily inclin'd, Has made me die, full sore against my
mind!
Some of you naughty men, I fear, will cry:
"Poor rogue! would I might teach thee
how to die!"
Thanks for your love; but I sincerely say,
I never mean to die, your wicked way.
Well, since it is decreed all flesh must go,
(And I am flesh — at least for aught you
know)
I first declare, I die with pious mind,
In perfect charity with all mankind. 10
Next for my will: I have in my dispose,
Some certain movables would please you
beaux;
As, first, my youth; for, as I have been told,
Some of you modish sparks are dev'lish
old.
My chastity I need not leave among ye;
For, to suspect old fops, were much to wrong ye.
You swear y^e are sinners; but, for all your
haste,
Your misses shake their heads, and find you chaste.
I give my courage to those bold commanders
That stay with us, and dare not go to Flanders. 20
I leave my truth (to make his plot more clear)
To Mr. Fuller, when he next shall swear.
I give my judgment, craving all your mercies,
To those that leave good plays for damn'd dull farces.
My small devotion let the gallants share,
That come to ogle us at evening pray'r.

I give my person — let me well consider —
Faith, e'en to him that is the fairest bidder;
To some rich hunks, if any be so bold
To say those dreadful words, To have and hold.

But stay — to give, and be bequeathing still,
When I'm so poor, is just like Wickham's will:

Like that notorious cheat, vast sums I give,

Only that you may keep me while I live.
Buy a good bargain, gallants, while you may;
I'll cost you but your half a crown a day.

SONG

I

No, no, poor suff'ring heart, no change endeavor,

Choose to sustain the smart, rather than leave her;

My ravish'd eyes behold such charms about her,

I can die with her, but not live without her;
One tender sigh of hers to see me languish,
Will more than pay the price of my past anguish:

Beware, O cruel fair, how you smile on me,
'Twas a kind look of yours that has undone me.

II

Love has in store for me one happy minute,
And she will end my pain, who did begin it;
Then no day void of bliss, or pleasure,
leaving,

Ages shall slide away without perceiving:
Cupid shall guard the door, the more to please us,

And keep out Time and Death, when they would seize us;

Time and Death shall depart, and say, in flying,

Love has found out a way to live by dying.

EPILOGUE TO HENRY THE SECOND, KING OF ENGLAND, WITH THE DEATH OF ROSA-MOND

SPOKE BY MRS. BRACEGIRDLE

[This tragedy was published in 1693, with no author's name attached, but with an epistle

dedicatory signed Will. Mountfort. Mountfort, who was a noted actor and a minor dramatist, does not, however, claim the play as his own. Gildon, in his continuation of Langbaine's English Dramatic Poets, 1699, assigns the play to John Bancroft, a surgeon, who may have presented his work to Mountfort for revision. In Sir Plays written by Mr. Mountfort: Printed for J. Tonson, G. Strahan, and W. Mears, 1720, there occurs a preface, The Booksellers to the Reader, which concludes as follows:

"To the four pieces under his name . . . we have annexed King Edward the Third, and Henry the Second, which though not wholly composed by him, it is presumed he had, at least, a share in fitting them for the stage, otherwise it cannot be supposed he would have taken the liberty of writing dedications to them, which we hope is sufficient authority for this freedom, notwithstanding one of them * was afterwards owned by another author.

* Henry the Second, by Mr. Bancroft."

The play was probably acted in 1692; Mountfort was killed on December 9 of that year.]

THUS you the sad catastrophe have seen,
Occasion'd by a mistress and a queen.

Queen Eleanor the proud was French, they say;

But English manufacture got the day.
Jane Clifford was her name, as books aver;
Fair Rosamond was but her nom de guerre.
Now tell me, gallants, would you lead your life

With such a mistress, or with such a wife?
If one must be your choice, which d'ye approve,

The curtain lecture, or the curtain love? ¹⁰
Would ye be godly with perpetual strife,
Still drudging on with homely Joan your wife,

Or take your pleasure in a wicked way,
Like honest whoring Harry in the play?
I guess your minds: the mistress would be taking,

And nauseous matrimony sent a packing.
The devil's in ye all; mankind's a rogue;
You love the bride, but you detest the clog.
After a year, poor spouse is left i' th' lurch,

And you, like Haynes, return to Mother Church. ²⁰

Or, if the name of Church comes cross your mind,

Chapels of ease behind our scenes you find.
The playhouse is a kind of market place;

One chaffers for a voice, another for a face:
Nay, some of you, I dare not say how many,
Would buy of me a pen'worth for your penny.

Ev'n this poor face, which with my fan
I hide,
Would make a shift my portion to provide,
With some small perquisites I have beside. }

Tho' for your love, perhaps, I should not care, ³⁰

I could not hate a man that bids me fair.
What might ensue, 'tis hard for me to
tell;

But I was drench'd to-day for loving well,
And fear the poison that would make me
swell. }

TRANSLATIONS FROM JUVENAL AND PERSIUS

[In October, 1692 (see advertisement in the London Gazette, referred to in the Scott-Saintsbury edition, xviii, 290), there appeared a folio volume with title-page reading as follows:

THE SATIRES

of

Decimus Junius Juvenalis.

Translated into

ENGLISH VERSE

BY

Mr. DRYDEN,

AND

Several other Eminent Hands.

Together with the

OF

Aulus Persius Flaccus.

Made English by Mr. Dryden.

With Explanatory Notes at the end of each SATIRE.

To which is Prefix'd a Discourse concerning the Original and Progress of SATIRE. Dedicated to the Right Honourable Charles Earl of Dorset, &c. By Mr. DRYDEN.

Quicquid agunt homines, votum, timer, Ira, voluptas, Gaudia, discursus, nostri est farrago libelli.

LONDON:

Printed for Jacob Tonson at the Judge's-Head in Chancery-Lane, near Fleetstreet MDCXCIII.

The translation of Persius has a separate title-page with the motto:

Serpus in libro memoratur Persius uno Quam levis in tota Marsus Amazonide. — MART.

To it there is prefixed a complimentary poem by Congreve.

Dryden's assistants on the Juvenal were Tate (Satires ii and xv), Bowles (Satire v), Stepney (Satire viii), Hervey (Satire ix), Congreve (Satire xi), Power (Satire xii), Creech (Satire xiii), and unnamed writer (Satire iv), and his own sons, Charles and John (Satires vii and xiv respectively). A second edition of the whole work, in octavo, appeared near the close of 1696: it is entered in the Term Catalogue for Michaelmas Term (November) of that year.]

CHARLES

EARL OF DORSET AND MIDDLESEX
LORD CHAMBERLAIN OF THEIR MAJESTIES' HOUSEHOLD, KNIGHT OF THE MOST NOBLE ORDER OF THE GARTER, &C.

MY LORD,

THE wishes and desires of all good men, which have attended your Lordship from your first appearance in the world, are at length accomplish'd. in your obtaining those honors and dignities which you have so long deserv'd. There are no factions, tho' irreconcilable to one another, that are not united in their affection to you, and the respect they pay you. They are equally pleas'd in your prosperity, and would be equally concern'd in your afflictions. Titus Vespasian was not more the delight of humankind. The universal empire made him only more known, and more powerful, but could not make him more belov'd. He had greater ability of doing good, but your inclination to it is not less; and tho' you could not extend your beneficence to so many persons, yet you have lost as few days as that excellent emperor; and never had his complaint to make when you went to bed, that the sun had shone upon you in vain, when you had the opportunity of relieving some unhappy man. This, my Lord, has justly acquir'd you as many friends as there are persons who have the honor to be known to you. Mere acquaintance you have none; you have drawn them all into a nearer line; and they who have convers'd with you are for ever after inviolably yours. This is a truth so generally acknowledg'd, that it needs no proof: 't is of the nature of a first principle, which is receiv'd as soon as it is propos'd; and needs not the reformation which Descartes us'd to his; for we doubt not, neither can we properly say we think we admire and love you above all other men; there is a certainty in the proposition, and we know it. With the same assurance I can say, you neither have enemies, nor can scarce have any; for they who have never heard of you, can neither love or hate you; and they who have, can have no other notion of you, than that which they receive from the public, that you are the best of men. After this, my testimony can be of no farther use, than to declare it to be daylight at high noon; and all who have the benefit of sight, can look up as well, and see the sun.

'T is true, I have one privilege which is almost particular to myself, that I saw you in the east at your first arising above the hemisphere: I was as soon sensible as any man of that light, when it was but just shooting out, and beginning to travel upwards to the meridian. I made my early addresses to your Lordship, in my Essay of Dramatic Poetry; and therein bespoke you to the world, wherein I have the right of a first discoverer. When I was myself in the rudiments of my poetry, without name or reputation in the world, having rather the ambition of a writer, than the skill; when I was drawing the outlines of an art, without any living master to instruct me in it; an art which had been better prais'd than studied here in England, wherein Shakespeare, who created the stage among us, had rather written happily, than knowingly and justly, and Jonson, who, by studying Horace, had been acquainted with the rules, yet seem'd to envy to posterity that knowledge, and, like an inventor of some useful art, to make a monopoly of his learning; when thus, as I may say, before the use of the loadstone, or knowledge of the compass, I was sailing in a vast ocean, without other help than the polestar of the ancients, and the rules of the French stage amongst the moderns, which are extremely different from ours, by reason of their opposite taste; yet even then, I had the presumption to dedicate to your Lordship—a very unfinished piece, I must confess, and which only can be excus'd by the little experience of the author, and the modesty of the title, An Essay. Yet I was stronger in prophecy than I was in criticism; I was inspir'd to foretell you to mankind, as the restorer of poetry, the greatest genius, the truest judge, and the best patron.

Good sense and good nature are never separated, tho' the ignorant world has thought otherwise. Good nature, by which I mean beneficence and candor, is the product of right reason; which of necessity will give allowance to the failings of others, by considering that there is nothing perfect in mankind; and by distinguishing that which comes nearest to excellency, tho' not absolutely free from faults, will certainly produce a candor in the judge. 'Tis incident to an elevated understanding, like your Lordship's, to find out the errors of other men; but 'tis your prerogative to pardon them; to look with pleasure on those things, which are somewhat congenial, and of a remote kindred to your own conceptions; and to forgive the many failings of those, who, with their wretched art, cannot arrive to those heights that you possess, from a happy, abundant, and native genius: which are as inborn to you, as they were to Shakespeare; and, for aught I know, to Homer; in either of whom we find all arts and sciences, all moral and natural philosophy, without knowing that they ever studied them.

There is not an English writer this day living, who is not perfectly convinc'd that your Lordship excels all others in all the several parts of poetry which you have undertaken to adorn. The most vain, and the most ambitious of our age, have not dar'd to assume so much as the competitors of Themistocles: they have yielded the first place without dispute; and have been arrogantly content to be esteem'd as second to your Lordship; and even that also, with a longo, sed proximi intervallo. If there have been, or are any, who go farther in their self-conceit, they must be very singular in their opinion; they must be like the officer in a play, who was call'd Captain, Lieutenant, and Company. The world will easily conclude whether such unattended generals can ever be capable of making a revolution in Parnassus.

I will not attempt, in this place, to say anything particular of your lyric poems, tho' they are the delight and wonder of this age, and will be the envy of the next. The subject of this book confines me to satire; and in that, an author of your own quality (whose ashes I will not disturb) has given you all the commendation which his self-sufficiency could afford to any man:

The best good man, with the worst-natur'd Muse.

In that character, methinks, I am reading Jonson's verses to the memory of Shakespeare; an insolent, sparing, and invidious panegyric: where good nature, the most godlike commendation of a man, is only attributed to your person, and denied to your writings; for they are everywhere so full of candor, that, like Horace, you only expose the follies of men, without arraigning their vices; and in this excel him, that you add that pointedness of thought, which is visibly wanting in our great Roman. There is more of salt in all your verses than I have seen in any of the moderns, or even of the ancients; but you have been sparing of the gall, by which means you have pleas'd all readers, and offended none. Donne alone, of all our countrymen, had your talent; but was not happy enough to arrive at your versification; and were he translated into numbers, and English, he would yet be wanting in the dignity of expression. That which is the prime virtue, and chief ornament, of Virgil, which distinguishes him from the rest of writers, is so conspicuous in your verses, that it casts a shadow on all your contemporaries; we cannot be seen, or but obscurely, while you are present. You equal Donne in the variety, multiplicity, and choice of thoughts; you excel him in the manner and the words. I read you both with the same admiration, but not with the same delight. He affects the metaphysics, not only in his satires, but in his amorous verses, where nature only should reign; and perplexes the minds of the fair sex with nice speculations of philosophy, when he should ingage their hearts, and entertain them with the softnesses of love. In this (if I may be pardon'd for so bold a truth) Mr. Cowley has copied him to a fault; so great a one, in my opinion, that it throws his Mistress infinitely below his Pindarics and his latter compositions, which are undoubtedly the best of his poems, and the most correct. For my own part, I must avow it freely to the world, that I never attempted anything in satire, wherein I have not studied your writings as the most perfect model. I have continually laid them before me; and the greatest commendation which my own partiality can give to my productions, is, that they are copies, and no farther to be allow'd, than as they have something more or less of the original. Some few touches of your Lordship, some secret graces which I have endeavor'd to express after your manner, have made whole poems of mine to pass with approbation; but take your verses altogether, and they are inimitable. If therefore I have not written better, 't is because you have not written more. You have not set me sufficient copy to transcribe; and I cannot add one letter of my own invention, of which I have not the example there.

'T is a general complaint against your Lordship, and I must have leave to upbraid you with it, that, because you need not write, you will not. Mankind, that wishes you so well in all things that relate to your prosperity, have their intervals of wishing for themselves, and are within a little of grudging you the fulness of your fortune: they would be more malicious if you us'd it not so well, and with so much generosity.

Fame is in itself a real good, if we may believe Cicero, who was perhaps too fond of it; but even fame, as Virgil tells us, acquires strength by going forward. Let Epicurus give indolency as an attribute to his gods, and place in it the happiness of the blest; the divinity which we worship has given us not only a precept against it, but his own example to the contrary. The world, my Lord, would be content to allow you a seventh day for rest; or if you thought that hard upon you, we would not refuse you half your time: if you came out, like some great monarch, to take a town but once a year, as it were for your diversion, tho' you had no need to extend your territories. In short, if you were a bad, or, which is worse, an indifferent poet, we would thank you for our own quiet, and not expose you to the want of yours. But when you are so great and so successful, and when we have that necessity of your writing, that we cannot subsist in poetry without it, any more (I may almost say) than the world without the daily course of ordinary providence, methinks this argument might prevail with you, my Lord, to forego a little of your repose for the public benefit. 'T is not that you are under any force of working daily miracles, to prove your being; but now and then somewhat of extraordinary, that is, anything of your production, is requisite to refresh your character.

This, I think, my Lord, is a sufficient reproach to you; and should I carry it as far as mankind would authorise me, would be little less than satire. And, indeed, a provocation is almost necessary, in behalf of the world, that you might be induc'd sometimes to write; and in relation to a multitude of scribblers, who daily pester the world with their insufferable stuff, that they might be discourag'd from writing any more. I complain not of their lampoons and libels, tho' I have been the public mark for many years. I am vindictive enough to have repell'd force by force, if I could imagine that any of them had ever reach'd me; but they either shot at rovers, and therefore miss'd, or their powder was so weak, that I might safely stand them, at the nearest distance. I answer'd not The Rehearsal, because I knew the author sate to himself when he drew the picture, and was the very Bayes of his own farce; because also I knew that my betters were more concern'd than I was in that satire; and, lastly, because Mr. Smith and Mr. Johnson, the main pillars of it, were two such languishing gentlemen in their conversation, that I could liken them to nothing but to their own relations, those noble characters of men of wit and pleasure about the town. The like considerations have hinder'd me from dealing with the lamentable companions of their prose and doggrel. I am so far from defending my poetry against them, that I will not so much as expose theirs. And for my morals, if they are not proof against their attacks, let me be thought by posterity, what those authors would be thought, if any memory of them, or of their writings, could endure so long as to another age. But these dull makers of lampoons, as harmless as they have been to me, are yet of dangerous example to the public. Some witty men may perhaps succeed to their designs, and, mixing sense with malice, blast the reputation of the most innocent amongst men, and the most virtuous amongst women.

Heaven be prais'd, our common libelers are as free from the imputation of wit as of morality; and therefore whatever mischief they have design'd, they have perform'd but little of it. Yet these ill-writers, in all justice, ought themselves to be expos'd; as Persius has given us a fair example in his First Satire, which is level'd particularly at them; and none is so fit to correct their faults, as he who is not only clear from any in his own writings, but is also so just, that he will never defame the good; and is arm'd with the power of verse, to punish and make examples of the bad. But of this I shall have occasion to speak further, when I come to give the definition and character of true satires.

In the mean time, as a counselor bred up in the knowledge of the municipal and statute laws, may honestly inform a just prince how far his prerogative extends; so I may be allow'd to tell your Lordship, who, by an undisputed title, are the king of poets, what an extent of power you have, and how lawfully you may exercise it, over the petulant scribblers of this age. As Lord Chamberlain, I know, you are absolute by your office, in all that belongs to the decency and good manners of the stage. You can banish from thence scurrility and profaneness, and restrain the licentious insolence of poets, and their actors, in all things that shock the public quiet, or the reputation of private persons, under the notion of humor. But I mean not the authority which is annex'd to your office; I speak of that only which is inborn and inherent to your person; what is produc'd in you by an excellent wit, a masterly and commanding genius over all writers: whereby you are empower'd, when you please, to give the final decision of wit; to put your stamp on all that ought to pass for current; and set a brand of reprobation on clipp'd poetry, and false coin. A shilling dipp'd in the bath may go for gold amongst the ignorant, but the scepters on the guineas shew the difference. That your Lordship is form'd by nature for this supremacy, I could easily prove (were it not already granted by the world) from the distinguishing character of your writing: which is so visible to me, that I never could be impos'd on to receive for yours, what was written by any others; or to mistake your genuine poetry for their spurious productions. I can farther add, with truth, (tho' not without some vanity in saying it,) that in the same paper, written by divers hands, whereof your Lordship's was only part, I could separate your gold from their copper; and tho' I could not give back to every author his own brass, (for there is not the same rule for distinguishing betwixt bad and bad, as betwixt ill and excellently good,) yet I never fail'd of knowing what was yours, and what was not; and was absolutely certain, that this, or the other part, was positively yours, and could not possibly be written by any other.

True it is, that some bad poems, tho' not all, carry their owners' marks about 'em. There is some peculiar awkwardness, false grammar, imperfect sense, or, at the least, obscurity; some brand or other on this buttock, or that ear, that 't is notorious who are the owners of the cattle, tho' they should not sign it with their names. But your Lordship, on the contrary, is distinguish'd, not only by the excellency of your thoughts, but by your style and manner of expressing them. A painter, judging of some admirable piece, may affirm, with certainty, that it was of Holbein, or Vandyck; but vulgar designs, and common draughts, are easily mistaken, and misapplied. Thus, by my long study of your Lordship, I am arriv'd at the knowledge of your particular manner. In the good poems of other men, like those artists, I can only say, this is like the draught of such a one, or like the coloring of another. In short, I can only be sure, that 't is the hand of a good master; but in your performances 't is scarcely possible for me to be deceiv'd. If you write in your strength, you stand reveal'd at the first view; and should you write under it, you cannot avoid some peculiar graces, which only cost me a second consideration to discover you: for I may say it, with all the severity of truth, that every line of yours is precious. Your Lordship's only fault is, that you have not written more; unless I could add another, and that yet greater, but I fear for the public the accusation would not be true — that you have written, and out of a vicious modesty will not publish.

Virgil has confin'd his works within the compass of eighteen thousand lines, and has not treated many subjects; yet he ever had, and ever will have, the reputation of the best poet. Martial says of him, that he could have excell'd Varius in tragedy, and Horace in lyric poetry, but out of deference to his friends, he attempted neither.

The same prevalence of genius is in your Lordship, but the world cannot pardon your concealing it on the same consideration; because we have neither a living Varius, nor a Horace, in whose excellencies, both of poems, odes, and satires, you had equal'd them, if our language had not yielded to the Roman majesty, and length of time had not added a reverence to the works of Horace. For good sense is the same in all or most ages, and course of time rather improves Nature than impairs her. What has been, may be again: another Homer, and another Virgil, may possibly arise from those very causes which produc'd the first; tho' it would be impudence to affirm, that any such have yet appear'd.

'Tis manifest that some particular ages have been more happy than others in the production of great men, in all sorts of arts and sciences; as that of Euripides, Sophocles, Aristophanes, and the rest, for stage poetry amongst the Greeks; that of Augustus, for heroic, lyric, dramatic, elegiac, and indeed all sorts of poetry, in the persons of Virgil, Horace, Varius, Ovid, and many others; especially if we take into that century the latter end of the commonwealth, wherein we find Varro, Lucretius, and Catullus; and at the same time liv'd Cicero, and Sallust, and Cæsar. A famous age in modern times, for learning in every kind, was that of Lorenzo de Medici, and his son Leo the Tenth; wherein painting was reviv'd, and poetry flourish'd, and the Greek language was restor'd.

Examples in all these are obvious: but what I would infer is this; that in such an age, 'tis possible some great genius may arise, to equal any of the ancients; abating only for the language. For great contemporaries whet and cultivate each other; and mutual borrowing, and commerce, makes the common riches of learning, as it does of the civil government.

But suppose that Homer and Virgil were the only of their species, and that Nature was so much worn out in producing them, that she is never able to bear the like again, yet the example only holds in heroic poetry: in tragedy and satire, I offer myself to maintain against some of our modern critics, that this age and the last, particularly in England, have excell'd the ancients in both those kinds; and I would instance in Shakespeare of the former, of your Lordship in the latter sort.

Thus I might safely confine myself to my native country; but if I would only cross the seas, I might find in France a living Horace and a Juvenal, in the person of the admirable Boileau; whose numbers are excellent, whose expressions are noble, whose thoughts are just, whose language is pure, whose satire is pointed, and whose sense is close; what he borrows from the ancients, he repays with usury of his own, in coin as good, and almost as universally valuable: for, setting prejudice and partiality apart, tho' he is our enemy, the stamp of a Louis, the patron of all arts, is not much inferior to the medal of an Augustus Cæsar. Let this be said without ent'ring into the interests of factions and parties, and relating only to the bounty of that king to men of learning and merit; a praise so just, that even we, who are his enemies, cannot refuse it to him.

Now if it may be permitted me to go back again to the consideration of epic poetry, I have confess'd that no man hitherto has reach'd, or so much as approach'd, to the excellencies of Homer, or of Virgil; I must farther add, that Statius, the best versificator next to Virgil, knew not how to design after him, tho' he had the model in his eye; that Lucan is wanting both in design and subject, and is besides too full of heat and affectation; that amongst the moderns, Ariosto neither design'd justly, nor observ'd any unity of action, or compass of time, or moderation in the vastness of his draught: his style is luxurious, without majesty or decency, and his adventures without the compass of nature and possibility. Tasso, whose design was regular, and who observ'd the rules of unity in time and place more closely than Virgil, yet was not so happy in his action; he confesses himself to have been too lyrical, that is, to have written beneath the dignity of heroic verse, in his episodes of Sophronia, Erminia, and Armida. His story is not so pleasing as Ariosto's; he is too flatulent sometimes, and sometimes too dry; many times unequal, and almost always forc'd; and, besides, is full of conceits, points of epigram, and witticisms; all which are not only below the dignity of heroic verse, but contrary to its nature: Virgil and Homer have not one of them. And those who are guilty of so boyish an ambition in so grave a subject, are so far from being consider'd as heroic poets, that they ought to be turn'd down from Homer to the Anthologia, from Virgil to Martial and Owen's Epigrams, and from Spenser to Flecknoe; that is, from the top to the bottom of all poetry. But to return to Tasso: he borrows from the invention of Boiardo, and in his alteration of his poem, which is infinitely for the worse, imitates Homer so very servilely, that (for example) he gives the King of Jerusalem fifty sons, only because Homer had bestow'd the like number on King Priam; he kills the youngest in the same manner, and has provided his hero with a Patroclus, under another name, only to bring him back to the wars, when his friend was kill'd. The French have perform'd nothing in this kind which is not far below those two Italians, and subject to a thousand more reflections, without examining their St. Lewis, their Pucelle, or their Alaric. The English have only to boast of Spenser and Milton, who neither of them wanted either genius or learning to have been perfect poets, and yet both of them are liable to many censures. For there is no uniformity in the design of Spenser: he aims at the accomplishment of no one action; he raises up a hero for every one of his adventures; and endows each of them with some particular moral virtue, which renders them all equal, without subordination or preference. Every one is most valiant in his own legend: only we must do him that justice to observe, that magnanimity, which is the character of Prince Arthur, shines throughout the whole poem; and succors the rest, when they are in distress. The original of every knight was then living in the court of Queen Elizabeth; and he attributed to each of them that virtue, which he thought was most conspicuous in them; an ingenious piece of flattery, tho' it turn'd not much to his account. Had he liv'd to finish his poem, in the six remaining legends, it had certainly been more of a piece; but could not have been perfect, because the model was not true. But Prince Arthur, or his chief patron Sir Philip Sidney, whom he intended to make happy by the marriage of his Gloriana, dying before him, depriv'd the poet both of means and spirit to accomplish his design. For the rest, his obsolete language, and the ill choice of his stanza, are faults but of the second magnitude; for, notwithstanding the first, he is still intelligible, at least after a little practice; and for the last, he is the more to be admir'd, that, laboring under such a difficulty, his verses are so numerous, so various, and so harmonious, that only Virgil, whom he profess'dly imitated, has surpass'd him among the Romans; and only Mr. Waller among the English.

As for Mr. Milton, whom we all admire with so much justice, his subject is not that of an heroic poem, properly so call'd. His design is the losing of our happiness; his event is not prosperous, like that of all other epic works; his heavenly machines are many, and his human persons are but two. But I will not take Mr. Rymer's work out of his hands: he has promis'd the world a critique on that author; wherein, tho' he will not allow his poem for heroic, I hope he will grant us, that his thoughts are elevated, his words sounding, and that no man has so happily copied the manner of Homer, or so copiously translated his Grecisms, and the Latin elegancies of Virgil. 'Tis true, he runs into a flat of thought, sometimes for a hundred lines together, but 'tis when he is got into a track of Scripture. His antiquated words were his choice, not his necessity; for therein he imitated Spenser, as Spenser did Chaucer. And tho', perhaps, the love of their masters may have transported both too far, in the frequent use of them, yet, in my opinion, obsolete words may then be laudably reviv'd, when either they are more sounding, or more significant, than those in practice; and when their obscurity is taken away, by joining other words to them which clear the sense; according to the rule of Horace, for the admission of new words. But in both cases a moderation is to be observ'd in the use of them: for unnecessary coinage, as well as unnecessary revival, runs into affectation; a fault to be avoided on either hand. Neither will I justify Milton for his blank verse, tho' I may excuse him, by the example of Hannibal Caro, and other Italians, who have us'd it; for whatever causes he alleges for the abolishing of rhyme, (which I have not now the leisure to examine,) his own particular reason is plainly this, that rhyme was not his talent; he had neither the ease of doing it, nor the graces of it; which is manifest in his Juvenilia, or verses written in his youth, where his rhyme is always constrain'd and forc'd, and comes hardly from him, at an age when the soul is most pliant, and the passion of love makes almost every man a rhymers, tho' not a poet.

By this time, my Lord, I doubt not but that you wonder, why I have run off from my bias so long together, and made so tedious a digression from satire to heroic poetry. But if you will not excuse it by the tattling quality of age, which, as Sir William Davenant says, is always narrative, yet I hope the usefulness of what I have to say on this subject will qualify the remoteness of it; and this is the last time I will commit the crime of prefaces, or trouble the world with my notions of anything that relates to verse. I have then, as you see, observ'd the failings of many great wits amongst the moderns, who have attempted to write an epic poem. Besides these, or the like animadversions of them by other men, there is yet a farther reason given, why they cannot possibly succeed so well as the ancients, even tho' we could allow them not to be inferior, either in genius or learning, or the tongue in which they write, or all those other wonderful qualifications which are necessary to the forming of a true accomplish'd heroic poet. The fault is laid on our religion; they say, that Christianity is not capable of those embellishments which are afforded in the belief of those ancient heathens.

And 'tis true, that, in the severe notions of our faith, the fortitude of a Christian consists in patience, and suffering, for the love of God, whatever hardships can befall him in the world; not in any great attempt, or in performance of those enterprises which the poets call heroic, and which are commonly the effects of interest, ostentation, pride, and worldly honor: that humility and resignation are our prime virtues; and that these include no action but that of the soul; when as, on the contrary, an heroic poem requires to its necessary design, and as its last perfection, some great action of war, the accomplishment of some extraordinary undertaking; which requires the strength and vigor of the body, the duty of a soldier, the capacity and prudence of a general, and, in short, as much, or more, of the active virtue, than the suffering. But to this the answer is very obvious. God has plac'd us in our several stations; the virtues of a private Christian are patience, obedience, submission, and the like; but those of a magistrate, or general, or a king, are prudence, counsel, active fortitude, coercive power, awful command, and the exercise of magnanimity, as well as justice. So that this objection hinders not but that an epic poem, or the heroic action of some great commander, enterpris'd for the common good, and honor of the Christian cause, and executed happily, may be as well written now, as it was of old by the heathens; provided the poet be endued with the same talents; and the language, tho' not of equal dignity, yet as near approaching to it, as our modern barbarism will allow; which is all that can be expected from our own, or any other now extant, tho' more refin'd; and therefore we are to rest contented with that only inferiority, which is not possibly to be remedied.

I wish I could as easily remove that other difficulty which yet remains. 'Tis objected by a great French critic, as well as an admirable poet, yet living, and whom I have mention'd with that honor which his merit exacts from me, I mean Boileau, that the machines of our Christian religion, in heroic poetry, are much more feeble to support that weight than those of heathenism. Their doctrine, grounded as it was on ridiculous fables, was yet the belief of the two victorious monarchies, the Grecian and Roman. Their gods did not only interest themselves in the event of wars, (which is the effect of a superior providence,) but also espous'd the several parties in a visible corporeal descent, manag'd their intrigues, and fought their battles sometimes in opposition to each other: tho' Virgil

(more discreet than Homer in that last particular) has contented himself with the partiality of his deities, their favors, their counsels or commands, to those whose cause they had espous'd, without bringing them to the outrageousness of blows. Now, our religion (says he) is depriv'd of the greatest part of those machines; at least the most shining in epic poetry. Tho' St. Michael, in Ariosto, seeks out Discord, to send her amongst the Pagans, and finds her in a convent of friars, where peace should reign, which indeed is fine satire; and Satan, in Tasso, excites Solyman to an attempt by night on the Christian camp, and brings an host of devils to his assistance; yet the archangel, in the former example, when Discord was restive, and would not be drawn from her belov'd monastery with fair words, has the whip-hand of her, drags her out with many stripes, sets her, on God's name, about her business, and makes her know the difference of strength betwixt a nuncio of heaven, and a minister of hell. The same angel, in the latter instance from Tasso, (as if God had never another messenger belonging to the court, but was confin'd like Jupiter to Mercury, and Juno to Iris,) when he sees his time, that is, when half of the Christians are already kill'd, and all the rest are in a fair way to be routed, stickles betwixt the remainders of God's host, and the race of fiends; pulls the devils backward by their tails, and drives them from their quarry; or otherwise the whole business had miscarried, and Jerusalem remain'd untaken. This, says Boileau, is a very unequal match for the poor devils, who are sure to come by the worst of it in the combat; for nothing is more easy, than for an Almighty Power to bring his old rebels to reason when he pleases. Consequently, what pleasure, what entertainment, can be rais'd from so pitiful a machine, where we see the success of the battle from the very beginning of it; unless that, as we are Christians, we are glad that we have gotten God on our side, to maul our enemies, when we cannot do the work ourselves? For if the poet had given the faithful more courage, which had cost him nothing, or at least have made them exceed the Turks in number, he might have gain'd the victory for us Christians, without interesting Heaven in the quarrel; and that with as much ease, and as little credit to the conqueror, as when a party of a hundred soldiers defeats another which consists only of fifty.

This, my Lord, I confess, is such an argument against our modern poetry, as cannot be answer'd by those mediums which have been us'd. We cannot hitherto boast, that our religion has furnish'd us with any such machines as have made the strength and beauty of the ancient buildings.

But what if I venture to advance an invention of my own, to supply the manifest defect of our new writers? I am sufficiently sensible of my weakness; and 't is not very probable that I should succeed in such a project, whereof I have not had the least hint from any of my predecessors, the poets, or any of their seconds and coadjutors, the critics. Yet we see the art of war is improv'd in sieges, and new instruments of death are invented daily; something new in philosophy and the mechanics is discover'd almost every year; and the science of former ages is improv'd by the succeeding. I will not detain you with a long preamble to that which better judges will, perhaps, conclude to be little worth.

'T is this, in short — that Christian poets have not hitherto been acquainted with their own strength. If they had search'd the Old Testament as they ought, they might there have found the machines which are proper for their work; and those more certain in their effect, than it may be the New Testament is, in the rules sufficient for salvation. The perusing of one chapter in the prophecy of Daniel, and accommodating what there they find with the principles of Platonic philosophy, as it is now Christianis'd, would have made the ministry of angels as strong an engine for the working up heroic poetry, in our religion, as that of the ancients has been to raise theirs by all the fables of their gods, which were only receiv'd for truths by the most ignorant and weakest of the people.

'T is a doctrine almost universally receiv'd by Christians, as well Protestants as Catholics, that there are guardian angels, appointed by God Almighty, as his vicegerents, for the protection and government of cities, provinces, kingdoms, and monarchies; and those as well of heathens, as of true believers. All this is so plainly prov'd from those texts of Daniel, that it admits of no farther controversy. The Prince of the Persians, and that other of the Grecians, are granted to be the guardians and protecting ministers of those empires. It cannot be denied that they were opposite, and resisted one another. St. Michael is mention'd by his name as the patron of the Jews, and is now taken by the Christians, as the protector-general of our religion. These tutelar genii, who presided over the several people and regions committed to their charge, were watchful over them for good, as far as their commissions could possibly extend. The general purpose and design of all was certainly the service of their Great Creator. But 't is an undoubted truth, that, for ends best known to the Almighty Majesty of Heaven, his providential designs for the benefit of his creatures, for the debasing and punishing of some nations, and the exaltation and temporal reward of others, were not wholly known to these his ministers; else why those factious quarrels, controversies, and battles amongst themselves, when they were all united in the same design, the service and honor of their common master? But being instructed only in the general, and zealous of the main design; and, as finite beings, not admitted into the secrets of government, the last resorts of providence, or capable of discovering the final purposes of God, who can work good out of evil as he pleases, and irresistibly sways all manner of events on earth, directing them finally for the best, to his creation in general, and to the ultimate end of his own glory in particular; they must, of necessity, be sometimes ignorant of the means conducing to those ends, in which alone they can jar and oppose each other. One angel, as we may suppose, the Prince of Persia, as he is call'd, judging that it would be more for God's honor, and the benefit of his people, that the Median and Persian monarchy, which deliver'd them from the Babylonish captivity, should still be uppermost; and the patron of the Grecians, to whom the will of God might be more particularly reveal'd, contending, on the other side, for the rise of Alexander and his successors, who were appointed to punish the backsliding Jews, and thereby to put them in mind of their offences, that they might repent, and become more virtuous, and more observant of the law reveal'd. But how far these controversies and appearing enmities of those glorious creatures may be carried; how these oppositions may best be manag'd, and by what means conducted, is not my business to shew or determine; these things must be left to the invention and judgment of the poet; if any of so happy a genius be now living, or any future age can produce a man, who, being conversant in the philosophy of Plato, as it is now accommodated to Christian use, for (as Virgil gives us to understand by his example) that is the only proper, of all others, for an epic poem; who, to his natural endowments, of a large invention, a ripe judgment, and a strong memory, has join'd the knowledge of the liberal arts and sciences, and particularly moral philosophy, the mathematics, geography, and history, and with all these qualifications is born a poet; knows, and can practice the variety of numbers, and is master of the language in which he writes — if such a man, I say, be now arisen, or shall arise, I am vain enough to think that I have propos'd a model to him by which he may build a nobler, a more beautiful, and more perfect poem, than any yet extant since the ancients.

There is another part of these machines yet wanting; but, by what I have said, it would have been easily supplied by a judicious writer. He could not have fail'd to add the opposition of ill spirits to the good; they have also their design, ever opposite to that of Heaven; and this alone has hitherto been the practice of the moderns: but this imperfect system, if I may call it such, which I have given, will infinitely advance and carry farther that hypothesis of the evil spirits contending with the good. For, being so much weaker, since their fall, than those blessed beings, they are yet suppos'd to have a permitted power from God of acting ill, as, from their own deprav'd nature, they have always the will of designing it. A great testimony of which we find in Holy Writ, when God Almighty suffer'd Satan to appear in the holy synod of the angels, (a thing not hitherto drawn into example by any of the poets,) and also gave him power over all things belonging to his servant Job, excepting only life.

Now, what these wicked spirits cannot compass, by the vast disproportion of their forces to those of the superior beings, they may by their fraud and cunning carry farther, in a seeming league, confederacy, or subserviency to the designs of some good angel, as far as consists with his purity to suffer such an aid, the end of which may possibly be disguis'd, and conceal'd from his finite knowledge. This is, indeed, to suppose a great error in such a being; yet since a devil can appear like an angel of light; since craft and malice may sometimes blind for a while a more perfect understanding; and, lastly, since Milton has given us an example of the like nature, when Satan, appearing like a cherub to Uriel, the Intelligence of the Sun, circumvented him even in his own province, and pass'd only for a curious traveler thro' those new-created regions, that he might observe therein the workmanship of God, and praise him in his works; I know not why, upon the same supposition, or some other, a fiend may not deceive a creature of more excellency than himself, but yet a creature; at least, by the connivance, or tacit permission, of the Omniscient Being.

Thus, my Lord, I have, as briefly as I could, given your Lordship, and by you the world, a rude draught of what I have been long laboring in my imagination, and what I had intended to have put in practice, (tho' far unable for the attempt of such a poem,) and to have left the stage (to which my genius never much inclin'd me) for a work which would have taken up my life in the performance of it. This, too, I had intended chiefly for the honor of my native country, to which a poet is particularly oblig'd. Of two subjects, both relating to it, I was doubtful whether I should choose that of King Arthur conquering the Saxons, which, being farther distant in time, gives the greater scope to my invention; or that of Edward, the Black Prince, in subduing Spain, and restoring it to the lawful prince, tho' a great tyrant, Don Pedro the Cruel: which, for the compass of time, including only the expedition of one year; for the greatness of the action, and its answerable event; for the magnanimity of the English hero, oppos'd to the ingrati-

tude of the person whom he restor'd; and for the many beautiful episodes, which I had interwoven with the principal design, together with the characters of the chiefest English persons; wherein, after Virgil and Spenser, I would have taken occasion to represent my living friends and patrons of the noblest families, and also shadow'd the events of future ages, in the succession of our imperial line. With these helps, and those of the machines, which I have mention'd, I might perhaps have done as well as some of my predecessors, or at least chalk'd out a way for others to amend my errors in a like design; but being encourag'd only with fair words by King Charles II, my little salary ill paid, and no prospect of a future subsistence, I was then discourag'd in the beginning of my attempt; and now age has overtaken me, and want, a more insufferable evil, thro' the change of the times, has wholly disenabled me. Tho' I must ever acknowledge, to the honor of your Lordship, and the eternal memory of your charity, that, since this revolution, wherein I have patiently suffer'd the ruin of my small fortune, and the loss of that poor subsistence which I had from two kings, whom I had serv'd more faithfully than profitably to myself — then your Lordship was pleas'd, out of no other motive but your own nobleness, without any desert of mine, or the least solicitation from me, to make me a most bountiful present, which at that time, when I was most in want of it, came most seasonably and unexpectedly to my relief. That favor, my Lord, is of itself sufficient to bind any grateful man to a perpetual acknowledgment, and to all the future service which one of my mean condition can be ever able to perform. May the Almighty God return it for me, both in blessing you here, and rewarding you hereafter! I must not presume to defend the cause for which I now suffer, because your Lordship is engag'd against it; but the more you are so, the greater is my obligation to you, for your laying aside all the considerations of factions and parties, to do an action of pure disinterest'd charity. This is one amongst many of your shining qualities, which distinguish you from others of your rank. But let me add a farther truth, that, without these ties of gratitude, and abstracting from them all, I have a most particular inclination to honor you; and, if it were not too bold an expression, to say, I love you. 'Tis no shame to be a poet, tho' 'tis to be a bad one. Augustus Cæsar of old, and Cardinal Richelieu of late, would willingly have been such; and David and Solomon were such. You, who, without flattery, are the best of the present age in England, and would have been so, had you been born in any other country, will receive more honor in future ages by that one excellency, than by all those honors to which your birth has intitled you, or your merits have acquir'd you.

Ne, forte, pudori

Sit tibi Musa lyræ solers, et cantor Apollo.

I have formerly said in this epistle, that I could distinguish your writings from those of any others; 'tis now time to clear myself from any imputation of self-conceit on that subject. I assume not to myself any particular lights in this discovery; they are such only as are obvious to every man of sense and judgment who loves poetry, and understands it. Your thoughts are always so remote from the common way of thinking, that they are, as I may say, of another species than the conceptions of other poets; yet you go not out of nature for any of them. Gold is never bred upon the surface of the ground, but lies so hidden, and so deep, that the mines of it are seldom found; but the force of waters casts it out from the bowels of mountains, and exposes it amongst the sands of rivers; giving us of her bounty what we could not hope for by our search. This success attends your Lordship's thoughts, which would look like chance, if it were not perpetual, and always of the same tenor. If I grant that there is care in it, 'tis such a care as would be ineffectual and fruitless in other men. 'Tis the curiosa felicitas which Petronius ascribes to Horace in his Odes. We have not wherewithal to imagine so strongly, so justly, and so pleasantly; in short, if we have the same knowledge, we cannot draw out of it the same quaintness; we cannot give it such a turn, such a propriety, and such a beauty; something is deficient in the manner, or the words, but more in the nobleness of our conception. Yet when you have finish'd all, and it appears in its full luster, when the diamond is not only found, but the roughness smooth'd, when it is cut into a form, and set in gold, then we cannot but acknowledge, that it is the perfect work of art and nature; and every one will be so vain, to think he himself could have perform'd the like, till he attempts it. 'Tis just the description that Horace makes of such a finish'd piece: it appears so easy,

— ut sibi quivis

Speret idem, sudet multum, frustra que laboret, Ausus idem.

And, besides all this, 'tis your Lordship's particular talent to lay your thoughts so close together, that, were they closer, they would be crowded, and even a due connection would be wanting. We are not kept in expectation of two good lines, which are to come after a long parenthesis of twenty bad; which is the April poetry of other writers, a mixture of rain and sunshine by fits: you are always bright, even almost to a fault, by reason of the excess. There is continual abundance, a magazine of thought, and yet a perpetual variety of entertainment; which creates such an appetite in your reader, that he is not cloy'd with anything, but satisfied with all. 'Tis that which the Romans call cæna dubia; where there is such plenty, yet withal so much diversity, and so good order, that the choice is difficult betwixt one excellency and another; and yet the conclusion, by a due climax, is evermore the best; that is, as a conclusion ought to be, ever the most proper for its place. See, my Lord, whether I have not studied your Lordship with some application; and, since you are so modest that you will not be judge and party, I appeal to the whole world, if I have not drawn your picture to a great degree of likeness, tho' 'tis but in miniature, and that some of the best features are yet wanting. Yet what I have done is enough to distinguish you from any other, which is the proposition that I took upon me to demonstrate.

And now, my Lord, to apply what I have said to my present business. The Satires of Juvenal and Persius, appearing in this new English dress, cannot so properly be inscrib'd to any man as to your Lordship, who are the first of the age in that way of writing. Your Lordship, amongst many other favors, has given me your permission for this address; and you have particularly encourag'd me by your perusal and approbation of the Sixth and Tenth Satires of Juvenal, as I have translated them. My fellow-laborers have likewise commission'd me to perform, in their behalf, this office of a dedication to you; and will acknowledge, with all possible respect and gratitude, your acceptance of their work. Some of them have the honor to be known to your Lordship already, and they who have not yet that happiness desire it now. Be pleas'd to receive our common endeavors with your wonted candor, without intitling you to the protection of our common failings in so difficult an undertaking. And allow me your patience, if it be not already tir'd with this long epistle, to give you, from the best authors, the origin, the antiquity, the growth, the change, and the completement of satire among the Romans; to describe, if not define, the nature of that poem, with its several qualifications and virtues, together with the several sorts of it; to compare the excellencies of Horace, Persius, and Juvenal, and shew the particular manners of their satires; and, lastly, to give an account of this new way of version, which is attempted in our performance: all which, according to the weakness of my ability, and the best lights which I can get from others, shall be the subject of my following discourse.

The most perfect work of poetry, says our master Aristotle, is tragedy. His reason is, because it is the most united; being more severely confin'd within the rules of action, time, and place. The action is entire, of a piece, and one, without episodes; the time limited to a natural day; and the place circumscrib'd at least within the compass of one town, or city. Being exactly proportion'd thus, and uniform in all its parts, the mind is more capable of comprehending the whole beauty of it without distraction.

But, after all these advantages, an heroic poem is certainly the greatest work of human nature. The beauties and perfections of the other are but mechanical; those of the epic are more noble: tho' Homer has limited his place to Troy, and the fields about it; his actions to forty-eight natural days, whereof twelve are holidays, or cessation from business, during the funerals of Patroclus. To proceed; the action of the epic is greater; the extension of time enlarges the pleasure of the reader, and the episodes give it more ornament, and more variety. The instruction is equal; but the first is only instructive, the latter forms a hero, and a prince.

If it signifies anything which of them is of the more ancient family, the best and most absolute heroic poem was written by Homer long before tragedy was invented. But, if we consider the natural endowments and acquir'd parts which are necessary to make an accomplish'd writer in either kind, tragedy requires a less and more confin'd knowledge; moderate learning, and observation of the rules, is sufficient, if a genius be not wanting. But in an epic poet, one who is worthy of that name, besides an universal genius, is requir'd universal learning, together with all those qualities and acquisitions which I have nam'd above, and as many more as I have, thro' haste or negligence, omitted. And, after all, he must have exactly studied Homer and Virgil as his patterns; Aristotle and Horace as his guides; and Vida and Bossu as their commentators; with many others, both Italian and French critics, which I want leisure here to recommend.

In a word, what I have to say in relation to this subject, which does not particularly concern satire, is, that the greatness of an heroic poem, beyond that of a tragedy, may easily be discover'd, by observing how few have attempted that work in comparison of those who have written dramas; and, of those few, how small a number have succeeded. But leaving the critics, on either side, to contend about the preference due to this or that sort of poetry, I will hasten to my present business, which is the antiquity and origin of satire, according to those informations which I have receiv'd from the learned Casaubon, Heinsius, Rigaltius, Dacier, and the Dauphin's Juvenal; to which I shall add some observations of my own.

There has been a long dispute amongst the modern critics, whether the Romans deriv'd their satire from the Grecians, or first invented it themselves. Julius Scaliger and Heinsius are of the first opinion; Casaubon, Rigaltius, Dacier, and the publisher of the Dauphin's Juvenal maintain the latter. If we take satire in the general signification of the word, as it is us'd in all modern languages, for an invective, 't is certain that it is almost as old as verse; and tho' hymns, which are praises of God, may be allow'd to have been before it, yet the defamation of others was not long after it. After God had curs'd Adam and Eve in Paradise, the husband and wife excus'd themselves by laying the blame on one another, and gave a beginning to those conjugal dialogues in prose which the poets have perfected in verse. The third chapter of Job is one of the first instances of this poem in holy Scripture; unless we will take it higher, from the latter end of the second, where his wife advises him to curse his Maker.

This original, I confess, is not much to the honor of satire; but here it was nature, and that deprav'd: when it became an art, it bore better fruit. Only we have learnt thus much already, that scoffs and revilings are of the growth of all nations; and, consequently, that neither the Greek poets borrow'd from other people their art of railing, neither needed the Romans to take it from them. But, considering satire as a species of poetry, here the war begins amongst the critics. Scaliger, the father, will have it descend from Greece to Rome; and derives the word satire from Satyrus, that mix'd kind of animal, or, as the ancients thought him, rural god, made up betwixt a man and a goat; with a human head, hook'd nose, pouting lips, a bunch, or struma, under the chin, prick'd ears, and upright horns; the body shagg'd with hair, especially from the waist, and ending in a goat, with the legs and feet of that creature. But Casaubon, and his followers, with reason, condemn this derivation; and prove, that from Satyrus, the word satira, as it signifies a poem, cannot possibly descend. For satira is not properly a substantive, but an adjective; to which the word lanx (in English, a charger, or large platter) is understood; so that the Greek poem, made according to the manners of a Satyr, and expressing his qualities, must properly be call'd satirical, and not satire. And thus far 't is allow'd that the Grecians had such poems; but that they were wholly different in specie from that to which the Romans gave the name of satire.

Aristotle divides all poetry, in relation to the progress of it, into nature without art, art begun, and art completed. Mankind, even the most barbarous, have the seeds of poetry implanted in them. The first specimen of it was certainly shewn in the praises of the Deity, and prayers to him; and as they are of natural obligation, so they are likewise of divine institution: which Milton observing, introduces Adam and Eve every morning adoring God in hymns and prayers. The first poetry was thus begun, in the wild notes of nature, before the invention of feet and measures. The Grecians and Romans had no other original of their poetry. Festivals and holidays soon succeeded to private worship, and we need not doubt but they were enjoin'd by the true God to his own people, as they were afterwards imitated by the heathens; who, by the light of reason, knew they were to invoke some superior being in their necessities, and to thank him for his benefits. Thus the Grecian holidays were celebrated with offerings to Bacchus, and Ceres, and other deities, to whose bounty they suppos'd they were owing for their corn and wine, and other helps of life; and the ancient Romans, as Horace tells us, paid their thanks to Mother Earth, or Vesta, to Silvanus, and their Genius, in the same manner. But as all festivals have a double reason of their institution, the first of religion, the other of recreation, for the unbending of our minds, so both the Grecians and Romans agreed, after their sacrifices were perform'd, to spend the remainder of the day in sports and merriments; amongst which, songs and dances, and that which they call'd wit, (for want of knowing better,) were the chiefest entertainments. The Grecians had a notion of Satyrs, whom I have already describ'd; and taking them, and the Sileni, that is, the young Satyrs and the old, for the tutors, attendants, and humble companions of their Bacchus, habited themselves like those rural deities, and imitated them in their rustic dances, to which they join'd songs, with some sort of rude harmony, but without certain numbers; and to these they added a kind of chorus.

The Romans, also, (as nature is the same in all places,) tho' they knew nothing of those Grecian demigods, nor had any communication with Greece, yet had certain young men, who, at their festivals, danc'd and sung, after their uncouth manner, to a certain kind of verse, which they call'd Saturnian. What it was, we have no very certain light from antiquity to discover; but we may conclude, that, like the Grecian, it was void of art, or at least with very feeble beginnings of it. Those ancient Romans, at these holidays, which were a mixture of devotion and debauchery, had a custom of reproaching each other with their faults, in a sort of ex tempore poetry, or rather of tunable hobbling verse; and they answer'd in the same kind of gross raillery; their wit and their music being of a piece. The Grecians, says Casaubon, had formerly done the same, in the persons of their petulant Satyrs. But I am afraid he mistakes the matter, and confounds the singing and dancing of the Satyrs with the rustical entertainments of the first Romans. The reason of my opinion is this: that Casaubon, finding little light from antiquity of these beginnings of poetry amongst the Grecians, but only these representations of Satyrs, who carried canisters and cornucopias full of several fruits in their hands, and danc'd with them at their public feasts; and afterwards reading Horace, who makes mention of his homely Romans jesting at one another in the same kind of solemnities, might suppose those wanton Satyrs did the same; and especially because Horace possibly might seem to him to have shewn the original of all poetry in general, including the Grecians as well as Romans; tho' 't is plainly otherwise, that he only describ'd the beginning and first rudiments of poetry in his own country. The verses are these, which he cites from the First Epistle of the Second Book, which was written to Augustus:

*Agricolæ prisci, fortes, puerque beati,
Condita post frumenta, levantes tempore festo
Corpus, et ipsum animum spe finis dura feren-*
tem,

*Cum sociis operum, et pueris, et conjuge fida,
Tellurem porco, Silvanum lacte piabant;
Floribus et vino Genium memorem brevis ævi.
Fescennina per hunc inventa licentia morem
Versibus æternis opprobria rustica fudit.*

Our brawny clowns, of old, who turn'd the soil,
Content with little, and inur'd to toil,

At harvest-home, with mirth and country cheer,

Restor'd their bodies for another year;
Refresh'd their spirits, and renew'd their hope

Of such a future feast, and future crop.

Then, with their fellow-joggers of the plows,
Their little children, and their faithful spouse,
A sow they slew to Vesta's deity,
And kindly milk, Silvanus, pour'd to thee;
With flow'rs, and wine, their Genius they ador'd;

A short life, and a merry, was the word.

From flowing cups, defaming rhymes ensue,

And at each other homely taunts they threw.

Yet since it is a hard conjecture, that so great a man as Casaubon should misapply what Horace writ concerning ancient Rome, to the ceremonies and manners of ancient Greece, I will not insist on this opinion, but rather judge in general, that since all poetry had its original from religion, that of the Grecians and Rome had the same beginning. Both were invented at festivals of thanksgiving, and both were prosecuted with mirth and raillery, and rudiments of verses: amongst the Greeks, by those who represented Satyrs; and amongst the Romans, by real clowns.

For, indeed, when I am reading Casaubon on these two subjects, methinks I hear the same story told twice over with very little alteration. Of which Dacier taking notice, in his interpretation of the Latin verses which I have translated, says plainly, that the beginning of poetry was the same, with a small variety, in both countries; and that the mother of it, in all nations, was devotion. But, what is yet more wonderful, that most learned critic takes notice also, in his illustrations on the First Epistle of the Second Book, that as the poetry of the Romans, and that of the Grecians, had the same beginning, at feasts of thanksgiving, as it has been observ'd, and the Old Comedy of the Greeks, which was invective, and the satire of the Romans, which was of the same nature, were begun on the very same occasion, so the fortune of both, in process of time, was just the same; the Old Comedy of the Grecians was forbidden, for its too much licence in exposing of particular persons; and the rude satire of the Romans was also punish'd by a law of the Decemviri, as Horace tells us, in these words:

*Libertasque recurrentes accepta per annos
Lusit amabiliter; donec jam sævus apertam
In rabiem verti cæpit jocus, et per honestas
Ire domos impune minax: doluere cruento
Dente lacessiti; fuit intactis quoque cura
Conditione super communi: quinetiam lex, Pœnaque lata, malo quæ nolle carmine quem-
quam*

*Describi: vertere modum, formidine fustis
Ad benedicendum delectandumque redacti.*

The law of the Decemviri was this: Siquis occentassit malum carmen, sive condidisset, quod infamiam facit, flagitiumve alteri, capital esto. A strange likeness, and barely possible; but the critics being all of the same opinion, it becomes me to be silent, and submit to better judgments than my own.

But, to return to the Grecians, from whose satyric dramas the elder Scaliger and Heinsius will have the Roman satire to proceed, I am to take a view of them first, and see if there be any such descent from them as those authors have pretended.

Thespis, or whosoever he were that invented tragedy, (for authors differ,) mingled with them a chorus and dances of Satyrs, which had before been us'd in the celebration of their festivals; and there they were ever afterwards retain'd. The character of them was also kept, which was mirth and wantonness; and this was given, I suppose, to the folly of the common audience, who soon grow weary of good sense, and, as we daily see in our own age and country, are apt to forsake poetry, and still ready to return to buffoonery and farce. From hence it came, that, in the Olympic games, where the poets contended for four prizes, the satyric tragedy was the last of them; for, in the rest, the Satyrs were excluded from the chorus. Amongst the plays of Euripides which are yet remaining, there is one of these satyrics, which is call'd the Cyclops; in which we may see the nature of those poems, and from thence conclude what likeness they have to the Roman satire.

The story of this Cyclops, whose name was Polyphemus, so famous in the Grecian fables, was, that Ulysses, who, with his company, was driven on that coast of Sicily, where those Cyclops inhabited, coming to ask relief from Silenus, and the Satyrs, who were herdsmen to that one-ey'd giant, was kindly receiv'd by them, and entertain'd; till, being perceiv'd by Polyphemus, they were made prisoners, against the rites of hospitality, for which Ulysses eloquently pleaded, were afterwards put down into the den, and some of them devour'd; after which Ulysses, having made him drunk, when he was asleep, thrust a great fire-brand into his eye, and so, revenging his dead followers, escap'd with the remaining party of the living; and Silenus and the Satyrs were freed from their servitude under Polyphemus, and remitted to their first liberty of attending and accompanying their patron, Bacchus.

This was the subject of the tragedy; which, being one of those that end with a happy event, is therefore, by Aristotle, judg'd below the other sort, whose success is unfortunate. Notwithstanding which, the Satyrs, who were part of the dramatis personæ, as well as the whole chorus, were properly introduc'd into the nature of the poem, which is mix'd of farce and tragedy. The adventure of Ulysses was to entertain the judging part of the audience; and the uncouth persons of Silenus, and the Satyrs, to divert the common people with their gross raileries.

Your Lordship has perceiv'd by this time that this satyric tragedy, and the Roman satire, have little resemblance in any of their features. The very kinds are different; for what has a pastoral tragedy to do with a paper of verses satirically written? The character and raillery of the Satyrs is the only thing that could pretend to a likeness, were Scaliger and Heinsius alive to maintain their opinion. And the first farces of the Romans, which were the rudiments of their poetry, were written before they had any communication with the Greeks, or indeed any knowledge of that people.

And here it will be proper to give the definition of the Greek satyric poem from Casaubon, before I leave this subject. "The Satyric," says he, "is a dramatic poem, annex'd to a tragedy, having a chorus, which consists of Satyrs. The persons represented in it are illustrious men; the action of it is great; the style is partly serious, and partly joecular; and the event of the action most commonly is happy."

The Grecians, besides these satyric tragedies, had another kind of poem, which they

call'd silli, which were more of kin to the Roman satire. Those silli were indeed invective poems, but of a different species from the Roman poems of Ennius, Pacuvius, Lucilius, Horace, and the rest of their successors. They were so call'd, says Casaubon in one place, from Silenus, the foster-father of Bacchus; but, in another place, bethinking himself better, he derives their name ἀπὸ τοῦ σιλλαινεῖν, from their scoffing and petulancy. From some fragments of the silli, written by Timon, we may find, that they were satiric poems, full of parodies; that is, of verses patch'd up from great poets, and turn'd into another sense than their author intended them. Such, amongst the Romans, is the famous Cento of Ausonius; where the words are Virgil's, but, by applying them to another sense, they are made a relation of a wedding night; and the act of consummation fulsomely describ'd in the very words of the most modest amongst all poets. Of the same manner are our songs which are turn'd into burlesque, and the serious words of the author perverted into a ridiculous meaning. Thus in Timon's silli the words are generally those of Homer and the tragic poets; but he applies them, satirically, to some customs and kinds of philosophy, which he arraigns. But the Romans, not using any of these parodies in their satires — sometimes, indeed, repeating verses of other men, as Persius cites some of Nero's, but not turning them into another meaning — the silli cannot be suppos'd to be the original of Roman satire. To these silli, consisting of parodies, we may properly add the satires which were written against particular persons; such as were the iambics of Archilochus against Lycambes, which Horace undoubtedly imitated in some of his Odes and Epodes, whose titles bear sufficient witness of it. I might also name the invective of Ovid against Ibis, and many others; but these are the underwood of satire, rather than the timber trees: they are not of general extension, as reaching only to some individual person. And Horace seems to have purg'd himself from those splenetic reflections in those Odes and Epodes, before he undertook the noble work of Satires, which were properly so call'd.

Thus, my Lord, I have at length disengag'd myself from those antiquities of Greece; and have prov'd, I hope, from the best critics, that the Roman satire was not borrow'd from thence, but of their own manufacture. I am now almost gotten into my depth; at least, by the help of Dacier, I am swimming towards it. Not that I will promise always to follow him, any more than he follows Casaubon; but to keep him in my eye, as my best and truest guide; and where I think he may possibly mislead me, there to have recourse to my own lights, as I expect that others should do by me.

Quintilian says, in plain words, Satira quidem tota nostra est; and Horace had said the same thing before him, speaking of his predecessor in that sort of poetry: Et Græcis intacti carminis auctor. Nothing can be clearer than the opinion of the poet, and the orator, both the best critics of the two best ages of the Roman Empire, than that satire was wholly of Latin growth, and not transplanted to Rome from Athens. Yet, as I have said, Scaliger, the father, according to his custom, that is, insolently enough, contradicts them both; and gives no better reason than the derivation of satyrus from σάθυ, salacitas; and so, from the lechery of those fauns, thinks he has sufficiently prov'd that satire is deriv'd from them: as if wantonness and lubricity were essential to that sort of poem, which ought to be avoided in it. His other allegation, which I have already mention'd, is as pitiful; that the Satyrs carried platters and canisters full of fruit in their hands. If they had enter'd empty-handed, had they been ever the less Satyrs? Or were the fruits and flowers which they offer'd anything of kin to satire? Or any argument that this poem was originally Grecian? Casaubon judg'd better, and his opinion is grounded on sure authority, that satire was deriv'd from satura, a Roman word, which signifies full and abundant, and full also of variety, in which nothing is wanting to its due perfection. 'Tis thus, says Dacier, that we say a full color, when the wool has taken the whole tincture, and drunk in as much of the dye as it can receive. According to this derivation, from satur comes satura, or satira, according to the new spelling, as optimus and maximus are now spell'd optimus and maximus. Satura, as I have formerly noted, is an adjective, and relates to the word lanx, which is understood; and this lanx, in English a charger, or large platter, was yearly fill'd with all sorts of fruits, which were offer'd to the gods at their festivals, as the premices, or first gatherings. These offerings of several sorts, thus mingled, 't is true, were not unknown to the Grecians, who call'd them πανκαρὸν θυσιαν, a sacrifice of all sorts of fruits; and πανσπερμιαν, when they offer'd all kinds of grain. Virgil has mention'd these sacrifices in his Georgics :

Lancibus et pandis fumantia reddimus exta, and in another place, lancesque et liba feremus: that is, we offer the smoking entrails in great platters, and we will offer the chargers and the cakes.

This word satura has been afterward applied to many other sorts of mixtures; as Festus calls it a kind of olla, or hotchpotch, made of several sorts of meats. Laws were also call'd leges saturnæ, when they were of several heads and titles, like our tack'd bills of Parliament: and per saturnam legem ferre, in the Roman senate, was to carry a law without telling the senators, or counting voices, when they were in haste. Sallust uses the word, per saturnam sententias exquirere, when the majority was visibly on one side. From hence it might probably be conjectur'd, that the Discourses, or Satires, of Ennius, Lucilius, and Horace, as we now call them, took their name; because they are full of various matters, and are also written on various subjects, as Porphyrius says. But Dacier affirms that it is not immediately from thence that these satires are so call'd; for that name had been us'd formerly for other things, which bore a nearer resemblance to those discourses of Horace. In explaining of which, continues Dacier, a method is to be pursued, of which Casaubon himself has never thought, and which will put all things into so clear a light, that no farther room will be left for the least dispute.

During the space of almost four hundred years, since the building of their city, the Romans had never known any entertainments of the stage. Chance and jollity first found out those verses which they call'd Saturnian and Fescennine; or rather human nature, which is inclin'd to poetry, first produc'd them, rude and barbarous, and unpolish'd, as all other operations of the soul are in their beginnings, before they are cultivated with art and study. However, in occasions of merriment they were first practic'd; and this roughcast unhewn poetry was instead of stageplays for the space of an hundred and twenty years together. They were made ex tempore, and were, as the French call them, impromptus; for which the Tarsians of old were much renown'd; and we see the daily examples of them in the Italian farces of Harlequin and Scaramucha. Such was the poetry of that salvage people, before it was tun'd into numbers, and the harmony of verse. Little of the Saturnian verses is now remaining; we only know from authors that they were nearer prose than poetry, without feet, or measure. They were εὐρυθμοί, but not εὐμετροί. Perhaps they might be us'd in the solemn part of their ceremonies; and the Fescennine, which were invented after them, in their afternoon's debauchery, because they were scoffing and obscene.

The Fescennine and Saturnian were the same; for as they were call'd Saturnian from their ancientness, when Saturn reign'd in Italy, they were also call'd Fescennine, from Fescennia, a town in the same country, where they were first practic'd. The actors, with a gross and rustic kind of railery, reproach'd each other with their failings; and at the same time were nothing sparing of it to their audience. Somewhat of this custom was afterwards retain'd in their Saturnalia, or feasts of Saturn, celebrated in December; at least all kind of freedom in speech was then allow'd to slaves even against their masters; and we are not without some imitation of it in our Christmas gambols. Soldiers also us'd those Fescennine verses, after measure and numbers had been added to them, at the triumph of their generals: of which we have an example, in the triumph of Julius Cæsar over Gaul, in these expressions:

Cæsar Gallias subegit, Nicomedes Cæsarem.

Ecce Cæsar nunc triumphat, qui subegit Gallias:

Nicomedes non triumphat, qui subegit Cæsarem.

The vapors of wine made those first satirical poets amongst the Romans; which, says Dacier, we cannot better represent, than by imagining a company of clowns on a holiday, dancing lubberly, and upbraiding one another, in ex tempore doggrel, with their defects and vices, and the stories that were told of them in bakehouses and barbers' shops.

When they began to be somewhat better bred, and were ent'ring, as I may say, into the first rudiments of civil conversation, they left these hedge-notes for another sort of poem, somewhat polish'd, which was also full of pleasant rallery, but without any mixture of obscenity. This sort of poetry appear'd under the name of satire, because of its variety; and this satire was adorn'd with compositions of music, and with dances; but lascivious postures were banish'd from it. In the Tuscan language, says Livy, the word hister signifies a player; and therefore those actors, which were first brought from Etruria to Rome, on occasion of a pestilence, when the Romans were admonish'd to avert the anger of the gods by plays, in the year ab urbe condita CCCXC, those actors, I say, were therefore call'd histriones; and that name has since remain'd, not only to actors Roman born, but to all others of every nation. They play'd not the former ex tempore stuff of Fescennine verses, or clownish jests; but what they acted was a kind of civil, cleanly farce, with music and dances, and motions that were proper to the subject.

In this condition Livius Andronicus found the stage, when he attempted first, instead of farces, to supply it with a nobler entertainment of tragedies and comedies. This man was a Grecian born, and being made a slave by Livius Salinator, and brought to Rome, had the education of his patron's children committed to him; which trust he discharg'd so much to the satisfaction of his master, that he gave him his liberty.

Andronicus, thus become a freeman of Rome, added to his own name that of Livius his master; and, as I observ'd, was the first author of a regular play in that commonwealth. Being already instructed, in his native country, in the manners and decencies of the Athenian theater, and conversant in the Archæ Comædia, or Old Comedy of Aristophanes, and the rest of the Grecian poets, he took from that model his own designing of plays for the Roman stage; the first of which was represented in the year 514 since the building of Rome, as Tully, from the commentaries of Atticus, has assur'd us: it was after the end of the first Punic war, the year before Ennius was born. Dacier has not carried the matter altogether thus far; he only says, that one Livius Andronicus was the first stage-poet at Rome. But I will adventure on this hint, to advance another proposition, which I hope the learned will approve. And tho' we have not anything of Andronicus remaining to justify my conjecture, yet 't is exceeding probable, that, having read the works of those Grecian wits, his countrymen, he imitated not only the groundwork, but also the manner of their writing; and how grave soever his tragedies might be, yet, in his comedies, he express'd the way of Aristophanes, Eupolis, and the rest, which was to call some persons by their own names, and to expose their defects to the laughter of the people: the examples of which we have in the foremention'd Aristophanes, who turn'd the wise Socrates into ridicule, and is also very free with the management of Cleon, Alcibiades, and other ministers of the Athenian government. Now if this be granted, we may easily suppose that the first hint of satirical plays on the Roman stage was given by the Greeks: not from their Satyrice, for that has been reasonably exploded in the former part of this discourse; but from their Old Comedy, which was imitated first by Livius Andronicus. And then Quintilian and Horace must be cautiously interpreted, where they affirm that satire is wholly Roman, and a sort of verse, which was not touch'd on by the Grecians. The reconciliation of my opinion to the standard of their judgment is not, however, very difficult, since they spoke of satire, not as in its first elements, but as it was form'd into a separate work; begun by Ennius, pursued by Lucilius, and completed afterwards by Horace. The proof depends only on this postulatum, that the comedies of Andronicus, which were imitations of the Greek, were also imitations of their ralleries, and reflections on particular persons. For, if this be granted me, which is a most probable supposition, 't is easy to infer that the first light which was given to the Roman theatrical satire, was from the plays of Livius Andronicus; which will be more manifestly discover'd when I come to speak of Ennius. In the mean time I will return to Dacier.

The people, says he, ran in crowds to these new entertainments of Andronicus, as to pieces which were more noble in their kind, and more perfect than their former satires, which for some time they neglected and abandon'd. But not long after, they took them up again, and then they join'd them to their comedies; playing them at the end of every drama, as the French continue at this day to act their farces, in the nature of a separate entertainment from their tragedies. But more particularly they were join'd to the Atellane fables, says Casaubon; which were plays invented by the Osci. Those fables, says Valerius Maximus, out of Livy, were temper'd with the Italian severity, and free from any note of infamy, or obscenity; and, as an old commentator on Juvenal affirms, the Exo-phiarii, which were singers and dancers, enter'd to entertain the people with light songs, and mimical gestures, that they might not go away oppress'd with melancholy, from those serious pieces of the theater. So that the ancient satire of the Romans was in extemporary reproaches; the next was farce, which was brought from Tuscany; to that succeeded the plays of Andronicus, from the Old Comedy of the Grecians; and out of all these sprung two several branches of new Roman satire, like different scions from the same root, which I shall prove with as much brevity as the subject will allow.

A year after Andronicus had open'd the Roman stage with his new dramas, Ennius was born; who, when he was grown to man's estate, having seriously consider'd the genius of the people, and how eagerly they follow'd the first satires, thought it would be worth his pains to refine upon the project, and to write satires, not to be acted on the theater, but read. He preserv'd the groundwork of their pleantry, their venom, and their raillery on particular persons, and general vices; and by this means, avoiding the danger of any ill success in a public representation, he hop'd to be as well receiv'd in the cabinet, as Andronicus had been upon the stage. The event was answerable to his expectation. He made discourses in several sorts of verse, varied often in the same paper; retaining still in the title their original name of satire. Both in relation to the subjects, and the variety of matters contain'd in them, the satires of Horace are entirely like them; only Ennius, as I said, confines not himself to one sort of verse, as Horace does; but taking example from the Greeks, and even from Homer himself in his Margites, which is a kind of satire, as Scaliger observes, gives himself the license, when one sort of numbers comes not easily, to run into another, as his fancy dictates. For he makes no difficulty to mingle hexameters with iambic trimeters, or with trochaic tetrameters; as appears by those fragments which are yet remaining of him. Horace has thought him worthy to be copied; inserting many things of his into his own Satires, as Virgil has done into his Aeneids.

Here we have Dacier making out that Ennius was the first satirist in that way of writing, which was of his invention; that is, satire abstracted from the stage, and new-model'd into papers of verses on several subjects. But he will have Ennius take the groundwork of satire from the first farces of the Romans, rather than from the form'd plays of Livius Andronicus, which were copied from the Grecian comedies. It may possibly be so; but Dacier knows no more of it than I do. And it seems to me the more probable opinion, that he rather imitated the fine railleries of the Greeks, which he saw in the pieces of Andronicus, than the coarseness of his old countrymen, in their clownish extemporary way of jeering.

But besides this, 't is universally granted that Ennius, tho' an Italian, was excellently learn'd in the Greek language. His verses were stuff'd with fragments of it, even to a fault; and he himself believ'd, according to the Pythagorean opinion, that the soul of Homer was transfus'd into him; which Persius observes, in his Sixth Satire: postquam destertuit esse Mæonides. But this being only the private opinion of so inconsiderable a man as I am, I leave it to the farther disquisition of the critics, if they think it worth their notice. Most evident it is, that whether he imitated the Roman farce, or the Greek comedies, he is to be acknowledged for the first author of Roman satire, as it is properly so call'd, and distinguish'd from any sort of stageplay.

Of Pacuvius, who succeeded him, there is little to be said, because there is so little remaining of him; only that he is taken to be the nephew of Ennius, his sister's son; that in probability he was instructed by his uncle, in his way of satire, which we are told he has copied: but what advances he made we know not.

Lucilius came into the world when Pacuvius flourish'd most. He also made satires after the manner of Ennius, but he gave them a more graceful turn, and endeavor'd to imitate more closely the Vetus Comœdia of the Greeks, of the which the old original Roman satire had no idea, till the time of Livius Andronicus. And tho' Horace seems to have made Lucilius the first author of satire in verse amongst the Romans, in these words:

— Quid? cum est Lucilius ausus Primus in hunc operis componere carmina morem,

he is only thus to be understood; that Lucilius had given a more graceful turn to the satire of Ennius and Pacuvius, not that he invented a new satire of his own: and Quintilian seems to explain this passage of Horace in these words: Satira quidem tota nostra est; in qua primus insignem laudem adeptus est Lucilius.

Thus, both Horace and Quintilian give a kind of primacy of honor to Lucilius, amongst the Latin satirists. For, as the Roman language grew more refin'd, so much more capable it was of receiving the Grecian beauties, in his time. Horace and Quintilian could mean no more, than that Lucilius writ better than Ennius and Pacuvius; and on the same account we prefer Horace to Lucilius. Both of them imitated the old Greek comedy; and so did Ennius and Pacuvius before them. The polishing of the Latin tongue, in the succession of times, made the only difference; and Horace himself, in two of his satires, written purposely on this subject, thinks the Romans of his age were too partial in their commendations of Lucilius; who writ not only loosely, and muddily, with little art, and much less care, but also in a time when the Latin tongue was not yet sufficiently purg'd from the dregs of barbarism; and many significant and sounding words, which the Romans wanted, were not admitted even in the times of Lucretius and Cicero, of which both complain.

But to proceed: Dacier justly taxes Casaubon for saying that the satires of Lucilius were wholly different in specie from those of Ennius and Pacuvius. Casaubon was led into that mistake by Diomedes the grammarian, who in effect says this: satire amongst the Romans, but not amongst the Greeks, was a biting invective poem, made after the model of the ancient comedy, for the reprehension of vices; such as were the poems of Lucilius, of Horace, and of Persius. But in former times the name of satire was given to poems which were compos'd of several sorts of verses, such as were made by Ennius and Pacuvius; more fully expressing the etymology of the word satire, from satura, which we have observ'd. Here 't is manifest, that Diomedes makes a specific distinction betwixt the satires of Ennius, and those of Lucilius. But this, as we say in English, is only a distinction without a difference; for the reason of it is ridiculous, and absolutely false. This was that which cozen'd honest Casaubon, who, relying on Diomedes, had not sufficiently examin'd the origin and nature of those two satires; which were entirely the same, both in the matter and the form: for all that Lucilius perform'd beyond his predecessors, Ennius and Pacuvius, was only the adding of more politeness, and more salt, without any change in the substance of the poem. And tho' Lucilius put not together in the same satire several sorts of verses, as Ennius did, yet he compos'd several satires, of several sorts of verses, and mingled them with Greek verses: one poem consisted only of hexameters, and another was entirely of iambs; a third of trochaics; as is visible by the fragments yet remaining of his works. In short, if the satires of Lucilius are therefore said to be wholly different from those of Ennius, because he added much more of beauty and polishing to his own poems than are to be found in those before him, it will follow from hence that the satires of Horace are wholly different from those of Lucilius, because Horace has not less surpass'd Lucilius in the elegance of his writing, than Lucilius surpass'd Ennius in the turn and ornament of his. This passage of Diomedes has also drawn Dousa, the son, into the same error of Casaubon, which I say, not to expose the little failings of those judicious men, but only to make it appear, with how much diffidence and caution we are to read their works, when they treat a subject of so much obscurity, and so very ancient, as is this of satire.

Having thus brought down the history of satire from its original to the times of Horace, and shewn the several changes of it, I should here discover some of those graces which Horace added to it, but that I think it will be more proper to defer that undertaking, till I make the comparison betwixt him and Juvenal. In the mean while, following the order of time, it will be necessary to say somewhat of another kind of satire, which also was descended from the ancient; 't is that which we call the Varroian satire, (but which Varro himself calls the Menippean,) because Varro, the most learn'd of the Romans, was the first author of it, who imitated, in his works, the manners of Menippus the Gadarenian, who profess'd the philosophy of the Cynics.

This sort of satire was not only compos'd of several sorts of verse, like those of Ennius, but was also mix'd with prose; and Greek was sprinkled amongst the Latin. Quintilian, after he had spoken of the satire of Lucilius, adds what follows: There is another and former kind of satire, compos'd by Terentius Varro, the most learn'd of the Romans; in which he was not satisfied alone with mingling in it several sorts of verse. The only difficulty of this passage is, that Quintilian tells us that this satire of Varro was of a former kind. For how can we possibly imagine this to be, since Varro, who was contemporary to Cicero, must consequently be after Lucilius? But Quintilian meant not, that the satire of Varro was in order of time before Lucilius; he would only give us to understand, that the Varronian satire, with mixture of several sorts of verses, was more after the manner of Ennius and Pacuvius, than that of Lucilius, who was more severe, and more correct, and gave himself less liberty in the mixture of his verses in the same poem.

We have nothing remaining of those Varroian satires, excepting some inconsiderable fragments, and those for the most part much corrupted. The titles of many of them are indeed preserv'd, and they are generally double; from whence, at least, we may understand, how many various subjects were treated by that author. Tully, in his Academics, introduces Varro himself giving us some light concerning the scope and design of these works. Wherein, after he had shewn his reasons why he did not ex professo write of philosophy, he adds what follows: Notwithstanding, says he, that those pieces of mine, wherein I have imitated Menippus, tho' I have not translated him, are sprinkled with a kind of mirth and gaiety, yet many things are there inserted, which are drawn from the very intrails of philosophy, and many things severely argued; which I have mingled with pleasantries on purpose, that they may more easily go down with the common sort of unlearn'd readers. The rest of the sentence is so lame, that we can only make thus much out of it, that in the composition of his satires he so temper'd philology with philosophy, that his work was a mixture of them both. And Tully himself confirms us in this opinion, when a little after he addresses himself to Varro in these words: And you yourself have compos'd a most elegant and complete poem; you have begun philosophy in many places; sufficient to incite us, tho' too little to instruct us. Thus it appears that Varro was one of those writers whom they call'd σπουδαγέλοιοι, studious of laughter; and that, as learned as he was, his business was more to divert his reader, than to teach him. And he entitled his own satires Menippean; not that Menippus had written any satires, (for his were either dialogues or epistles,) but that Varro imitated his style, his manner, and his facetiousness. All that we know farther of Menippus and his writings, which are wholly lost, is that by some he is esteem'd, as, amongst the rest, by Varro; by others he is noted of cynical impudence and obscenity; that he was much given to those parodies which I have already mention'd; that is, he often quoted the verses of Homer and the tragic poets, and turn'd their serious meaning into something that was ridiculous; whereas Varro's satires are by Tully call'd absolute, and most elegant and various poems. Lucian, who was emulous of this Menippus, seems to have imitated both his manners and his style in many of his Dialogues; where Menippus himself is often introduc'd as a speaker in them, and as a perpetual buffoon; particularly his character is express'd in the beginning of that dialogue which is call'd Νεκυιαρχία. But Varro, in imitating him, avoids his impudence and filthiness, and only expresses his witty pleasantry.

This we may believe for certain, that as his subjects were various, so most of them were tales or stories of his own invention. Which is also manifest from antiquity, by those authors who are acknowledg'd to have written Varronian satires, in imitation of his; of whom the chief is Petronius Arbiter, whose satire, they say, is now printing in Holland, wholly recover'd and made complete: when 't is made public, it will easily be seen by any one sentence, whether it be supposititious, or genuine. Many of Lucian's Dialogues may also properly be call'd Varronian satires, particularly his True History; and consequently the Golden Ass of Apuleius, which is taken from him. Of the same stamp is the mock deification of Claudius, by Seneca; and the Symposium or Cæsars of Julian the Emperor. Amongst the moderns, we may reckon the Encomium Morie of Erasmus, Barclay's Euphormio, and a volume of German authors, which my ingenious friend, Mr. Charles Killegrew, once lent me. In the English, I remember none which are mix'd with prose, as Varro's were; but of the same kind is Mother Hubbard's Tale, in Spenser; and (if it be not too vain to mention anything of my own) the poems of Absalom and Mac Flecknoe.

This is what I have to say in general of satire; only, as Dacier has observ'd before me, we may take notice that the word satire is of a more general signification in Latin, than in French, or English. For amongst the Romans it was not only us'd for those discourses which decried vice, or expos'd folly, but for others also, where virtue was recommended. But in our modern languages we apply it only to invective poems, where the very name of satire is formidable to those persons who would appear to the world what they are not in themselves; for in English, to say satire, is to mean reflection, as we use that word in the worst sense; or as the French call it, more properly, méditation. In the criticism of spelling, it ought to be with i, and not with y, to distinguish its true derivation from satura, not from satyrus. And if this be so, then 't is false spell'd throughout this book; for here 't is written satyr: which having not consider'd at the first, I thought it not worth correcting afterwards. But the French are more nice, and never spell it any other ways than satire.

I am now arriv'd at the most difficult part of my undertaking, which is, to compare Horace with Juvenal and Persius. 'T is observ'd by Rigaltius, in his preface before Juvenal, written to Thuanus, that these three poets have all their particular partisans and favorers. Every commentator, as he has taken pains with any of them, thinks himself oblig'd to prefer his author to the other two; to find out their failings, and decry them, that he may make room for his own darling. Such is the partiality of mankind, to set up that interest which they have once espous'd, tho' it be to the prejudice of truth, morality, and common justice; and especially in the productions of the brain. As authors generally think themselves the best poets, because they cannot go out of themselves to judge sincerely of their betters; so it is with critics, who, having first taken a liking to one of these poets, proceed to comment on him, and to illustrate him; after which, they fall in love with their own labors, to that degree of blind fondness, that at length they defend and exalt their author, not so much for his sake as for their own. 'T is a folly of the same nature with that of the Romans themselves, in their games of the Circus. The spectators were divided in their factions, betwixt the Veneti and the Prasini; some were for the charioteer in blue, and some for him in green. The colors themselves were but a fancy; but when once a man had taken pains to set out those of his party, and had been at the trouble of procuring voices for them, the case was alter'd; he was concern'd for his own labor, and that so earnestly, that disputes and quarrels, animosities, commotions, and bloodshed, often happen'd; and in the declension of the Grecian Empire, the very sovereigns themselves engag'd in it, even when the barbarians were at their doors, and stickled for the preference of colors, when the safety of their people was in question. I am now myself on the brink of the same precipice; I have spent some time on the translation of Juvenal and Persius; and it behoves me to be wary, lest, for that reason, I should be partial to them, or take a prejudice against Horace. Yet, on the other side, I would not be like some of our judges, who would give the cause for a poor man, right or wrong; for, tho' that be an error on the better hand, yet it is still a partiality; and a rich man, unheard, cannot be concluded an oppressor. I remember a saying of K. Charles the Second, on Sir Matthew Hale, (who was doubtless an uncorrupt and upright man,) that his servants were sure to be cast on any trial which was heard before him; not that he thought the judge was possibly to be brib'd, but that his integrity might be too scrupulous; and that the causes of the crown were always suspicious, when the privileges of subjects were concern'd.

It had been much fairer, if the modern critics, who have imbark'd in the quarrels of their favorite authors, had rather given to each his proper due; without taking from another's heap, to raise their own. There is praise enough for each of them in particular, without encroaching on his fellows, and detracting from them, or enriching themselves with the spoils of others. But to come to particulars. Heinsius and Dacier are the most principal of those who raise Horace above Juvenal and Persius. Scaliger the father, Rigaltius, and many others, debase Horace, that they may set up Juvenal; and Casaubon, who is almost single, throws dirt on Juvenal and Horace, that he may exalt Persius, whom he understood particularly well, and better than any of his former commentators; even Stelluti, who succeeded him. I will begin with him, who, in my opinion, defends the weakest cause, which is that of Persius; and laboring, as Tacitus professes of his own writing, to divest myself of partiality, or prejudice, consider Persius, not as a poet whom I have wholly translated, and who has cost me more labor and time than Juvenal, but according to what I judge to be his own merit; which I think not equal, in the main, to that of Juvenal or Horace, and yet in some things to be preferr'd to both of them.

First, then, for the verse; neither Casaubon himself, nor any for him, can defend either his numbers, or the purity of his Latin. Casaubon gives this point for lost, and pretends not to justify either the measures or the words of Persius; he is evidently beneath Horace and Juvenal in both.

Then, as his verse is scabrous and hobbling, and his words not everywhere well chosen, the purity of Latin being more corrupted than in the time of Juvenal, and consequently of Horace, who writ when the language was in the height of its perfection, so his diction is hard, his figures are generally too bold and daring, and his tropes, particularly his metaphors, insufferably strain'd.

In the third place, notwithstanding all the diligence of Casaubon, Stelluti, and a Scotch gentleman, (whom I have heard extremely commended for his illustrations of him,) yet he is still obscure: whether he affected not to be understood, but with difficulty; or whether the fear of his safety under Nero compell'd him to this darkness in some places; or that it was occasion'd by his close way of thinking, and the brevity of his style, and crowding of his figures; or lastly, whether, after so long a time, many of his words have been corrupted, and many customs, and stories relating to them, lost to us: whether some of these reasons, or all, concurr'd to render him so cloudy, we may be bold to affirm, that the best of commentators can but guess at his meaning, in many passages; and none can be certain that he has divin'd rightly.

After all, he was a young man, like his friend and contemporary Lucan; both of them men of extraordinary parts, and great acquir'd knowledge, considering their youth: but neither of them had arriv'd to that maturity of judgment which is necessary to the accomplishing of a form'd poet. And this consideration, as, on the one hand, it lays some imperfections to their charge, so, on the other side, 'tis a candid excuse for those failings which are incident to youth and inexperience; and we have more reason to wonder how they, who died before the thirtieth year of their age, could write so well, and think so strongly, than to accuse them of those faults from which human nature, and more especially in youth, can never possibly be exempted.

To consider Persius yet more closely: he rather insulted over vice and folly, than expos'd them, like Juvenal and Horace; and as chaste and modest as he is esteem'd, it cannot be denied but that in some places he is broad and fulsome, as the latter verses of the Fourth Satire, and of the Sixth, sufficiently witness. And 't is to be believ'd that he who commits the same crime often, and without necessity, cannot but do it with some kind of pleasure.

To come to a conclusion: he is manifestly below Horace, because he borrows most of his greatest beauties from him; and Casaubon is so far from denying this, that he has written a treatise purposely concerning it, wherein he shews a multitude of his translations from Horace, and his imitations of him, for the credit of his author; which he calls Imitatio Horatiana.

To these defects, which I casually observ'd while I was translating this author, Scaliger has added others; he calls him, in plain terms, a silly writer and a trifler, full of ostentation of his learning, and, after all, unworthy to come into competition with Juvenal and Horace.

After such terrible accusations, 't is time to hear what his patron Casaubon can allege in his defense. Instead of answering, he excuses for the most part; and, when he cannot, accuses others of the same crimes. He deals with Scaliger, as a modest scholar with a master. He compliments him with so much reverence, that one would swear he fear'd him as much at least as he respected him. Scaliger will not allow Persius to have any wit; Casaubon interprets this in the mildest sense, and confesses his author was not good at turning things into a pleasant ridicule; or, in other words, that he was not a laughable writer. That he was ineptus, indeed, but that was non aptissimus ad jocandum; but that he was ostentatious of his learning, that, by Scaliger's good favor, he denies. Persius shew'd his learning, but was no boaster of it; he did ostendere, but not ostentare; and so, he says, did Scaliger: where, methinks, Casaubon turns it handsomely upon that supercilious critic, and silently insinuates that he himself was sufficiently vainglorious, and a boaster of his own knowledge. All the writings of this venerable censor, continues Casaubon, which are χρυσὸν χρυσόβρεπα, more golden than gold itself, are everywhere smelling of that thyme which, like a bee, he has gather'd from ancient authors; but far be ostentation and vainglory from a gentleman so well born, and so nobly educated as Scaliger. But, says Scaliger, he is so obscure, that he has got himself the name of Scotinus, a dark writer. Now, says Casaubon, 't is a wonder to me that anything could be obscure to the divine wit of Scaliger, from which nothing could be hidden. This is indeed a strong compliment, but no defense; and Casaubon, who could not but be sensible of his author's blind side, thinks it time to abandon a post that was untenable. He acknowledges that Persius is obscure in some places; but so is Plato, so is Thucydides; so are Pindar, Theocritus, and Aristophanes, amongst the Greek poets; and even Horace and Juvenal, he might have added, amongst the Romans. The truth is, Persius is not sometimes, but generally, obscure; and therefore Casaubon, at last, is forc'd to excuse him, by alleging that it was se defendendo, for fear of Nero; and that he was commanded to write so cloudily by Cornutus, in virtue of holy obedience to his master. I cannot help my own opinion; I think Cornutus needed not to have read many lectures to him on that subject. Persius was an apt scholar; and when he was bidden to be obscure in some places, where his life and safety were in question, took the same counsel for all his book; and never afterwards wrote ten lines together clearly. Casaubon, being upon this chapter, has not fail'd, we may be sure, of making a compliment to his own dear comment. If Persius, says he, be in himself obscure, yet my interpretation has made him intelligible. There is no question but he deserves that praise which he has given to himself; but the nature of the thing, as Lucretius says, will not admit of a perfect explanation. Besides many examples which I could urge, the very last verse of his last satire, upon which he particularly values himself in his preface, is not yet sufficiently explicated. 'T is true, Holyday has endeavor'd to justify his construction; but Stelluti is against it; and, for my part, I can have but a very dark notion of it. As for the chastity of his thoughts, Casaubon denies not but that one particular passage, in the Fourth Satire: At si unctus cesses, &c., is not only the most obscure, but the most obscene of all his works. I understood it, but for that reason turn'd it over. In defense of his boist'rous metaphors, he quotes Longinus, who accounts them as instruments of the sublime; fit to move and stir up the affections, particularly in narration. To which it may be replied, that where the trope is farfetch'd and hard 't is fit for nothing but to puzzle the understanding; and may be reckon'd amongst those things of Demosthenes which Æschines call'd θαύματα, not ῥήματα, that is, prodigies, not words. It must be granted to Casaubon, that the knowledge of many things is lost in our modern ages, which were of familiar notice to the ancients; and that satire is a poem of a difficult nature in itself, and is not written to vulgar readers: and thro' the relation which it has to comedy, the frequent change of persons makes the sense perplex'd, when we can but divine who it is that speaks; whether Persius himself, or his friend and monitor; or, in some places, a third person. But Casaubon comes back always to himself, and concludes, that if Persius had not been obscure, there had been no need of him for an interpreter. Yet when he had once enjoin'd himself so hard a task, he then consider'd the Greek proverb, that he must χελώνης φαγεῖν ἢ μὴ φαγεῖν, either eat the whole snail, or let it quite alone; and so he went thro' with his laborious task, as I have done with my difficult translation.

Thus far, my Lord, you see it has gone very hard with Persius: I think he cannot be allow'd to stand in competition either with Juvenal or Horace. Yet for once I will venture to be so vain as to affirm, that none of his hard metaphors, or forc'd expressions, are in my translation. But more of this in its proper place, where I shall say somewhat in particular of our general performance, in making these two authors English. In the mean time, I think myself oblig'd to give Persius his undoubted due, and to acquaint the world, with Casaubon, in what he has equal'd, and in what excell'd, his two competitors.

A man who is resolv'd to praise an author, with any appearance of justice, must be sure to take him on the strongest side, and where he is least liable to exceptions. He is therefore oblig'd to choose his mediums accordingly. Casaubon, who saw that Persius could not laugh with a becoming grace, that he was not made for jesting, and that a merry conceit was not his talent, turn'd his feather, like an Indian, to another light, that he might give it the better gloss. Moral doctrine, says he, and urbanity, or well-manner'd wit, are the two things which constitute the Roman satire; but of the two, that which is most essential to this poem, and is, as it were, the very soul which animates it, is the scourging of vice and exhortation to virtue. Thus wit, for a good reason, is already almost out of doors; and allow'd only for an instrument, a kind of tool, or a weapon, as he calls it, of which the satirist makes use in the compassing of his design. The end and aim of our three rivals is consequently the same. But by what methods they have prosecuted their intention is farther to be consider'd. Satire is of the nature of moral philosophy, as being instructive: he, therefore, who instructs most usefully, will carry the palm from his two antagonists. The philosophy in which Persius was educated, and which he professes thro' his whole book, is the Stoic; the most noble, most generous, most beneficial to humankind, amongst all the sects, who have given us the rules of ethics, thereby to form a severe virtue in the soul; to raise in us an undaunted courage against the assaults of fortune; to esteem as nothing the things that are without us, because they are not in our power; not to value riches, beauty, honors, fame, or health, any farther than as conveniences, and so many helps to living as we ought, and doing good in our generation: in short, to be always happy, while we possess our minds with a good conscience, are free from the slavery of vices, and conform our actions and conversation to the rules of right reason. See here, my Lord, an epitome of Epictetus; the doctrine of Zeno, and the education of our Persius: and this he express'd, not only in all his satires, but in the manner of his life. I will not lessen this commendation of the Stoic philosophy by giving you an account of some absurdities in their doctrine, and some perhaps impieties, if we consider them by the standard of Christian faith. Persius has fall'n into none of them; and therefore is free from those imputations. What he teaches might be taught from pulpits, with more profit to the audience than all the nice speculations of divinity, and controversies concerning faith;

which are more for the profit of the shepherd than for the edification of the flock. Passion, interest, ambition, and all their bloody consequences of discord and of war, are banish'd from this doctrine. Here is nothing propos'd but the quiet and tranquillity of mind; Virtue lodg'd at home, and afterwards diffus'd in her general effects, to the improvement and good of humankind. And therefore I wonder not that the present Bishop of Salisbury has recommended this our author, and the Tenth Satire of Juvenal, in his Pastoral Letter, to the serious perusal and practice of the divines in his diocese, as the best commonplaces for their sermons, as the storehouses and magazines of moral virtues, from whence they may draw out, as they have occasion, all manner of assistance for the accomplishment of a virtuous life, which the Stoics have assign'd for the great end and perfection of mankind. Herein then it is, that Persius has excell'd both Juvenal and Horace. He sticks to his one philosophy; he shifts not sides, like Horace, who is sometimes an Epicurean, sometimes a Stoic, sometimes an Eclectic, as his present humor leads him; nor declaims like Juvenal against vices, more like an orator than a philosopher. Persius is everywhere the same; true to the dogmas of his master. What he has learnt, he teaches vehemently; and what he teaches, that he practices himself. There is a spirit of sincerity in all he says; you may easily discern that he is in earnest, and is persuaded of that truth which he inculcates. In this I am of opinion that he excels Horace, who is commonly in jest, and laughs while he instructs; and is equal to Juvenal, who was as honest and serious as Persius, and more he could not be.

Hitherto I have follow'd Casaubon, and enlarg'd upon him, because I am satisfied that he says no more than truth; the rest is almost all frivolous. For he says that Horace, being the son of a taxgatherer, or a collector, as we call it, smells everywhere of the meanness of his birth and education: his conceits are vulgar, like the subjects of his satire; that he does plebeium sapere, and writes not with that elevation which becomes a satirist: that Persius, being nobly born, and of an opulent family, had likewise the advantage of a better master; Cornutus being the most learned of his time, a man of a most holy life, the chief of the Stoic sect at Rome, and not only a great philosopher, but a poet himself, and in probability a coadjutor of Persius: that, as for Juvenal, he was long a declaimer, came late to poetry, and had not been much conversant in philosophy.

'Tis granted that the father of Horace was libertinus, that is, one degree remov'd from his grandfather, who had been once a slave. But Horace, speaking of him, gives him the best character of a father which I ever read in history; and I wish a witty friend of mine, now living, had such another. He bred him in the best school, and with the best company of young noblemen; and Horace, by his gratitude to his memory, gives a certain testimony that his education was ingenuous. After this, he form'd himself abroad, by the conversation of great men. Brutus found him at Athens, and was so pleas'd with him that he took him thence into the army, and made him tribunus militum, a colonel in a legion, which was the preferment of an old soldier. All this was before his acquaintance with Mæcenas, and his introduction into the court of Augustus, and the familiarity of that great emperor; which, had he not been well-bred before, had been enough to civilize his conversation, and render him accomplish'd and knowing in all the arts of complacency and good behavior; and, in short, an agreeable companion for the retir'd hours and privacies of a favorite, who was first minister. So that, upon the whole matter, Persius may be acknowledg'd to be equal with him in those respects, tho' better born, and Juvenal inferior to both. If the advantage be anywhere, 't is on the side of Horace; as much as the court of Augustus Cæsar was superior to that of Nero. As for the subjects which they treated, it will appear hereafter that Horace writ not vulgarly on vulgar subjects, nor always chose them. His style is constantly accommodated to his subject, either high or low. If his fault be too much lowness, that of Persius is the fault of the hardness of his metaphors, and obscurity: and so they are equal in the failings of their style; where Juvenal manifestly triumphs over both of them.

The comparison betwixt Horace and Juvenal is more difficult, because their forces were more equal. A dispute has always been, and ever will continue, betwixt the favorers of the two poets. Non nostrum est tantas componere lites. I shall only venture to give my own opinion, and leave it for better judges to determine. If it be only argued in general, which of them was the better poet, the victory is already gain'd on the side of Horace; Virgil himself must yield to him in the delicacy of his turns, his choice of words, and perhaps the purity of his Latin. He who says that Pindar is inimitable, is himself inimitable in his Odes. But the contention betwixt these two great masters is for the prize of satire; in which controversy all the Odes and Epodes of Horace are to stand excluded. I say this, because Horace has written many of them satirically, against his private enemies; yet these, if justly consider'd, are somewhat of the nature of the Greek silli, which were invectives against particular sects and persons. But Horace had purg'd himself of this choler before he enter'd on those discourses which are more properly call'd the Roman satire. He has not now to do with a Lyce, a Canidia, a Cassius Severus, or a Menas; but is to correct the vices and the follies of his time, and to give the rules of a happy and virtuous life. In a word, that former sort of satire, which is known in England by the name of lampoon, is a dangerous sort of weapon, and for the most part unlawful. We have no moral right on the reputation of other men. 'Tis taking from them what we cannot restore to them. There are only two reasons for which we may be permitted to write lampoons; and I will not promise that they can always justify us. The first is revenge, when we have been affronted in the same nature, or have been any ways notoriously abus'd, and can make ourselves no other reparation. And yet we know, that, in Christian charity, all offenses are to be forgiven, as we expect the like pardon for those which we daily commit against Almighty God. And this consideration has often made me tremble when I was saying our Savior's prayer; for the plain condition of the forgiveness which we beg is the pardoning of others the offenses which they have done to us; for which reason I have many times avoided the commission of that fault, ev'n when I have been notoriously provok'd. Let not this, my Lord, pass for vanity in me; for 'tis truth. More libels have been written against me, than almost any man now living; and I had reason on my side, to have defended my own innocence. I speak not of my poetry, which I have wholly given up to the critics: let them use it as they please; posterity, perhaps, may be more favorable to me; for interest and passion will lie buried in another age, and partiality and prejudice be forgotten. I speak of my morals, which have been sufficiently aspers'd: that only sort of reputation ought to be dear to every honest man, and is to me. But let the world witness for me, that I have been often wanting to myself in that particular; I have seldom answer'd any scurrilous lampoon, when it was in my power to have expos'd my enemies; and, being naturally vindictive, have suffer'd in silence, and possess'd my soul in quiet.

Anything, tho' never so little, which a man speaks of himself, in my opinion, is still too much; and therefore I will waive this subject, and proceed to give the second reason which may justify a poet when he writes against a particular person; and that is, when he is become a public nuisance. All those whom Horace in his Satires, and Persius and Juvenal have mention'd in theirs, with a brand of infamy, are wholly such. 'Tis an action of virtue to make examples of vicious men. They may and ought to be upbraided with their crimes and follies; both for their own amendment, if they are not yet incorrigible, and for the terror of others, to hinder them from falling into those enormities which they see are so severely punish'd in the persons of others. The first reason was only an excuse for revenge; but this second is absolutely of a poet's office to perform: but how few lampooners are there now living, who are capable of this duty! When they come in my way, 'tis impossible sometimes to avoid reading them. But, good God! how remote they are, in common justice, from the choice of such persons as are the proper subject of satire! And how little wit they bring for the support of their injustice! The weaker sex is their most ordinary theme, and the best and fairest are sure to be the most severely handled. Amongst men, those who are prosperously unjust are intitled to a panegyric, but afflicted virtue is insolently stabb'd with all manner of reproaches; no decency is consider'd, no fulsomeness omitted; no venom is wanting, as far as dullness can supply it: for there is a perpetual dearth of wit, a barrenness of good sense and entertainment. The neglect of the readers will soon put an end to this sort of scribbling. There can be no pleasantry where there is no wit; no impression can be made where there is no truth for the foundation. To conclude: they are like the fruits of the earth in this unnatural season; the corn which held up its head is spoil'd with rankness; but the greater part of the harvest is laid along, and little of good income and wholesome nourishment is receiv'd into the barns. This is almost a digression, I confess to your Lordship; but a just indignation forc'd it from me. Now I have remov'd this rubbish, I will return to the comparison of Juvenal and Horace.

I would willingly divide the palm betwixt them, upon the two heads of profit and delight, which are the two ends of poetry in general. It must be granted by the favorers of Juvenal, that Horace is the more copious and profitable in his instructions of human life; but, in my particular opinion, which I set not up for a standard to better judgments, Juvenal is the more delightful author. I am profited by both, I am pleas'd with both; but I owe more to Horace for my instruction, and more to Juvenal for my pleasure. This, as I said, is my particular taste of these two authors: they who will have either of them to excel the other in both qualities, can scarce give better reasons for their opinion than I for mine. But all unbiass'd readers will conclude that my moderation is not to be condemn'd: to such impartial men I must appeal; for they who have already form'd their judgment may justly stand suspected of prejudice; and tho' all who are my readers will set up to be my judges, I enter my caveat against them, that they ought not so much as to be of my jury; or, if they be admitted, 't is but reason that they should first hear what I have to urge in the defense of my opinion.

That Horace is somewhat the better instructor of the two, is prov'd from hence, that his instructions are more general, Juvenal's more limited. So that, granting that the counsels which they give are equally good for moral use, Horace, who gives the most various advice, and most applicable to all occasions which can occur to us in the course of our lives — as including in his discourses not only all the rules of morality, but also of civil conversation — is undoubtedly to be preferr'd to him who is more circumscrib'd in his instructions, makes them to fewer people, and on fewer occasions, than the other. I may be pardon'd for using an old saying, since 't is true, and to the purpose: Bonum quo communius, eo melius. Juvenal, excepting only his First Satire, is in all the rest confin'd to the exposing of some particular vice; that he lashes, and there he sticks. His sentences are truly shining and instructive; but they are sprinkled here and there. Horace is teaching us in every line, and is perpetually moral: he had found out the skill of Virgil, to hide his sentences; to give you the virtue of them, without shewing them in their full extent; which is the ostentation of a poet, and not his art: and this Petronius charges on the authors of his time, as a vice of writing which was then growing on the age: ne sententiæ extra corpus orationis emineant: he would have them weav'd into the body of the work, and not appear emboss'd upon it, and striking directly on the reader's view. Folly was the proper quarry of Horace, and not vice; and as there are but few notoriously wicked men, in comparison with a shoal of fools and fops, so 't is a harder thing to make a man wise than to make him honest; for the will is only to be reclaim'd in the one, but the understanding is to be inform'd in the other. There are blind sides and follies, even in the professors of moral philosophy; and there is not any one sect of them that Horace has not expos'd: which, as it was not the design of Juvenal, who was wholly employ'd in lashing vices, some of them the most enormous that can be imagin'd, so, perhaps, it was not so much his talent.

*Omne ræfer vitium ridenti Flaccus amico
Tangit, et admissus circum præcordia ludit.*

This was the commendation which Persius gave him: where, by vitium, he means those little vices which we call follies, the defects of human understanding, or, at most, the peccadillos of life, rather than the tragical vices, to which men are hurried by their unruly passions and exorbitant desires. But in the word omne, which is universal, he concludes with me, that the divine wit of Horace left nothing untouched; that he enter'd into the inmost recesses of nature; found out the imperfections even of the most wise and grave, as well as of the common people; discovering, even in the great Trebatius, to whom he addresses the First Satire, his hunting after business, and following the court, as well as in the persecutor Crispinus, his impertinence and importunity. 'Tis true, he exposes Crispinus openly, as a common nuisance; but he rallies the other, as a friend, more finely. The exhortations of Persius are confin'd to noblemen; and the Stoic philosophy is that alone which he recommends to them; Juvenal exhorts to particular virtues, as they are oppos'd to those vices against which he declaims; but Horace laughs to shame all follies, and insinuates virtue rather by familiar examples than by the severity of precepts.

This last consideration seems to incline the balance on the side of Horace, and to give him the preference to Juvenal, not only in profit, but in pleasure. But, after all, I must confess that the delight which Horace gives me is but languishing. Be pleas'd still to understand, that I speak of my own taste only: he may ravish other men; but I am too stupid and insensible to be tickled. Where he barely grins himself, and, as Scaliger says, only shews his white teeth, he cannot provoke me to any laughter. His urbanity, that is, his good manners, are to be commended, but his wit is faint; and his salt, if I may dare to say so, almost insipid. Juvenal is of a more vigorous and masculine wit; he gives me as much pleasure as I can bear; he fully satisfies my expectation; he treats his subject home: his spleen is rais'd, and he raises mine: I have the pleasure of concernment in all he says; he drives his reader along with him; and when he is at the end of his way, I willingly stop with him. If he went another stage, it would be too far; it would make a journey of a progress, and turn delight into fatigue. When he gives over, 't is a sign the subject is exhausted, and the wit of man can carry it no farther. If a fault can be justly found in him, 't is that he is sometimes too luxuriant, too redundant; says more than he needs, like my friend the Plain Dealer, but never more than pleases. Add to this, that his thoughts are as just as those of Horace, and much more elevated. His expressions are sonorous and more noble; his verse more numerous, and his words are suitable to his thoughts, sublime and lofty. All these contribute to the pleasure of the reader; and the greater the soul of him who reads, his transports are the greater. Horace is always on the amble, Juvenal on the gallop; but his way is perpetually on carpet-ground. He goes with more impetuosity than Horace, but as securely; and the swiftness adds a more lively agitation to the spirits. The low style of Horace is according to his subject, that is, generally groveling. I question not but he could have rais'd it; for the First Epistle of the Second Book, which he writes to Augustus, (a most instructive satire concerning poetry,) is of so much dignity in the words, and of so much elegance in the numbers, that the author plainly shews the sermo pedestris, in his other satires, was rather his choice than his necessity. He was a rival to Lucilius, his predecessor, and was resolv'd to surpass him in his own manner. Lucilius, as we see by his remaining fragments, minded neither his style, nor his numbers, nor his purity of words, nor his run of verse. Horace therefore copes with him in that humble way of satire, writes under his own force, and carries a dead weight, that he may match his competitor in the race. This, I imagine, was the chief reason why he minded only the clearness of his satire, and the cleanness of expression, without ascending to those heights to which his own vigor might have carried him. But, limiting his desires only to the conquest of Lucilius, he had his ends of his rival, who liv'd before him; but made way for a new conquest over himself, by Juvenal, his successor. He could not give an equal pleasure to his reader, because he us'd not equal instruments. The fault was in the tools, and not in the workman. But versification and numbers are the greatest pleasures of poetry: Virgil knew it, and practis'd both so happily, that, for aught I know, his greatest excellency is in his diction. In all other parts of poetry, he is faultless; but in this he plac'd his chief perfection. And give me leave, my Lord, since I have here an apt occasion, to say that Virgil could have written sharper satires than either Horace or Juvenal, if he would have employ'd his talent that way. I will produce a verse and half of his, in one of his Eclogues, to justify my opinion; and with commas after every word, to shew that he has given almost as many lashes as he has written syllables. 'Tis against a bad poet, whose ill verses he describes:

— non tu, in triviis, indocte, solebas

Stridenti, miserum, stipula, disperdere carmen?

But to return to my purpose. When there is anything deficient in numbers and sound, the reader is uneasy and unsatisfied; he wants something of his complement, desires somewhat which he finds not: and this being the manifest defect of Horace, 'tis no wonder that, finding it supplied in Juvenal, we are more delighted with him. And, besides this, the sauce of Juvenal is more poignant, to create in us an appetite of reading him. The meat of Horace is more nourishing; but the cookery of Juvenal more exquisite: so that, granting Horace to be the more general philosopher, we cannot deny that Juvenal was the greater poet, I mean in satire. His thoughts are sharper; his indignation against vice is more vehement; his spirit has more of the commonwealth genius; he treats tyranny, and all the vices attending it, as they deserve, with the utmost rigor: and consequently, a noble soul is better pleas'd with a zealous vindicator of Roman liberty, than with a temporizing poet, a well-manner'd court slave, and a man who is often afraid of laughing in the right place; who is ever decent, because he is naturally servile. After all, Horace had the disadvantage of the times in which he liv'd; they were better for the man, but worse for the satirist. 'Tis generally said, that those enormous vices which were practic'd under the reign of Domitian, were unknown in the time of Augustus Cæsar; that therefore Juvenal had a larger field than Horace. Little follies were out of doors, when oppression was to be scourg'd instead of avarice: it was no longer time to turn into ridicule the false opinions of philosophers, when the Roman liberty was to be asserted. There was more need of a Brutus in Domitian's days, to redeem or mend, than of a Horace, if he had then been living, to laugh at a fly-catcher. This reflection at the same time excuses Horace, but exalts Juvenal. I have ended, before I was aware, the comparison of Horace and Juvenal, upon the topics of instruction and delight; and, indeed, I may safely here conclude that commonplace; for, if we make Horace our minister of state in satire, and Juvenal of our private pleasures, I think the latter has no ill bargain of it. Let profit have the preëminence of honor, in the end of poetry. Pleasure, tho' but the second in degree, is the first in favor. And who would not choose to be lov'd better, rather than to be more esteem'd? But I am enter'd already upon another topic, which concerns the particular merits of these two satirists. However, I will pursue my business where I left it, and carry it farther than that common observation of the several ages in which these authors flourish'd. When Horace writ his Satires, the monarchy of his Cæsar was in its newness, and the government but just made easy to the conquer'd people. They could not possibly have forgotten the usurpation of that prince upon their freedom, nor the violent methods which he had us'd in the compassing of that vast design: they yet remember'd his proscriptions, and the slaughter of so many noble Romans, their defenders: amongst the rest, that horrible action of his, when he forc'd Livia from the arms of her husband, who was constrain'd to see her married, as Dion relates the story, and, big with child as she was, convey'd to the bed of his insulting rival. The same Dion Cassius gives us another instance of the crime before mention'd; that Cornelius Sisenna being reproach'd, in full senate, with the licentious conduct of his wife, return'd this answer, that he had married her by the counsel of Augustus; intimating, says my author, that Augustus had oblig'd him to that marriage, that he might, under that covert, have the more free access to her. His adulteries were still before their eyes, but they must be patient where they had not power. In other things that emperor was moderate enough: propriety was generally secur'd; and the people entertain'd with public shows and donatives, to make them more easily digest their lost liberty. But Augustus, who was conscious to himself of so many crimes which he had committed, thought, in the first place, to provide for his own reputation, by making an edict against lampoons and satires, and the authors of those defamatory writings which my author Tacitus, from the law-term, calls famosos libellos.

In the first book of his Annals, he gives the following account of it, in these words: Primus Augustus cognitionem de famosis libellis, specie legis ejus, tractavit; commotus Cassii Severi libidine, qua viros fœminasque illustres, procacibus scriptis diffamaverat. Thus in English: "Augustus was the first who under the color of that law took cognizance of lampoons, being provok'd to it by the petulancy of Cassius Severus, who had defam'd many illustrious persons of both sexes in his writings." The law to which Tacitus refers was Lex læsæ Majestatis; commonly call'd, for the sake of brevity, Majestas; or, as we say, high treason. He means not that this law had not been enacted formerly: for it had been made by the Decemviri, and was inscrib'd amongst the rest in the Twelve Tables; to prevent the aspersion of the Roman majesty, either of the people themselves, or their religion, or their magistrates: and the infringement of it was capital; that is, the offender was whipp'd to death with the fascēs, which were borne before their chief officers of Rome. But Augustus was the first who restor'd that intermitted law. By the words, under color of that law, he insinuates that Augustus caus'd it to be executed, on pretense of those libels which were written by Cassius Severus against the nobility; but, in truth, to save himself from such defamatory verses. Suetonius likewise makes mention of it thus: Sparsos de se in curia famosos libellos, nec expavit, et magna cura redarguit. Ac ne requisitis quidem auctoribus, id modo censuit, cognoscendum posthac de iis qui libellos aut carmina ad infamiam cuiuspiam sub alieno nomine edant. "Augustus was not afraid of libels," says that author; "yet he took all care imaginable to have them answer'd; and then decreed, that for the time to come the authors of them should be punish'd." But Aurelius makes it yet more clear, according to my sense, that this emperor for his own sake durst not permit them: Fecit id Augustus in specie, et quasi gratificaretur populo Romano, et primoribus urbis; sed revera ut sibi consuleret: nam habuit in animo, comprimere nimiam quorundam procacitatem in loquendo, a qua nec ipse exemptus fuit. Nam suo nomine comescere erat invidiosum, sub alieno facile et utile. Ergo specie legis tractavit, quasi populi Romani majestas infamaretur. This, I think, is a sufficient comment on that passage of Tacitus. I will add only by the way, that the whole family of the Cæsars, and all their relations, were included in the law; because the majesty of the Romans, in the time of the empire, was wholly in that house; omnia Cæsar erat: they were all accounted sacred who belong'd to him. As for Cassius Severus, he was contemporary with Horace; and was the same poet against whom he writes in his Epodes, under this title, In Cassium Severum maledicam poetam; perhaps intending to kill two crows, according to our proverb, with one stone, and revenge both himself and his emperor together.

From hence I may reasonably conclude, that Augustus, who was not altogether so good as he was wise, had some by-respect in the enacting of this law; for to do anything for nothing was not his maxim. Horace, as he was a courtier, complied with the interest of his master; and, avoiding the lashing of greater crimes, confin'd himself to the ridiculing of petty vices and common follies; excepting only some reserv'd cases, in his Odes and Epodes, of his own particular quarrels, which either with permission of the magistrate, or without it, every man will revenge, tho' I say not that he should; for prior lesit is a good excuse in the civil law, if Christianity had not taught us to forgive. However, he was not the proper man to arraign great vices, at least if the stories which we hear of him are true, that he practis'd some, which I will not here mention, out of honor to him. It was not for a Clodius to accuse adulterers, especially when Augustus was of that number; so that tho' his age was not exempted from the worst of villainies, there was no freedom left to reprehend them, by reason of the edict; and our poet was not fit to represent them in an odious character, because himself was dip'd in the same actions. Upon this account, without farther insisting on the different tempers of Juvenal and Horace, I conclude, that the subjects which Horace chose for satire are of a lower nature than those of which Juvenal has written.

Thus I have treated, in a new method, the comparison betwixt Horace, Juvenal, and Persius; somewhat of their particular manner belonging to all of them is yet remaining to be consider'd. Persius was grave, and particularly oppos'd his gravity to lewdness, which was the predominant vice in Nero's court at the time when he publish'd his Satires, which was before that emperor fell into the excess of cruelty. Horace was a mild admonisher, a court satirist, fit for the gentle times of Augustus, and more fit, for the reasons which I have already given. Juvenal was as proper for his times, as they for theirs; his was an age that deserv'd a more severe chastisement; vices were more gross and open, more flagitious, more encourag'd by the example of a tyrant, and more protected by his authority. Therefore, wheresoever Juvenal mentions Nero, he means Domitian, whom he dares not attack in his own person, but scourges him by proxy. Heinsius urges in praise of Horace, that, according to the ancient art and law of satire, it should be nearer to comedy than to tragedy; not declaiming against vice, but only laughing at it. Neither Persius nor Juvenal were ignorant of this, for they had both studied Horace. And the thing itself is plainly true. But as they had read Horace, they had likewise read Lucilius, of whom Persius says, secuit urbem; et genuinum fregit in illis; meaning Mutius and Lupus; and Juvenal also mentions him in these words: Ense velut stricto, quoties Lucilius ardens infremuit, &c. So that they thought the imitation of Lucilius was more proper to their purpose than that of Horace. "They chang'd satire," says Holyday, "but they chang'd it for the better; for the business being to reform great vices, chastisement goes farther than admonition; whereas a perpetual grin, like that of Horace, does rather anger than amend a man."

Thus far that learned critic, Barten Holyday, whose interpretation and illustrations of Juvenal are as excellent, as the verse of his translation and his English are lame and pitiful. For 'tis not enough to give us the meaning of a poet, which I acknowledge him to have perform'd most faithfully, but he must also imitate his genius and his numbers, as far as the English will come up to the elegance of the original. In few words, 'tis only for a poet to translate a poet. Holyday and Stapylton had not enough con-

sider'd this, when they attempted Juvenal: but I forbear reflections; only I beg leave to take notice of this sentence, where Holyday says: "A perpetual grin, like that of Horace, rather angers than amends a man." I cannot give him up the manner of Horace in low satire so easily. Let the chastisements of Juvenal be never so necessary for his new kind of satire; let him declaim as wittily and sharply as he pleases; yet still the nicest and most delicate touches of satire consist in fine raillery. This, my Lord, is your particular talent, to which even Juvenal could not arrive. 'Tis not reading, 'tis not imitation of an author, which can produce this fineness; it must be inborn; it must proceed from a genius, and particular way of thinking, which is not to be taught; and therefore not to be imitated by him who has it not from nature. How easy it is to call rogue and villain, and that wittily! But how hard to make a man appear a fool, a block-head, or a knave, without using any of those opprobrious terms! To spare the grossness of the names, and to do the thing yet more severely, is to draw a full face, and to make the nose and cheeks stand out, and yet not to employ any depth of shadowing. This is the mystery of that noble trade, which yet no master can teach to his apprentice; he may give the rules, but the scholar is never the nearer in his practice. Neither is it true, that this fineness of raillery is offensive. A witty man is tickled while he is hurt in this manner, and a fool feels it not. The occasion of an offense may possibly be given, but he cannot take it. If it be granted, that in effect this way does more mischief; that a man is secretly wounded, and tho' he be not sensible himself, yet the malicious world will find it for him; yet there is still a vast difference betwixt the slovenly butchering of a man, and the fineness of a stroke that separates the head from the body, and leaves it standing in its place. A man may be capable, as Jack Ketch's wife said of his servant, of a plain piece of work, a bare hanging; but to make a malefactor die sweetly, was only belonging to her husband. I wish I could apply it to myself, if the reader would be kind enough to think it belongs to me. The character of Zimri in my Absalom is, in my opinion, worth the whole poem: 'tis not bloody, but 'tis ridiculous enough; and he for whom it was intended was too witty

to resent it as an injury. If I had rail'd, I might have suffer'd for it justly; but I manag'd my own work more happily, perhaps more dext'rously. I avoided the mention of great crimes, and applied myself to the representing of blind sides, and little extravagancies; to which, the wittier a man is, he is generally the more obnoxious. It succeeded as I wish'd; the jest went round, and he was laugh'd at in his turn who began the frolic.

And thus, my Lord, you see I have preferr'd the manner of Horace, and of your Lordship, in this kind of satire, to that of Juvenal, and, I think, reasonably. Holyday ought not to have arraign'd so great an author for that which was his excellency and his merit; or if he did, on such a palpable mistake, he might expect that some one might possibly arise, either in his own time, or after him, to rectify his error, and restore to Horace that commendation of which he has so unjustly robb'd him. And let the manes of Juvenal forgive me, if I say that this way of Horace was the best for amending manners, as it is the most difficult. His was an ense rescindendum; but that of Horace was a pleasant cure, with all the limbs preserv'd entire; and, as our mountebanks tell us in their bills, without keeping the patient within-doors for a day. What they promise only, Horace has effectually perform'd: yet I contradict not the proposition which I formerly advanc'd. Juvenal's times requir'd a more painful kind of operation; but if he had liv'd in the age of Horace, I must needs affirm that he had it not about him. He took the method which was prescrib'd him by his own genius, which was sharp and eager; he could not rally, but he could declaim; and as his provocations were great, he has reveng'd them tragically. This notwithstanding, I am to say another word, which, as true as it is, will yet displease the partial admirers of our Horace. I have hinted it before, but 't is time for me now to speak more plainly.

This manner of Horace is indeed the best; but Horace has not executed it altogether so happily, at least not often. The manner of Juvenal is confess'd to be inferior to the former, but Juvenal has excell'd him in his performance. Juvenal has rail'd more wittily than Horace has rallied. Horace means to make his reader laugh, but he is not sure of his experiment. Juvenal always intends to move your indignation, and he always brings about his purpose. Horace, for aught I know, might have tickled the people of his age; but amongst the moderns he is not so successful. They who say he entertains so pleasantly may perhaps value themselves on the quickness of their own understandings, that they can see a jest farther off than other men. They may find occasion of laughter in the wit-battle of the two buffoons, Sarmentus and Cicerrus; and hold their sides for fear of bursting, when Rupilius and Persius are scolding. For my own part, I can only like the characters of all four, which are judiciously given; but for my heart I cannot so much as smile at their insipid raillery. I see not why Persius should call upon Brutus to revenge him on his adversary; and that because he had kill'd Julius Cæsar, for endeavoring to be a king, therefore he should be desir'd to murder Rupilius, only because his name was Mr. King. A miserable clench, in my opinion, for Horace to record: I have heard honest Mr. Swan make many a better, and yet have had the grace to hold my countenance. But it may be puns were then in fashion, as they were wit in the sermons of the last age, and in the court of King Charles the Second. I am sorry to say it, for the sake of Horace; but certain it is, he has no fine palate who can feed so heartily on garbidge.

But I have already wearied myself, and doubt not but I have tir'd your Lordship's patience, with this long, rambling, and, I fear, trivial discourse. Upon the one half of the merits, that is, pleasure, I cannot but conclude that Juvenal was the better satirist. They who will descend into his particular praises may find them at large in the Dissertation of the learned Rigaltius to Thuanus. As for Persius, I have given the reasons why I think him inferior to both of them; yet I have one thing to add on that subject.

Barten Holyday, who translated both Juvenal and Persius, has made this distinction betwixt them, which is no less true than witty; that in Persius the difficulty is to find a meaning, in Juvenal to choose a meaning: so crabbed is Persius, and so copious is Juvenal; so much the understanding is employ'd in one, and so much the judgment in the other; so difficult it is to find any sense in the former, and the best sense of the latter.

If, on the other side, any one suppose I have commended Horace below his merit, when I have allow'd him but the second place, I desire him to consider, if Juvenal, a man of excellent natural endowments, besides the advantages of diligence and study, and coming after him, and building upon his foundations, might not probably, with all these helps, surpass him; and whether it be any dishonor to Horace to be thus surpass'd, since no art or science is at once begun and perfected, but that it must pass first thro' many hands, and even thro' several ages. If Lucilius could add to Ennius, and Horace to Lucilius, why, without any diminution to the fame of Horace, might not Juvenal give the last perfection to that work? Or rather, what disreputation is it to Horace, that Juvenal excels in the tragical satire, as Horace does in the comical? I have read over attentively both Heinsius and Dacier, in their commendations of Horace; but I can find no more in either of them, for the preference of him to Juvenal, than the instructive part; the part of wisdom, and not that of pleasure; which, therefore, is here allow'd him, notwithstanding what Scaliger and Rigaltius have pleaded to the contrary for Juvenal. And, to shew I am impartial, I will here translate what Dacier has said on that subject:

"I cannot give a more just idea of the two books of Satires made by Horace, than by comparing them to the statues of the Sileni, to which Alcibiades compares Socrates in the Symposium. They were figures which had nothing of agreeable, nothing of beauty, on their outside; but when any one took the pains to open them, and search into them, he there found the figures of all the deities. So, in the shape that Horace presents himself to us in his Satires, we see nothing, at the first view, which deserves our attention: it seems that he is rather an amusement for children, than for the serious consideration of men. But, when we take away his crust, and that which hides him from our sight, when we discover him to the bottom, then we find all the divinities in a full assembly; that is to say, all the virtues which ought to be the continual exercise of those who seriously endeavor to correct their vices."

'Tis easy to observe, that Dacier, in this noble similitude, has confin'd the praise of his author wholly to the instructive part; the commendation turns on this, and so does that which follows:

"In these two books of satire, 'tis the business of Horace to instruct us how to combat our vices, to regulate our passions, to follow nature, to give bounds to our desires, to distinguish betwixt truth and falsehood, and betwixt our conceptions of things, and things themselves; to come back from our prejudicate opinions, to understand exactly the principles and motives of all our actions; and to avoid the ridicule into which all men necessarily fall, who are intoxicated with those notions which they have receiv'd from their masters, and which they obstinately retain, without examining whether or no they are founded on right reason.

"In a word, he labors to render us happy in relation to ourselves; agreeable and faithful to our friends; and discreet, serviceable, and well-bred, in relation to those with whom we are oblig'd to live, and to converse. To make his figures intelligible, to conduct his readers thro' the labyrinth of some perplex'd sentence, or obscure parenthesis, is no great matter; and, as Epictetus says, there is nothing of beauty in all this, or what is worthy of a prudent man. The principal business, and which is of most importance to us, is to shew the use, the reason, and the proof of his precepts.

"They who endeavor not to correct themselves according to so exact a model, are just like the patients who have open before them a book of admirable receipts for their diseases, and please themselves with reading it, without comprehending the nature of the remedies, or how to apply them to their cure."

Let Horace go off with these encomiums, which he has so well deserv'd.

To conclude the contention betwixt our three poets, I will use the words of Virgil, in his fifth Aeneid, where Aeneas proposes the rewards of the foot race to the three first who should reach the goal:

— tres præmia primi
Accipient, flavaque caput nectentur oliva.

Let these three ancients be preferr'd to all the moderns, as first arriving at the goal; let them all be crown'd, as victors, with the wreath that properly belongs to satire; but, after that, with this distinction amongst themselves:

Primus equum phaleris insignem victor habeto: —

let Juvenal ride first in triumph:

*Alter Amazoniam pharetram, plenamque sagittis
Threiciis, lato quam circumplectitur auro Balteus, et tereti subnectit fibula gemma: —*

let Horace, who is the second, and but just the second, carry off the quivers and the arrows, as the badges of his satire, and the golden belt, and the diamond button:

Tertius Argolico hoc clypeo contentus abito: —

and let Persius, the last of the first three worthies, be contented with this Grecian shield, and with victory, not only over all the Grecians, who were ignorant of the Roman satire, but over all the moderns in succeeding ages, excepting Boileau and your Lordship.

And thus I have given the history of satire, and deriv'd it as far as from Ennius to your Lordship; that is, from its first rudiments of barbarity to its last polishing and perfection; which is, with Virgil, in his address to Augustus:

— *nomen fama tot ferre per annos,
Tithoni prima quot abest ab origine Cæsar.*

I said only from Ennius; but I may safely carry it higher, as far as Livius Andronicus; who, as I have said formerly, taught the first play at Rome, in the year ab urbe condita 514. I have since desir'd my learn'd friend, Mr. Maidwell, to compute the difference of times betwixt Aristophanes and Livius Andronicus; and he assures me, from the best chronologers, that Phutus, the last of Aristophanes his plays, was represented at Athens, in the year of the 97th Olympiad, which agrees with the year urbis conditæ 364. So that the difference of years betwixt Aristophanes and Andronicus is 150; from whence I have probably deduc'd, that Livius Andronicus, who was a Grecian, had read the plays of the Old Comedy, which were satirical, and also of the New; for Menander was fifty years before him, which must needs be a great light to him in his own plays, that were of the satirical nature. That the Romans had farces before this, 't is true; but then they had no communication with Greece; so that Andronicus was the first who wrote after the manner of the Old Comedy in his plays: he was imitated by Ennius, about thirty years afterwards. Tho' the former writ fables, the latter, speaking properly, began the Roman satire; according to that description which Juvenal gives of it in his First:

*Quicquid agunt homines, votum, timor, ira, voluptas,
Gaudia, discursus, nostri est farrago libelli.*

This is that in which I have made bold to differ from Casaubon, Rigaltius, Dacier, and indeed from all the modern critics, that not Ennius, but Andronicus was the first; who, by the Archæa Comædia of the Greeks, added many beauties to the first rude and barbarous Roman satire: which sort of poem, tho' we had not deriv'd from Rome, yet nature teaches it mankind in all ages, and in every country.

'T is but necessary, that after so much has been said of satire, some definition of it should be given. Heinsius, in his Dissertations on Horace, makes it for me, in these words: "Satire is a kind of poetry, without a series of action, invented for the purging of our minds; in which human vices, ignorance, and errors, and all things besides, which are produc'd from them in every man, are severely reprehended; partly dramatically, partly simply, and sometimes in both kinds of speaking; but, for the most part, figuratively, and occultly; consisting in a low familiar way, chiefly in a sharp and pungent manner of speech; but partly, also, in a facetious and civil way of jesting; by which either hatred, or laughter, or indignation is mov'd." — Where I cannot but observe, that this obscure and perplex'd definition, or rather description, of satire, is wholly accommodated to the Horatian way; and excluding the works of Juvenal and Persius, as foreign from that kind of poem. The clause in the beginning of it, without a series of action, distinguishes satire properly from stageplays, which are all of one action, and one continued series of action. The end or scope of satire is to purge the passions; so far it is common to the satires of Juvenal and Persius. The rest which follows is also generally belonging to all three; till he comes upon us, with the excluding clause, consisting in a low familiar way of speech, which is the proper character of Horace; and from which the other two, for their honor be it spoken, are far distant. But how come lowness of style, and the familiarity of words, to be so much the propriety of satire, that without them a poet can be no more a satirist, than without risibility he can be a man? Is the fault of Horace to be made the virtue and standing rule of this poem? Is the grande sophos of Persius, and the sublimity of Juvenal, to be circumscrib'd with the meanness of words and vulgarity of expression? If Horace refus'd the pains of numbers, and the loftiness of figures, are they bound to follow so ill a precedent? Let him walk afoot, with his pad in his hand, for his own pleasure; but let not them be accounted no poets, who choose to mount, and shew their horsemanship. Holyday is not afraid to say, that there was never such a fall, as from his Odes to his Satires, and that he, injuriously to himself, untun'd his harp. The majestic way of Persius and Juvenal was new when they began it, but 'tis old to us; and what poems have not, with time, receiv'd an alteration in their fashion? "Which alteration," says Holyday, "is to aftertimes as good a warrant as the first." Has not Virgil chang'd the manners of Homer's heroes in his Æneis? Certainly he has, and for the better: for Virgil's age was more civiliz'd, and better bred; and he writ according to the politeness of Rome, under the reign of Augustus Cæsar, not to the rudeness of Agamemnon's age, or the times of Homer. Why should we offer to confine free spirits to one form, when we cannot so much as confine our bodies to one fashion of apparel? Would not Donne's Satires, which abound with so much wit, appear more charming, if he had taken care of his words, and of his numbers? But he follow'd Horace so very close, that of necessity he must fall with him; and I may safely say it of this present age, that if we are not so great wits as Donne, yet certainly we are better poets.

But I have said enough, and it may be too much, on this subject. Will your Lordship be pleas'd to prolong my audience, only so far, till I tell you my own trivial thoughts, how a modern satire should be made. I will not deviate in the least from the precepts and examples of the ancients, who were always our best masters. I will only illustrate them, and discover some of the hidden beauties in their designs, that we thereby may form our own in imitation of them. Will you please but to observe, that Persius, the least in dignity of all the three, has notwithstanding been the first who has discover'd to us this important secret in the designing of a perfect satire — that it ought only to treat of one subject; to be confin'd to one particular theme; or at least, to one principally. If other vices occur in the management of the chief, they should only be transiently lash'd, and not be insisted on, so as to make the design double. As in a play of the English fashion, which we call a tragi-comedy, there is to be but one main design; and tho' there be an underplot, or second walk of comical characters and adventures, yet they are subservient to the chief fable, carried along under it, and helping to it; so that the drama may not seem a monster with two heads. Thus, the Copernican system of the planets makes the moon to be mov'd by the motion of the earth, and carried about her orb, as a dependent of hers. Mascardi, in his discourse of the Doppia favola, or double tale in plays, gives an instance of it in the famous pastoral of Guarini, call'd Il Pastor Fido; where Corisca and the Satyr are the under parts; yet we may observe that Corisca is brought into the body of the plot, and made subservient to it. 'Tis certain that the divine wit of Horace was not ignorant of this rule — that a play, tho' it consists of many parts, must yet be one in the action, and must drive on the accomplishment of one design; for he gives this very precept, sit quodvis simplex duntaxat et unum; yet he seems not much to mind it in his Satires, many of them consisting of more arguments than one; and the second without dependence on the first. Casaubon has observ'd this before me, in his preference of Persius to Horace; and will have his own belov'd author to be the first who found out and introduc'd this method of confining himself to one subject. I know it may be urg'd in defense of Horace, that this unity is not necessary; because the very word satura signifies a dish plentifully stor'd with all variety of fruits and grains. Yet

Juvenal, who calls his poems a farrago, which is a word of the same signification with satura, has chosen to follow the same method of Persius, and not of Horace; and Boileau, whose example alone is a sufficient authority, has wholly confin'd himself, in all his Satires, to this unity of design. That variety, which is not to be found in any one satire, is at least in many, written on several occasions. And if variety be of absolute necessity in every one of them, according to the etymology of the word, yet it may arise naturally from one subject, as it is diversely treated, in the several subordinate branches of it, all relating to the chief. It may be illustrated accordingly with variety of examples in the subdivisions of it, and with as many precepts as there are members of it; which, altogether, may complete that olla, or hotchpotch, which is properly a satire.

Under this unity of theme, or subject, is comprehended another rule for perfecting the design of true satire. The poet is bound, and that ex officio, to give his reader some one precept of moral virtue, and to caution him against some one particular vice or folly. Other virtues, subordinate to the first, may be recommended under that chief head; and other vices or follies may be scourg'd, besides that which he principally intends. But he is chiefly to inculcate one virtue, and insist on that. Thus Juvenal, in every satire excepting the First, ties himself to one principal instructive point, or to the shunning of moral evil. Even in the Sixth, which seems only an arraignment of the whole sex of womankind, there is a latent admonition to avoid ill women, by shewing how very few who are virtuous and good are to be found amongst them. But this, tho' the wittiest of all his satires, has yet the least of truth or instruction in it. He has run himself into his old declamatory way, and almost forgotten that he was now setting in for a moral poet.

Persius is never wanting to us in some profitable doctrine, and in exposing the opposite vices to it. His kind of philosophy is one, which is the Stoic; and every satire is a comment on one particular dogma of that sect, unless we will except the First, which is against bad writers; and yet ev'n there he forgets not the precepts of the Porch. In general, all virtues are everywhere to be prais'd and recommended to practice; and all vices to be reprehended, and made either odious or ridiculous; or else there is a fundamental error in the whole design.

I have already declar'd who are the only persons that are the adequate object of private satire, and who they are that may properly be expos'd by name for public examples of vices and follies; and therefore I will trouble your Lordship no farther with them. Of the best and finest manner of satire, I have said enough in the comparison betwixt Juvenal and Horace: 't is that sharp, well-manner'd way of laughing a folly out of countenance, of which your Lordship is the best master in this age. I will proceed to the versification which is most proper for it, and add somewhat to what I have said already on that subject. The sort of verse which is call'd burlesque, consisting of eight syllables, or four feet, is that which our excellent Hudibras has chosen. I ought to have mention'd him before, when I spoke of Donne; but by a slip of an old man's memory he was forgotten. The worth of his poem is too well known to need my commendation, and he is above my censure. His satire is of the Varronian kind, tho' unmix'd with prose. The choice of his numbers is suitable enough to his design, as he has manag'd it; but in any other hand, the shortness of his verse, and the quick returns of rhyme, had debas'd the dignity of style. And besides, the double rhyme (a necessary companion of burlesque writing) is not so proper for manly satire; for it turns earnest too much to jest, and gives us a boyish kind of pleasure. It tickles awkwardly with a kind of pain, to the best sort of readers: we are pleas'd ungratefully, and, if I may say so, against our liking. We thank him not for giving us that unseasonable delight, when we know he could have given us a better, and more solid. He might have left that task to others, who, not being able to put in thought, can only make us grin with the excrescence of a word of two or three syllables in the close. 'T is, indeed, below so great a master to make use of such a little instrument. But his good sense is perpetually shining thro' all he writes; it affords us not the time of finding faults. We pass thro' the levity of his rhyme, and are immediately carried into some admirable useful thought. After all, he has chosen this kind of verse, and has written the best in it; and had he taken another, he would always have excell'd: as we say of a court favorite, that whatsoever his office be, he still makes it uppermost, and most beneficial to himself.

The quickness of your imagination, my Lord, has already prevented me; and you know beforehand, that I would prefer the verse of ten syllables, which we call the English heroic, to that of eight. This is truly my opinion; for this sort of number is more roomy: the thought can turn itself with greater ease in a larger compass. When the rhyme comes too thick upon us, it straitens the expression; we are thinking of the close, when we should be employ'd in adorning the thought. It makes a poet giddy with turning in a space too narrow for his imagination; he loses many beauties, without gaining one advantage. For a burlesque rhyme I have already concluded to be none; or, if it were, 't is more easily purchas'd in ten syllables than in eight. In both occasions 't is as in a tennis court, when the strokes of greater force are given, when we strike out and play at length. Tassoni and Boileau have left us the best examples of this way, in the Secchia Rapita, and the Lutrin; and next them Merlin Coccaius in his Baldus. I will speak only of the two former, because the last is written in Latin verse. The Secchia Rapita is an Italian poem, a satire of the Varronian kind. 'T is written in the stanza of eight, which is their measure for heroic verse. The words are stately, the numbers smooth, the turn both of thoughts and words is happy. The first six lines of the stanza seem majestic and severe; but the two last turn them all into a pleasant ridicule. Boileau, if I am not much deceiv'd, has model'd from hence his famous Lutrin. He had read the burlesque poetry of Scarron with some kind of indignation, as witty as it was, and found nothing in France that was worthy of his imitation; but he copied the Italian so well, that his own may pass for an original. He writes it in the French heroic verse, and calls it an heroic poem; his subject is trivial, but his verse is noble. I doubt not but he had Virgil in his eye, for we find many admirable imitations of him, and some parodies; as particularly this passage in the fourth of the Æneids:

*Nec tibi diva parens, generis nec Dardanus auctor,
Perfide; sed duris genuit te cautibus horrens
Caucasus; Hyrcanæque admorunt ubera tigres:*

which he thus translates, keeping to the words, but altering the sense:

*Non, ton père à Paris ne fut point boulanger;
Et tu n'es point du sang de Gervais, horloger:
Ta mère ne fut point la maîtresse d'un coche;
Caucase dans ses flancs te forma d'une roche:
Une tigresse affreuse, en quelque antre écarté,
Te fit, avec son lait, sucer sa cruauté.*

And, as Virgil in his Fourth Georgic, of the Bees, perpetually raises the lowness of his subject by the loftiness of his words, and ennobles it by comparisons drawn from empires, and from monarchs:

*Admiranda tibi levium spectacula rerum,
Magnanimosque duces, totiusque ordine gentis
Mores et studia, et populos, et prælia dicam;*

and again:

*Sed genus immortale manet; multosque per annos
Stat fortuna domus, et avi numerantur avorum;*

we see Boileau pursuing him in the same flights, and scarcely yielding to his master. This, I think, my Lord, to be the most beautiful and most noble kind of satire. Here is the majesty of the heroic, finely mix'd with the venom of the other; and raising the delight which otherwise would be flat and vulgar, by the sublimity of the expression. I could say somewhat more of the delicacy of this and some other of his satires; but it might turn to his prejudice, if 't were carried back to France.

I have given your Lordship but this bare hint, in what verse and in what manner this sort of satire may best be manag'd. Had I time, I could enlarge on the beautiful turns of words and thoughts, which are as requisite in this, as in heroic poetry itself, of which this satire is undoubtedly a species. With these beautiful turns, I confess myself to have been unacquainted, till about twenty years ago, in a conversation which I had with that noble wit of Scotland, Sir George Mackenzie, he ask'd me why I did not imitate in my verses the turns of Mr. Waller and Sir John Denham, of which he repeated many to me. I had often read with pleasure, and with some profit, those two fathers of our English poetry, but had not seriously enough consider'd those beauties which give the last perfection to their works. Some sprinklings of this kind I had also formerly in my plays; but they were casual, and not design'd. But this hint, thus seasonably given me, first made me sensible of my own wants, and brought me afterwards to seek for the supply of them in other English authors. I look'd over the darling of my youth, the famous Cowley; there I found, instead of them, the points of wit, and quirks of epigram, even in the Davideis, a heroic poem, which is of an opposite nature to those puerilities; but no elegant turns either on the word or on the thought. Then I consulted a greater genius, (without offense to the manes of that noble author,) I mean Milton; but as he endeavors everywhere to express Homer, whose age had not arriv'd to that fineness, I found in him a true sublimity, lofty thoughts, which were cloth'd with admirable Grecisms, and ancient words, which he had been digging from the mines of Chaucer and of Spenser, and which, with all their rusticity, had somewhat of venerable in them. But I found not there neither that for which I look'd. At last I had recourse to his master, Spenser, the author of that immortal poem call'd The Fairy Queen, and there I met with that which I had been looking for so long in vain. Spenser had studied Virgil to as much advantage as Milton had done Homer, and amongst the rest of his excellencies had copied that. Looking farther into the Italian, I found Tasso had done the same; nay more, that all the sonnets in that language are on the turn of the first thought; which Mr. Walsh, in his late ingenious preface to his poems, has observ'd. In short, Virgil and Ovid are the two principal fountains of them in Latin poetry. And the French at this day are so fond of them, that they judge them to be the first beauties: délicat et bien tourné are the highest commendations which they bestow on somewhat which they think a masterpiece.

An example of the turn on words, amongst a thousand others, is that in the last book of Ovid's Metamorphoses:

*Heu! quantum scelus est, in viscera, viscera condi!
Congestoque avidum pinguescere corpore corpus;
Alteriusque animantem animantis vivere leto.*

An example on the turn both of thoughts and words is to be found in Catullus, in the complaint of Ariadne, when she was left by Theseus:

*Tum jam nulla viro juranti fœmina credat;
Nulla viri speret sermones esse fideles;
Qui, dum aliquid cupiens animus prægestit
apisci,
Nil metuunt jurare, nihil promittere parcant:
Sed simul ac cupide mentis satiata libido est,
Dicta nihil metuere, nihil perjuria curant.*

An extraordinary turn upon the words is that in Ovid's Epistolæ Heroidum, of Sappho to Phaon:

*Si, nisi quæ forma poterit te digna videri,
Nulla futura tua est, nulla futura tua est.*

Lastly, a turn, which I cannot say is absolutely on words, for the thought turns with them, is in the Fourth Georgic of Virgil; where Orpheus is to receive his wife from hell, on express condition not to look on her till she was come on earth:

*Cum subita incautum dementia cepit amantem;
Ignoscenda quidem, scirent si ignoscere manes.*

I will not burthen your Lordship with more of them, for I write to a master who understands them better than myself. But I may safely conclude them to be great beauties. I might descend also to the mechanic beauties of heroic verse; but we have yet no English prosodia, not so much as a tolerable dictionary, or a grammar; so that our language is in a manner barbarous; and what government will encourage any one, or more, who are capable of refining it, I know not: but nothing under a public expense can go thro' with it. And I rather fear a declination of the language, than hope an advancement of it in the present age.

I am still speaking to you, my Lord, tho', in all probability, you are already out of hearing. Nothing which my meanness can produce is worthy of this long attention. But I am come to the last petition of Abraham; if there be ten righteous lines in this vast preface, spare it for their sake; and also spare the next city, because it is but a little one.

I would excuse the performance of this translation, if it were all my own; but the better, tho' not the greater part, being the work of some gentlemen who have succeeded very happily in their undertaking, let their excellencies atone for my imperfections, and those of my sons. I have perus'd some of the satires which are done by other hands, and they seem to me as perfect in their kind as anything I have seen in English verse. The common way which we have taken is not a literal translation, but a kind of paraphrase; or somewhat which is yet more loose, betwixt a paraphrase and imitation. It was not possible for us, or any men, to have made it pleasant any other way. If rend'ring the exact sense of these authors, almost line for line, had been our business, Barten Holyday had done it already to our hands; and, by the help of his learned notes and illustrations, not only Juvenal and Persius, but, what yet is more obscure, his own verses, might be understood.

But he wrote for fame, and wrote to scholars; we write only for the pleasure and entertainment of those gentlemen and ladies, who, tho' they are not scholars, are not ignorant: persons of understanding and good sense, who, not having been conversant in the original, or at least not having made Latin verse so much their business as to be critics in it, would be glad to find if the wit of our two great authors be answerable to their fame and reputation in the world. We have, therefore, endeavor'd to give the public all the satisfaction we are able in this kind.

And if we are not altogether so faithful to our author, as our predecessors Holyday and Stapylton, yet we may challenge to ourselves this praise, that we shall be far more pleasing to our readers. We have follow'd our authors at greater distance, tho' not step by step, as they have done: for oftentimes they have gone so close, that they have trod on the heels of Juvenal and Persius, and hurt them by their too near approach. A noble author would not be pursued too close by a translator. We lose his spirit, when we think to take his body. The grosser part remains with us, but the soul is flown away in some noble expression, or some delicate turn of words or thought. Thus Holyday, who made this way his choice, seiz'd the meaning of Juvenal; but the poetry has always escap'd him.

They who will not grant me that pleasure is one of the ends of poetry, but that it is only a means of compassing the only end, which is instruction, must yet allow, that, without the means of pleasure, the instruction is but a bare and dry philosophy: a crude preparation of morals, which we may have from Aristotle and Epictetus, with more profit than from any poet. Neither Holyday nor Stapylton have imitated Juvenal in the poetical part of him, his diction and his elocution. Nor had they been poets, as neither of them were, yet, in the way they took, it was impossible for them to have succeeded in the poetic part.

The English verse which we call heroic consists of no more than ten syllables; the Latin hexameter sometimes rises to seventeen; as, for example, this verse in Virgil:

Pulverulenta putrem sonitu quatit ungula campum.

Here is the difference of no less than seven syllables in a line, betwixt the English and the Latin. Now the medium of these is about fourteen syllables; because the dactyl is a more frequent foot in hexameters than the spondee. But Holyday, without considering that he writ with the disadvantage of four syllables less in every verse, endeavors to make one of his lines to comprehend the sense of one of Juvenal's. According to the falsity of the proposition was the success. He was forc'd to crowd his verse with ill-sounding monosyllables, of which our barbarous language affords him a wild plenty; and by that means he arriv'd at his pedantic end, which was to make a literal translation. His verses have nothing of verse in them, but only the worst part of it, the rhyme; and that, into the bargain, is far from good. But, which is more intolerable, by cramming his ill-chosen and worse-sounding monosyllables so close together, the very sense which he endeavors to explain is become more obscure than that of his author; so that Holyday himself cannot be understood, without as large a commentary as that which he makes on his two authors. For my own part, I can make a shift to find the meaning of Juvenal without his notes; but his translation is more difficult than his author. And I find beauties in the Latin to recompense my pains; but, in Holyday and Stapylton, my ears, in the first place, are mortally offended; and then their sense is so perplex'd, that I return to the original, as the more pleasing task, as well as the more easy.

This must be said for our translation, that, if we give not the whole sense of Juvenal, yet we give the most considerable part of it: we give it, in general, so clearly, that few notes are sufficient to make us intelligible. We make our author at least appear in a poetic dress. We have actually made him more sounding, and more elegant, than he was before in English; and have endeavor'd to make him speak that kind of English which he would have spoken had he liv'd in England, and had written to this age. If sometimes any of us (and 't is but seldom) make him express the customs and manners of our native country rather than of Rome, 't is either when there was some kind of analogy betwixt their customs and ours, or when, to make him more easy to vulgar understandings, we gave him those manners which are familiar to us. But I defend not this innovation; 't is enough if I can excuse it. For, to speak sincerely, the manners of nations and ages are not to be confounded; we should either make them English, or leave them Roman. If this can neither be defended nor excus'd, let it be pardon'd at least, because it is acknowledg'd; and so much the more easily, as being a fault which is never committed without some pleasure to the reader.

Thus, my Lord, having troubled you with a tedious visit, the best manners will be shewn in the least ceremony. I will slip away while your back is turn'd, and while you are otherwise employ'd; with great confusion for having entertain'd you so long with this discourse, and for having no other recompense to make you, than the worthy labors of my fellow-undertakers in this work, and the thankful acknowledgments, prayers, and perpetual good wishes, of,

MY LORD,

Your Lordship's

Most oblig'd, most humble,

And most obedient Servant,

JOHN DRYDEN.

THE FIRST SATIRE OF JUVENAL

THE ARGUMENT

The poet gives us first a kind of humorous reason for his writing: that being provok'd by hearing so many ill poets rehearse their works, he does himself justice on them, by giving them as bad as they bring. But since no man will rank himself with ill writers, 't is easy to conclude, that if such wretches could draw an audience, he thought it no hard matter to excel them, and gain a greater esteem with the public. Next he informs us more openly, why he rather addicts himself to satire, than any other kind of poetry. And here he discovers that it is not so much his indignation to ill poets, as to ill men, which has prompted him to write. He therefore gives us a summary and general view of the vices and follies reigning in his time. So that this first satire is the natural groundwork of all the rest. Herein he confines himself to no one subject, but strikes indifferently at all men in his way: in every following satire he has chosen some particular moral which he would inculcate; and lashes some particular vice or folly (an art with which our lampooners are not much acquainted). But our poet being desirous to reform his own age, and not daring to attempt it by an overt act of naming living persons, inveighs only against those who were infamous in the times immediately preceding his, whereby he not only gives a fair warning to great men, that their memory lies at the mercy of future poets and historians, but also, with a finer stroke of his pen, brands ev'n the living, and personates them under dead men's names.

I have avoided as much as I could possibly the borrow'd learning of marginal notes and illustrations, and for that reason have translated this satire somewhat largely; and freely own (if it be a fault) that I have likewise omitted most of the proper names, because I thought they would not much edify the reader. To conclude, if in two or three places I have deserted all the commentators, 't is because I thought they first deserted my author, or at least have left him in so much obscurity, that too much room is left for guessing.

STILL shall I hear, and never quit the score,

Stunn'd with hoarse Codrus'¹ Theseid, o'er and o'er?

Shall this man's elegies and t'other's play
Unpunish'd murder a long summer's day?
Huge Telephus,² a formidable page,
Cries vengeance; and Orestes'³ bulky rage,
Unsatisfied with margins closely writ,
Foams o'er the covers, and not finish'd yet.
No man can take a more familiar note
Of his own home, than I of Vulcan's grot,

Or Mars his grove,⁴ or hollow winds that blow¹¹
 From Ætna's top, or tortur'd ghosts below.
 I know by rote the fam'd exploits of Greece;
 The Centaurs' fury, and the Golden Fleece;
 Thro' the thick shades th' eternal scribbler
 bawls,
 And shakes the statues on their pedestals.
 The best and worst⁵ on the same theme employs
 His Muse, and plagues us with an equal
 noise.

Provok'd by these incorrigible fools,
 I left declaiming in pedantic schools;²⁰
 Where, with men-boys, I strove to get renown,
 Advising Sylla⁶ to a private gown.
 But, since the world with writing is pos-
 sess'd,
 I'll versify in spite; and do my best,
 To make as much waste paper as the
 rest.

But why I lift aloft the Satire's rod,
 And tread the path which fam'd Lucilius⁷
 trod,
 Attend the causes which my Muse have led:
 When sapless eunuchs mount the marriage-
 bed;
 When mannish Mævia,⁸ that two-handed
 whore,³⁰
 Astride on horseback hunts the Tuscan boar;
 When all our lords are by his wealth out-vied,
 Whose razor⁹ on my callow beard was
 tried;
 When I behold the spawn of conquer'd Nile,

Crispinus,¹⁰ both in birth and manners vile,
 Pacing in pomp, with cloak of Tyrian dye,
 Chang'd oft a day for needless luxury;
 And finding oft occasion to be fann'd,
 Ambitious to produce his lady-hand;
 Charg'd with light summer-rings¹¹ his fingers sweat,⁴⁰

Unable to support a gem of weight —
 Such fulsome objects meeting everywhere,
 'T is hard to write, but harder to forbear.

To view so lewd a town, and to refrain,
 What hoops of iron could my spleen contain!

When pleading Matho,¹² borne abroad for
 air,
 With his fat paunch fills his new-fashion'd
 chair,

And after him the wretch in pomp convey'd,
 Whose evidence his lord and friend betray'd,
 And but the wish'd occasion does attend
 From the poor nobles the last spoils to rend,⁵¹
 Whom ev'n spies dread as their superior
 fiend,

And bribe with presents; or, when presents
 fail,

They send their prostituted wives for bail:
 When night-performance holds the place of merit,

And brawn and back the next of kin dis-
 herit;

For such good parts are in preferment's
 way,

The rich old madam never fails to pay
 Her legacies, by nature's standard giv'n,
 One gains an ounce, another gains eleven:
 A dear-bought bargain, all things duly weigh'd,⁶¹

For which their thrice concocted blood is
 paid:

With looks as wan, as he who in the brake
 At unawares has trod upon a snake;
 Or play'd at Lyons¹³ a declaiming prize,
 For which the vanquish'd rhetorician dies.

What indignation boils within my veins,
 When perjurd guardians, proud with im-
 pious gains,
 Choke up the streets, too narrow for their trains!

Whose wards, by want betray'd, to crimes
 are led⁷⁰

Too foul to name, too fulsome to be read!
 When he who pill'd his province scapes the
 laws,

And keeps his money, tho' he lost his cause:
 His fine begg'd off, contemns his infamy,
 Can rise at twelve, and get him drunk ere three;

Enjoys his exile, and, condemn'd in vain,
 Leaves thee, prevailing province,¹⁴ to com-
 plain!

Such villainies rous'd Horace¹⁵ into wrath;

And 't is more noble to pursue his path,
 Than an old tale of Diomedes to repeat,
 Or lab'ring after Hercules to sweat,⁸¹
 Or wand'ring in the winding maze of Crete;

Or with the winged smith aloft to fly,
 Or flutt'ring perish with his foolish boy.

With what impatience must the Muse
 behold

The wife by her procuring husband sold ?
For tho' the law makes null th' adulterer's deed

Of lands to her, the cuckold may succeed;
Who his taught eyes up to the ceiling throws,

And sleeps all over but his wakeful nose.
When he dares hope a colonel's command,
Whose coursers kept, ran out his father's land;

Who, yet a stripling, Nero's chariot } drove,

Whirl'd o'er the streets, while his vain }
master strove

With boasted art to please his eunuch- } love.¹⁶

Would it not make a modest author dare
To draw his table-book within the square,
And fill with notes, when lolling at his ease,
Mæcenas-like,¹⁷ the happy rogue he sees ⁹⁹
Borne by six wearied slaves in open view,
Who cancel'd an old will and forg'd a new;
Made wealthy at the small expense of signing

With a wet seal, and a fresh interlining ?
The lady, next, requires a lashing line,
Who squeez'd a toad into her husband's wine:

So well the fashionable med'cine thrives,
That now 't is practic'd ev'n by country wives;

Pois'ning, without regard of fame or fear:
And spotted corps are frequent on the bier.
Wouldst thou to honors and preferments climb,

Be bold in mischief, dare some mighty crime,

Which dungeons, death, or banishment deserves:

For virtue is but dryly prais'd, and sterves.
Great men, to great crimes, owe their }
plate emboss'd,

Fair palaces, and furniture of cost; }
And high commands: a sneaking sin is }
lost.

Who can behold that rank old lecher keep
His son's corrupted wife, and hope to sleep ? ¹⁸

Or that male-harlot, or that unfledg'd boy,
Eager to sin, before he can enjoy ? ¹²⁰

If nature could not, anger would indite
Such woful stuff as I or S——ll write.

Count from the time, since old Deucalion's ¹⁹ boat,

Rais'd by the flood, did on Parnassus float;

And scarcely mooring on the cliff, implor'd
An oracle how man might be restor'd;
When soften'd stones and vital breath ensued,

And virgins naked were by lovers view'd;
Whatever since that Golden Age was done,
What humankind desires, and what they shun,

Rage, passions, pleasures, impotence of will,
Shall this satirical collection fill.

What age so large a crop of vices bore,
(Or when was avarice extended more ?
When were the dice with more profusion thrown ?

The well-fill'd fob not emptied now alone,
But gamesters for whole patrimonies play;
The steward brings the deeds which must convey

The lost estate: what more than madness reigns,

When one short sitting many hundreds drains,

And not enough is left him to supply }
Board-wages, or a footman's livery ?

What age so many summer seats did see ?

Or which of our forefathers far'd so well,
As on seven dishes, at a private meal ?

Clients of old were feasted; now a poor
Divided dole is dealt at th' outward door,
Which by the hungry rout is soon dispatch'd:

The paltry largess, too, severely watch'd
Ere given; and every face observ'd with care,

That no intruding guest usurp a share.

Known, you receive: the crier calls aloud }
Our old nobility of Trojan blood,

Who gape among the crowd for their } precarious food.

The prætors' and the tribunes' voice is heard;

The freedman justles, and will be preferr'd;
"First come, first serv'd," he cries; "and I, in spite

Of your great lordships, will maintain my right.

Tho' born a slave, tho' my torn ears are bor'd,²⁰

'T is not the birth, 't is money makes the lord.

The rents of five fair houses I receive;
What greater honors can the purple give ?

The poor patrician ²¹ is reduc'd to keep
In melancholy walks a grazier's sheep:

Not Pallas nor Licinius²² had my treasure;
Then let the sacred tribunes wait my leisure.

Once a poor rogue, 't is true, I trod the street,
And trudg'd to Rome upon my naked feet:

Gold is the greatest god; tho' yet we see
No temples rais'd to Money's majesty, ¹⁷⁰
No altars fuming to her pow'r divine,
Such as to Valor, Peace, and Virtue shine,
And Faith, and Concord: where the stork on high²³

Seems to salute her infant progeny,
Presaging pious love with her auspicious cry."

But since our knights and senators account
To what their sordid begging vails amount,
Judge what a wretched share the poor attends,

Whose whole subsistence on those alms depends!

Their household fire, their raiment, and their food, ¹⁸⁰

Prevented by those harpies;²⁴ when a wood
Of litters thick besiege the donor's gate,
And begging lords and teeming ladies wait
The promis'd dole: nay, some have learn'd the trick

To beg for absent persons; feign them sick,
Close mew'd in their sedans, for fear of air;

And for their wives produce an empty chair.

"This is my spouse: dispatch her with her share."

'Tis Galla."²⁵ "Let her ladyship but peep."

"No, sir, 't is pity to disturb her sleep."¹⁹⁰

Such fine employments our whole days divide:

The salutations of the morning tide
Call up the sun; those ended, to the hall
We wait the patron, hear the lawyers bawl;
Then to the statues;²⁶ where, amidst the race

Of conqu'ring Rome, some Arab shews his face,
Inscrib'd with titles, and profanes the place;

Fit to be piss'd against, and somewhat more.
The great man, home conducted, shuts his door: ¹⁹⁹

Old clients, wearied out with fruitless care,
Dismiss their hopes of eating, and despair;

Tho' much against the grain, forc'd to retire,

Buy roots for supper, and provide a fire.

Meantime his lordship lolls within at ease,
Pamp'ring his paunch with foreign rarities;
Both sea and land are ransack'd for the feast,

And his own gut the sole invited guest.
Such plate, such tables, dishes dress'd so well,

That whole estates are swallow'd at a meal.
Ev'n parasites are banish'd from his board:
(At once a sordid and luxurious lord:) ²¹¹
Prodigious throat, for which whole boars
are dress'd;

(A creature form'd to furnish out a feast.)
But present punishment pursues his maw,
When, surfeited and swell'd, the peacock raw

He bears into the bath; whence want of breath,

Repletions, apoplex, intestate death.

His fate makes table talk, divulg'd with scorn,

And he, a jest, into his grave is borne.

No age can go beyond us; future times ²²⁰
Can add no farther to the present crimes.

Our sons but the same things can wish
and do;

Vice is at stand, and at the highest flow.
Then, Satire, spread thy sails; take all the winds can blow.

Some may, perhaps, demand what Muse can
yield

Sufficient strength for such a spacious field;
From whence can be deriv'd so large a
vein,

Bold truths to speak, and spoken to maintain,

When godlike freedom is so far bereft
The noble mind, that scarce the name is left. ²³⁰

Ere scandalum magnatum was begot,
No matter if the great forgave or not:
But if that honest license now you take,
If into rogues omnipotent you rake,
Death is your doom, impal'd upon a stake, Smear'd o'er with wax, and set on fire, to
light

The streets, and make a dreadful blaze by night.

Shall they, who drench'd three uncles in a draught

Of pois'nous juice, be then in triumph
brought,

Make lanes among the people where they
 go, 240
 And, mounted high on downy chariots,
 throw
 Disdainful glances on the crowd below ?
 Be silent, and beware, if such you see;
 'Tis defamation but to say: "That's he!"
 Against bold Turnus²⁷ the great Trojan arm,
 Amidst their strokes the poet gets no
 harm:
 Achilles may in epic verse be slain,
 And none of all his Myrmidons complain:
 Hylas may drop his pitcher, none will cry;
 Not if he drown himself for company: 250
 But when Lucilius brandishes his pen,
 And flashes in the face of guilty men,
 A cold sweat stands in drops on ev'ry part;
 And rage succeeds to tears, revenge to
 smart.
 Muse, be advis'd; 't is past consid'ring time,
 When enter'd once the dangerous lists of
 rhyme:
 Since none the living villains dare implead,
 Arraign them in the persons of the dead.

EXPLANATORY NOTES ON THE FIRST SATIRE

- 1 Codrus, or it may be Cordus, a bad poet who wrote the life and actions of Theseus.
- 2 Telephus, the name of a tragedy.
- 3 Orestes, another tragedy.
- 4 Mars his grove. Some commentators take this grove to be a place where poets were us'd to repeat their works to the people; but more probably, both this and Vulcan's grot, or cave, and the rest of the places and names here mention'd, are only meant for the commonplaces of Homer in his Iliads and Odysses.
- 5 The best and worst; that is, the best and the worst poets.
- 6 Advising Sylla, &c. This was one of the themes given in the schools of rhetoricians, in the deliberative kind; whether Sylla should lay down the supreme power of dictatorship, or still keep it.
- 7 Lucilius, the first satirist of the Romans, who wrote long before Horace.
- 8 Mævia, a name put for any impudent or mannish woman.
- 9 Whose razor, &c. Juvenal's barber now grown wealthy.
- 10 Crispinus, an Egyptian slave; now by his riches transform'd into a nobleman.
- 11 Charg'd with light summer-rings, &c. The Romans were grown so effeminate in Juvenal's time, that they wore light rings in the summer and heavier in the winter.
- 12 Matho, a famous lawyer, mention'd in other places by Juvenal and Martial.

13 At Lyons. A city in France, where annual sacrifices and games were made in honor of Augustus Cæsar.

14 Prevailing province, &c. Here the poet complains that the governors of provinces, being accus'd for their unjust exactions, tho' they were condemn'd at their trials, yet got off by bribery.

15 Horace, who wrote satires: 't is more noble, says our author, to imitate him in that way, than to write the labors of Hercules, the sufferings of Diomedes and his followers, or the flight of Dædalus, who made the Labyrinth, and the death of his son Icarus.

16 His eunuch-love. Nero married Sporus, an eunuch; tho' it may be, the poet meant Nero's mistress in man's apparel.

17 Mæcenat-like. Mæcenat is often tax'd by Seneca and others for his effeminacy.

18 And hope to sleep. The meaning is, that the very consideration of such a crime will hinder a virtuous man from taking his repose.

19 Deucalion and Pyrrha, when the world was drown'd, escap'd to the top of Mount Parnassus, and were commanded to restore mankind, by throwing stones over their heads: the stones he threw became men, and those she threw became women.

20 Tho' my torn ears are bor'd. The ears of all slaves were bor'd, as a mark of their servitude; which custom is still usual in the East Indies, and in other parts, even for whole nations, who bore prodigious holes in their ears, and wear vast weights at them.

21 The poor patrician. The poor nobleman.

22 Pallas, or Licinius. Pallas, a slave freed by Claudius Cæsar, and rais'd by his favor to great riches. Licinius was another wealthy freedman, belonging to Augustus.

23 Where the stork on high, &c. Perhaps the storks were us'd to build on the top of the temple dedicated to Concord.

24 Prevented by those harpies. He calls the Roman knights, &c., harpies, or devourers. In those days the rich made doles intended for the poor; but the great were either so covetous, or so needy, that they came in their litters to demand their shares of the largess, and thereby prevented, and consequently starv'd, the poor.

25 'T is Galla, &c. The meaning is, that noblemen would cause empty litters to be carried to the giver's door, pretending their wives were within them. " 'T is Galla," that is, "my wife;" the next words, "Let her ladyship but peep," are of the servant who distributes the dole; "Let me see her, that I may be sure she is within the litter." The husband answers: "She is asleep, and to open the litter would disturb her rest."

26 Next to the statues, &c. The poet here tells you how the idle pass'd their time; in going first to the levees of the great, then to the hall, that is, to the temple of Apollo, to hear the lawyers plead, then to the marketplace of Augustus, where the statues of the famous Romans were set in ranks on pedestals, amongst which statues were seen those of foreigners, such as Arabs, &c., who, for no desert, but only on the account of their wealth or favor, were plac'd amongst the noblest

27 Against bold Turnus, &c. A poet may safely write an heroic poem, such as that of Virgil who describes the duel of Turnus and Æneas; or of Homer, who writes of Achilles and Hector; or the death of Hylas, the catamite of Hercules, who, stooping for water, dropp'd his pitcher, and fell into the well after it. But 't is dangerous to write satire, like Lucilius.

THE THIRD SATIRE OF JUVENAL

THE ARGUMENT

The story of this satire speaks itself. Umbritius, the suppos'd friend of Juvenal, and himself a poet, is leaving Rome, and retiring to Cumæ. Our author accompanies him out of town. Before they take leave of each other, Umbritius tells his friend the reasons which oblige him to lead a private life, in an obscure place. He complains that an honest man cannot get his bread at Rome; that none but flatterers make their fortunes there; that Grecians and other foreigners raise themselves by those sordid arts which he describes, and against which he bitterly inveighs. He reckons up the several inconveniencies which arise from a city life, and the many dangers which attend it; upbraids the noblemen with covetousness, for not rewarding good poets; and arraigns the government for starving them. The great art of this satire is particularly shown in commonplaces, and drawing in as many vices as could naturally fall into the compass of it.

GRIEV'D tho' I am an ancient friend to }
lose, }
I like the solitary seat he chose, }
In quiet Cumæ ' fixing his repose: } Where, far from noisy Rome, secure he } lives, }
And one more citizen to Sibyl gives; }
The road to Bajæ;² and that soft recess, }
Which all the gods with all their bounty }
bless. }
Tho' I in Prochyta³ with greater ease }
Could live, than in a street of palaces. }
What scene so desert, or so full of fright, }
As tow'ring houses tumbling in the night, }
And Rome on fire beheld by its own blaz- } ing light? }
But worse than all, the clatt'ring tiles; and }
worse }
Than thousand padders, is the poet's curse;

Rogues that in dog days ' cannot rhyme for-
bear:

But without mercy read, and make you
hear.

Now while my friend, just ready to de-
part,

Was packing all his goods in one poor cart;
He stopp'd a little at the Conduit-gate,
Where Numa⁵ model'd once the Roman
State,

In mighty councils with his nymph⁶ retir'd:
Tho' now the sacred shades and founts are hir'd

By banish'd Jews, who their whole wealth can lay

In a small basket, on a wisp of hay;
Yet such our avarice is, that every tree
Pays for his head; not sleep itself is free:
Nor place, nor persons, now are sacred held;
From their own grove the Muses are expell'd.

Into this lonely vale our steps we bend,
I and my sullen discontented friend:³⁰
The marble caves, and aqueducts we view;
But how adult'rate now, and different from
the true!

How much more beauteous had the fountain been,
Embellish'd with her first created green,
Where crystal streams thro' living turf had
run,

Contented with an urn of native stone!
Then thus Umbritius (with an angry
frown,

And looking back on this degen'rate town):
"Since noble arts in Rome have no support,
And ragged virtue not a friend at court,⁴⁰
No profit rises from th' ungrateful stage,
My poverty encreasing with my age,
'T is time to give my just disdain a vent,
And, cursing, leave so base a government.
Where Dædalus⁷ his borrow'd wings laid by,
To that obscure retreat I choose to fly:

While yet few furrows on my face are
seen,
While I walk upright, and old age is
green,
And Lachesis⁸ has somewhat left to spin. }

Now, now 't is time to quit this cursed place,⁵⁰

And hide from villains my too honest face:
Here let Arturius⁹ live, and such as he;
Such manners will with such a town agree.
Knaves who in full assemblies have the knack

Of turning truth to lies, and white to black;
Can hire large houses, and oppress the poor
By farm'd excise; can cleanse the common
shore,

And rent the fishery; can bear the dead;
And teach their eyes dissembled tears to
shed:

All this for gain; for gain they sell their very head. 60

These fellows (see what Fortune's pow'r can
do)

Were once the minstrels of a country show:
Follow'd the prizes thro' each paltry town,
By trumpet-cheeks and bloated faces known.
But now, grown rich, on drunken holi-
days,

At their own costs exhibit public plays;
Where, influenc'd by the rabble's bloody
will,

With thumbs bent back,¹⁰ they popularly kill.

From thence return'd, their sordid avarice rakes

In excrements again, and hires the jakes.⁷⁰
Why hire they not the town, not ev'ry-
thing,

Since such as they have Fortune in a string,
Who, for her pleasure, can her fools advance,

And toss 'em topmost on the wheel of
chance?

What's Rome to me, what bus'ness have I
there,

I who can neither lie, nor falsely swear?
Nor praise my patron's undeserving rhymes, Nor yet comply with him, nor with his
times;

Unskill'd in schemes by planets to foreshow,
Like canting rascals, how the wars will go:

I neither will, nor can prognosticate 81

To the young gaping heir, his father's fate;
Nor in the entrails of a toad have pried,
Nor carried bawdy presents to a bride:

For want of these town virtues, thus, alone,
I go conducted on my way by none:

Like a dead member from the body rent;
Maim'd, and useless to the government.

"Who now is lov'd, but he who loves the
times,

Conscious of close intrigues, and dipp'd in
crimes; 90

Lab'ring with secrets which his bosom burn,
Yet never must to public light return?

They get reward alone who can betray:
For keeping honest counsels none will pay.

He who can Verres,¹¹ when he will, accuse,
The purse of Verres may at pleasure use:

But let not all the gold which Tagus¹² hides,
And pays the sea in tributary tides,

Be bribe sufficient to corrupt thy breast,
Or violate with dreams thy peaceful rest. 100

Great men with jealous eyes the friend be-
hold,

Whose secrecy they purchase with their
gold.

"I haste to tell thee, nor shall shame oppose,

What confidents our wealthy Romans chose;
And whom I most abhor: to speak my mind,
I hate, in Rome, a Grecian town to find:

To see the scum of Greece transplanted
here,

Receiv'd like gods, is what I cannot bear.

Nor Greeks alone, but Syrians here abound;
Obscene Orontes,¹³ diving under ground, 110

Conveys his wealth to Tiber's¹⁴ hungry
shores,

And fattens Italy with foreign whores:
Hether their crooked harps and customs

come;
All find receipt in hospitable Rome.

The barbarous harlots crowd the public
place:

Go, fools, and purchase an unclean embrace;

The painted miter court, and the more painted face.

Old Romulus,¹⁵ and Father Mars, look
down!

Your herdsman primitive, your homely
clown

Is turn'd a beau in a loose tawdry gown.
His once unkem'd and horrid locks, be-
hold 121

Stilling sweet oil: his neck inchain'd with
gold;

Aping the foreigners, in ev'ry dress,
Which, bought at greater cost, becomes him less.

Meantime they wisely leave their native
land;

From Sicyon, Samos, and from Alaband,
And Amydon, to Rome they swarm in shoals:

So sweet and easy is the gain from fools.
Poor refugees at first, they purchase here;

And, soon as denizen'd, they domineer; 130
Grow to the great a flatt'ring servile rout:

Work themselves inward, and their patrons
out:

Quick-witted, brazen-fac'd, with fluent
tongues,

Patient of labors, and dissembling wrongs.
Riddle me this, and guess him if you can,
Who bears a nation in a single man?

A cook, a conjurer, a rhetorician,
A painter, pedant, a geometrician,
A dancer on the ropes, and a physician. }
All things the hungry Greek exactly knows:
And bid him go to heav'n, to heav'n he goes: 141

In short, no Scythian, Moor, or Thracian
born,
But in that town¹⁶ which arms and arts
adorn.

Shall he be plac'd above me at the board,
In purple cloth'd, and lolling like a lord?
Shall he before me sign, whom t'other
day

A small-craft vessel hither did convey;
Where, stow'd with prunes, and rotten figs, he lay? }

How little is the privilege become
Of being born a citizen of Rome! 150

The Greeks get all by fulsome flatteries;
A most peculiar stroke they have at lies.
They make a wit of their insipid friend;
His blobber lips, and beetle brows commend;
His long crane neck, and narrow shoulders
praise —

You'd think they were describing Hercules.
A creaking voice for a clear treble goes;
Tho' harsher than a cock that treads and crows.

We can as grossly praise; but, to our grief,
No flatt'ry but from Grecians gains belief.
Besides these qualities, we must agree 161
They mimic better on the stage than we:
The wife, the whore, the shepherdess they
play,

In such a free, and such a graceful way,
That we believe a very woman shown,
And fancy something underneath the gown.
But not Antiochus, nor Stratocles,¹⁷
Our ears and ravish'd eyes can only
please: }

The nation is compos'd of such as these.
All Greece is one comedian: laugh, and
they 170

Return it louder than an ass can bray:
Grieve, and they grieve; if you weep
silently,

There seems a silent echo in their eye:
They cannot mourn like you; but they can cry. }

Call for a fire, their winter clothes they
take:

Begin but you to shiver, and they shake:
In frost and snow, if you complain of heat,
They rub th' unswearing brow, and swear
they sweat.

We live not on the square with such as
these; 179

Such are our betters who can better please;
Who day and night are like a looking-glass,
Still ready to reflect their patron's face;
The panegyric hand, and lifted eye,
Prepar'd for some new piece of flattery.

Ev'n nastiness occasions will afford;
They praise a belching, or well-pissing lord.
Besides, there's nothing sacred, nothing free
From bold attempts of their rank lechery.

Thro' the whole family their labors run;
The daughter is debauch'd, the wife is
won: 190

Nor scapes the bridegroom, or the blooming son.

If none they find for their lewd purpose fit,
They with the walls and very floors commit.
They search the secrets of the house, and
so

Are worship'd there, and fear'd for what they know.

"And, now we talk of Grecians, cast a
view

On what, in schools, their men of morals
do; }

A rigid Stoic¹⁸ his own pupil slew:
A friend, against a friend, of his own cloth,
Turn'd evidence, and murder'd on his oath.
What room is left for Romans in a town 201
Where Grecians rule, and cloaks control the gown?

Some Diphilus, or some Protogenes,¹⁹
Look sharply out, our senators to seize:
Engross 'em wholly, by their native art,
And fear no rivals in their bubble's heart:
One drop of poison in my patron's ear,
One slight suggestion of a senseless fear,
Infus'd with cunning, serves to ruin me;
Disgrac'd and banish'd from the family. 210
In vain forgotten services I boast;
My long dependence in an hour is lost:
Look round the world, what country will appear,

Where friends are left with greater ease
than here?

At Rome (nor think me partial to the poor)
All offices of ours are out of door:
In vain we rise, and to their levees run;

My lord himself is up, before, and gone;
The prætor bids his lictors mend their pace,
Lest his colleague outstrip him in the
race;

The childless matrons are, long since,
awake,

And for affronts the tardy visits take.

"Tis frequent, here, to see a freeborn
son

On the left hand of a rich hireling run;
Because the wealthy rogue can throw away,
For half a brace of bouts, a tribune's pay:
But you, poor sinner, tho' you love the vice
And like the whore, demur upon the price;
And, frightened with the wicked sum, forbear
To lend a hand, and help her from the chair.

"Produce a witness of unblemish'd life,
Holy as Numa, or as Numa's wife,
Or him who bid²⁰ th' unhallow'd flames
retire,

And snatch'd the trembling goddess from
the fire;

The question is not put, how far extends
His piety, but what he yearly spends:
Quick, to the bus'ness; how he lives and eats;

How largely gives; how splendidly he treats;

How many thousand acres feed his sheep;
What are his rents; what servants does he
keep?

Th' account is soon cast up; the judges
rate

Our credit in the court by our estate.

Swear by our gods, or those the Greeks
adore,

Thou art as sure forsworn, as thou art poor;
The poor must gain their bread by perjury;

And even the gods, that other means
deny,

In conscience must absolve 'em, when they lie.

"Add, that the rich have still a gibe in
store;

And will be monstrous witty on the poor:
For the torn surtout and the tatter'd vest,
The wretch and all his wardrobe are a jest;
The greasy gown, sullied with often turn-
ing,

Gives a good hint, to say: 'The man's in mourning:'

Or if the shoe be ripp'd, or patches put:

'He's wounded! see the plaster on his foot.'

Want is the scorn of ev'ry wealthy fool;
And wit in rags is turn'd to ridicule.

"Pack hence, and from the cover'd benches rise,

The master of the ceremonies cries,
'This is no place for you, whose small estate
Is not the value of the settled rate;

The sons of happy punks, the pander's
heir,

Are privileg'd to sit in triumph there,
To clap the first, and rule the theater.

Up to the galleries, for shame, retreat;
For, by the Roscian law,²¹ the poor can claim no seat.'

Who ever brought to his rich daughter's bed
The man that poll'd but twelvecence for his head?

Who ever nam'd a poor man for his heir,
Or call'd him to assist the judging chair?
The poor were wise, who, by the rich op-
press'd,

Withdrew, and sought a sacred place of
rest.

Once they did well, to free themselves from
scorn;

But had done better never to return.

Rarely they rise by virtue's aid, who lie
Plung'd in the depth of helpless poverty.

"At Rome 't is worse; where house-rent by the year

And servants' bellies cost so dev'lish dear;
And tavern bills run high for hungry
cheer.

To drink or eat in earthenware we
scorn,

Which cheaply country cupboards does
adorn;

And coarse blue hoods on holidays are worn.

Some distant parts of Italy are known,
Where none, but only dead men,²² wear a
gown;

On theaters of turf, in homely state,
Old plays they act, old feasts they celebrate;

The same rude song returns upon the crowd,
And, by tradition, is for wit allow'd.

The mimic yearly gives the same delights;
And in the mother's arms the clownish infant frights.

Their habits (undistinguish'd by degree)
Are plain, alike; the same simplicity,

Both on the stage, and in the pit, you see.
In his white cloak the magistrate appears;

The country bumpkin the same liv'ry wears.

But here, attir'd beyond our purse we go,
For useless ornament and flaunting show:
We take on trust, in purple robes to shine;
And poor, are yet ambitious to be fine.
This is a common vice, tho' all things here
Are sold, and sold unconscionably dear. ³⁰¹
What will you give that Cossus²³ may but
view

Your face, and in the crowd distinguish
you;

May take your incense like a gracious god,
And answer only with a civil nod?

To please our patrons, in this vicious age,
We make our entrance by the fav'rite page;
Shave his first down, and when he polls his
hair,

The consecrated locks to temples bear;
Pay tributary cracknels, which he sells, ³¹⁰
And, with our offerings, help to raise his vails.

"Who fears, in country towns, a house's
fall,

Or to be caught betwixt a riven wall?

But we inhabit a weak city, here;

Which buttresses and props but scarcely
bear:

And 't is the village mason's daily calling,
To keep the world's metropolis from fall-
ing,

To cleanse the gutters, and the chinks to
close,

And, for one night, secure his lord's repose.
At Cumæ we can sleep, quite round the year, ³²⁰

Nor falls, nor fires, nor nightly dangers fear;
While rolling flames from Roman turrets
fly,

And the pale citizens for buckets cry.

Thy neighbor has remov'd his wretched
store,

(Few hands will rid the lumber of the poor;)

Thy own third story smokes, while thou, supine,

Art drench'd in fumes of undigested wine.

For if the lowest floors already burn, Cocklofts and garrets soon will take the
turn,

Where thy tame pigeons²⁴ next the tiles were bred, ³³⁰

Which, in their nests unsafe, are timely fled.

"Codrus²⁵ had but one bed, so short to boot,

That his short wife's short legs hung dangling out;

His cupboard's head six earthen pitchers
grac'd,

Beneath 'em was his trusty tankard plac'd;
And, to support this noble plate, there lay
A bending Chiron cast from honest clay;
His few Greek books a rotten chest con-
tain'd,

Whose covers much of moldiness com-
plain'd: ³³⁹

Where mice and rats devour'd poetic bread,
And with heroic verse luxuriously were fed.

'T is true, poor Codrus nothing had to boast,
And yet poor Codrus all that nothing lost;
Begg'd naked thro' the streets of wealthy
Rome;

And found not one to feed, or take him
home.

"But if the palace of Arturius burn,
The nobles change their clothes, the matrons mourn;

The city prætor will no pleadings hear;

The very name of fire we hate and fear,

And look aghast, as if the Gauls were here. ³⁵⁰

While yet it burns, th' officious nation flies,
Some to condole, and some to bring supplies:

One sends him marble to rebuild; and one

White naked statues of the Parian stone,

The work of Polyclete, that seem to live;

While others images for altars give;

One books and screens, and Pallas to the
breast;

Another bags of gold; and he gives best.

Childless Arturius, vastly rich before,

Thus by his losses multiplies his store; ³⁶⁰

Suspected for accomplice to the fire,

That burnt his palace but to build it higher.

"But, could you be content to bid adieu

To the dear playhouse, and the players too;

Sweet country seats are purchas'd ev'ry-
where,

With lands and gardens, at less price
than here

You hire a darksome doghole by the year:

A small convenience, decently prepar'd,

A shallow well, that rises in your yard,

That spreads his easy crystal streams around, ³⁷⁰

And waters all the pretty spot of ground.

There, love the fork, thy garden cultivate,
And give thy frugal friends a Pythagorean treat.²⁶

'T is somewhat to be lord of some small
ground,

In which a lizard may, at least, turn round.

" 'T is frequent, here, for want of sleep
 to die;
 Which fumes of undigested feasts deny;
 And, with imperfect heat, in languid stomachs fry.
 What house secure from noise the poor can
 keep,
 When ev'n the rich can scarce afford to sleep? ³⁸⁰
 So dear it costs to purchase rest in Rome;
 And hence the sources of diseases come.
 The drover who his fellow-drover meets
 In narrow passages of winding streets;
 The wagoners, that curse their standing teams,
 Would wake ev'n drowsy Drusus from his dreams.
 And yet the wealthy will not brook de-
 lay,
 But sweep above our heads; and make
 their way,
 In lofty litters borne, and read and write,
 Or sleep at ease: the shutters make it night. ³⁹⁰
 Yet still he reaches, first, the public place:
 The prease before him stops the client's
 pace.
 The crowd that follows crush his panting
 sides,
 And trip his heels; he walks not, but he rides.
 One elbows him, one justles in the shole,
 A rafter breaks his head, or chairman's pole:
 Stocking'd with loads of fat town-dirt
 he goes;
 And some rogue-soldier, with his hob-nail'd shoes,
 Indents his legs behind in bloody rows.
 "See with what smoke our doles we celebrate: ⁴⁰⁰
 A hundred guests, invited, walk in state;
 A hundred hungry slaves, with their Dutch kitchens, wait.
 Huge pans the wretches on their heads
 must bear,
 Which scarce gigantic Corbulo ²⁷ could
 rear:
 Yet they must walk upright beneath the
 load;
 Nay, run, and, running, blow the sparkling flames abroad.
 Their coats, from botching newly brought,
 are torn;
 Unwieldy timber-trees in wagons borne,

Stretch'd at their length, beyond their carriage lie,
 That nod, and threaten ruin from on high;
 For, should their axle break, its overthrow ⁴¹¹
 Would crush, and pound to dust, the crowd below;
 Nor friends their friends, nor sires their sons could know:
 Nor limbs, nor bones, nor carcass would remain:
 But a mash'd heap, a hotchpotch of the slain;
 One vast destruction; not the soul alone,
 But bodies, like the soul, invisible are
 flown.
 Meantime, unknowing of their fellows'
 fate,
 The servants wash the platter, scour the plate,
 Then blow the fire, with puffing cheeks,
 and lay ⁴²⁰
 The rubbers, and the bathing-sheets dis-
 play;
 And oil them first; and each is handy in
 his way.
 But he, for whom this busy care they take,
 Poor ghost, is wand'ring by the Stygian
 lake;
 Affrighted with the ferryman's ²⁸ grim face,
 New to the horrors of that uncouth place,
 His passage begs with unregarded pray'r,
 And wants two farthings to discharge his fare.
 "Return we to the dangers of the night:
 And, first, behold our houses' dreadful
 height;
 From whence come broken potsherds ⁴³⁰ tumbling down;
 And leaky ware, from garret windows
 thrown:
 Well may they break our heads, that mark the flinty stone.
 'T is want of sense to sup abroad too late,
 Unless thou first hast settled thy estate.
 As many fates attend, thy steps to meet,
 As there are waking windows in the street.
 Bless the good gods, and think thy chance is rare,
 To have a pisspot only for thy share.
 "The scouring drunkard, if he does not fight ⁴⁴⁰
 Before his bedtime, takes no rest that
 night;
 Passing the tedious hours in greater pain

Than stern Achilles,²⁹ when his friend was slain:

'Tis so ridiculous, but so true withal,
A bully cannot sleep without a brawl;
Yet tho' his youthful blood be fir'd with wine,

He wants not wit, the danger to decline;
Is cautious to avoid the coach and six,
And on the lackeys will no quarrel fix.
His train of flambeaux, and embroider'd coat,

May privilege my lord to walk secure on foot.

But me, who must by moonlight home-ward bend,

Or lighted only with a candle's end,
Poor me he fights, if that be fighting, where
He only cudgels, and I only bear.

He stands, and bids me stand; I must abide;

For he's the stronger, and is drunk beside.

"Where did you whet your knife to-night?" he cries,

'And shred the leeks that in your stomach rise?

Whose windy beans have stuff'd your guts, and where

Have your black thumbs been dipp'd in vinegar?

With what companion cobbler have you fed,
On old ox-cheeks, or he-goat's tougher head?

What, are you dumb? Quick, with your answer, quick,

Before my foot salutes you with a kick.
Say, in what nasty cellar, under ground,

Or what church porch, your roguiship may be found?

Answer, or answer not, 't is all the same:
He lays me on, and makes me bear the blame.

Before the bar, for beating him, you come;
This is a poor man's liberty in Rome.

You beg his pardon; happy to retreat

With some remaining teeth, to chew your meat.

"Nor is this all; for, when retir'd, you think

To sleep securely; when the candles wink,
When every door with iron chains is barr'd,

And roaring taverns are no longer heard;
The ruffian robbers, by no justice aw'd,

And unpaid cutthroat soldiers, are abroad,
Those venal souls, who, harden'd in each ill,

To save complaints and prosecution, kill.
Chas'd from their woods and bogs, the padders come

To this vast city, as their native home;
To live at ease, and safely skulk in Rome.

"The forge in fetters only is employ'd;
Our iron mines exhausted and destroy'd
In shackles; for these villains scarce allow Goads for the teams, and plowshares for the plow.

O happy ages of our ancestors,
Beneath the kings³⁰ and tribunitial pow'rs!
One jail did all their criminals restrain,
Which, now, the walls of Rome can scarce contain.

"More I could say, more causes I could show

For my departure; but the sun is low;
The wagoner grows weary of my stay,
And whips his horses forwards on their way.

"Farewell; and when, like me, o'erwhelm'd with care,

You to your own Aquinum³¹ shall repair,
To take a mouthful of sweet country air,

Be mindful of your friend; and send me word,

What joys your fountains and cool shades afford:

Then, to assist your satires, I will come;
And add new venom, when you write of Rome."

EXPLANATORY NOTES ON THE THIRD SATIRE

1 Cumæ, a small city in Campania, near Puteoli, or Puzzolo, as it is call'd. The habitation of the Cumæan Sibyl.

2 Bajæ, another little town in Campania, near the sea; a pleasant place.

3 Prochyta, a small barren island belonging to the kingdom of Naples.

4 In dog days. The poets in Juvenal's time us'd to rehearse their poetry in August.

5 Numa, the second king of Rome, who made their laws, and instituted their religion.

6 Nymph. Egeria, a nymph, or goddess, with whom Numa feign'd to converse by night, and to be instructed by her in modeling his superstitions.

7 Where Dædalus, &c., meaning at Cumæ.

8 Lachesis, one of the three Destinies, whose office was to spin the life of every man; as it was of Clotho to hold the distaff, and Atropos to cut the thread.

9 Arturius, any debauch'd, wicked fellow, who gains by the times.

10 With thumbs bent backward. In a prize of sword-players, when one of the fencers had the other at his mercy, the vanquish'd party implor'd the clemency of the spectators. If they thought he deserv'd it not, they held up their thumbs and bent them backwards in sign of death.

11 Verres, prætor in Sicily, contemporary with Cicero, by whom, accus'd of oppressing the province, he was condemn'd: his name is us'd here for any rich vicious man.

12 Tagus, a famous river in Spain, which discharges itself into the ocean near Lisbon, in Portugal. It was held of old to be full of golden sands.

13 Orontes, the greatest river of Syria. The poet here puts the river for the inhabitants of Syria.

14 Tiber, the river which runs by Rome.

15 Romulus, first king of Rome; son of Mars, as the poets feign. The first Romans were originally herdsmen.

16 But in that town, &c. He means Athens, of which Pallas, the Goddess of Arms and Arts, was patroness.

17 Antiochus and Stratocles, two famous Grecian mimics, or actors, in the poet's time.

18 A rigid Stoic, &c. Publius Egnatius, a Stoic, falsely accus'd Barea Soranus, as Tacitus tells us.

19 Diphilus and Protogenes, &c., were Grecians living in Rome.

20 Or him who bade, &c. Lucius Metellus, the high priest, who, when the temple of Vesta was on fire, sav'd the Palladium.

21 For, by the Roscian law, &c. Roscius, a tribune, who order'd the distinction of places in public shows betwixt the noblemen of Rome and the plebeians.

22 Where none, but only dead men, &c. The meaning is, that men in some parts of Italy never wore a gown (the usual habit of the Romans) till they were buried in one.

23 Cossus is here taken for any great man.

24 Where the tame pigeons, &c. The Romans us'd to breed their tame pigeons in their garrets.

25 Codrus, a learned man, very poor: by his books, suppos'd to be a poet; for, in all probability, the heroic verses here mention'd, which rats and mice devour'd, were Homer's works.

26 A Pythagorean treat. He means herbs, roots, fruits, and salads.

27 Gigantic Corbulo. Corbulo was a famous general, in Nero's time, who conquer'd Armenia, and was afterwards put to death by that tyrant, when he was in Greece, in reward of his great services. His stature was not only tall, above the ordinary size, but he was also proportionably strong.

28 The ferryman's, &c. Charon, the ferryman of hell, whose fare was a halfpenny for every soul.

29 Stern Achilles. The friend of Achilles was Patroclus, who was slain by Hector.

30 Beneath the kings, &c. Rome was originally rul'd by kings, till, for the rape of Lucretia, Tarquin the Proud was expell'd; after which it was govern'd by two consuls, yearly chosen; but they oppressing the people, the commoners mutinied and procur'd tribunes to be created, who defended their privileges and often oppos'd the consular authority and the senate.

31 Aquinum was the birthplace of Juvenal.

THE SIXTH SATIRE OF JUVENAL

THE ARGUMENT

This satire, of almost double length to any of the rest, is a bitter invective against the fair sex. 'Tis, indeed, a commonplace, from whence all the moderns have notoriously stolen their sharpest railleries. In his other satires, the poet has only glanc'd on some particular women and generally scourg'd the men. But this he reserv'd wholly for the ladies. How they had offended him I know not; but upon the whole matter he is not to be excus'd for imputing to all the vices of some few amongst them. Neither was it generously done of him, to attack the weakest as well as the fairest part of the creation; neither do I know what moral he could reasonably draw from it. It could not be to avoid the whole sex, if all had been true which he alleges against them; for that had been to put an end to humankind. And to bid us beware of their artifices, is a kind of silent acknowledgment, that they have more wit than men: which turns the satire upon us, and particularly upon the poet; who thereby makes a compliment, where he meant a libel. If he intended only to exercise his wit, he has forfeited his judgment, by making the one half of his readers his mortal enemies; and amongst the men, all the happy lovers, by their own experience, will disprove his accusations. The whole world must allow this to be the wittiest of his satires; and truly he had need of all his parts, to maintain, with so much violence, so unjust a charge. I am satisfied he will bring but few over to his opinion; and on that consideration chiefly I ventur'd to translate him. Tho' there wanted not another reason, which was, that no one else would undertake it: at least, Sir C. S., who could have done more right to the author, after a long delay, at length absolutely refus'd so ungrateful an employment; and everyone will grant that the work must have been imperfect and lame, if it had appear'd without one of the principal members belonging to it. Let the poet therefore bear the blame of his own invention ; and let me satisfy the world that I am not of his opinion. Whatever his Roman ladies were, the English are free from all his imputations. They will read with wonder and abhorrence the vices of an age which was the most infamous of any on record. They will bless themselves when they behold those examples related of Domitian's time ; they will give back to antiquity those monsters it produc'd ; and believe with reason that the species of those women is extinguish'd, or at least that they were never here propagated. I may safely therefore proceed to the argument of a satire, which is no way relating to them ; and first observe that my author makes their lust the most heroic of their vices : the rest are in a manner but digression. He skims them over ; but he dwells on this : when he seems to have taken his last leave of it, on the sudden he returns to it : 't is one branch of it in Hippia, another in Messalina, but lust is the main body of the tree. He begins with this text in the first line, and takes it up with intermissions to the end of the chapter. Every vice is a loader, but that's a ten. The fillers, or intermediate parts, are their revenge ; their contrivances of secret crimes ; their arts to hide them ; their wit to excuse them ; and their impudence to own them, when they can no longer be kept secret. Then, the persons to whom they are most addicted, and on whom they commonly bestow the last favors : as stage-players, fiddlers, singing-boys, and fencers. Those who pass for chaste amongst them, are not really so ; but only, for their vast dowries, are rather suffer'd, than lov'd, by their own husbands. That they are imperious, domineering, scolding wives ; set up for learning and criticism in poetry, but are false judges. Love to speak Greek (which was then the fashionable tongue, as French is now with us). That they plead causes at the bar, and play prizes at the bear garden. That they are gossips and newsmongers ; wrangle with their neighbors abroad, and beat their servants at home. That they lie in for new faces once a month ; are sluttish with their husbands in private ; and paint and dress in public for their lovers. That they deal with Jews, diviners, and fortune tellers ; learn the arts of miscarrying, and barrenness. Buy children, and produce them for their own. Murder their husband's sons, if they stand in their way to his estate, and make their adulterers his heirs. From hence the poet proceeds to shew the occasions of all these vices, their original, and how they were introduc'd in Rome, by peace, wealth, and luxury. In conclusion, if we will take the word of our malicious author, bad women are the general standing rule ; and the good, but some few exceptions to it.

IN Saturn's reign,¹ at Nature's early birth,
There was that thing call'd chastity on earth ;
When in a narrow cave, their common shade,
The sheep, the shepherds, and their gods
were laid :

When reeds, and leaves, and hides of beasts were spread

By mountain huswives for their homely
bed,

And mossy pillows rais'd, for the rude husband's head.

Unlike the niceness of our modern dames, (Affected nymphs with new affected names,) ⁹

The Cynthias and the Lesbias of our years,
Who for a sparrow's death dissolve in
tears ;

Those first unpolish'd matrons, big and
bold,

Gave suck to infants of gigantic mold ;

Rough as their savage lords who rang'd
the wood,

And fat with acorns² belch'd their windy
food.

For when the world was buxom, fresh, and
young,

Her sons were undebauch'd and therefore
strong ;

And whether born in kindly beds of earth,
Or struggling from the teeming oaks to
birth,

Or from what other atoms they begun, ²⁰
No sires they had, or, if a sire, the sun.

Some thin remains of chastity appear'd,
Ev'n under Jove,³ but Jove without a
beard ;

Before the servile Greeks had learnt to
swear

By heads of kings ; while yet the bounteous
year

Her common fruits in open plains expos'd, Ere thieves were fear'd, or gardens were enclos'd.

At length uneasy Justice⁴ upwards flew,
And both the sisters to the stars withdrew ;

From that old era whoring did begin, ³⁰
So venerably ancient is the sin.

Adult'ers next invade the nuptial state,
And marriage beds creak'd with a foreign
weight ;

All other ills did iron times adorn,
But whores and silver in one age were born.

Yet thou, they say, for marriage dost provide:
 Is this an age to buckle with a bride?
 They say thy hair the curling art is taught,
 The wedding ring perhaps already bought:
 A sober man like thee to change his life!
 What fury would possess thee with a wife?
 Art thou of ev'ry other death bereft, 42
 No knife, no ratsbane, no kind halter left?
 (For every noose compar'd to hers is cheap)
 Is there no city bridge from whence to leap?
 Wouldst thou become her drudge, who dost enjoy
 A better sort of bedfellow, thy boy?
 He keeps thee not awake with nightly brawls,
 Nor with a begg'd reward thy pleasure palls;
 Nor with insatiate heavings calls for more,
 When all thy spirits were drain'd out before. 51
 But still Ursidius courts the marriage bait,
 Longs for a son to settle his estate,
 And takes no gifts, tho' ev'ry gaping heir
 Would gladly grease the rich old bachelor.
 What revolution can appear so strange,
 As such a lecher, such a life to change?
 A rank, notorious whoremaster, to choose
 To thrust his neck into the marriage roose!
 He who so often in a dreadful fright 60
 Had in a coffer scap'd the jealous cuckold's sight,
 That he, to wedlock dotingly betray'd,
 Should hope in this lewd town to find a maid!
 The man's grown mad: to ease his frantic pain,
 Run for the surgeon; breathe the middle vein:
 But let a heifer with gilt horns be led
 To Juno, regent of the marriage bed,
 And let him every deity adore, }
 If his new bride prove not an arrant whore }
 In head and tail, and every other pore. }
 On Ceres' feast,^s restrain'd from their delight, 71
 Few matrons, there, but curse the tedious night;
 Few whom their fathers dare salute, such lust
 Their kisses have, and come with such a gust.
 With ivy now adorn thy doors, and wed;
 Such is thy bride, and such thy genial bed.

Think'st thou one man is for one woman meant?
 She, sooner, with one eye would be content.
 And yet, 't is nois'd, a maid did once appear
 In some small village, tho' fame says not where: 80
 'T is possible; but sure no man she found;
 'T was desert, all, about her father's ground:
 And yet some lustful god might there make bold;
 Are Jove and Mars⁶ grown impotent and old?
 Many a fair nymph has in a cave been spread,
 And much good love without a feather bed.
 Whither wouldst thou to choose a wife resort,
 The Park, the Mall, the Playhouse, or the Court?
 Which way soever thy adventures fall,
 Secure alike of chastity in all. 90
 One sees a dancing master cap'ring high,
 And raves, and pisses, with pure ecstasy;
 Another does with all his motions move,
 And gapes, and grins, as in the feat of love;
 A third is charm'd with the new opera notes,
 Admires the song, but on the singer dotes:
 The country lady in the box appears, }
 Softly she warbles over all she hears; }
 And sucks in passion, both at eyes and ears. }
 The rest, (when now the long vacation's come, 100
 The noisy hall and theaters grown dumb,) }
 Their memories to refresh, and cheer their hearts, }
 In borrow'd breeches act the players' parts.
 The poor, that scarce have wherewithal to eat,
 Will pinch, to make the singing-boy a treat:
 The rich, to buy him, will refuse no price;
 And stretch his quail-pipe, till they crack his voice.
 Tragedians, acting love, for lust are sought:
 (Tho' but the parrots of a poet's thought.)
 The pleading lawyer, tho' for counsel us'd,
 In chamber practice often is refus'd. 111
 Still thou wilt have a wife, and father heirs;
 (The product of concurring theaters.)
 Perhaps a fencer did thy brows adorn,
 And a young swordman to thy lands is born.
 Thus Hippia loath'd her old patrician lord,

And left him for a brother of the sword:
To wond'ring Pharos⁷ with her love she
fled,

To shew one monster more than Afric bred:
Forgetting house and husband, left behind, ¹²⁰
Ev'n children too; she sails before the
wind;

False to 'em all, but constant to her kind.
But, stranger yet, and harder to conceive,
She could the playhouse and the players
leave.

Born of rich parentage, and nicely bred,
She lodg'd on down, and in a damask bed;
Yet daring now the dangers of the deep,
On a hard mattress is content to sleep.
Ere this, 't is true, she did her fame expose:
But that, great ladies with great ease can lose. ¹³⁰

The tender nymph could the rude ocean
bear:

So much her lust was stronger than her fear.
But, had some honest cause her passage
press'd,

The smallest hardship had disturb'd her
breast:

Each inconvenience makes their virtue cold;
But womankind, in ills, is ever bold.

Were she to follow her own lord to sea,
What doubts and scruples would she raise to stay?

Her stomach sick, and her head giddy grows; ¹³⁹

The tar and pitch are nauseous to her nose.
But in love's voyage nothing can offend;
Women are never seasick with a friend.

Amidst the crew, she walks upon the
board;

She eats, she drinks, she handles every
cord;

And if she spews, 't is thinking of her
lord.

Now ask, for whom her friends and fame she
lost?

What youth, what beauty could th' adult'r'er boast?

What was the face, for which she could sustain

To be call'd mistress to so base a man?
The gallant of his days had known the best: ¹⁵⁰

Deep scars were seen indented on his
breast;

And all his batter'd limbs requir'd their needful rest.

A promontory wen, with grisly grace,
Stood high, upon the handle of his face:
His blear eyes ran in gutters to his chin;
His beard was stubble, and his cheeks were thin.

But 't was his fencing did her fancy move:
'T is arms and blood and cruelty they love.
But should he quit his trade, and sheathe
his sword,

Her lover would begin to be her lord. ¹⁶⁰
This was a private crime; but you shall
hear

What fruits the sacred brows of monarchs
bear:

The good old sluggard but began to snore,
When from his side up rose th' imperial whore:⁸

She who preferr'd the pleasures of the
night

To poms, that are but impotent delight;
Strode from the palace, with an eager
pace,

To cope with a more masculine embrace;
Muffled she march'd, like Juno in a cloud,
Of all her train but one poor wench allow'd;
One whom in secret service she could trust,
The rival and companion of her lust. ¹⁷²

To the known brothel-house she takes her
way;

And for a nasty room gives double pay;
That room in which the rankest harlot
lay.

Prepar'd for fight, expectingly she lies,
With heaving breasts, and with desiring
eyes:

Still as one drops, another takes his place,
And baffled still succeeds to like disgrace.
At length, when friendly darkness is expir'd, ¹⁸⁰

And every strumpet from her cell retir'd,
She lags behind, and, ling'ring at the gate,
With a repining sigh submits to fate:

All filth without, and all a fire within,
Tir'd with the toil, unsated with the sin.

Old Caesar's bed the modest matron seeks;
The steam of lamps still hanging on her cheeks

In ropy smut: thus foul, and thus bedight,
She brings him back the product of the
night.

Now should I sing what poisons they provide, ¹⁹⁰
With all their trumpery of charms beside,
And all their arts of death, it would be
known

Lust is the smallest sin the sex can own;
 Cæsinia still, they say, is guiltless found
 Of every vice, by her own lord renown'd:
 And well she may, she brought ten thousand pound.

She brought him wherewithal to be call'd chaste;

His tongue is tied in golden fetters fast:
 He sighs, adores, and courts her every hour;
 Who would not do as much for such a dower?

She writes love letters to the youth in grace;
 Nay, tips the wink before the cuckold's face;
 And might do more; her portion makes it good;

Wealth has the privilege⁹ of widowhood.

These truths with his example you disprove,

Who with his wife is monstrously in love:
 But know him better; for I heard him swear,

'T is not that she's his wife, but that she's fair.

Let her not have three wrinkles in her face,
 Let her eyes lessen, and her skin unbrace,²¹⁰
 Soon you will hear the saucy steward say:
 "Pack up with all your trinkets, and away;
 You grow offensive both at bed and board:
 Your betters must be had to please my lord."

Meantime she's absolute upon the throne;
 And, knowing time is precious, loses none:
 She must have flocks of sheep, with wool more fine

Than silk, and vineyards of the noblest wine;
 Whole droves of pages for her train she craves,

And sweeps the prisons for attending slaves.²²⁰

In short, whatever in her eyes can come,
 Or others have abroad, she wants at home.
 When winter shuts the seas, and fleecy snows

Make houses white, she to the merchant goes;

Rich crystals of the rock she takes up there,

Huge agate vases, and old China ware:
 Then Berenice's ring¹⁰ her finger proves,
 More precious made by her incestuous loves,
 And infamously dear; a brother's bribe,
 Ev'n God's anointed, and of Judah's tribe;
 Where barefoot they approach the sacred shrine,²³¹

And think it only sin to feed on swine.

But is none worthy to be made a wife
 In all this town? Suppose her free from strife,
 Rich, fair, and fruitful, of unblemish'd life;

Chaste as the Sabines, whose prevailing charms

Dismiss'd their husbands', and their brothers' arms:

Grant her, besides, of noble blood, that ran

In ancient veins ere heraldry began:

Suppose all these, and take a poet's word,²⁴⁰
 A black swan is not half so rare a bird.

A wife, so hung with virtues, such a freight,
 What mortal shoulders could support the weight!

Some country girl, scarce to a curtsy bred,
 Would I much rather than Cornelia¹¹ wed:
 If supercilious, haughty, proud, and vain,
 She brought her father's triumphs in her train.

Away with all your Carthaginian state;
 Let vanquish'd Hannibal without doors wait,

Too burly and too big to pass my narrow gate.²⁵⁰

"O Pæan,"¹² cries Amphion, "bend thy bow

Against my wife, and let my children go!"

But sullen Pæan shoots at sons and mothers too.

His Niobe and all his boys he lost;

Ev'n her who did her num'rous offspring boast,

As fair and fruitful as the sow that carried
 The thirty pigs¹³ at one large litter farrow'd.

What beauty or what chastity can bear
 So great a price, if, stately and severe
 She still insults, and you must still adore?
 Grant that the honey's much, the gall is more.²⁶¹

Upbraided with the virtues she displays,
 Sev'n hours in twelve you loathe the wife you praise.

Some faults, tho' small, intolerable grow;
 For what so nauseous and affected too,
 As those that think they due perfection want,

Who have not learnt to lisp the Grecian cant?¹⁴

In Greece, their whole accomplishments they seek;

Their fashion, breeding, language, must be Greek: 269

But, raw in all that does to Rome belong,
They scorn to cultivate their mother tongue.
In Greek they flatter, all their fears they speak,

Tell all their secrets; nay, they scold in Greek:

Ev'n in the feat of love, they use that
tongue.

Such affectations may become the young;
But thou, old hag, of threescore years and
three,

Is shewing of thy parts in Greek for thee ?

Ζωή καὶ ψυχὴ ! All those tender words
The momentary trembling bliss affords,
The kind soft murmurs of the private sheets, 280

Are bawdy, while thou speak'st in public streets.

Those words have fingers; and their force is such,

They raise the dead, and mount him with a touch:

But all provocatives from thee are vain;
No blandishment the slacken'd nerve can
strain.

If then thy lawful spouse thou canst not
love,

What reason should thy mind to marriage
move ?

Why all the charges of the nuptial feast,
Wine and desserts, and sweetmeats to digest;
Th' indowing gold that buys the dear de-
light, 290

Giv'n for thy first and only happy night ?

If thou art thus uxoriously inclin'd,
To bear thy bondage with a willing mind,
Prepare thy neck, and put it in the yoke;
But for no mercy from thy woman look.

For tho', perhaps, she loves with equal fires,
To absolute dominion she aspires;

Joys in the spoils, and triumphs o'er thy
purse;

The better husband makes the wife the
worse.

Nothing is thine to give, or sell, or buy, 300
All offices of ancient friendship die;
Nor hast thou leave to make a legacy. }

By thy imperious wife thou art bereft
A privilege,¹⁵ to pimps and panders left.

Thy testament's her will; where she prefers }

Her ruffians, drudges, and adulterers,
Adopting all thy rivals for thy heirs. }

"Go drag that slave to death !"¹⁶ "Your reason, why"¹⁷

Should the poor innocent be doom'd to die ?
What proofs ? For, when man's life is in debate, 310

The judge can ne'er too long deliberate."

"Call'st thou that slave a man ?"¹⁸ the wife
replies;

"Prov'd, or unprov'd the crime, the villain
dies.

I have the sovereign pow'r to save or kill,
And give no other reason but my will."

Thus the she-tyrant reigns, till, pleas'd with change,

Her wild affections to new empires range:
Another subject-husband she desires;
Divorc'd from him, she to the first retires,
While the last wedding feast is scarcely
o'er, 320

And garlands hang yet green upon the door.

So still the reck'ning rises; and appears,
In total sum, eight husbands in five years.
The title for a tombstone might be fit,
But that it would too commonly be writ.

Her mother living, hope no quiet day;
She sharpens her, instructs her how to flay
Her husband bare, and then divides the
prey. }

She takes love letters, with a crafty smile,
And in her daughter's answer mends the style. 330

In vain the husband sets his watchful spies;
She cheats their cunning, or she bribes their eyes.

The doctor's call'd; the daughter, taught the trick,

Pretends to faint; and in full health is sick.
The panting stallion, at the closet door,
Hears the consult, and wishes it were o'er.
Canst thou, in reason, hope, a bawd so
known

Should teach her other manners than her
own ?

Her int'rest is in all th' advice she gives:
"T is on the daughter's rents the mother
lives. 340

No cause is tried at the litigious bar,
But women plaintiffs or defendants are;
They form the process, all the briefs they
write; }

The topics furnish, and the pleas indite;
And teach the toothless lawyer how to bite. }

They turn viragoes too; the wrastler's toil

They try, and smear their naked limbs with oil:

Against the post their wicker shields they crush,

Flourish the sword, and at the plastron push.

Of every exercise the mannish crew ³⁵⁰

Fulfil the parts, and oft excels us too;

Prepar'd not only in feign'd fights t' engage,

But rout the gladiators on the stage.

What sense of shame in such a breast can lie,

Inur'd to arms, and her own sex to fly?

Yet to be wholly man she would disclaim;

To quit her tenfold pleasure at the game,

For frothy praises and an empty name. }

O what a decent sight 't is to behold

All thy wife's magazine by auction sold! ³⁶⁰

The belt, the crested plume, the several suits

Of armor, and the Spanish-leather boots!

Yet these are they, that cannot bear the heat

Of figur'd silks, and under sarcenet sweat.

Behold the strutting Amazonian whore:

She stands in guard with her right foot before;

Her coats tuck'd up, and all her motions just;

She stamps, and then cries Hah! at every thrust:

But laugh to see her, tir'd with many a bout,

Call for the pot, and like a man piss out. ³⁷⁰

The ghosts of ancient Romans, should they rise,

Would grin to see their daughters play a prize.

Besides, what endless brawls by wives are bred!

The curtain lecture makes a mournful bed.

Then, when she has thee sure within the sheets,

Her cry begins, and the whole day repeats.

Conscious of crimes herself, she teases first;

Thy servants are accus'd; thy whore is curst;

She acts the jealous, and at will she cries;

For women's tears are but the sweat of eyes. ³⁸⁰

Poor cuckold-fool, thou think'st that love sincere,

And suck'st between her lips the falling tear;

But search her cabinet, and thou shalt find
Each tiller there with love epistles lin'd.

Suppose her taken in a close embrace,

This you would think so manifest a case, }

No rhetoric could defend, no impudence
outface:

And yet even then she cries: "The marriage
vow

A mental reservation must allow;

And there's a silent bargain still implied, }

The parties should be pleas'd on either side; ³⁹¹

And both may for their private needs provide.

Tho' men yourselves, and women us you
call,

Yet homo is a common name for all."

There's nothing bolder than a woman caught;

Guilt gives 'em courage to maintain their fault.

You ask from whence proceed these monstrous crimes.

Once poor, and therefore chaste, in former times,

Our matrons were: no luxury found room
In low-roof'd houses, and bare walls of loam; ⁴⁰⁰

Their hands with labor harden'd while 't was
light,

And frugal sleep supplied the quiet night;

While pinch'd with want, their hunger held
'em straight,

When Hannibal¹⁰ was how'ring at the gate:

But wanton now, and lolling at our ease,

We suffer all th' invet'rate ills of peace,

And wasteful riot; whose destructive
charms

Revenge the vanquish'd world of our victorious arms.

No crime, no lustful postures are unknown;

Since Poverty, our guardian god, is gone:

Pride, laziness, and all luxurious arts, ⁴¹¹

Pour like a deluge in, from foreign parts;

Since gold obscene and silver found the
way,

Strange fashions, with strange bullion, to convey,

And our plain simple manners to betray. }

What care our drunken dames to whom they spread?

Wine no distinction makes of tail or head:

Who, lewdly dancing at a midnight ball,

For hot eringoes and fat oysters call;

Full brimmers to their fuddled noses thrust,

Brimmers, the last provocatives of lust; ⁴²¹
When vapors to their swimming brains advance,

And double tapers on the tables dance.

Now think what bawdy dialogues they have,

What Tullia talks to her confiding slave,
At Modesty's old statue; when by night
They make a stand, and from their litters light:

The good man early to the levee goes,
And treads the nasty paddle of his spouse.

The secrets of the goddess nam'd the Good,²⁰ ⁴³⁰

Are even by boys and barbers understood:
Where the rank matrons, dancing to the pipe,

Gig with their bums, and are for action ripe;

With music rais'd, they spread abroad their hair,

And toss their heads like an enamor'd mare:

Laufella lays her garland by, and proves
The mimic lechery of manly loves.

Rank'd with the lady the cheap sinner lies;
For here not blood, but virtue, gives the prize.

Nothing is feign'd in this venereal strife; ⁴⁴⁰
'Tis downright lust, and acted to the life.

So full, so fierce, so vigorous, and so strong,
That looking on would make old Nestor²¹ young.

Impatient of delay, a general sound,
An universal groan of lust goes round; }
For then, and only then, the sex sincere } is found.

"Now is the time of action; now begin,"
They cry, "and let the lusty lovers in."

"The whoresons are asleep." "Then bring the slaves,

And watermen, a race of strong-back'd knaves."⁴⁵⁰

I wish, at least, our sacred rites were free

From those pollutions of obscenity:

But 't is well known what singer,²² how disguis'd,

A lewd audacious action enterpriz'd:

Into the fair, with women mix'd, he went,
Arm'd with a huge two-handed instrument;

A grateful present to those holy choirs,
Where the mouse, guilty of his sex, retires,

And even male pictures modestly are veil'd:
Yet no profaneness on that age prevail'd; ⁴⁶⁰

No scoffers at religious rites were found;
Tho' now, at every altar they abound.

I hear your cautious counsel, you would say:

"Keep close your women under lock and key."

But, who shall keep those keepers? Women, nurs'd

In craft, begin with those, and bribe 'em first.

The sex is turn'd all whore; they love the game:

And mistresses and maids are both the same.

The poor Ogulnia, on the poet's day,
Will borrow clothes, and chair, to see the play: ⁴⁷⁰

She, who before had mortgag'd her estate,
And pawn'd the last remaining piece of plate.

Some are reduc'd their utmost shifts to try,
But women have no shame of poverty.

They live beyond their stint; as if their store,

The more exhausted, would increase the more:

Some men, instructed by the lab'ring ant,
Provide against th' extremities of want;

But womankind, that never knows a mean,
Down to the dregs their sinking fortune drain: ⁴⁸⁰

Hourly they give, and spend, and waste, and wear,

And think no pleasure can be bought too dear.

There are, who in soft eunuchs place their bliss,²³

To shun the scrubbing of a bearded kiss,
And scape abortion; but their solid joy

Is when the page, already past a boy,
Is capon'd late, and to the gelder shown,

With his two pounders to perfection grown;
When all the navel-string could give, appears;

All but the beard, and that's the barber's loss, not theirs. ⁴⁹⁰

Seen from afar, and famous for his ware,
He struts into the bath, among the fair:

Th' admiring crew to their devotions fall;
And, kneeling, on their new Priapus²⁴ call.

Kerv'd for his lady's use, with her he lies;
And let him drudge for her, if thou art wise,

Rather than trust him with thy fav'rite boy;
He proffers death, in proffering to enjoy.

If songs they love, the singer's voice they force
 Beyond his compass, till his quail-pipe's hoarse; 500
 His lute and lyre with their embrace is worn;
 With knots they trim it, and with gems
 adorn:
 Run over all the strings, and kiss the case;
 And make love to it in the master's place.
 A certain lady once, of high degree,
 To Janus vow'd, and Vesta's deity, That Pollio²⁵ might, in singing, win the
 prize;
 Pollio the dear, the darling of her eyes:
 She pray'd, and brib'd; what could she more have done
 For a sick husband, or an only son? 510
 With her face veil'd, and heaving up her
 hands,
 The shameless suppliant at the altar stands;
 The forms of prayer she solemnly pursues;
 And, pale with fear, the offer'd entrails views.
 Answer, ye pow'rs: for, if you heard her
 vow,
 Your godships, sure, had little else to do.
 This is not all; for actors²⁶ they implore:
 An impudence unknown to Heav'n before.
 Th' Aruspex,²⁷ tir'd with this religious rout,
 Is forc'd to stand so long, he gets the gout. 520
 But suffer not thy wife abroad to roam:
 If she love singing, let her sing at home;
 Not strut in streets, with Amazonian pace,
 For that's to cuckold thee before thy face.
 Their endless itch of news comes next in
 play;
 They vent their own, and hear what others
 say:
 Know what in Thrace, or what in France is
 done;
 Th' intrigues betwixt the stepdam and the
 son:
 Tell who loves who, what favors some par-
 take;
 And who is jilted for another's sake: 530
 What pregnant widow in what month was
 made;
 How oft she did, and, doing, what she said.
 She, first, beholds the raging comet rise;
 Knows whom it threatens, and what lands destroys.
 Still for the newest news she lies in wait,
 And takes reports just ent'ring at the gate.

Wrecks, floods, and fires, whatever she can
 meet,
 She spreads; and is the Fame of every street.

This is a grievance; but the next is worse,
 A very judgment, and her neighbors'
 curse: 540

For if their barking dog disturb her ease,
 No pray'r can bend her, no excuse appease.
 Th' unmanner'd malefactor is arraign'd;
 But first the master, who the cur maintain'd,
 Must feel the scourge; by night she leaves
 her bed,

By night her bathing equipage is led,
 That marching armies a less noise create;
 She moves in tumult, and she sweats in
 state.

Meanwhile, her guests their appetites must
 keep;

Some gape for hunger, and some gasp for
 sleep. 550

At length she comes, all flush'd; but ere she sup,
 Swallows a swingeing preparation cup;
 And then, to clear her stomach, spews it up. }

The deluge-vomit all the floor o'erflows,
 And the sour savor nauseates every nose.
 She drinks again; again she spews a lake;
 Her wretched husband sees, and dares not
 speak;

But mutters many a curse against his wife,
 And damns himself for choosing such a life.

But of all plagues, the greatest is untold;
 The book-learn'd wife, in Greek and Latin
 bold: 561

The critic-dame, who at her table sits,
 Homer and Virgil quotes, and weighs their wits; }

And pities Dido's agonizing fits.
 She has so far th' ascendant of the board,
 The prating pedant puts not in one word:
 The man of law is non-plus'd in his suit;
 Nay, every other female tongue is mute.

Hammers and beating anvils, you would
 swear, 569

And Vulcan²⁸ with his whole militia there.
 Tabors and trumpets²⁹ cease; for she alone
 Is able to redeem the lab'ring Moon.

Ev'n wit's a burthen, when it talks too
 long;

But she, who has no continence of tongue,
 Should walk in breeches, and should wear
 a beard,

And mix among the philosophic herd.

O what a midnight curse has he, whose side
Is pester'd with a mood and figure bride !³⁰ Let mine, ye gods, (if such must be my
fate,)

No logic learn, nor history translate; 580
But rather be a quiet, humble fool:
I hate a wife to whom I go to school,
Who climbs the grammar tree, distinctly
knows

Where noun, and verb, and participle grows;
Corrects her country neighbor; and, abed,
For breaking Priscian's,³¹ breaks her husband's head.

The gaudy gossip, when she's set agog,
In jewels dress'd, and at each ear a bob,
Goes flaunting out, and, in her trim of pride,
Thinks all she says or does is justified. 590
When poor, she's scarce a tolerable evil;
But rich, and fine, a wife's a very devil.

She duly, once a month, renews her face;
Meantime, it lies in daub, and hid in grease:
Those are the husband's nights; she craves
her due,

He takes fat kisses, and is stuck in glue.
But, to the lov'd adult'rer when she steers, Fresh from the bath, in brightness she appears:

For him the rich Arabia sweats her gum, }
And precious oils from distant Indies }
come, 600

How haggardly soe'er she looks at home. }
Th' eclipse then vanishes; and all her face }
Is open'd, and restor'd to ev'ry grace; }
The crust remov'd, her cheeks, as smooth }
as silk,

Are polish'd with a wash of asses' milk;
And should she to the farthest North be
sent,

A train of these³² attend her banishment.
But, hadst thou seen her plaister'd up before,
'T was so unlike a face, it seem'd a sore.

'T is worth our while to know what all
the day 610

They do, and how they pass their time
away;

For, if o'ernight the husband has been
slack,

Or counterfeited sleep, and turn'd his
back,

Next day, be sure, the servants go to wrack.

The chambermaid and dresser are call'd
whores,

The page is stripp'd, and beaten out of doors;

The whole house suffers for the master's
crime,
And he himself is warn'd to wake another
time.

She hires tormentors by the year; she treats

Her visitors, and talks, but still she beats; 620
Beats while she paints her face, surveys
her gown,

Casts up the day's account, and still beats
on:

Tir'd out, at length, with an outrageous tone,

She bids 'em in the Devil's name be gone.
Compar'd with such a proud, insulting
dame,

Sicilian tyrants³³ may renounce their name.

For, if she hastes abroad to take the air,
Or goes to Isis' church, (the bawdyhouse of pray'r,)

She hurries all her handmaids to the task;
Her head, alone, will twenty dressers ask.
Psecas, the chief, with breast and shoulders
bare, 631

Trembling, considers every sacred hair;
If any straggler from his rank be found,
A pinch must for the mortal sin compound.
Psecas is not in fault; but, in the glass,
The dame's offended at her own ill face.

That maid is banish'd; and another girl,
More dextrous, manages the comb and curl;
The rest are summon'd on a point so nice;
And first, the grave old woman gives advice. 640

The next is call'd, and so the turn goes
round,

As each for age, or wisdom, is renown'd:
Such counsel, such delib'rate care they take,
As if her life and honor lay at stake:

With curls on curls, they build her head
before,

And mount it with a formidable tow'r.³⁴
A giantess she seems; but, look behind,

And then she dwindles to the pigmy kind.
Duck-legg'd, short-waisted, such a dwarf
she is,

That she must rise on tiptoes for a kiss. 650
Meanwhile her husband's whole estate is spent;

He may go bare, while she receives his rent.

She minds him not; she lives not as a wife,
But like a bawling neighbor, full of strife:

Near him in this alone, that she extends
Her hate to all his servants and his friends.

Bellona's priests,³⁵ an eunuch at their head,
 About the streets a mad procession lead;
 The venerable gelding, large and high,
 O'erlooks the herd of his inferior fry. 660
 His awkward clergymen about him prance,
 And beat the timbrels to their mystic dance;
 Guiltless of testicles, they tear their throats,
 And squeak, in treble, their unmanly notes.
 Meanwhile, his cheeks the miter'd prophet swells,
 And dire presages of the year foretells;
 Unless with eggs (his priestly hire) they haste
 To expiate, and avert th' autumnal blast;
 And add beside³⁶ a murrey-color'd vest,
 Which, in their places, may receive the pest; 670
 And, thrown into the flood, their crimes may bear
 To purge th' unlucky omens of the year.
 Th' astonish'd matrons pay, before the rest;
 That sex is still obnoxious to the priest.
 Thro' ice they beat, and plunge into the stream,
 If so the god has warn'd 'em in a dream.
 Weak in their limbs, but in devotion strong,
 On their bare hands and feet they crawl along
 A whole field's length, the laughter of the throng.
 Should Io (Io's priest I mean) command
 A pilgrimage to Meroë's burning sand, 681
 Thro' deserts they would seek the secret spring;
 And holy water, for lustration, bring.
 How can they pay their priests too much respect,
 Who trade with heav'n, and earthly gains neglect?
 With him, domestic gods discourse by night;
 By day, attended by his choir in white,
 The baldpate tribe runs madding thro' the street,
 And smile to see with how much ease they cheat. 689
 The ghostly sire forgives the wife's delights,
 Who sins, thro' frailty, on forbidden nights,
 And tempts her husband in the holy time,
 When carnal pleasure is a mortal crime.
 The sweating image shakes its head, but he
 With mumbled prayers atones the deity.

The pious priesthood the fat goose receive,
 And they once brib'd, the godhead must forgive.

No sooner these remove, but, full of fear,
 A gypsy Jewess whispers in your ear,
 And begs an alms; an high priest's daughter she, 700
 Vers'd in their Talmud, and divinity,
 And prophesies beneath a shady tree.
 Her goods a basket, and old hay her bed,
 She strolls, and, telling fortunes, gains her bread:
 Farthings, and some small moneys, are her fees;
 Yet she interprets all your dreams for these;
 Foretells th' estate, when the rich uncle dies,

And sees a sweetheart in the sacrifice.
 Such toys a pigeon's entrails can disclose,
 Which yet th' Armenian augur far outgoes;
 In dogs, a victim more obscene, he rakes, 711
 And murder'd infants for inspection takes:
 For gain his impious practice he pursues;
 For gain, will his accomplices accuse.

More credit, yet, is to Chaldeans³⁷ giv'n;
 What they foretell, is deem'd the voice of Heav'n.

Their answers, as from Hammon's altar, come;

Since now the Delphian oracles are dumb.
 And mankind, ignorant of future fate,
 Believes what fond astrologers relate. 720

Of these the most in vogue is he, who, sent

Beyond seas, is return'd from banishment;
 His art who to aspiring Otho³⁸ sold,
 And sure succession to the crown foretold:
 For his esteem is in his exile plac'd;
 The more believ'd, the more he was disgrac'd.

No astrologic wizard honor gains,
 Who has not oft been banish'd, or in chains.
 He gets renown, who, to the halter near,
 But narrowly escapes, and buys it dear.

From him your wife enquires the planets' will, 731

When the black jaundice shall her mother kill;

Her sister's and her uncle's end, would know;

But, first, consults his art, when you shall go;

And, what's the greatest gift that Heav'n can give.

If, after her, th' adulterer shall live.
She neither knows nor cares to know the
rest;

If Mars and Saturn³⁹ shall the world infest;
Or Jove and Venus, with their friendly
rays,

Will interpose, and bring us better days.⁷⁴⁰
Beware the woman, too, and shun her
sight,

Who in these studies does herself delight;
By whom a greasy almanac is borne,
With often handling, like chaf'd amber,
worn:

Not now consulting, but consulted, she
Of the twelve houses, and their lords, is free.
She, if the scheme a fatal journey show,
Stays safe at home, but lets her husband
go.

If but a mile she travel out of town,
The planetary hour must first be known,⁷⁵⁰
And lucky moment; if her eye but aches
Or itches, its decumbiture she takes;
No nourishment receives in her disease,
But what the stars and Ptolemy⁴⁰ shall
please.

The middle sort, who have not much to
spare,
To chiromancers' cheaper art repair,
Who clap the pretty palm, to make the lines more fair.

But the rich matron, who has more to
give,
Her answers from the Brachman⁴¹ will receive:

Skill'd in the globe and sphere, he gravely stands,⁷⁶⁰
And, with his compass, measures seas and lands.

The poorest of the sex have still an itch
To know their fortunes, equal to the rich.
The dairymaid enquires, if she shall take
The trusty tailor, and the cook forsake.

Yet these, tho' poor, the pain of childbed
bear;

And, without nurses, their own infants rear:
You seldom hear of the rich mantle, spread
For the babe, born in the great lady's bed.
Such is the pow'r of herbs; such arts they use⁷⁷⁰

To make them barren, or their fruit to lose.
But thou, whatever slops she will have
brought,

Be thankful, and supply the deadly draught;
Help her to make manslaughter; let her
bleed,

And never want for savin at her need.
For, if she holds till her nine months be
run,

Thou mayst be father to an Ethiop's son;⁴²
A boy, who ready gotten to thy hands,
By law is to inherit all thy lands;
One of that hue, that should he cross the way,⁷⁸⁰

His omen⁴³ would discolor all the day.
I pass the foundling by, a race unknown,
At doors expos'd, whom matrons make their
own;

And into noble families advance
A nameless issue, the blind work of chance.
Indulgent Fortune does her care employ,
And, smiling, broods upon the naked boy:
Her garment spreads, and laps him in the fold,

And covers with her wings from nightly
cold:
Gives him her blessing; puts him in a way;
Sets up the farce, and laughs at her own play.⁷⁹¹

Him she promotes; she favors him alone,
And makes provision for him as her own.

The craving wife the force of magic tries,

And philters for th' unable husband buys:
The potion works not on the part design'd;
But turns his brains, and stupefies his mind.
The sotted mooncalf gapes, and, staring on,
Sees his own business by another done:

A long oblivion, a benumbing frost,⁸⁰⁰
Constrains his head; and yesterday is lost:
Some nimbler juice would make him foam
and rave,

Like that Cresonia⁴⁴ to her Caius gave;
Who, plucking from the forehead of the foal

His mother's love, infus'd it in the bowl:
The boiling blood ran hissing in his veins,
Till the mad vapor mounted to his brains.
The Thund'r'er⁴⁵ was not half so much on
fire,

When Juno's girdle kindled his desire.
What woman will not use the pois'ning trade,⁸¹⁰

When Cæsar's wife the precedent has made?
Let Agrippina's⁴⁶ mushroom be forgot,
Giv'n to a slav'ring, old, unuseful sot;
That only clos'd the driveling dotard's eyes,
And sent his godhead downward to the
skies:

But this fierce potion calls for fire and
sword,

Nor spares the commons, when it strikes the
lord;

So many mischiefs were in one combin'd;
So much one single pois'ner cost mankind.

If stepdames seek their sons-in-law to kill,

'Tis venial trespass; let them have their
will:

But let the child, entrusted to the care
Of his own mother, of her bread beware:
Beware the food she reaches with her hand;
The morsel is intended for thy land.

Thy tutor be thy taster, ere thou eat;
There's poison in thy drink and in thy meat.

You think this feign'd; the satire in a
rage

Struts in the buskins of the tragic stage,
Forgets his bus'ness is to laugh and bite; ⁸³⁰
And will of deaths and dire revenges
write.

Would it were all a fable that you read;
But Drymon's wife ⁴⁷ pleads guilty to the deed.

"I," she confesses, "in the fact was caught,
Two sons dispatching at one deadly
draught."

"What two! two sons, thou viper, in one
day!"

"Yes, sev'n," she cries, "if sev'n were in my way."

Medea's ⁴⁸ legend is no more a lie;

Our age adds credit to antiquity.

Great ills, we grant, in former times did
reign,

And murders then were done: but not for
gain.

Less admiration to great crimes is due,
Which they thro' wrath, or thro' revenge
pursue.

For, weak of reason, impotent of will,
The sex is hurried headlong into ill;
And, like a cliff from its foundations torn
By raging earthquakes, into seas is borne.
But those are fiends, who crimes from thought begin;

And, cool in mischief, meditate the sin.
They read th' example of a pious wife, ⁸⁵⁰ Redeeming, with her own, her husband's life;

Yet, if the laws did that exchange afford,
Would save their lapdog sooner than their
lord.

Where'er you walk, the Belides ⁴⁹ you
meet;

And Clytemnestras ⁵⁰ grow in every street.

But here's the difference; Agamemnon's
wife

Was a gross butcher with a bloody knife;
But murder, now, is to perfection grown,
And subtle poisons are employ'd alone;
Unless some antidote prevents their arts, ⁸⁶⁰
And lines with balsam all the noble parts:
In such a case, reserv'd for such a need,
Rather than fail, the dagger does the deed.

EXPLANATORY NOTES ON THE SIXTH SATIRE

1 In the Golden Age, when Saturn reign'd.

2 Fat with acorns. Acorns were the bread of mankind, before corn was found.

3 Under Jove. When Jove had driven his father into banishment, the Silver Age began, according to the poets.

4 Uneasy Justice, &c. The poet makes Justice and Chastity sisters; and says that they fled to heaven together, and left earth for ever.

5 Ceres' feast. When the Roman women were forbidden to bed with their husbands.

6 Jove and Mars, of whom more fornicating stories are told than any of the other gods.

7 Wond'ring Pharos. She fled to Egypt, which wonder'd at the enormity of her crime.

8 He tells the famous story of Messalina, wife to the Emperor Claudius.

9 Wealth has the privilege, &c. His meaning is, that a wife who brings a large dowry may do what she pleases, and has all the privileges of a widow.

10 Berenice's ring. A ring of great price, which Herod Agrippa gave to his sister Berenice. He was King of the Jews, but tributary to the Romans.

11 Cornelia, mother to the Gracchi, of the family of the Corneli, from whence Scipio the African was descended, who triumph'd over Hannibal.

12 O Pean, &c. He alludes to the known fable of Niobe, in Ovid. Amphion was her husband. Pean is Apollo, who with his arrows kill'd her children, because she boasted that she was more fruitful than Latona, Apollo's mother.

13 The thirty pigs, &c. He alludes to the white sow in Virgil, who farrow'd thirty pigs.

14 The Grecian cant. Women then learnt Greek, as ours speak French.

15 All the Romans, even the most inferior and most infamous sort of them, had the power of making their wills.

16 "Go drag that slave, &c. These are the words of the wife.

17 "Your reason, why, &c. The answer of the husband.

18 "Call'st thou that slave a man?" The wife again.

19 Hannibal, a famous Carthaginian captain, who was upon the point of conquering the Romans.

20 The Good Goddess, at whose feasts no men were to be present.

21 Nestor, who liv'd three hundred years.

22 What singer, &c. He alludes to the story of P. Clodius, who, disguis'd in the habit of a singing woman, went into the house of Cæsar, where the feast of the Good Goddess was celebrated, to find an opportunity with Cæsar's wife, Pompeia.

23 He taxes women with their loving eunuchs, who can get no children; but adds that they only love such eunuchs as are gelded when they are already at the age of manhood.

24 Priapus, the God of Lust.

25 Pollio, a famous singing-boy.

26 That such an actor whom they love might obtain the prize.

27 Th' Aruspex. He who inspects the entrails of the sacrifice, and from thence foretells the successor.

28. Vulcan, the god of smiths.

29 Tabors and trumpets, &c. The ancients thought that with such sounds they could bring the Moon out of her eclipse.

30 A mood and figure bride. A woman who has learn'd logic.

31 A woman-grammarian, who corrects her husband for speaking false Latin, which is call'd breaking Priscian's head.

32 A train of these. That is, of she-asses.

33 Sicilian tyrants are grown to a proverb, in Latin, for their cruelty.

34 This dressing up the head so high, which we call a tow'r, was an ancient way amongst the Romans.

35 Bellona's priests were a sort of fortune tellers, and the high priest an eunuch.

36 And add beside, &c. A garment was given to the priest, which he threw into the river; and that, they thought, bore all the sins of the people, which were drown'd with it.

37 Chaldeans are thought to have been the first astrologers.

38 Otho succeeded Galba in the empire, which was foretold him by an astrologer.

39 Mars and Saturn are the two unfortunate planets; Jupiter and Venus the two fortunate.

40 Ptolemy, a famous astrologer; an Egyptian.

41 The Brachmans are Indian philosophers, who remain to this day, and hold, after Pythagoras, the translation of souls from one body to another.

42 To an Ethiop's son. His meaning is, help her to any kind of slops which may cause her to miscarry, for fear she may be brought to bed of a blackmoor, which thou, being her husband, art bound to father; and that bastard may, by law, inherit thy estate.

43 His omen, &c. The Romans thought it ominous to see a blackmoor in the morning, if he were the first man they met.

44 Cæsonia, wife to Caius Caligula, the great tyrant. 'Tis said she gave him a love potion, which, flying up into his head, distracted him, and was the occasion of his committing so many acts of cruelty.

45 The Thunderer, &c. The story is in Homer, where Juno borrow'd the girdle of Venus, call'd cestos, to make Jupiter in love with her, while the Grecians and Trojans were fighting, that he might not help the latter.

46 Agrippina was the mother of the tyrant Nero, who poison'd her husband Claudius, that Nero might succeed, who was her son, and not Britannicus, who was the son of Claudius by a former wife.

47 The widow of Drymon poison'd her sons, that she might succeed to their estate. This was done either in the poet's time, or just before it.

48 Medea, out of revenge to Jason, who had forsaken her, kill'd the children which she had by him.

49 The Belides, who were fifty sisters, married to fifty young men, their cousin-germans, and kill'd them all on their wedding night, excepting Hypermnestra, who sav'd her husband Linus.

50 Clytemnestra, the wife of Agamemnon, who, in favor to her adulterer, Ægisthus, was consenting to his murder.

THE TENTH SATIRE OF JUVENAL

THE ARGUMENT

The poet's design, in this divine satire, is to represent the various wishes and desires of mankind, and to set out the folly of 'em. He runs thro' all the several heads of riches, honors, eloquence, fame for martial achievements, long life, and beauty; and gives instances, in each, how frequently they have prov'd the ruin of those that own'd them. He concludes, therefore, that since we generally choose so ill for ourselves, we should do better to leave it to the gods to make the choice for us. All we can safely ask of Heaven lies within a very small compass. 'Tis but health of body and mind. And if we have these, 'tis not much matter what we want besides, for we have already enough to make us happy.

Look round the habitable world: how few
Know their own good; or knowing it, pursue.

How void of reason are our hopes and fears!
What in the conduct of our life appears
So well design'd, so luckily begun,
But, when we have our wish, we wish undone?

Whole houses, of their whole desires
possess'd,
Are often ruin'd, at their own request.

In wars, and peace, things hurtful we require,
When made obnoxious to our own desire. 10

With laurels some have fatally been
crown'd;
Some, who the depths of eloquence have
found,

In that unnavigable stream were drown'd.
The brawny fool,¹ who did his vigor
boast,

In that presuming confidence was lost;
But more have been by avarice oppress'd,
And heaps of money crowded in the chest:
Unwieldy sums of wealth, which higher
mount

Than files of marshal'd figures can account;
To which the stores of Cræsus, in the scale, 20

Would look like little dolphins, when they sail

In the vast shadow of the British whale. }

For this, in Nero's arbitrary time,
When virtue was a guilt, and wealth a
crime,

A troop of cutthroat guards were sent to seize

The rich men's goods, and gut their palaces:
The mob, commission'd by the government,
Are seldom to an empty garret sent.

The fearful passenger, who travels late,
Charg'd with the carriage of a paltry plate,
Shakes at the moonshine shadow of a rush, 31

And sees a redcoat rise from every bush:
The beggar sings, ev'n when he sees the
place

Beset with thieves, and never mends his pace.

Of all the vows, the first and chief request

Of each is, to be richer than the rest;
And yet no doubts the poor man's draught
control,

He dreads no poison in his homely bowl.
Then fear the deadly drug, when gems divine

Enchase the cup, and sparkle in the wine. 40

Will you not now the pair of sages praise,
Who the same end pursued, by several ways?

One pitied, one condemn'd the woful times;
One laugh'd at follies, one lamented crimes:
Laughter is easy; but the wonder lies,
What stores of brine supplied the weeper's
eyes.

Democritus could feed his spleen, and shake

His sides and shoulders till he felt 'em ache;
Tho' in his country town no lictors were,
Nor rods, nor ax, nor tribune did appear; 50
Nor all the foppish gravity of show Which cunning magistrates on crowds bestow.

What had he done, had he beheld, on
high,

Our prætor seated, in mock majesty?
His chariot rolling o'er the dusty place,
While, with dumb pride, and a set formal
face,

He moves in the dull ceremonial track,
With Jove's embroider'd coat upon his
back:

A suit of hangings had not more oppress'd
His shoulders, than that long, laborious vest:
A heavy gewgaw, (call'd a crown,) that
spread 61

About his temples, drown'd his narrow
head;

And would have crush'd it with the massy
freight,

But that a sweating slave sustain'd the
weight:

A slave in the same chariot seen to ride,
To mortify the mighty madman's pride.
Add now th' imperial eagle, rais'd on high,
With golden beak (the mark of majesty),
Trumpets before, and on the left and right,
A cavalcade of nobles, all in white: 70

In their own natures false and flatt'ring
tribes,

But made his friends by places and by bribes.

In his own age, Democritus could find Sufficient cause to laugh at humankind:
Learn from so great a wit: a land of bogs
With ditches fenc'd, a heaven fat with fogs,
May form a spirit fit to sway the State;
And make the neigh'ring monarchs fear
their fate.

He laughs at all the vulgar cares and
fears;

At their vain triumphs, and their vainer
tears: 80

An equal temper in his mind he found,
When Fortune flatter'd him, and when she frown'd.

'Tis plain, from hence, that what our vows request

Are hurtful things, or useless at the best.
Some ask for envied pow'r; which public
hate

Pursues, and hurries headlong to their fate:

Down go the titles; and the statue crown'd
Is by base hands in the next river drown'd.
The guiltless horses, and the chariot wheel,
The same effects of vulgar fury feel: ⁹⁰
The smith prepares his hammer for the stroke,

While the lung'd bellows hissing fire provoke;

Sejanus,² almost first of Roman names,
The great Sejanus crackles in the flames:
Form'd in the forge, the pliant brass is
laid

On anvils; and of head and limbs are
made

Pans, cans, and pisspots, a whole kitchen
trade.

Adorn your doors with laurels; and a bull,
Milk-white, and large, lead to the Capitol;
Sejanus with a rope is dragg'd along, ¹⁰⁰
The sport and laughter of the giddy throng!
"Good Lord," they cry, "what Ethiop lips
he has,

How foul a snout, and what a hanging face!
By Heav'n, I never could endure his sight;
But say, how came his monstrous crimes to
light?

What is the charge, and who the evidence
(The savior of the nation and the prince)? "
"Nothing of this; but our old Cæsar sent A noisy letter to his parliament."

"Nay, sirs, if Cæsar writ, I ask no more — He's guilty; and the question's out of door." ¹¹¹

How goes the mob? (for that's a mighty thing.)

When the king's trump, the mob are for
the king:

They follow Fortune, and the common cry
Is still against the rogue condemn'd to die.

But the same very mob, that rascal crowd,
Had cried Sejanus, with a shout as loud,
Had his designs (by Fortune's favor blest)
Succeeded, and the prince's age oppress'd,
But long, long since, the times have chang'd their face, ¹²⁰

The people grown degenerate and base;
Not suffer'd now the freedom of their choice,
To make their magistrates, and sell their
voice.

Our wise forefathers, great by sea and
land,

Had once the pow'r and absolute command;
All offices of trust, themselves dispos'd; Rais'd whom they pleas'd, and whom they pleas'd depos'd.

But we, who give our native rights away,
And our enslav'd posterity betray,
Are now reduc'd to beg an alms, and go ¹³⁰
On holidays to see a puppet show.

"There was a damn'd design," cries one,
"no doubt;

For warrants are already issued out:

I met Brutidius in a mortal fright;

He's dipp'd for certain, and plays least in
sight:

I fear the rage of our offended prince,
Who thinks the senate slack in his defense!
Come, let us haste, our loyal zeal to show,
And spurn the wretched corpse of Cæsar's foe: ¹³⁹

But let our slaves be present there, lest they Accuse their masters, and for gain betray."

Such were the whispers of those jealous
times

About Sejanus' punishment and crimes.

Now, tell me truly, wouldst thou change
thy fate

To be, like him, first minister of state?
To have thy levees crowded with resort,
Of a depending, gaping, servile court;
Dispose all honors of the sword and gown,
Grace with a nod, and ruin with a frown;
To hold thy prince in pupillage, and sway
That monarch whom the master'd world obey? ¹⁵¹

While he, intent on secret lusts alone,
Lives to himself, abandoning the throne;
Coop'd in a narrow isle,³ observing dreams
With flatt'ring wizards, and erecting schemes!

I well believe, thou wouldst be great as
he;

For every man's a fool to that degree;
All wish the dire prerogative to kill;
Ev'n they would have the pow'r, who want the will:

But wouldst thou have thy wishes understood, ¹⁶⁰

To take the bad together with the good?
Wouldst thou not rather choose a small re-
nown,

To be the may'r of some poor paltry town,
Bigly to look, and barb'rously to speak;
To pound false weights, and scanty measures break?

Then, grant we that Sejanus went astray
In ev'ry wish, and knew not how to pray:
For he who grasp'd the world's exhausted
store,

Yet never had enough, but wish'd for more,

Rais'd a top-heavy tow'r, of monstrous height, ¹⁷⁰

Which mold'ring, crush'd him underneath
the weight.

What did the mighty Pompey's fall be-
get;

And ruin'd him,⁴ who, greater than the Great,

The stubborn pride of Roman nobles broke,
And bent their haughty necks beneath his yoke?

What else but his immoderate lust of
pow'r,

Pray'r's made and granted in a luckless
hour?

For few usurpers to the shades descend

By a dry death, or with a quiet end.

The boy, who scarce has paid his entrance down ¹⁸⁰

To his proud pedant, or declin'd a noun, (So small an elf, that, when the days are foul,

He and his satchel must be borne to school.)
Yet prays, and hopes, and aims at nothing
less,

To prove a Tully, or Demosthenes:⁵

But both those orators, so much renown'd,
In their own depths of eloquence were
drown'd:

The hand and head were never lost of those Who dealt in dogg'rel, or who punn'd in prose.

"Fortune foretun'd the dying notes of Rome: ¹⁹⁰

Till I, thy consul sole, consol'd thy doom."⁶

His fate had crept below the lifted swords,
Had all his malice been to murder words.
I rather would be Mævius, thrash for
rhymes

Like his, the scorn and scandal of the times,
Than that Philippic,⁷ fatally divine,
Which is inscrib'd the Second, should be
mine.

Nor he, the wonder of the Grecian throng,
Who drove them with the torrent of his
tongue,

Who shook the theaters, and sway'd the state ²⁰⁰

Of Athens, found a more propitious fate:
Whom, born beneath a boding horoscope,
His sire, the blear-ey'd Vulcan of a shop,
From Mars his forge, sent to Minerva's
schools,

To learn th' unlucky art of wheedling fools.

With itch of honor and opinion vain,

All things beyond their native worth we
strain:

The spoils⁸ of war, brought to Feretrian
Jove,

An empty coat of armor hung above
The conqueror's chariot, and in triumph borne, ²¹⁰

A streamer from a boarded galley torn,
A chap-fall'n beaver loosely hanging by
The cloven helm, an arch of victory,
On whose high convex sits a captive foe,
And sighing casts a mournful look below;
Of ev'ry nation each illustrious name,
Such toys as these have cheated into fame:
Exchanging solid quiet, to obtain
The windy satisfaction of the brain.

So much the thirst of honor fires the blood; ²²⁰

So many would be great, so few be good.
For who would Virtue for herself regard,
Or wed, without the portion of reward?
Yet this mad chase of fame, by few pursued,

Has drawn destruction on the multitude:
This avarice of praise in times to come,
Those long inscriptions, crowded on the
tomb,

Should some wild fig tree take her native
bent,

And heave below the gaudy monument,
Would crack the marble titles, and disperse ²³⁰

The characters of all the lying verse.

For sepulchers themselves must crumbling
fall

In time's abyss, the common grave of all.

Great Hannibal within the balance lay,
And tell how many pounds his ashes weigh;
Whom Afric was not able to contain,
Whose length runs level with th' Atlantic
main,

And wearies fruitful Nilus, to convey
His sun-beat waters by so long a way;
Which Ethiopia's double clime divides, ²⁴⁰
And elephants in other mountains hides.
Spain first he won, the Pyrenæans pass'd,
And steepy Alps, the mounds that Nature
cast;

And with corroding juices, as he went,
A passage thro' the living rocks he rent.
Then, like a torrent, rolling from on high,
He pours his headlong rage on Italy;
In three victorious battles overrun;
Yet, still uneasy, cries: "There's nothing
done,

Till level with the ground their gates are laid, ²⁵⁰
And Punic flags on Roman tow'rs display'd."

Ask what a face belong'd to this high
fame:

His picture scarcely would deserve a frame;
A signpost dauber would disdain to paint
The one-ey'd hero on his elephant.

Now what's his end, O charming Glory!
say,

What rare fifth act to crown this huffing
play?

In one deciding battle overcome,
He flies, is banish'd from his native home;
Begg refuge in a foreign court, and there
Attends, his mean petition to prefer; ²⁶¹
Repuls'd by surly grooms, who wait before
The sleeping tyrant's interdicted door.

What wondrous sort of death has Heav'n design'd, Distinguish'd from the herd of human-
kind,

For so untam'd, so turbulent a mind!
Nor swords at hand, nor hissing darts afar,
Are doom'd t' avenge the tedious bloody
war;

But poison, drawn thro' a ring's hollow
plate,

Must finish him; a sucking infant's fate. ²⁷⁰
Go, climb the rugged Alps, ambitious fool,
To please the boys, and be a theme at school.

One world suffic'd not Alexander's mind:
Coop'd up, he seem'd in earth and seas confin'd;

And, struggling, stretch'd his restless limbs
about

The narrow globe, to find a passage out.
Yet, enter'd in the brick-built town,⁹ he
tried

The tomb, and found the strait dimensions wide:

"Death only this mysterious truth unfolds,
The mighty soul, how small a body holds."

Old Greece a tale of Athos¹⁰ would make out, ²⁸¹

Cut hid from the continent, and sail'd about;
Seas hid with navies, chariots passing o'er
The channel, on a bridge from shore to
shore:

Rivers, whose depth no sharp beholder sees,
Drunk at an army's dinner, to the lees;
With a long legend of romantic things,
Which in his cups the bowsy poet sings.
But how did he return, this haughty brave,

Who whipp'd the winds, and made the sea
his slave? ²⁹⁰

(Tho' Neptune took unkindly to be
bound;

And Eurys never such hard usage found
In his Æolian prisons under ground;)

What god so mean, ev'n he who points the way,¹¹

So merciless a tyrant to obey!
But how return'd he? let us ask again:
In a poor skiff he pass'd the bloody main, Chok'd with the slaughter'd bodies of his train.

For fame he pray'd, but let th' event declare

He had no mighty penn'worth of his pray'r.
"Jove, grant me length of life, and years'
good store ³⁰¹

Heap on my bending back; I ask no more."
Both sick and healthful, old and young, conspire

In this one silly mischievous desire.

Mistaken blessing, which old age they call!

'T is a long, nasty, darksome hospital,
A ropy chain of rheums; a visage rough,
Deform'd, unfeatur'd, and a skin of buff;
A stitch-fall'n cheek, that hangs below the jaw;

Such wrinkles, as a skilful hand would draw ³¹⁰

For an old grandam ape, when, with a grace,
She sits at squat, and scrubs her leathern
face.

In youth, distinctions infinite abound;
No shape or feature just alike are found;
The fair, the black, the feeble, and the
strong;

But the same foulness does to age belong,
The selfsame palsy, both in limbs and
tongue;

The skull and forehead one bald barren
plain,

And gums unarm'd to mumble meat in
vain:

Besides th' eternal drivel, that supplies ³²⁰
The dropping beard, from nostrils, mouth,
and eyes.

His wife and children loathe him, and,
what's worse,

Himself does his offensive carrion curse!
Flatt'ers forsake him too; for who would kill

Himself, to be remember'd in a will?
His taste not only pall'd to wine and meat,
But to the relish of a nobler treat.

The limber nerve, in vain provok'd to rise,
 Inglorious from the field of battle flies:
 Poor feeble dotard, how could he advance
 With his blue headpiece, and his broken lance ? 331

Add, that endeavoring still without effect,
 A lust more sordid justly we suspect.

Those senses lost, behold a new defeat,
 The soul dislodging from another seat.
 What music, or enchanting voice, can cheer
 A stupid, old, impenetrable ear ?
 No matter in what place, or what degree
 Of the full theater, he sits to see;
 Cornets and trumpets cannot reach his ear:
 Under an actor's nose he's never near. 341

His boy must bawl, to make him understand

The hour o' th' day, or such a lord's at hand:
 The little blood that creeps within his veins,
 Is but just warm'd in a hot fever's pains.
 In fine, he wears no limb about him sound;
 With sores and sicknesses beleagu'rd round:
 Ask me their names, I sooner could relate
 How many drudges on salt Hippia wait;
 What crowds of patients the town doctor kills, 350

Or how, last fall, he rais'd the weekly bills;
 What provinces by Basilus were spoil'd;
 What herds of heirs by guardians are be-
 guil'd;

How many bouts a day that bitch has tried;
 How many boys that pedagogue can ride;
 What lands and lordships for their owners
 know

My quondam barber, but his worship now.

This dotard of his broken back com-
 plains,

One his legs fail, and one his shoulder
 pains;

Another is of both his eyes bereft, 360
 And envies who has one for aiming left.

A fifth with trembling lips expecting stands,
 As in his childhood, cramm'd by others'
 hands;

One, who at sight of supper open'd wide
 His jaws before, and whetted grinders
 tried;

Now only yawns, and waits to be supplied: }

Like a young swallow, when with weary
 wings

Expected food her fasting mother brings.

His loss of members is a heavy curse,
 But all his faculties decay'd, a worse ! 370
 His servants' names he has forgotten quite;

Knows not his friend who supp'd with him
 last night:

Not ev'n the children he begot and bred;
 Or his will knows 'em not; for, in their stead,

In form of law, a common hackney jade,
 Sole heir, for secret services, is made:
 So lewd, and such a batter'd brothel whore,
 That she defies all comers at her door.

Well, yet suppose his senses are his own,
 He lives to be chief mourner for his son: 380
 Before his face his wife and brother burns;
 He numbers all his kindred in their urns.

These are the fines he pays for living long,
 And dragging tedious age in his own wrong:
 Griefs always green, a household still in
 tears,

Sad poms, a threshold throng'd with daily biers,

And liveries of black for length of years. }

Next to the raven's age, the Pylian king 12
 Was longest liv'd of any two-legg'd thing;
 Blest, to defraud the grave so long, to
 mount 390

His number'd years, and on his right hand
 count 13

Three hundred seasons, guzzling must of
 wine !

But, hold a while, and hear himself repine
 At fate's unequal laws; and at the clue
 Which, merciless in length, the midmost sister 14 drew.

When his brave son upon the fun'ral pyre
 He saw extended, and his beard on fire,
 He turn'd, and weeping, ask'd his friends
 what crime

Had curs'd his age to this unhappy time.

Thus mourn'd old Peleus for Achilles
 slain, 400

And thus Ulysses' father did complain.

How fortunate an end had Priam made,
 Among his ancestors a mighty shade, While Troy yet stood; when Hector, with
 the race

Of royal bastards, might his funeral grace:
 Amidst the tears of Trojan dames inurn'd,
 And by his loyal daughters truly mourn'd !
 Had Heav'n so blest him, he had died before
 The fatal fleet to Sparta Paris bore.

But mark what age produc'd; he liv'd to
 see 410

His town in flames, his falling monarchy:
 In fine, the feeble sire, reduc'd by fate,
 To change his scepter for a sword, too late,
 His last effort before Jove's altar tries; 15

A soldier half, and half a sacrifice:
Falls like an ox, that waits the coming
blow;

Old and unprofitable to the plow.

At least, he died a man; his queen ¹⁶ surviv'd,

To howl, and in a barking body liv'd.

I hasten to our own; nor will relate ⁴²⁰
Great Mithridates' ¹⁷ and rich Cræsus' ¹⁸ fate;
Whom Solon wisely counsel'd to attend
The name of happy, till he knew his end.

That Marius was an exile, that he fled,
Was ta'en, in ruin'd Carthage begg'd his
bread,

All these were owing to a life too long:
For whom had Rome beheld so happy,
young!

High in his chariot, and with laurel crown'd,
When he had led the Cimbrian captives
round

The Roman streets; descending from his state, ⁴³⁰

In that blest hour he should have begg'd
his fate:

Then, then, he might have died of all admir'd,

And his triumphant soul with shouts expir'd.

Campania, Fortune's malice to prevent,
To Pompey ¹⁹ an indulgent fever sent;
But public pray'rs impos'd on Heav'n, to
give

Their much-lov'd leader an unkind reprieve.
The city's fate and his conspir'd to save
The head reserv'd for an Egyptian slave.

Cethegus, ²⁰ tho' a traitor to the State, ⁴⁴⁰
And tortur'd, scap'd this ignominious fate:
And Sergius, ²¹ who a bad cause bravely
tried,

All of a piece, and undiminish'd, died.

To Venus the fond mother makes a
pray'r,

That all her sons and daughters may be
fair:

True, for the boys a mumbling vow she sends;

But, for the girls, the vaulted temple rends:
They must be finish'd pieces; 't is allow'd
Diana's beauty made Latona proud,
And pleas'd, to see the wond'ring people pray ⁴⁵⁰

To the new-rising sister of the day.

And yet Lucretia's fate would bar that
vow;

And fair Virginia ²² would her fate bestow

On Rutila, and change her faultless make
For the foul rump of her camel back.

But, for his mother's boy, the beau, what
frights

His parents have by day, what anxious nights!

Form join'd with virtue is a sight too rare:

Chaste is no epithet to suit with fair.

Suppose the same traditionary strain ⁴⁶⁰

Of rigid manners in the house remain;

Inveterate truth, an old plain Sabine's heart;

Suppose that Nature, too, has done her part;

Infus'd into his soul a sober grace,

And blush'd a modest blood into his face,

(For Nature is a better guardian far

Than saucy pedants, or dull tutors are:)

Yet still the youth must ne'er arrive at
man;

(So much almighty bribes and presents can;)

Ev'n with a parent, where persuasions fail,
Money is impudent, and will prevail. ⁴⁷¹

We never read of such a tyrant king,
Who gelt a boy deform'd, to hear him sing.

Nor Nero, in his more luxurious rage,

E'er made a mistress of an ugly page:

Sporus, his spouse, nor crooked was, nor lame,

With mountain back, and belly, from the game

Cross-barr'd; but both his sexes well became.

Go, boast your springal, by his beauty curst
To ills, nor think I have declar'd the worst: ⁴⁸⁰

His form procures him journeywork; a strife Betwix town-madams, and the merchant's
wife:

Guess, when he undertakes this public war,
What furious beasts offended cuckolds are.

Adult'rers are with dangers round beset;
Born under Mars, they cannot scape the net;

And from revengeful husbands oft have
tried

Worse handling than severest laws provide:
One stabs; one slashes; one, with cruel art,

Makes colon suffer for the peccant part. ⁴⁹⁰

But your Endymion, your smooth, smockfac'd boy,

Unrival'd, shall a beauteous dame enjoy.

Not so: one more salacious, rich, and old,
Outbids, and buys her pleasure for her gold:

Now he must moil and drudge for one he loathes;

She keeps him high in equipage and clothes;
 She pawns her jewels and her rich attire,
 And thinks the workman worthy of his hire:
 In all things else immoral, stingy, mean;
 But, in her lusts, a conscionable quean. 500

"She may be handsome, yet be chaste,"
 you say —

Good observator, not so fast away:
 Did it not cost the modest youth²³ his life,
 Who shunn'd th' embraces of his father's
 wife?

And was not t'other stripling²⁴ forc'd to
 fly,

Who coldly did his patron's queen deny,
 And pleaded laws of hospitality?
 The ladies charg'd 'em home, and turn'd
 the tale;

With shame they redden'd, and with spite grew pale.

'T is dang'rous to deny the longing dame;
 She loses pity, who has lost her shame. 511

Now Silius wants thy counsel, give advice;

Wed Cæsar's wife,²⁵ or die; the choice is nice.

Her comet-eyes she darts on ev'ry grace,
 And takes a fatal liking to his face.

Adorn'd with bridal pomp she sits in state;
 The public notaries and auspex wait:

The genial bed is in the garden dress'd, 518
 The portion paid, and ev'ry rite express'd
 Which in a Roman marriage is profess'd.

'T is no stol'n wedding this, rejecting awe;
 She scorns to marry, but in form of law.

In this moot case, your judgment: to refuse

Is present death, besides the night you
 lose:

If you consent, 't is hardly worth your pain;
 A day or two of anxious life you gain,

Till loud reports thro' all the town have
 pass'd,

And reach the prince; for cuckolds hear the last.

Indulge thy pleasure, youth, and take thy swing;

For not to take is but the selfsame thing:
 Inevitable death before thee lies, 531

But looks more kindly thro' a lady's eyes.

What then remains? Are we depriv'd of will;

Must we not wish, for fear of wishing
 ill?

Receive my counsel, and securely move;
 Intrust thy fortune to the pow'rs above.

Leave them to manage for thee, and to grant

What their unerring wisdom sees thee want:
 In goodness as in greatness they excel;

Ah, that we lov'd ourselves but half so
 well! 540

We, blindly by our headstrong passions led,
 Are hot for action, and desire to wed;

Then wish for heirs: but to the gods alone
 Our future offspring, and our wives are

known;
 Th' audacious strumpet, and ungracious
 son.

Yet, not to rob the priests of pious gain,
 That altars be not wholly built in vain;

Forgive the gods the rest, and stand con-
 fin'd

To health of body, and content of mind:
 A soul, that can securely death defy, 550

And count it nature's privilege to die;
 Serene and manly, harden'd to sustain

The load of life, and exercis'd in pain;
 Guiltless of hate, and proof against desire;

That all things weighs, and nothing can admire;

That dares prefer the toils of Hercules
 To dalliance, banquets, and ignoble ease.

The path to peace is virtue: what I show,
 Thyself may freely on thyself bestow:

Fortune was never worship'd by the wise;
 But, set aloft by fools, usurps the skies. 561

EXPLANATORY NOTES ON THE TENTH SATIRE

1 Milo, of Crotona; who, for a trial of his strength, going to rend an oak, perish'd in the attempt, for his arms were caught in the trunk of it, and he was devour'd by wild beasts.

2 Sejanus was Tiberius's first favorite; and, while he continued so, had the highest marks of honor bestow'd on him: statues and triumphal chariots were everywhere erected to him. But, as soon as he fell into disgrace with the emperor, these were all immediately dismounted, and the senate and common people insulted over him as meanly as they had fawn'd on him before.

3 The island of Caprea, which lies about a league out at sea from the Campanian shore, was the scene of Tiberius's pleasures in the latter part of his reign. There he liv'd, for some years, with diviners, soothsayers, and worse company; and from thence dispatch'd all his orders to the senate.

4 Julius Cæsar, who got the better of Pompey, that was styl'd "the Great."

5 Demosthenes and Tully both died for their oratory: Demosthenes gave himself poison, to avoid being carried to Antipater, one of Alexander's captains, who had then made himself master of Athens. Tully was murth'rd by M. Antony's order, in return for those invectives he had made against him.

6 The Latin of this couplet is a famous verse of Tully's, in which he sets out the happiness of his own consulship, famous for the vanity and the ill poetry of it; for Tully, as he had a good deal of the one, so he had no great share of the other.

7 The orations of Tully against M. Antony were styl'd by him Philippics, in imitation of Demosthenes, who had given that name before to those he made against Philip of Macedon.

8 This is a mock account of a Roman triumph.

9 Babylon, where Alexander died.

10 Xerxes is represented in history after a very romantic manner: affecting fame beyond measure, and doing the most extravagant things to compass it. Mount Athos made a prodigious promontory in the Ægean Sea; he is said to have cut a channel thro' it, and to have sail'd round it. He made a bridge of boats over the Hellespont, where it was three miles broad; and order'd a whipping for the winds and seas, because they had once cross'd his designs; as we have a very solemn account of it in Herodotus. But, after all these vain boasts, he was shamefully beaten by Themistocles at Salamis; and return'd home, leaving most of his fleet behind him.

11 Mercury, who was a god of the lowest size, and employ'd always in errands between heaven and hell; and mortals us'd him accordingly: for his statues were anciently plac'd where roads met, with directions on the fingers of 'em, pointing out the several ways to travelers.

12 Nestor, King of Pylus; who was three hundred years old, according to Homer's account; at least as he is understood by his expositors.

13 The ancients counted by their fingers. Their left hands serv'd 'em till they came up to an hundred. After that they us'd their right, to express all greater numbers.

14 The Fates were three sisters, which had all some peculiar business assign'd 'em by the poets, in relation to the lives of men. The first held the distaff, the second spun the thread, and the third cut it.

15 Whilst Troy was sacking by the Greeks, old King Priam is said to have buckled on his armor to oppose 'em; which he had no sooner done, but he was met by Pyrrhus, and slain before the altar of Jupiter, in his own palace; as we have the story finely told in Virgil's second Æneid.

16 Hecuba, his queen, escap'd the swords of the Grecians, and outliv'd him. It seems she behav'd herself so fiercely and unasily to her husband's murderers while she liv'd, that the poets thought fit to turn her into a bitch when she died.

17 Mithridates, after he had disputed the empire of the world for forty years together, with the Romans, was at last depriv'd of life and empire by Pompey the Great.

18 Cræsus, in the midst of his prosperity, making his boast to Solon how happy he was, receiv'd this answer from the wise man: that no one could pronounce himself happy, till he saw what his end should be. The truth of this Cræsus found, when he was put in chains by Cyrus, and condemn'd to die.

19 Pompey, in the midst of his glory, fell into a dangerous fit of sickness at Naples. A great many cities then made public supplications for him. He recover'd; was beaten at Pharsalia; fled to Ptolemy, King of Egypt; and, instead of receiving protection at his court, had his head struck off by his order, to please Cæsar.

20 Cethegus was one that conspir'd with Catiline, and was put to death by the Senate.

21 Catiline died fighting.

22 Virginia was kill'd by her own father, to prevent her being expos'd to the lust of Appius Claudius, who had ill designs upon her. The story at large is in Livy's third book; and 't is a remarkable one, as it gave occasion to the putting down the power of the Decemviri, of whom Appius was one.

23 Hippolytus, the son of Theseus, was lov'd by his mother-in-law, Phædria; but he not complying with her, she procur'd his death.

24 Bellerophon, the son of King Glancus, residing some time at the court of Pætus, King of the Argives, the queen, Sthenobæa, fell inlove with him; but he refusing her, she turn'd the accusation upon him, and he narrowly escap'd Pætus's vengeance.

25 Messalina, wife to the Emperor Claudius, infamous for her lewdness. She set her eyes upon C. Silius, a fine youth; fore'd him to quit his own wife, and marry her, with all the formalities of a wedding, whilst Claudius Cæsar was sacrificing at Hostia. Upon his return, he put both Silius and her to death.

THE SIXTEENTH SATIRE OF JUVENAL

THE ARGUMENT

The poet in this satire proves that the condition of a soldier is much better than that of a countryman: first, because a countryman, however affronted, provok'd, and struck himself, dares not strike a soldier who is only to be judg'd by a court-martial; and, by the law of Camillus, which obliges him not to quarrel without the trenches, he is also assur'd to have a speedy hearing and quick dispatch: whereas, the townsman or peasant is delay'd in his suit by frivolous pretenses, and not sure of justice when he is heard in the court. The soldier is also privileg'd to make a will, and to give away his estate, which he got in war, to whom he pleases, without consideration of parentage or relations, which is denied to all other Romans. This satire was written by Juvenal when he was a commander in Egypt: 't is certainly his, tho' I think it not finish'd. And, if it be well observ'd, you will find he intended an invective against a standing army.

WHAT vast prerogatives, my Gallus, are Accruing to the mighty man of war !
For, if into a lucky camp I light,
Tho' raw in arms, and yet afraid to fight, }
Befriend me, my good stars, and all goes
right:

One happy hour is to a soldier better,
Than Mother Juno's¹ recommending letter,

Or Venus, when to Mars she would prefer
My suit, and own the kindness done to her.

See what our common privileges are: 10
As, first, no saucy citizen shall dare
To strike a soldier, nor, when struck, resent

The wrong, for fear of farther punishment:

Not tho' his teeth are beaten out, his eyes
Hang by a string, in bumps his forehead
rise,

Shall he presume to mention his disgrace,
Or beg amends for his demolish'd face.
A booted judge shall sit to try his cause,
Not by the statute, but by martial laws,
Which old Camillus² order'd, to confine 20
The brawls of soldiers to the trench and line:

A wise provision; and from thence 't is
clear,

That officers a soldier's cause should hear;
And, taking cognizance of wrongs receiv'd,
An honest man may hope to be reliev'd.

So far 't is well: but with a general cry,
The regiment will rise in mutiny,
The freedom of their fellow-rogue demand,
And, if refus'd, will threaten to disband.

Withdraw thy action, and depart in peace;
The remedy is worse than the disease; 31
This cause is worthy him,³ who in the hall
Would for his fee, and for his client, bawl:
But wouldst thou, friend, who hast two legs
alone,

(Which, Heav'n be prais'd, thou yet mayst call thy own,)

Wouldst thou to run the gauntlet these expose

To a whole company of hobnail'd shoes ?⁴
Sure the good breeding of wise citizens Should teach 'em more good nature to their shins.

Besides, whom canst thou think so much thy friend ?

Who dares appear thy business to defend ?⁴⁰
Dry up thy tears, and pocket up th'
abuse,

Nor put thy friend to make a bad excuse:

The judge cries out: "Your evidence produce."

Will he, who saw the soldier's mutton fist,
And saw thee maul'd, appear within the list,

To witness truth ? When I see one so brave,
The dead, think I, are risen from the grave;

And with their long spade beards and matted
hair,

Our honest ancestors are come to take the
air. 50

Against a clown, with more security,
A witness may be brought to swear a lie,
Than, tho' his evidence be full and fair,
To vouch a truth against a man of war.

More benefits remain, and claim'd as rights,

Which are a standing army's perquisites.
If any rogue vexatious suits advance
Against me for my known inheritance,
Enter by violence my fruitful grounds,
Or take the sacred landmark from my bounds, 60

Those bounds which, with procession and
with pray'r,

And offer'd cakes, have been my annual care;⁵

Or if my debtors do not keep their day,
Deny their hands, and then refuse to pay;
I must with patience all the terms attend,
Among the common causes that depend,
Till mine is call'd; and that long-look'd-for
day

Is still encumber'd with some new delay.
Perhaps the cloth of state is only spread,⁶
Some of the quorum may be sick abed; 70
That judge is hot, and doffs his gown, while this

O'ernight was bowsy, and goes out to piss:
So many rubs appear, the time is gone
For hearing, and the tedious suit goes on;
But buff and beltmens never know these cares,

No time, nor trick of law, their action bars:
Their cause they to an easier issue put;
They will be heard, or they lug out, and cut.

Another branch of their revenue still Remains, beyond their boundless right
to kill,
Their father yet alive, impow'r'd to make a will.⁷
For, what their prowess gain'd, the law declares,
Is to themselves alone, and to their heirs:
No share of that goes back to the be-getter,
But if the son fights well, and plunders
better,
Like stout Coranus, his old shaking sire
Does a remembrance in his will desire;
Inquisitive of fights, and longs in vain
To find him in the number of the slain:
But still he lives, and, rising by the war, Enjoys his gains, and has enough to
spare;
For 't is a noble general's prudent part
To cherish valor, and reward desert:
Let him be daub'd with lace, live high, and
whore;
Sometimes be lousy, but be never poor.

EXPLANATORY NOTES ON THE SIX-TEENTH SATIRE

1 Juno was mother to Mars, the God of War; Venus was his mistress.

2 Camillus, who, being first banish'd by his ungrateful countrymen the Romans, afterwards return'd, and freed them from the Gauls, made a law which prohibited the soldiers from quarreling without the camp, lest upon that pretense they might happen to be absent when they ought to be on duty.

3 This cause is worthy him, &c. The poet names a Modenese lawyer, whom he calls Vagellius, who was so impudent that he would plead any cause, right or wrong, without shame or fear.

4 Hobnail'd shoes. The Roman soldiers wore plates of iron under their shoes, or stuck them with nails, as countrymen do now.

5 Landmarks were us'd by the Romans almost in the same manner as now; and as we go once a year in procession about the bounds of parishes, and renew them, so they offer'd cakes upon the stone, or landmark.

6 The courts of judicature were hung, and spread, as with us; but spread only before the hundred judges were to sit and judge public causes, which were call'd by lot.

7 The Roman soldiers had the privilege of making a will, in their father's lifetime, of what they had purchas'd in the wars, as being no part of their patrimony. By this will they had power of excluding their own parents, and giving the estate so gotten to whom they pleas'd. Therefore, says the poet, Coranus (a soldier contemporary with Juvenal, who had rais'd his fortune by the wars) was courted by his own father to make him his heir.

THE FIRST SATIRE OF PERSIUSARGUMENT OF THE PROLOGUE TO THE FIRST SATIRE

The design of the author was to conceal his name and quality. He liv'd in the dangerous times of the tyrant Nero, and aims particularly at him in most of his satires. For which reason, tho' he was a Roman knight, and of a plentiful fortune, he would appear in this Prologue but a beggarly poet, who writes for bread. After this, he breaks into the business of the First Satire; which is chiefly to decry the poetry then in fashion, and the impudence of those who were endeavoring to pass their stuff upon the world.

PROLOGUE TO THE FIRST SATIRE

I NEVER did on cleft Parnassus¹ dream,
Nor taste the sacred Heliconian stream;
Nor can remember when my brain, in-spir'd,
Was by the Muses into madness fir'd.
My share in pale Pyrene² I resign,
And claim no part in all the mighty
Nine.
Statues,³ with winding ivy crown'd, be-
long
To nobler poets, for a nobler song:
Heedless of verse, and hopeless of the
crown,
Scarce half a wit, and more than half a
clown,
Before the shrine⁴ I lay my rugged numbers down.
Who taught the parrot human notes to
try,
Or with a voice endued the chatt'ring pie?
'T was witty want, fierce hunger to appease;
Want taught their masters, and their masters these.
Let gain, that gilded bait, be hung on
high;
The hungry witlings have it in their eye:
Pies, crows, and daws, poetic presents
bring;
You say they squeak, but they will swear
they sing.

THE FIRST SATIRE

IN DIALOGUE

BETWIXT THE POET AND HIS FRIEND OR MONITOR

THE ARGUMENT

I need not repeat that the chief aim of the author is against bad poets in this satire. But I must add that he includes also bad orators, who began at that time (as Petronius in the beginning of his book tells us) to enervate manly eloquence by tropes and figures, ill plac'd, and worse applied. Amongst the poets, Persius covertly strikes at Nero, some of whose verses he recites with scorn and indignation. He also takes notice of the noblemen and their abominable poetry, who, in the luxury of their fortune, set up for wits and judges. The satire is in dialogue, betwixt the author and his friend or monitor; who dissuades him from this dangerous attempt of exposing great men. But Persius, who is of a free spirit, and has not forgotten that Rome was once a commonwealth, breaks thro' all those difficulties, and boldly arraigns the false judgment of the age in which he lives, The reader may observe that our poet was a Stoic philosopher; and that all his moral sentences, both here and in all the rest of his satires, are drawn from the dogmas of that sect.

PERSIUS. How anxious are our cares, and yet how vain

The bent of our desires!

FRIEND. Thy spleen contain;
For none will read thy satires.

PER. This to me?

FRIEND. None; or what's next to none, but two or three.

'Tis hard, I grant.

PER. 'Tis nothing; I can bear
That paltry scribblers have the public ear:
That this vast universal fool, the Town,
Should cry up Labeo's stuff,¹ and cry me
down.

They damn themselves; nor will my Muse descend

To clap with such, who fools and knaves
commend:

Their smiles and censures are to me the
same;

I care not what they praise, or what they blame.

In full assemblies let the crowd prevail:

I weigh no merit by the common scale

The conscience is the test of ev'ry mind;
"Seek not thyself, without thyself, to find."
But where's that Roman? — Somewhat I would say,

But fear — let Fear, for once, to Truth give way.

Truth lends the Stoic courage: when I look
On human acts, and read in Nature's book,
From the first pastimes of our infant age,
To elder cares, and man's severer page;²²
When stern as tutors, and as uncles hard,
We lash the pupil, and defraud the ward:
Then, then I say — or would say, if I
durst —

But thus provok'd, I must speak out, or burst.

FRIEND. Once more forbear.

PER. I cannot rule my spleen;

My scorn rebels, and tickles me within.

First, to begin at home: our authors write
In lonely rooms, secur'd from public sight;
Whether in prose, or verse, 'tis all the
same;

The prose is fustian, and the numbers
lame:

All noise, and empty pomp, a storm of
words,

Lab'ring with sound, that little sense affords.

They comb,² and then they order ev'ry
hair:

A gown, or white, or scour'd to whiteness,
wear;

A birthday jewel bobbing at their ear:

Next, gargle well their throats, and thus prepar'd,

They mount, a-God's name, to be seen and
heard,

From their high scaffold, with a trumpet
cheek,

And ogling all their audience ere they speak.

The nauseous nobles, ev'n the chief of Rome,

With gaping mouths to these rehearsals
come,

And pant with pleasure, when some lusty
line

The marrow pierces, and invades the chine;
At open fulsome bawdry they rejoice,

And slimy jests applaud with broken voice.
Base prostitute, thus dost thou gain thy bread?

Thus dost thou feed their ears, and thus art fed?

At his own filthy stuff he grins and brays,
And gives the sign where he expects their
praise.

Why have I learn'd, say'st thou, if, thus confid'd,

I choke the noble vigor of my mind?
Know, my wild fig tree,³ which in rocks is
bred,
Will split the quarry, and shoot out the
head.

Fine fruits of learning! old ambitious fool,
Dar'st thou apply that adage of the school;
As if 't is nothing worth that lies conceal'd,
And "science is not science till reveal'd"?
O, but 't is brave to be admir'd, to see ⁶⁰
The crowd, with pointing fingers, cry:
"That's he:

That's he whose wondrous poem is become
A lecture for the noble youth of Rome!
Who, by their fathers, is at feasts renown'd;
And often quoted when the bowls go round."
Full gorg'd and flush'd, they wantonly re-
hearse,

And add to wine the luxury of verse.
One, clad in purple, not to lose his time,
Eats, and recites some lamentable rhyme:
Some senseless Phyllis, in a broken note, ⁷⁰
Snuffling at nose, or croaking in his throat.
Then graciously the mellow audience nod;
Is not th' immortal author made a god?
Are not his manes blest, such praise to have?
Lies not the turf more lightly on his grave?
And roses (while his loud applause they sing)

Stand ready from his sepulcher to spring?
All these, you cry, but light objections
are;

Mere malice, and you drive the jest too far.
For does there breathe a man who can reject

A general fame, and his own lines neglect?
In cedar tablets 'worthy to appear,
That need not fish, or frankincense to
fear?

Thou, whom I make the adverse part
to bear,

Be answer'd thus. — If I by chance succeed
In what I write, (and that's a chance indeed,)

Know, I am not so stupid, or so hard,
Not to feel praise, or fame's deserv'd reward:

But this I cannot grant, that thy applause
Is my work's ultimate, or only cause. ⁹⁰
Prudence can ne'er propose so mean a prize;

For mark what vanity within it lies.
Like Labeo's Iliads, in whose verse is found Nothing but trifling care, and empty sound:
Such little elegies as nobles write,
Who would be poets, in Apollo's spite.
Them and their woful works the Muse defies:

Products of citron beds,⁵ and golden canopies.

To give thee all thy due, thou hast the
heart
To make a supper, with a fine dessert; ¹⁰⁰
And to thy threadbare friend, a cast old suit impart.

Thus brib'd, thou thus bespeak'st him:
"Tell me, friend,
(For I love truth, nor can plain speech offend,)

What says the world of me and of my Muse?"

The poor dare nothing tell but flatt'ring
news:

But shall I speak? Thy verse is wretched
rhyme,

And all thy labors are but loss of time.
Thy strutting belly swells, thy paunch is
high;

Thou writ'st not, but thou pissest poetry.
All authors to their own defects are
blind;

Hadst thou but, Janus-like,⁶ a face behind,
To see the people, what splaymouths they
make;

To mark their fingers, pointed at thy back;
Their tongues loll'd out, a foot beyond
the pitch,

When most athirst, of an Apulian bitch:
But noble scribblers are with flatt'ry fed;
For none dare find their faults, who eat their bread.

To pass the poets of patrician blood,
What is 't the common reader takes for
good?

The verse in fashion is, when numbers flow, ¹²⁰

Soft without sense, and without spirit slow:
So smooth and equal, that no sight can find
The rivet, where the polish'd piece was
join'd:

So even all, with such a steady view,
As if he shut one eye to level true.
Whether the vulgar vice his satire stings,
The people's riots, or the rage of kings,
The gentle poet is alike in all;
His reader hopes no rise, and fears no fall.

FRIEND. Hourly we see some raw pin-feather'd thing ¹³⁰
Attempt to mount, and fights and heroes
sing;
Who for false quantities was whipp'd at school
But t'other day, and breaking grammar
rule;
Whose trivial art was never tried above
The bare description of a native grove;
Who knows not how to praise the country store,
The feasts, the baskets, nor the fatted
boar;
Nor paint the flow'ry fields, that paint themselves before;
Where Romulus⁷ was bred, and Quintius
born,
Whose shining plowshare was in furrows
worn, ¹⁴⁰
Met by his trembling wife, returning home,
And rustically joy'd, as chief of Rome:
She wip'd the sweat from the dictator's
brow,
And o'er his back his robe did rudely
throw;
The lictors bore in state their lord's triumphant plow.

Some love to hear the fustian poet roar,
And some on antiquated authors pore;
Rummage for sense, and think those only
good
Who labor most, and least are understood.
When thou shalt see the blear-ey'd fathers teach ¹⁵⁰
Their sons this harsh and moldy sort of speech;
Or others new affected ways to try,
Of wanton smoothness, female poetry;
One would enquire from whence this motley style

Did first our Roman purity defile:
For our old dotards cannot keep their seat,
But leap and catch at all that's obsolete.

Others, by foolish ostentation led,
When call'd before the bar, to save their
head,
Bring trifling tropes, instead of solid sense,
And mind their figures more than their defense; ¹⁶¹

Are pleas'd to hear their thick-skull'd judges cry:

"Well mov'd, O finely said, and decently!"
"Theft," says th' accuser, "to thy charge
I lay,

O Pedius!" What does gentle Pedius say?
Studious to please the genius of the times,
With periods,⁸ points, and tropes, he slurs
his crimes:

"He robb'd not, but he borrow'd from the
poor;

And took but with intention to restore."
He lards with flourishes his long harangue;
"Tis fine," say'st thou;— what, to be prais'd and hang? ¹⁷¹

Effeminate Roman, shall such stuff prevail
To tickle thee, and make thee wag thy tail?

Say, should a shipwrack'd sailor sing his
woe,

Wouldst thou be mov'd to pity, or bestow
An alms? What's more prepost'rous than
to see

A merry beggar? Mirth in misery?

PER. He seems a trap for charity to lay,
And cons, by night, his lesson for the day.

FRIEND. But to raw numbers, and un-finish'd verse, ¹⁸⁰

Sweet sound is added now, to make it terse:
"Tis tagg'd with rhyme, like Berecyn-thian Atys,⁹

The mid-part chimes with art, which never flat is.

The dolphin brave, that cut the liquid wave,
Or he who in his line can chine the longribb'd Apennine."

PER. All this is dogg'rel stuff.

FRIEND. What if I bring A nobler verse? "Arms and the man I sing." ¹⁹⁰

PER. Why name you Virgil with such fops as these?

He's truly great, and must for ever please;
Not fierce, but awful is his manly page; ¹⁹⁰
Bold is his strength, but sober is his rage.

FRIEND. What poems think you soft?
and to be read

With languishing regards, and bending
head?

PER. "Their crooked horns" the Mi-mallonian crew

With blasts inspir'd; and Bassaris who slew
The scornful calf, with sword advanc'd on
high,

Made from his neck his haughty head to fly.

And Mænas, when with ivy bridles bound,
She led the spotted lynx, then Evion rung around;

Evion from woods and floods repairing
echoes sound." ²⁰⁰

Could such rude lines a Roman mouth become,
Were any manly greatness left in Rome?
Mænas and Atys¹² in the mouth were bred,
And never hatch'd within the lab'ring head:
No blood from bitten nails those poems
drew;
But churn'd, like spettle, from the lips they flew.

FRIEND. 'Tis fustian all; 'tis execra-
bly bad:

But if they will be fools, must you be mad?
Your satires, let me tell you, are too fierce;
The great will never bear so blunt a verse.
Their doors are barr'd against a bitter flout:
Snarl, if you please, but you shall snarl without.

Expect such pay as railing rhymes deserve,
Y' are in a very hopeful way to sterve.

PER. Rather than so, uncensur'd let 'em
be;

All, all is admirably well, for me.
My harmless rhyme shall scape the dire
disgrace

Of common shores, and ev'ry pissing-place.
Two painted serpents¹³ shall on high appear:
"Tis holy ground; you must not urine
here."

This shall be writ to fright the fry away,
Who draw their little baubles, when they
play.

Yet old Lucilius¹⁴ never fear'd the times,
But lash'd the city, and dissected crimes.
Mutius and Lupus both by name he brought;
He mouth'd 'em, and betwixt his grinders
caught.

Unlike in method, with conceal'd design,
Did crafty Horace his low numbers join;
And, with a sly insinuating grace, Laugh'd at his friend, and look'd him in the
face;

Would raise a blush, where secret vice he
found,

And tickle, while he gently prob'd the
wound;

With seeming innocence the crowd be-
guil'd,

But made the desperate passes, when he smil'd.

Could he do this, and is my Muse con-
troll'd

By servile awe? Born free, and not be bold?

At least, I'll dig a hole within the ground,
And to the trusty earth commit the sound:

The reeds shall tell you what the poet
fears:

"King Midas¹⁵ has a snout, and ass's ears."
This mean conceit, this darling mystery,
Which thou think'st nothing, friend, thou shalt not buy;

Nor will I change for all the flashy wit
That flatt'ring Labeo in his Iliads writ.

Thou, if there be a thou in this base town,
Who dares, with angry Eupolis,¹⁶ to frown;
He who, with bold Cratinus, is inspir'd
With zeal, and equal indignation fir'd;
Who at enormous villainy turns pale,²⁴⁹
And steers against it with a full-blown sail,
Like Aristophanes; let him but smile
On this my honest work, tho' writ in homely
style:

And if two lines or three in all the vein
Appear less drossy, read those lines again.
May they perform their author's just intent,
Glow in thy ears, and in thy breast ferment.
But from the reading of my book and me,
Be far, ye foes of virtuous poverty:

Who Fortune's fault¹⁷ upon the poor can
throw,

Point at the tatter'd coat and ragged shoe;
Lay Nature's failings to their charge, and jeer

The dim weak eyesight, when the mind is clear:

When thou thyself, thus insolent in state,
Art but, perhaps, some country magistrate;
Whose pow'r extends no farther than to speak

Big on the bench, and scanty weights to break.

Him, also, for my censor I disdain,
Who thinks all science, as all virtue, vain;
Who counts geometry and numbers toys,
And with his foot¹⁸ the sacred dust destroys;

Whose pleasure is to see a strumpet tear
A Cynic's beard, and lug him by the hair.
Such, all the morning, to the pleadings
run;

But, when the bus'ness of the day is done,
On dice, and drink, and drabs, they spend their afternoon.

EXPLANATORY NOTES ON THE PROLOGUE

1 Parnassus and Helicon were hills consecrated to the Muses, and the suppos'd place of their abode. Parnassus was fork'd on the top;

and from Helicon ran a stream, the spring of which was call'd the Muses' Well.

2 Pyrene, a fountain in Corinth, consecrated also to the Muses.

3 Statues, &c. The statues of the poets were crown'd with ivy about their brows.

4 Before the shrine; that is, before the shrine of Apollo, in his temple at Rome, call'd the Palatine.

EXPLANATORY NOTES ON THE FIRST SATIRE

1 Labeo's stuff. Nothing is remaining of Atticus Labeo (so he is call'd by the learned Casaubon); nor is he mention'd by any other poet besides Persius. Casaubon, from an old commentator on Persius, says that he made a very foolish translation of Homer's Iliads.

2 They comb, &c. He describes a poet preparing himself to rehearse his works in public, which was commonly perform'd in August. A room was hir'd, or lent by some friend; a scaffold was rais'd, and a pulpit plac'd for him who was to hold forth; who borrow'd a new gown, or scour'd his old one, and adorn'd his ears with jewels, &c.

3 My wild fig tree. Trees of that kind grow wild in many parts of Italy, and make their way thro' rocks, sometimes splitting the tombstones.

4 The Romans wrote on cedar and cypress tables, in regard of the duration of the wood. Ill verses might justly be afraid of frankincense, for the papers in which they were written were fit for nothing but to wrap it up.

5 Products of citron beds, &c. Writings of noblemen, whose bedsteads were of the wood of citron.

6 Janus-like, &c. Janus was the first king of Italy, who refug'd Saturn when he was expell'd, by his son Jupiter, from Crete (or, as we now call it, Candia). From his name the first month of the year is call'd January. He was pictur'd with two faces, one before and one behind, as regarding the past time and the future. Some of the mythologists think he was Noah, for the reason given above.

7 Where Romulus, &c. He speaks of the country in the foregoing verses; the praises of which are the most easy theme for poets, but which a bad poet cannot naturally describe: then he makes a digression to Romulus, the first king of Rome, who had a rustical education; and enlarges upon Quintius Cincinnatus, a Roman senator, who was call'd from the plow to be dictator of Rome.

8 In periods, &c. Persius here names antitheses, or seeming contradictions; which, in this place, are meant for rhetorical flourishes, as I think, with Casaubon.

9 Berecynthian Atys (or Attin), &c. Foolish verses of Nero, which the poet repeats; and which cannot be translated properly into English.

10 Arms and the man, &c. The first line of Virgil's Æneids.

11 Their crooked horns, &c. Other verses of Nero, that were mere bombast. I only note that the repetition of these and the former verses of Nero might justly give the poet a caution to conceal his name.

12 Mænas and Atys. Poems on the Mænades, who were priestesses of Bacchus; and of Atys, who made himself an eunuch to attend on the sacrifices of Cybele, call'd Berecynthia by the poets. She was mother of the gods.

13 Two painted serpents, &c. Two snakes, twin'd with each other, were painted on the walls, by the ancients, to shew the place was holy.

14 Yet old Lucilius, &c. Lucilius wrote long before Horace, who imitates his manner of satire, but far excels him in the design.

15 King Midas, &c. The story is vulgar, that Midas, King of Phrygia, was made judge betwixt Apollo and Pan, who was the best musician: he gave the prize to Pan; and Apollo, in revenge, gave him ass's ears. He wore his hair long to hide them; but his barber discovering them, and not daring to divulge the secret, dug a hole in the ground, and whisper'd into it: the place was marshy; and, when the reeds grew up, they repeated the words which were spoken by the barber. By Midas, the poet meant Nero.

16 Eupolis and Cratinus, as also Aristophanes, mention'd afterwards, were all Athenian poets; who wrote that sort of comedy which was call'd the Old Comedy, where the people were nam'd who were satiriz'd by those authors.

17 Who Fortune's fault, &c. The people of Rome, in the time of Persius, were apt to scorn the Grecian philosophers, particularly the Cynics and Stoics, who were the poorest of them.

18 And with his foot, &c. Arithmetic and geometry were taught on floors which were strew'd with dust, or sand; in which the numbers and diagrams were made and drawn, which they might strike out again at pleasure.

THE SECOND SATIRE OF PERSIUS

DEDICATED TO HIS FRIEND PLOTIUS MACRINUS, ON HIS BIRTHDAY

THE ARGUMENT

This satire contains a most grave and philosophical argument, concerning prayers and wishes. Undoubtedly it gave occasion to Juvenal's Tenth Satire; and both of them had their original from one of Plato's dialogues, call'd the Second Alcibiades. Our author has induc'd it with great mastery of art, by taking his rise from the birthday of his friend; on which occasions prayers were made, and sacrifices offer'd by the native. Persius, commending first the purity of his friend's vows, descends to the impious and immoral requests of others. The satire is divided into three parts. The first is the exordium to Maecrinus, which the poet confines within the compass of four verses; the second relates to the matter of the prayers and vows, and an enumeration of those things, wherein men commonly sinn'd against right reason, and offended in their requests; the third part consists in shewing the repugnancies of those prayers and wishes to those of other men, and inconsistencies with themselves. He shews the original of these vows, and sharply inveighs against them; and, lastly, not only corrects the false opinion of mankind concerning them, but gives the true doctrine of all addresses made to Heaven, and how they may be made acceptable to the pow'rs above, in excellent precepts, and more worthy of a Christian than a heathen.

LET this auspicious morning be express'd
With a white stone,¹ distinguish'd from the rest,

White as thy fame, and as thy honor clear;
And let new joys attend on thy new-added year.

Indulge thy genius, and o'erflow thy soul,
Till thy wit sparkle, like the cheerful bowl.
Pray; for thy pray'rs the test of Heav'n will bear;

Nor need'st thou take the gods aside, to hear;

While others, ev'n the mighty men of Rome,

Big swell'd with mischief, to the temples come;

And in low murmurs, and with costly smoke,
Heaven's help, to prosper their black vows, invoke.

So boldly to the gods mankind reveal
What from each other they, for shame, conceal.

"Give me good fame, ye pow'rs, and make me just;"

Thus much the rogue to public ears will trust:

In private then:—"When wilt thou, mighty Jove,

My wealthy uncle from this world remove?"

Or—"O thou Thund'rer's son, great Hercules,"

That once thy bounteous deity would please
To guide my rake upon the chinking sound
Of some vast treasure, hidden under ground!

"O were my pupil fairly knock'd o' th' head;

I should possess th' estate, if he were dead!
He's so far gone with rickets, and with th' evil,

That one small dose would send him to the devil.

"This is my neighbor Nerius his third spouse,

Of whom in happy time he rids his house;
But my eternal wife!—Grant Heav'n I may Survive to see the fellow of his day!"

Thus, that thou mayst the better bring about

Thy wishes, thou art wickedly devout:
In Tiber ducking thrice, by break of day,
To wash th' obscenities of night³ away.

But pr'ythee tell me, ('t is a small request,)
With what ill thoughts of Jove art thou possess'd?

Wouldst thou prefer him to some man?
Suppose

I dipp'd among the worst, and Staius chose?
Which of the two would thy wise head declare

The trustier tutor to an orphan heir?
Or, put it thus:—Unfold to Staius, straight,
What to Jove's ear thou didst impart of late:

He'll stare, and, "O good Jupiter!" will cry;

"Canst thou indulge him in this villainy?"
And think'st thou, Jove himself, with patience, then,

Can hear a pray'r condemn'd by wicked men?

That, void of care, he lolls supine in state,
And leaves his bus'ness to be done by fate?
Because his thunder splits some burly tree,
And is not darted at thy house and thee?
Or that his vengeance falls not at the time,
Just at the perpetration of thy crime:

And makes thee a sad object of our eyes,
Fit for Ergenna's pray'r 'and sacrifice?
What well-fed off'ring to appease the god,
What pow'rful present to procure a nod,
Hast thou in store? What bribe hast thou prepar'd,

To pull him, thus unpunish'd, by the beard?
Our superstitions with our life begin:

Th' obscene old grandam, or the next of kin,

The newborn infant from the cradle takes,
And first of spittle a lustration⁵ makes;

Then in the spawl her middle finger dips, Anoints the temples, forehead, and the lips,
 Pretending force of witchcraft to prevent,
 By virtue of her nasty excrement;
 Then dandles him with many a mutter'd
 pray'r
 That Heav'n would make him some rich miser's heir,
 Lucky to ladies, and in time a king;
 Which to insure, she adds a length of navel-string. ⁷⁰
 But no fond nurse is fit to make a pray'r:
 And Jove, if Jove be wise, will never
 hear;
 Not tho' she prays in white, with lifted
 hands.
 A body made of brass the crone demands
 For her lov'd nursling, strung with nerves of wire,
 Tough to the last, and with no toil to tire:
 Unconscionable vows! which when we use,
 We teach the gods, in reason, to refuse.
 Suppose they were indulgent to thy wish:
 Yet the fat entrails, in the spacious dish, ⁸⁰
 Would stop the grant; the very over-care,
 And nauseous pomp, would hinder half the
 pray'r.
 Thou hop'st with sacrifice of oxen slain
 To compass wealth, and bribe the God of Gain,
 To give thee flocks and herds, with large increase;
 Fool! to expect 'em from a bullock's grease!
 And think'st that when the fatten'd flames
 aspire,
 Thou seest th' accomplishment of thy desire!
 Now, now, my bearded harvest gilds the
 plain,
 The scanty folds can scarce my sheep contain, ⁹⁰
 And show'rs of gold come pouring in
 amain!
 Thus dreams the wretch, and vainly thus dreams on,
 Till his lank purse declares his money gone.
 Should I present thee with rare figur'd
 plate,
 Or gold as rich in workmanship as weight;
 O how thy rising heart would throb and
 beat,
 And thy left side, with trembling pleasure,
 sweat!

Thou measur'st by thyself the pow'rs divine;
 Thy gods are burnish'd gold, and silver is their shrine.
 Thy puny godlings of inferior race, ¹⁰⁰ Whose humble statues are content with brass,
 Should some of these, in visions purg'd
 from phlegm,⁶
 Foretell events, or in a morning dream;
 Ev'n those thou wouldst in veneration hold;
 And, if not faces, give 'em beards of gold.
 The priests in temples now no longer care
 For Saturn's brass,⁷ or Numa's earthenware,⁸
 Or vestal urns, in each religious rite:
 This wicked gold has put 'em all to flight.
 O souls, in whom no heav'nly fire is found,
 Fat minds, and ever groveling on the ground! ¹¹¹
 We bring our manners to the blest abodes,
 And think what pleases us must please the gods.
 Of oil and cassia one th' ingredients takes,
 And, of the mixture, a rich ointment makes;
 Another finds the way to dye in grain,
 And make Calabrian wool⁹ receive the Tyrian stain;
 Or from the shells their orient treasure
 takes,
 Or, for their golden ore, in rivers rakes;
 Then melts the mass. All these are vanities! ¹²⁰
 Yet still some profit from their pains may
 rise:
 But tell me, priest, if I may be so bold,
 What are the gods the better for this gold?
 The wretch that offers from his wealthy
 store
 These presents, bribes the pow'rs to give him more;
 As maids to Venus¹⁰ offer baby-toys,
 To bless the marriage bed with girls and boys.
 But let us for the gods a gift prepare,
 Which the great man's great chargers cannot bear:
 A soul, where laws, both human and divine, ¹³⁰
 In practice more than speculation shine;
 A genuine virtue, of a vigorous kind,
 Pure in the last recesses of the mind;
 When with such off'rings to the gods I
 come,
 A cake thus giv'n¹¹ is worth a hecatomb.

EXPLANATORY NOTES ON THE SECOND SATIRE

1 White stone. The Romans were us'd to mark their fortunate days, or anything that luckily befell 'em, with a white stone, which they had from the island Creta, and their unfortunate with a coal.

2 Hercules was thought to have the key and power of bestowing all hidden treasure.

3 The ancients thought themselves tainted and polluted by night itself, as well as bad dreams in the night; and therefore purified themselves by washing their heads and hands every morning, which custom the Turks observe to this day.

4 When anyone was thunderstruck, the soothsayer (who is here call'd Ergenna) immediately repair'd to the place, to expiate the displeasure of the gods by sacrificing two sheep.

5 The poet laughs at the superstitious ceremonies which the old women made use of in their lustration, or purification days, when they nam'd their children, which was done on the eighth day to females, and on the ninth to males.

6 In visions purg'd from phlegm, &c. It was the opinion both of Grecians and Romans, that the gods, in visions or dreams, often reveal'd to their favorites a cure for their diseases, and sometimes those of others. Thus Alexander dreamt of an herb which cur'd Ptolemy. These gods were principally Apollo and Æsculapius, but in aftertimes the same virtue and good will was attributed to Isis and Osiris. Which brings to my remembrance an odd passage in Sir Tho. Browne's Religio Medici, or in his Vulgar Errors: the sense whereof is, that we are beholding, for many of our discoveries in physic, to the courteous revelation of spirits. By the expression of visions purg'd from phlegm, our author means such dreams or visions as proceed not from natural causes, or humors of the body, but such as are sent from heaven; and are, therefore, certain remedies.

7 For Saturn's brass, &c. Brazen vessels, in which the public treasures of the Romans was kept: it may be the poet means only old vessels, which were all call'd Κρόνια, from the Greek name of Saturn. Note also that the Roman treasury was in the temple of Saturn.

8 Numa's earthenware. Under Numa, the second king of Rome and for a long time after him, the holy vessels for sacrifice were of earthenware; according to the superstitious rites which were introduc'd by the same Numa: tho' afterwards, when Memmius had taken Corinth, and Paulus Æmilius had conquer'd Macedonia, luxury began amongst the Romans, and then their utensils of devotion were of gold and silver, &c.

9 And make Calabrian wool, &c. The wool of Calabria was of the finest sort in Italy, as Juvenal also tells us. The Tyrian stain is the purple color dyed at Tyrus; and I suppose, but dare not positively affirm, that the richest of that dye was nearest our crimson, and not scarlet, or that other color more approaching to the blue. I have not room to justify my conjecture.

10 As maids to Venus, &c. Those baby-toys were little babies, or poppets, as we call them; in Latin, pupæ: which the girls, when they came to the age of puberty, or childbearing, offer'd to Venus; as the boys, at fourteen or fifteen years of age, offer'd their bullæ, or bosses.

11 A cake thus giv'n, &c. A cake of barley, or coarse wheat meal, with the bran in it: the meaning is that God is pleas'd with the pure and spotless heart of the offerer, and not with the riches of the offering. Laberius, in the fragments of his Mimes, has a verse like this: Puras Deus non plenas aspicit manus. — What I had forgotten before, in its due place, I must here tell the reader, that the first half of this satire was translated by one of my sons, now in Italy; but I thought so well of it that I let it pass without any alteration.

THE THIRD SATIRE OF PERSIUS

THE ARGUMENT

Our author has made two satires concerning study; the First and the Third: the First related to men; this to young students, whom he desir'd to be educated in the Stoic philosophy: he himself sustains the person of the master, or preceptor, in this admirable satire, where he upbraids the youth of sloth and negligence in learning. Yet he begins with one scholar reproaching his fellow students with late rising to their books. After which he takes upon him the other part, of the teacher; and, addressing himself particularly to young noblemen, tells them that, by reason of their high birth, and the great possessions of their fathers, they are careless of adorning their minds with precepts of moral philosophy: and, withal, inculcates to them the miseries which will attend them in the whole course of their life, if they do not apply themselves betimes to the knowledge of virtue, and the end of their creation, which he pathetically insinuates to them. The title of this satire, in some ancient manuscripts, was The Reproach of Idleness; tho' in others of the scholiasts 't is inscrib'd, Against the Luxury and Vices of the Rich. In both of which the intention of the poet is pursued, but principally in the former.

I remember I translated this satire, when I was a King's Scholar at Westminster School, for a Thursday-night's exercise; and believe that it, and many other of my exercises of this nature, in English verse, are still in the hands of my learned master, the Reverend Doctor Busby.

"Is this thy daily course? The glaring
 sun
 Breaks in at ev'ry chink; the cattle run
 To shades, and noontide rays of summer
 shun;
 Yet plung'd in sloth we lie; and snore supine,
 As fill'd with fumes of undigested wine."
 This grave advice some sober student
 bears,
 And loudly rings it in his fellow's ears.
 The yawning youth, scarce half awake, essays
 His lazy limbs and dozy head to raise;
 Then rubs his gummy eyes, and scrubs his pate,
 And cries: "I thought it had not been so
 late:
 My clothes; make haste: why when!" If none be near,
 He mutters first, and then begins to swear;
 And brays aloud, with a more clam'rous
 note,
 Than an Arcadian ass can stretch his throat.
 With much ado, his book before him
 laid,
 And parchment¹ with the smoother side
 display'd;
 He takes the papers; lays 'em down again;
 And with unwilling fingers tries the pen:
 Some peevish quarrel straight he strives to pick;
 His quill writes double, or his ink's too thick:
 Infuse more water; now 't is grown so thin,
 It sinks, nor can the character be seen.
 O wretch, and still more wretched ev'ry
 day!
 Are mortals born to sleep their lives away?
 Go back to what thy infancy began,
 Thou who wert never meant to be a man:
 Eat pap and spoon-meat; for thy gewgaws
 cry:
 Be sullen, and refuse the lullaby.
 No more accuse thy pen; but charge the
 crime
 On native sloth, and negligence of time.
 Think'st thou thy master, or thy friends,
 to cheat?
 Fool, 't is thyself, and that's a worse deceit.
 Beware the public laughter of the town;
 Thou spring'st a leak already in thy crown.
 A flaw is in thy ill-bak'd vessel found;
 'T is hollow, and returns a jarring sound.

Yet, thy moist clay is pliant to command;
 Unwrought, and easy to the potter's hand:
 Now take the mold; now bend thy mind to feel
 The first sharp motions of the forming wheel.
 But thou hast land; a country seat, secure
 By a just title; costly furniture;
 A fuming-pan² thy Lares to appease:
 What need of learning when a man's at
 ease?
 If this be not enough to swell thy soul,
 Then please thy pride, and search the herald's roll,
 Where thou shalt find thy famous pedigree
 Drawn from the root³ of some old Tuscan
 tree;
 And thou, a thousand off, a fool of long
 degree;
 Who, clad in purple,⁴ canst thy censor greet,
 And loudly call him cousin in the street.
 Such pageantry be to the people shown;
 Their boast thy horse's trappings, and thy
 own:
 I know thee to thy bottom; from within Thy shallow center, to thy outmost skin:
 Dost thou not blush to live so like a beast,
 So trim, so dissolute, so loosely dress'd?
 But 't is in vain: the wretch is drench'd
 too deep,
 His soul is stupid, and his heart asleep;
 Fatten'd in vice, so callous, and so gross,
 He sins, and sees not, senseless of his loss.
 Down goes the wretch at once, unskill'd to swim,
 Hopeless to bubble up and reach the water's brim.
 Great Father of the Gods, when, for our
 crimes,
 Thou send'st some heavy judgment on the
 times;
 Some tyrant king, the terror of his age,
 The type, and true vicegerent of thy rage;
 Thus punish him: set Virtue in his sight,
 With all her charms adorn'd, with all her graces bright;
 But set her distant, make him pale to see
 His gains outweigh'd by lost felicity!
 Sicilian tortures,⁵ and the brazen bull,
 Are emblems, rather than express the full
 Of what he feels; yet what he fears is

The wretch, who sitting⁶ at his plenteous
board,
Look'd up, and view'd on high the pointed
sword
Hang o'er his head, and hanging by a twine,
Did with less dread, and more securely dine.
Ev'n in his sleep he starts, and fears the knife,
And, trembling, in his arms takes his accomplice wife:
Down, down he goes; and from his darling
friend
Conceals the woes his guilty dreams por-
tend.

When I was young, I, like a lazy fool,
Would blear my eyes with oil to stay from
school,
Averse from pains, and loth to learn the
part
Of Cato, dying with a dauntless heart;
Tho' much my master that stern virtue
prais'd,
Which o'er the vanquisher the vanquish'd
rais'd;
And my pleas'd father came with pride to
see
His boy defend the Roman liberty.

But then my study was to cog the dice,
And dextrously to throw the lucky sice;
To shun ames-ace, that swept my stakes
away;
And watch the box, for fear they should convey
False bones, and put upon me in the play;
Careful, besides, the whirling top to whip,
And drive her giddy, till she fell asleep.

Thy years are ripe, nor art thou yet to learn
What's good or ill, and both their ends discern:

Thou, in the Stoic Porch,⁷ severely bred,
Hast heard the dogmas of great Zeno read;
Where on the walls, by Polygnotus'⁸ hand,
The conquer'd Medians in trunk-breeches
stand;

Where the shorn youth to midnight lectures rise,
Rous'd from their slumbers to be early
wise;

Where the coarse cake, and homely husks of beans,
From pamp'ring riot the young stomach
weans;
And where the Samian Y⁹ directs thy steps
to run

To Virtue's narrow steep, and broad-way
Vice to shun.

And yet thou snor'st; thou draw'st thy drunken breath,
Sour with debauch; and sleep'st the sleep
of death:

Thy chaps are fallen, and thy frame dis-
join'd;

Thy body as dissolv'd as is thy mind.

Hast thou not yet propos'd some certain
end,

To which thy life, thy ev'ry act may tend ?
Hast thou no mark at which to bend thy bow ?

Or like a boy pursu'st the carrion crow
With pellets, and with stones, from tree to
tree:

A fruitless toil, and liv'st extempore ?
Watch the disease in time; for, when within

The dropsy rages and extends the skin,
In vain for hellebore the patient cries,
And fees the doctor; but too late is wise:
Too late for cure, he proffers half his
wealth;

Conquest and Gibbons cannot give him
health.

Learn, wretches, learn the motions of the mind,
Why you were made, for what you were design'd;

And the great moral end of humankind.
Study thyself, what rank or what degree
The wise Creator has ordain'd for thee;
And all the offices of that estate Perform, and with thy prudence guide thy
fate.

Pray justly, to be heard; nor more desire

Than what the decencies of life require.
Learn what thou ow'st thy country, and thy
friend;

What's requisite to spare, and what to spend:

Learn this; and after, envy not the store
Of the greas'd advocate, that grinds the
poor,

Fat fees¹⁰ from the defended Umbrian
draws,

And only gains the wealthy client's cause;
To whom the Marsians¹¹ more provision
send,

Than he and all his family can spend.
Gammons, that give a relish to the taste,
And potted fowl, and fish come in so fast,

That, ere the first is out, the second stinks,
And moldy mother gathers on the brinks.

But here some captain of the land or
fleet,

Stout of his hands, but of a soldier's wit, Cries: "I have sense to serve my turn, in
store; 150

And he's a rascal who pretends to more.
Damme, whate'er those book-learn'd block-heads say,

Solon's the veriest fool in all the play.
Top-heavy drones, and always looking down,
(As overballasted within the crown!)
Muttring betwixt their lips some mystic
thing,

Which, well examin'd, is flat conjuring, Mere madmen's dreams: for what the schools have taught,
Is only this, that nothing can be brought From nothing; and, what is, can ne'er be turn'd to naught. 160

Is it for this they study? to grow pale,
And miss the pleasures of a glorious meal?
For this, in rags accouter'd, they are seen,
And made the May-game of the public spleen?"

Proceed, my friend, and rail; but hear me tell

A story, which is just thy parallel.

A spark, like thee, of the man-killing
trade,

Fell sick, and thus to his physician said:
"Methinks I am not right in ev'ry part;
I feel a kind of trembling at my heart: 170
My pulse unequal, and my breath is strong;
Besides, a filthy fur upon my tongue."
The doctor heard him, exercis'd his skill;
And, after, bade him for four days be still.
Three days he took good counsel, and began

To mend, and look like a recov'ring man;
The fourth, he could not hold from drink,
but sends

His boy to one of his old trusty friends,
Adjuring him, by all the pow'rs divine,
To pity his distress, who could not dine 180
Without a flagon of his healing wine.
He drinks a swilling draught; and, lin'd
within,

Will supple in the bath his outward skin:
Whom should he find but his physician
there,

Who, wisely, bade him once again beware:
"Sir, you look wan, you hardly draw your
breath;

Drinking is dangerous, and the bath is
death."

"'Tis nothing," says the fool. "But," says
the friend,

"This nothing, sir, will bring you to your
end.

Do I not see your dropsy-belly swell? 190
Your yellow skin?" — "No more of that;
I'm well.

I have already buried two or three
That stood betwixt a fair estate and me,
And, doctor, I may live to bury thee.
Thou tell'st me, I look ill, and thou look'st
worse."

"I've done," says the physician; "take your course."

The laughing sot, like all unthinking men, Bathes and gets drunk; then bathes and drinks again.

His throat half throttled with corrupted
phlegm,

And breathing thro' his jaws a belching
stream, 200

Amidst his cups with fainting shiv'ring
seiz'd,

His limbs disjointed, and all o'er diseas'd,
His hand refuses to sustain the bowl,
And his teeth chatter, and his eyeballs
roll,

Till, with his meat, he vomits out his soul:
Then trumpets, torches, and a tedious crew
Of hireling mourners, for his funeral due.

Our dear departed brother lies in state,
His heels stretch'd out, ¹² and pointing to the gate;

And slaves, now manumiz'd, on their dead master wait. 210

They hoist him on the bier, and deal the dole;

And there's an end of a luxurious fool.

"But what's thy fulsome parable to me?

My body is from all diseases free:

My temperate pulse does regularly beat;
Feel, and be satisfied, my hands and feet:
These are not cold, nor those oppress'd with heat.

Or lay thy hand upon my naked heart,
And thou shalt find me hale in ev'ry part."

I grant this true: but, still, the deadly
wound 220

Is in thy soul; 'tis there thou art not
sound.

Say, when thou seest a heap of tempting
gold,

Or a more tempting harlot dost behold;

Then, when she casts on thee a sidelong
glance,
Then try thy heart, and tell me if it dance.
Some coarse cold salad is before thee
set;
Bread, with the bran perhaps, and broken meat:
Fall on, and try thy appetite to eat.
These are not dishes for thy dainty tooth:
What, hast thou got an ulcer in thy mouth?
Why stand'st thou picking? Is thy palate sore,
That beet and radishes will make thee
roar?
Such is th' unequal temper of thy mind;
Thy passions in extremes, and unconfin'd:
Thy hair so bristles with unmanly fears,
As fields of corn that rise in bearded ears;
And, when thy cheeks with flushing fury
glow,
The rage of boiling caldrons is more slow;
When fed with fuel and with flames be-
low.
With foam upon thy lips, and sparkling
eyes,
Thou say'st and dost in such outrageous
wise,
That mad Orestes,¹³ if he saw the show,
Would swear thou wert the madder of the two.

EXPLANATORY NOTES ON THE THIRD
SATIRE

1 And parchment, &c. The students us'd to write their notes on parchments; the inside, on which they wrote, was white; the other side was hairy, and commonly yellow. Quintilian reproves this custom, and advises rather table-books, lin'd with wax, and a style, like that we use in our vellum table-books, as more easy.

2 A fuming-pan, &c. Before eating, it was customary to cut off some part of the meat, which was first put into a pan, or little dish, then into the fire, as an offering to the household gods: this they call'd a libation.

3 Drawn from the root, &c. The Tuscans were accounted of most ancient nobility. Horace observes this in most of his compliments to Mæcenas, who was deriv'd from the old kings of Tuscany, now the dominion of the Great Duke.

4 Who, clad in purple, &c. The Roman knights, attir'd in the robe call'd trabea, were summon'd by the censor to appear before him, and to salute him in passing by, as their names were call'd over. They led their horses in their hand. See more of this in Pompey's life, written by Plutarch.

5 Sicilian tortures, &c. Some of the Sicilian kings were so great tyrants, that the name is become proverbial. The brazen bull is a known story of Phalaris, one of those tyrants, who, when Perillus, a famous artist, had presented him with a bull of that metal hollow'd within, which, when the condemn'd person was inclos'd in it, would render the sound of a bull's roaring, caus'd the workman to make the first experiment—docuitque suum mugire juvencum.

6 The wretch, who sitting, &c. He alludes to the story of Damocles, a flatterer of one of those Sicilian tyrants, namely Dionysius. Damocles had infinitely extoll'd the happiness of kings. Dionysius, to convince him of the contrary, invited him to a feast, and cloth'd him in purple; but caus'd a sword, with the point downward, to be hung over his head by a silken twine; which when he perceiv'd, he could eat nothing of the delicacies that were set before him.

7 Thou, in the Stoic Porch, &c. The Stoics taught their philosophy under a porticus, to secure their scholars from the weather. Zeno was the chief of that sect.

8 Polygnotus, a famous painter, who drew the pictures of the Medes and Persians conquer'd by Miltiades, Themistocles, and other Athenian captains, on the walls of the portico, in their natural habits.

9 And where the Samian Y, &c. Pythagoras, of Samos, made the allusion of the Y, or Greek upsilon, to Vice and Virtue. One side of the letter, being broad, characters Vice, to which the ascent is wide and easy; the other side represents Virtue, to which the passage is strait and difficult; and perhaps our Savior might also allude to this, in those noted words of the evangelist, "The way to heaven," &c.

10 Fat fees, &c. Casaubon here notes that among all the Romans who were brought up to learning, few besides the orators, or lawyers, grew rich.

11 The Marsians and Umbrians were the most plentiful of all the provinces in Italy.

12 His heels stretch'd out, &c. The Romans were buried without the city; for which reason the poet says that the dead man's heels were stretch'd out towards the gate.

13 That mad Orestes. Orestes was son to Agamemnon and Clytemnestra. Agamemnon, at his return from the Trojan wars, was slain by Ægisthus, the adulterer of Clytemnestra. Orestes, to revenge his father's death, slew both Ægisthus and his mother; for which he was punish'd with madness by the Eumenides, or Furies, who continually haunted him.

THE FOURTH SATIRE OF PERSIUS

THE ARGUMENT

Our author, living in the time of Nero, was contemporary and friend to the noble poet Lucan; both of them were sufficiently sensible, with all good men, how unskilfully

he manag'd the commonwealth; and perhaps might guess at his future tyranny by some passages during the latter part of his first five years; tho' he broke not out into his greater excesses, while he was restrain'd by the counsels and authority of Seneca. Lucan has not spar'd him in the poem of his Pharsalia; for his very compliment look'd asquint, as well as Nero. Persius has been bolder, but with caution likewise. For here, in the person of young Alcibiades, he arraigns his ambition of meddling with state affairs, without judgment or experience. 'Tis probable that he makes Seneca, in this satire, sustain the part of Socrates, under a borrow'd name; and, withal, discovers some secret vices of Nero, concerning his lust, his drunkenness, and his effeminacy, which had not yet arriv'd to public notice. He also reprehends the flattery of his courtiers, who endeavor'd to make all his vices pass for virtues. Covetousness was undoubtedly none of his faults; but it is here describ'd as a veil cast over the true meaning of the poet, which was to satirize his prodigality and voluptuousness; to which he makes a transition. I find no instance in history of that emperor's being a pathic, tho' Persius seems to brand him with it. From the two dialogues of Plato, both call'd Alcibiades, the poet took the arguments of the Second and Third Satire, but he inverted the order of them; for the Third Satire is taken from the first of those dialogues.

The commentators before Casaubon were ignorant of our author's secret meaning, and thought he had only written against young noblemen in general, who were too forward in aspiring to public magistracy; but this excellent scholiast has unravel'd the whole mystery, and made it apparent that the sting of the satire was particularly aim'd at Nero.

WHOE'ER thou art, whose forward years are bent

On state affairs, to guide the government;
Hear, first, what Socrates¹ of old has said
To the lov'd youth, whom he at Athens
bred:

"Tell me, thou pupil to great Pericles,²
Our second hope, my Alcibiades,
What are the grounds, from whence thou dost prepare

To undertake, so young, so vast a care?
Perhaps thy wit: (a chance not often heard,
That parts and prudence should prevent the beard:)

'Tis seldom seen, that senators so young

Know when to speak, and when to hold their tongue.

Sure thou art born to some peculiar fate;
When the mad people rise against the State,

To look them into duty; and command
An awful silence with thy lifted hand.
Then to bespeak 'em thus: 'Athenians,
know

Against right reason all your counsels go;
This is not fair; nor profitable that;
Nor t'other question proper for debate.'²⁰
But thou, no doubt, canst set the business
right,

And give each argument its proper weight;
Know'st, with an equal hand, to hold the
scale;

Seest where the reasons pinch, and where they fail,

And where exceptions o'er the general rule prevail;

And, taught by inspiration, in a trice,
Canst punish crimes,³ and brand offending
vice.

"Leave, leave to fathom such high points
as these,

Nor be ambitious, ere thy time, to please;
Unseasonably wise, till age and cares³⁰
Have form'd thy soul to manage great affairs.

Thy face, thy shape, thy outside, are but
vain;

Thou hast not strength such labors to sus-
tain:

Drink hellebore,⁴ my boy, drink deep,
and purge thy brain.

"What aim'st thou at, and whither tends thy care?

In what thy utmost good? Delicious fare;
And then, to sun thyself in open air.

"Hold, hold; are all thy empty wishes
such?

A good old woman would have said as much.³⁹

But thou art nobly born: 't is true; go boast Thy pedigree, the thing thou valu'st most.
Besides, thou art a beau: what's that, my child?

A fop, well-dress'd, extravagant, and wild:
She that cries herbs has less impertinence;
And, in her calling, more of common sense."

None, none descends into himself, to find
The secret imperfections of his mind:

But ev'ryone is eagle-ey'd, to see
Another's faults and his deformity.

"Say, dost thou know Vectidius?" "Who,
the wretch

Whose lands beyond the Sabines largely stretch;

Cover the country, that a sailing kite
Can scarce o'erfly 'em in a day and night?
Him dost thou mean, who, spite of all his
store,

Is ever craving, and will still be poor?
Who cheats for halfpence, and who doffs
his coat,

To save a farthing in a ferryboat?
Ever a glutton, at another's cost,
But in whose kitchen dwells perpetual frost?

Who eats and drinks with his domestic slaves; 60

A verier hind than any of his knaves?
Born with the curse and anger of the gods,
And that indulgent genius he defrauds?
At harvest-home, and on the shearing day,
When he should thanks⁶ to Pan and Pales
pay,

And better Ceres, trembling to approach
The little barrel, which he fears to broach:
He 'says the wimble, often draws it back,
And deals to thirsty servants but a snack.
To a short meal he makes a tedious grace, 70
Before the barley pudding comes in place:
Then, bids fall on; himself, for saving charges,

A peel'd slic'd onion eats, and tipples ver-
juice."

"Thus fares the drudge: but thou, whose life's a dream

Of lazy pleasures, tak'st a worse extreme.
'Tis all thy bus'ness, bus'ness how to shun;
To bask thy naked body in the sun,
Suppling thy stiffen'd joints with fragrant
oil;

Then, in thy spacious garden, walk a while,
To suck the moisture up, and soak it in: 80
And this, thou think'st, but vainly think'st, unseen.

But know, thou art observ'd; and there are those

Who, if they durst, would all thy secret sins expose:

The depilation of thy modest part; }
Thy catamite, the darling of thy heart, }
His engine-hand, and ev'ry lewder art; }
When, prone to bear, and patient to receive,

Thou tak'st the pleasure which thou canst
not give.

With odorous oil thy head and hair are sleek;

And then thou kemb'st the tuzzes on thy
cheek: 90

Of these thy barbers take a costly care,
While thy salt tail is overgrown with hair.
Not all thy pincers, nor unmanly arts,
Can smoothe the roughness of thy shameful
parts:

Not five, the strongest⁸ that the Circus
breeds,

From the rank soil can root those wicked
weeds,

Tho' supplied first with soap, to ease thy
pain;

The stubborn fern springs up, and sprouts
again.

"Thus others we with defamations wound,
While they stab us; and so the jest goes
round. 100

Vain are thy hopes, to scape censorious eyes;
Truth will appear thro' all the thin disguise:
Thou hast an ulcer which no leech can heal,
Tho' thy broad shoulder belt the wound conceal.

Say thou art sound and hale in ev'ry part,
We know, we know thee rotten at thy heart.
We know thee sullen, impotent, and proud:
Nor canst thou cheat thy nerve,⁹ who cheat'st
the crowd."

"But when they praise me, in the neighborhood,

When the pleas'd people take me for a god, 110

Shall I refuse their incense? Not receive
The loud applauses which the vulgar give?"

"If thou dost wealth with longing eyes
behold,

And greedily art gaping after gold;
If some alluring girl, in gliding by,
Shall tip the wink, with a lascivious eye, }
And thou with a consenting glance reply; }

If thou thy own solicitor become,
And bidd'st arise the lumpish pendulum;

If thy lewd lust provokes an empty
storm, 120

And prompts to more than nature can perform;

If with thy guards¹⁰ thou scour'st the streets
by night,

And dost in murders, rapes, and spoils de-
light;

Please not thyself, the flatt'ring crowd to
hear;

'Tis fulsome stuff to feed thy itching ear.

Reject the nauseous praises of the times;
Give thy base poets back their cobbled
rhymes:

Survey thy soul,¹¹ not what thou dost appear,
But what thou art, and find the beggar
there."

EXPLANATORY NOTES ON THE FOURTH SATIRE

1 Socrates, whom the oracle of Delphos prais'd as the wisest man of his age, liv'd in the time of the Peloponnesian War. He, finding the uncertainty of natural philosophy, applied himself wholly to the moral. He was master to Xenophon and Plato, and to many of the Athenian young noblemen; amongst the rest, to Alcibiades, the most lovely youth then living; afterwards a famous captain, whose life is written by Plutarch.

2 Pericles was tutor, or rather overseer, of the will of Clinias, father to Alcibiades. While Pericles liv'd, who was a wise man, and an excellent orator, as well as a great general, the Athenians had the better of the war.

3 Canst punish crimes, &c. That is, by death. When the judges would condemn a malefactor, they cast their votes into an urn; as, according to the modern custom, a balloting-box. If the suffrages were mark'd with Θ, they signified the sentence of death to the offender; as being the first letter of Θάνατος, which, in English, is death.

4 Drink hellebore, &c. The poet would say, that such an ignorant young man as he here describes is fitter to be govern'd himself than to govern others. He therefore advises him to drink hellebore, which purges the brain.

5 "Say, dost thou know Vertidius?" &c. The name of Vectidius is here us'd appellatively, to signify any rich covetous man, tho' perhaps there might be a man of that name then living. I have translated this passage paraphrastically and loosely; and leave it for those to look on, who are not unlike the picture.

6 When he should thanks, &c. Pan, the god of shepherds, and Pales, the goddess presiding over rural affairs; whom Virgil invokes in the beginning of his Second Georgic. I give the epithet of better to Ceres, because she first taught the use of corn for bread, as the poets tell us; men, in the first rude ages, feeding only on acorns, or mast, instead of bread.

7 . . .
8 Not five, the strongest, &c. The learned Holyday (who has made us amends for his bad poetry in this and the rest of these satires, with his excellent illustrations) here tells us, from good authority, that the number five does not allude to the five fingers of one man, . . . but to five strong men, such as were skilful in the five robust exercises then in practice at Rome, and were perform'd in the Circus, or public place ordain'd for them. These five he reckons up in this manner: 1. The cæstus, or whirlbats, describ'd by Virgil in his fifth Æneid; and this was the most dangerous of all the rest. The second was the foot race; the third the discus, like the throwing a weighty ball, a sport now us'd in Cornwall and other parts of England; we may see it daily practic'd in Red Lion Fields. The fourth was the saltus, or leaping; and the fifth, wrestling naked and besmear'd with oil. They who were practic'd in these five manly exercises were call'd Πέντα-θλοι.

9 Thy nerve, &c. That is, thou canst not deceive thy obscene part, which is weak or impotent, tho' thou mak'st ostentation of thy performances with women.

10 If with thy guards, &c. Persius durst not have been so bold with Nero as I dare now; and therefore there is only an intimation of that in him which I publicly speak: I mean, of Nero's walking the streets by night in disguise, and committing all sorts of outrages, for which he was sometimes well beaten.

11 Survey thy soul, &c. That is, look into thyself, and examine thy own conscience; there thou shalt find that how wealthy soever thou appear'st to the world, yet thou art but a beggar; because thou art destitute of all virtues, which are the riches of the soul. This also was a paradox of the Stoic school.

THE FIFTH SATIRE OF PERSIUS

INSCRIB'D TO THE REVEREND DR. BUSBY

THE ARGUMENT

The judicious Casaubon, in his proem to this satire, tells us that Aristophanes the grammarian, being ask'd what poem of Archilochus his Iambics he preferr'd before the rest, answer'd, the longest. His answer may justly be applied to this Fifth Satire; which, being of a greater length than any of the rest, is also by far the most instructive. For this reason I have selected it from all the others, and inscrib'd it to my learned master, Doctor Busby; to whom I am not only oblig'd myself for the best part of my own education, and that of my two sons, but have also receiv'd from him the first and truest taste of Persius. May he be pleas'd to find in this translation the gratitude, or at least some small acknowledgment, of his unworthy scholar, at the distance of forty-two years from the time when I departed from under his tuition.

This satire consists of two distinct parts: the first contains the praises of the Stoic philosopher Cornutus, master and tutor to our Persius. It also declares the love and piety of Persius to his well-deserving master, and the mutual friendship which continued betwixt them, after Persius was now grown a man; as also his exhortation to young noblemen, that they would enter themselves into his institution. From hence he makes an artful transition into the second part of his subject: wherein he first complains of the sloth of scholars, and afterwards persuades them to the pursuit of their true liberty. Here our author excellently treats that paradox of the Stoics which affirms, that the wise or virtuous man is only free, and that all vicious men are naturally slaves; and, in the illustration of this dogma, he takes up the remaining part of this inimitable satire.

THE SPEAKERS PERSIUS AND CORNUTUS

PER. Of ancient use to poets it belongs,
To wish themselves an hundred mouths and
tongues:

Whether to the well-lung'd tragedian's rage
They recommend their labors of the stage,
Or sing the Parthian, when transfix'd he
lies,
Wrenching the Roman javelin from his thighs.

CORN. And why wouldst thou these mighty morsels choose,
Of words unchaw'd, and fit to choke the Muse?

Let fustian poets with their stuff be gone,
And suck the mists that hang o'er Helicon;
When Progne's¹ or Thyestes'² feast they
write;

And, for the mouthing actor, verse indite.
Thou neither, like a bellows, swell'st thy
face,

As if thou wert to blow the burning mass
Of melting ore; nor canst thou strain thy throat,

Or murmur in an undistinguish'd note,
Like rolling thunder, till it breaks the cloud,

And rattling nonsense is discharg'd aloud.
Soft elocution does thy style renown,
And the sweet accents of the peaceful
gown:

Gentle or sharp, according to thy choice,
To laugh at follies, or to lash at vice.

Hence draw thy theme, and to the stage permit

Raw-head and bloody-bones, and hands
and feet,

Ragousts for Tereus or Thyestes dress'd;
'T is task enough for thee t' expose a Roman feast.

PER. 'T is not, indeed, my talent to engage

In lofty trifles, or to swell my page
With wind and noise; but freely to impart,
As to a friend, the secrets of my heart; ³⁰
And, in familiar speech, to let thee know How much I love thee, and how much I owe.

Knock on my heart: for thou hast skill to
find
If it sound solid, or be fill'd with wind;
And, thro' the vale of words, thou view'st
the naked mind. }

For this a hundred voices I desire,
To tell thee what an hundred tongues would
tire;

Yet never could be worthily express'd,
How deeply thou art seated in my breast.

When first my childish robe³ resign'd the charge, ⁴⁰

And left me, unconfin'd, to live at large;
When now my golden bulla (hung on
high

To household gods) declar'd me past a
boy,
And my white shield⁴ proclaim'd my liberty; }

When, with my wild companions, I could roll

From street to street, and sin without control;

Just at that age, when manhood set me free,
I then depos'd myself, and left the reins to
thee.

On thy wise bosom I repos'd my head,
And by my better Socrates⁵ was bred. ⁵⁰
Then thy straight rule set virtue in my
sight,

The crooked line reforming by the right.
My reason took the bent of thy command,
Was form'd and polish'd by thy skilful
hand;

Long summer days thy precepts I rehearse,
And winter nights were short in our con-
verse;

One was our labor, one was our repose,
One frugal supper did our studies close.

Sure on our birth some friendly planet
shone;

And, as our souls, our horoscope was one:⁶
Whether the mounting Twins⁷ did heav'n adorn, ⁶¹

Or with the rising Balance⁸ we were born;
Both have the same impressions from
above,

And both have Saturn's rage, repell'd by Jove.⁹

What star I know not, but some star, I find,
Has giv'n thee an ascendant o'er my mind.

CORN. Nature is ever various in her frame;

Each has a different will, and few the same:
The greedy merchants, led by lucre, run
To the parch'd Indies, and the rising sun;⁷⁰
From thence hot pepper and rich drugs
they bear,

Bart'ring for spices their Italian ware;
The lazy glutton safe at home will keep,
Indulge his sloth, and batten with his sleep:
One bribes for high preferments in the State;

A second shakes the box, and sits up late;
Another shakes the bed, dissolving there,
Till knots upon his gouty joints appear,
And chalk is in his crippled fingers found;
Rots like a dodder'd oak, and piecemeal falls to ground;⁸⁰

Then his lewd follies he would late repent;
And his past years, that in a mist were spent.

PER. But thou art pale in nightly studies grown,

To make the Stoic institutes thy own;¹⁰
Thou long with studious care hast till'd our youth,

And sown our well-purg'd ears with wholesome truth.

From thee both old and young with profit learn

The bounds of good and evil to discern.

CORN. Unhappy he who does this work adjourn

And to to-morrow would the search delay:⁹⁰
His lazy morrow will be like to-day.

PER. But is one day of ease too much to borrow?

CORN. Yes, sure: for yesterday was once to-morrow.

That yesterday is gone, and nothing gain'd;
And all thy fruitless days will thus be drain'd;

For thou hast more to-morrows yet to ask,
And wilt be ever to begin thy task;
Who, like the hindmost chariot wheels, art
curst,

Still to be near, but ne'er to reach the first.

O freedom! first delight of human-kind!¹⁰⁰

Not that which bondmen from their masters find,

The privilege of doles;¹¹ nor yet t' inscribe
Their names in this or t'other Roman tribe:¹²

That false enfranchisement with ease is
found;

Slaves are made citizens by turning round.¹³

"How," replies one, "can any be more
free?"

Here's Dama, once a groom of low degree
Not worth a farthing, and a sot beside;
So true a rogue, for lying's sake he lied:

But, with a turn, a freeman he became;¹¹⁰
Now Marcus Dama is his worship's name.¹⁴

Good gods! who would refuse to lend a sum,

If wealthy Marcus surety will become!
Marcus is made a judge, and for a proof
Of certain truth, 'He said it,' is enough.

A will is to be prov'd; put in your claim;
'Tis clear, if Marcus has subscrib'd his name.¹⁵

This is true liberty, as I believe;
What farther can we from our caps receive,¹⁶

Than as we please without control to live?¹²⁰

Not more to noble Brutus¹⁷ could belong."

"Hold," says the Stoic, "your assumption's wrong:

I grant true freedom you have well de-
fin'd;

But, living as you list, and to your mind,
Are loosely tack'd, and must be left behind."

"What! since the prætor did my fetters
loose,

And left me freely at my own dispose,
May I not live without control or awe,
Excepting still the letter of the law?"¹⁸

"Hear me with patience, while thy mind
I free¹³⁰

From those fond notions of false liberty:
'Tis not the prætor's province to bestow True freedom; nor to teach mankind to
know

What to ourselves, or to our friends, we owe.

He could not set thee free from cares and
strife,

Nor give the reins to a lewd vicious life:
As well he for an ass a harp might string,

Which is against the reason of the thing;
For reason still is whip'ring in your ear:

'Where you are sure to fail, th' attempt forbear.'¹⁴⁰

No need of public sanctions this to bind,
Which Nature has implanted in the
mind:
Not to pursue the work, to which we're not design'd.
"Unskill'd in hellebore, if thou shouldst
try
To mix it, and mistake the quantity,
The rules of physic would against thee
cry.
The high-shoed plowman, should he quit
the land,
To take the pilot's rudder in his hand,
Artless of stars, and of the moving sand,
The gods would leave him to the waves and
wind,
And think all shame was lost in human-
kind.

"Tell me, my friend, from whence hadst
thou the skill,
So nicely to distinguish good from ill?
Or by the sound to judge of gold and brass,
What piece is tinker's metal, what will
pass?
And what thou art to follow, what to fly,
This to condemn, and that to ratify?
When to be bountiful, and when to spare,
But never craving, or oppress'd with care?
The baits of gifts and money to despise,
And look on wealth with undesiring eyes?
When thou canst truly call these virtues
thine,
Be wise and free, by Heav'n's consent, and
mine.

"But thou, who lately of the common
strain,
Wert one of us, if still thou dost retain
The same ill habits, the same follies too,
Gloss'd over only with a saintlike show,
Then I resume the freedom which I gave;
Still thou art bound to vice, and still a slave.
Thou canst not wag thy finger, or begin
The least light motion, but it tends to sin."

"How's this? Not wag my finger?"
he replies.
"No, friend; nor fuming gums, nor sacrifice,
Can ever make a madman free, or wise.
*Virtue and Vice are never in one soul:
A man is wholly wise, or wholly is a fool.*¹⁹
A heavy bumpkin, taught with daily care,
Can never dance three steps with a becoming air."

PER. In spite of this, my freedom still remains.

CORN. Free! what, and fetter'd with so many chains? ¹⁸⁰

Canst thou no other master understand
Than him that freed thee by the prætor's wand? ²⁰

Should he, who was thy lord, command
thee now,

With a harsh voice, and supercilious brow,
To servile duties, thou wouldst fear no
more;

The gallows and the whip are out of door.
But if thy passions lord it in thy breast,
Art thou not still a slave, and still op-
press'd?

Whether alone, or in thy harlot's lap,
When thou wouldst take a lazy morning's nap, ¹⁹⁰

"Up, up," says Avarice; thou snor'st again, Stretchest thy limbs, and yawn'st, but all
in vain:

The tyrant Lucre no denial takes;
At his command th' unwilling sluggard wakes.

"What must I do?" he cries: "What?"
says his lord:

"Why rise, make ready, and go straight aboard;

With fish, from Euxine seas, thy vessel
freight;

Flax, castor, Coan wines, the precious
weight

Of pepper, and Sabæan incense, take
With thy own hands, from the tir'd camel's back: ²⁰⁰

And with posthaste thy running markets
make.

Be sure to turn the penny: lie and swear;
"Tis wholesome sin." "But Jove," thou say'st, "will hear."

"Swear, fool, or starve; for the dilemma's
even:

A tradesman thou! and hope to go to heav'n?"

Resolv'd for sea, the slaves thy baggage pack,

Each saddled with his burden on his back;
Nothing retards thy voyage, now, unless Thy other lord forbids, Voluptuousness:
And he may ask this civil question:

"Friend, ²¹⁰
What dost thou make a-shipboard? to what end?

Art thou of Bethlem's noble college free?
Stark, staring mad, that thou wouldst tempt the sea?

Cubb'd in a cabin, on a mattress laid,
 On a brown george, with lousy swabbers
 fed,
 Dead wine, that stinks of the borachio,
 sup
 From a foul jack, or greasy maple cup?
 Say, wouldst thou bear all this, to raise thy
 store
 From six i' th' hundred, to six hundred
 more?
 Indulge, and to thy Genius freely give; ²²⁰
 For, not to live at ease, is not to live;
 Death stalks behind thee, and each flying
 hour
 Does some loose remnant of thy life devour.
 Live, while thou liv'st; for death will make us all
 A name, a nothing but an old wife's tale."
 Speak; wilt thou Avarice, or Pleasure
 choose
 To be thy lord? Take one, and one refuse.
 But both, by turns, the rule of thee will
 have,
 And thou, bewixt 'em both, wilt be a slave.
 Nor think, when once thou hast resisted
 one, ²³⁰
 That all thy marks of servitude are gone:
 The struggling greyhound gnaws his leash
 in vain,
 If, when 't is broken, still he drags the chain.
 Says Phædria ²¹ to his man: "Believe me,
 friend,
 To this uneasy love I'll put an end.
 Shall I run out of all? my friends dis-
 grace,
 And be the first lewd unthrift of my race?
 Shall I the neighbors' nightly rest invade
 At her deaf doors, with some vile serenade?"
 "Well hast thou freed thyself," his man
 replies, ²⁴⁰
 "Go, thank the gods, and offer sacrifice."
 "Ah," says the youth, "if we unkindly
 part,
 Will not the poor fond creature break her
 heart?"
 "Weak soul! and blindly to destruction
 led!
 She break her heart! she'll sooner break
 your head.
 She knows her man, and when you rant and
 swear,

Can draw you to her with a single hair."
 "But shall I not return? Now, when she sues,
 Shall I my own, and her desires refuse?"
 "Sir, take your course; but my advice is plain: ²⁵⁰
 Once freed, 't is madness to resume your chain."
 Ay; there's the man, who, loos'd from lust and pelf,
 Less to the prætor owes, than to himself.
 But write him down a slave, who, humbly
 proud,
 With presents begs preferments from the
 crowd;
 That early suppliant, ²² who salutes the
 tribes,
 And sets the mob to scramble for his bribes,
 That some old dotard, sitting in the sun,
 On holidays may tell that such a feat was
 done:
 In future times this will be counted rare. ²⁶⁰
 Thy superstition too may claim a share:
 When flow'rs are strew'd, and lamps in order plac'd,
 And windows with illuminations grac'd,
 On Herod's day; ²³ when sparkling bowls go
 round,
 And tunny's tails in savory sauce are
 drown'd,
 Thou mutter'st prayers obscene; nor dost refuse
 The fasts and Sabbaths of the curtail'd Jews.
 Then a crack'd eggshell thy sick fancy
 frights, ²⁴
 Besides the childish fear of walking sprites.
 Of o'ergrown gelding priests thou art afraid; ²⁷⁰
 The timbrel, and the squintifego maid
 Of Isis, awe thee; lest the gods, for sin, Should with a swelling dropsy stuff thy
 skin:
 Unless three garlic heads the curse avert,
 Eaten each morn, devoutly, next thy heart.
 "Preach this among the brawny guards," say'st thou,
 "And see if they thy doctrine will allow:"
 The dull fat captain, with a hound's deep
 throat,
 Would bellow out a laugh, in a bass
 note;
 And prize a hundred Zenos just as much ²⁸⁰
 As a clipp'd sixpence, or a schilling Dutch.

EXPLANATORY NOTES ON THE FIFTH SATIRE

1 Progne was wife to Tereus, King of Thracia. Tereus fell in love with Philomela, sister to Progne, ravish'd her, and cut out her tongue; in revenge of which, Progne kill'd Itys, her own son by Tereus, and serv'd him up at a feast, to be eaten by his father.

2 Thyestes and Atræus were brothers, both kings. Atræus, to revenge himself of his unnatural brother, kill'd the sons of Thyestes, and invited him to eat them.

3 By the childish robe is meant the prætexta, or first gowns which the Roman children of quality wore. These were welted with purple, and on those welts were fasten'd the bullæ, or little bells; which, when they came to the age of puberty, were hung up, and consecrated to the Lares, or household gods.

4 The first shields which the Roman youths wore were white, and without any impress or device on them, to shew they had yet achiev'd nothing in the wars.

5 Socrates, by the oracle, was declar'd to be the wisest of mankind: he instructed many of the Athenian young noblemen in morality, and amongst the rest Alcibiades.

6 Astrologers divide the heaven into twelve parts, according to the number of the twelve signs of the zodiac. The sign, or constellation, which rises in the east at the birth of any man, is call'd the Ascendant: Persius therefore judges that Cornutus and he had the same or a like nativity.

7 The sign of Gemini.

8 The sign of Libra.

9 Astrologers have an axiom that whatsoever Saturn ties is loos'd by Jupiter. They account Saturn to be a planet of a malevolent nature, and Jupiter of a propitious influence.

10 Zeno was the great master of the Stoic philosophy, and Cleanthes was second to him in reputation. Cornutus, who was master or tutor to Persius, was of the same school.

11 When a slave was made free, he had the privilege of a Roman born; which was to have a share in the donatives, or doles of bread, &c., which were distributed by the magistrates amongst the people.

12 The Roman people was distributed into several tribes. He who was made free was in-roll'd into some one of them, and thereupon enjoy'd the common privileges of a Roman citizen.

13 The master who intended to enfranchise a slave carried him before the city prætor, and turn'd him round, using these words: "I will that this man be free."

14 Slaves had only one name before their freedom; after it they were admitted to a prænomen, like our christen'd names: so Dama is now call'd Marcus Dama.

15 At the proof of a testament, the magistrates were to subscribe their names, as allowing the legality of the will.

16 Slaves, when they were set free, had a cap given them, in sign of their liberty.

17 Brutus freed the Roman people from the tyranny of the Tarquins, and chang'd the form of the government into a glorious commonwealth.

18 The text of the Roman laws was written in red letters, which was call'd the Rubric; translated here, in more general words, "The letter of the law."

19 The Stoics held this paradox, that any one vice, or notorious folly, which they call'd madness, hinder'd a man from being virtuous; that a man was of a piece, without a mixture, either wholly vicious, or good; one virtue or vice, according to them, including all the rest.

20 The prætor held a wand in his hand, with which he softly struck the slave on the head, when he declar'd him free.

21 This alludes to the play of Terence, call'd The Eunuch; which was excellently imitated of late in English, by Sir Charles Sedley. In the first scene of that comedy Phædria was introduc'd with his man, Pamphilus, discoursing whether he should leave his mistress Thais, or return to her, now that she had invited him.

22 He who sued for any office amongst the Romans was call'd a candidate, because he wore a white gown; and sometimes chalk'd it, to make it appear whiter. He rose early, and went to the levees of those who headed the people; saluted also the tribes severally, when they were gather'd together to choose their magistrates; and distributed a largess amongst them, to bribe them for their voices; much resembling our elections of Parliament-men.

23 The commentators are divided what Herod this was, whom our author mentions; whether Herod the Great, whose birthday might possibly be celebrated, after his death, by the Herodians, a sect amongst the Jews, who thought him their Messiah; or Herod Agrippa, living in the author's time and after it. The latter seems the more probable opinion.

24 The ancients had a superstition, contrary to ours, concerning eggshells: they thought that if an eggshell were crack'd, or a hole bor'd in the bottom of it, they were subject to the power of sorcery. We as vainly break the bottom of an eggshell, and cross it, when we have eaten the egg, lest some hag should make use of it in bewitching us, or sailing over the sea in it, if it were whole.

The rest, of the priests of Isis, and her one-eyed or squinting priestess, is more largely treated in the Sixth Satire of Juvenal, where the superstitions of women are related.

THE SIXTH SATIRE OF PERSIUS

TO CÆSIUS BASSUS, A LYRIC POET

THE ARGUMENT

This Sixth Satire treats an admirable commonplace of moral philosophy; of the true use of riches. They are certainly intended, by the power who bestows them, as instruments and helps of living commodiously ourselves, and of administ'ring to the wants of others who are oppress'd by fortune. There are two extremes in the opinions of men concerning them. One error, tho' on the right hand, yet a great one, is that they are no helps to a virtuous life; the other places all our happiness in the acquisition and possession of them; and this is, undoubtedly, the worse extreme. The mean betwixt these is the opinion of the Stoics; which is that riches may be useful to the leading a virtuous life, in case we rightly understand how to give according to right reason; and how to receive what is given us by others. The virtue of giving well is call'd liberality; and 'tis of this virtue that Persius writes in this satire, wherein he not only shews the lawful use of riches, but also sharply inveighs against the vices which are oppos'd to it; and especially of those which consist in the defects of giving or spending, or in the abuse of riches. He writes to Cæsius Bassus, his friend, and a poet also; enquires first of his health and studies, and afterwards informs him of his own, and where he is now resident. He gives an account of himself, that he is endeavoring by little and little to wear off his vices; and particularly, that he is combating ambition and the desire of wealth. He dwells upon the latter vice; and being sensible that few men either desire or use riches as they ought, he endeavors to convince them of their folly; which is the main design of the whole satire.

HAS winter caus'd thee, friend, to change
thy seat,

And seek, in Sabine air,¹ a warm retreat?
Say, dost thou yet the Roman harp command?

Do the strings answer to thy noble hand?
Great master of the Muse, inspir'd to sing
The beauties of the first created spring;
The pedigree of nature to rehearse,
And sound the Maker's work, in equal
verse;

Now sporting on thy lyre² the loves of
youth,

Now virtuous age, and venerable truth; ¹⁰
ing justly Sappho's wanton art
Of odes, and Pindar's more majestic part.

For me, my warmer constitution wants
More cold, than our Ligurian winter grants;
And therefore, to my native shores re-
tir'd,

I view the coast old Ennius once admir'd;

Where cliffs on either side their points display;
And, after opening in an ampler way,
Afford the pleasing prospect of the bay.

"Tis worth your while, O Romans, to regard ²⁰

The Port of Luna," says our learned
bard;

Who, in a drunken dream,³ beheld his
soul

The fifth within the transmigrating roll;
Which first a peacock, then Euphorbus
was,

Then Homer next, and next Pythagoras;
And last of all the line did into Ennius
pass.

Secure and free from business of the State,

And more secure of what the vulgar prate,
Here I enjoy my private thoughts, nor
care

What rots for sheep the southern winds prepare; ³⁰

Survey the neighb'ring fields, and not re-
pine,

When I behold a larger crop than mine.

To see a beggar's brat in riches flow,

Adds not a wrinkle to my even brow;

Nor, envious at the sight, will I forbear

My plenteous bowl, nor bate my bounteous
cheer;

Nor yet unseal the dregs of wine that stink

Of cask, nor in a nasty flagon drink:

Let others stuff their guts with homely
fare;

For men of diff'rent inclinations are, ⁴⁰

Tho' born, perhaps, beneath one common star.

In minds and manners twins oppos'd we
see

In the same sign, almost the same degree:

One, frugal, on his birthday fears to
dine,

Does at a penny's cost in herbs repine,
And hardly dares to dip his fingers in the brine;

Prepar'd as priest of his own rites to stand,
He sprinkles pepper with a sparing hand.

His jolly brother, opposite in sense,

Laughs at his thrift; and, lavish of expense, ⁵⁰

Quaffs, crams, and guttles in his own defense.

For me, I'll use my own, and take my share,
 Yet will not turbots for my slaves prepare;
 Nor be so nice in taste myself, to know
 If what I swallow be a thrush, or no.
 Live on thy annual income! Spend thy store,
 And freely grind from thy full threshing floor:
 Next harvest promises as much, or more.
 Thus I would live; but friendship's holy band,
 And offices of kindness, hold my hand: 60
 My friend is shipwreck'd on ' the Bruttian strand,
 His riches in th' Ionian main are lost;
 And he himself stands shiv'ring on the coast;
 Where, destitute of help, forlorn, and bare,
 He wearies the deaf gods with fruitless pray'r.
 Their images, the relics of the wrack,
 Torn from the naked poop, are tid'd back
 By the wild waves; and, rudely thrown ashore,
 Lie impotent, nor can themselves restore.
 The vessel sticks, and shews her open'd side, 70
 And on her shatter'd mast the mews in triumph ride.
 From thy new hope,⁵ and from thy growing store,
 Now lend assistance, and relieve the poor.
 Come, do a noble act of charity;
 A pittance of thy land will set him free.
 Let him not bear the badges of a wrack,
 Nor beg with a blue table⁶ on his back;
 Nor tell me that thy frowning heir will say:
 " 'Tis mine, that wealth thou squander'st thus away."
 What is 't to thee, if he neglects thy urn, 80
 Or without spices⁷ lets thy body burn?
 If odors to thy ashes he refuse,
 Or buys corrupted cassia from the Jews?
 " All these," the wiser Bestius will reply,
 " Are empty pomp, and dead men's luxury."
 We never knew this vain expense, before
 Th' effeminated Grecians brought it o'er:
 Now toys and trifles from their Athens come,
 And dates and pepper have unsinew'd Rome.

Our sweating hinds their salads, now, defile,
 Infecting homely herbs with fragrant oil. 90
 But to thy fortune be not thou a slave,
 For what hast thou to fear beyond the grave?
 And thou who gap'st for my estate, draw near;
 For I would whisper somewhat in thy ear.
 Hear'st thou the news, my friend? Th' express is come
 With laurel'd letters from the camp to Rome:
 Cæsar salutes⁸ the queen and senate thus:
 " My arms are on the Rhine victorious.
 From mourning altars sweep the dust away: 100
 Cease fasting, and proclaim a fat thanksgiving day."
 The goodly empress,⁹ jollily inclin'd,
 Is to the welcome bearer wondrous kind;
 And, setting her good housewif'ry aside,
 Prepares for all the pageantry of pride.
 The captive Germans,¹⁰ of gigantic size,
 Are rank'd in order, and are clad in frize.
 The spoils of kings and conquer'd camps we boast,
 Their arms in trophies hang on the triumphal post.
 Now, for so many glorious actions done 110
 In foreign parts, and mighty battles won;
 For peace at home, and for the public wealth,
 I mean to crown a bowl to Cæsar's health:
 Besides, in gratitude for such high matters,
 Know, I have vow'd two hundred gladiators.¹¹
 Say, wouldst thou hinder me from this expense?
 I disinherit thee, if thou dar'st take offense.
 Yet more, a public largess I design
 Of oil and pies, to make the people dine:
 Control me not, for fear I change my will. 120
 And yet methinks I hear thee grumbling still:
 " You give as if you were the Persian king;
 Your land does no such large revenues bring."
 Well, on my terms thou wilt not be my heir;

If thou car'st little, less shall be my care:

Were none of all my father's sisters left;
Nay, were I of my mother's kin bereft;
None by an uncle's or a grandam's side,
Yet I could some adopted heir provide. ¹²⁹
I need but take my journey half a day
From haughty Rome, and at Aricia stay, Where fortune throws poor Manius in
my way. }

Him will I choose. "What; him, of humble birth,

Obscure, a foundling, and a son of earth?"
Obscure! Why pry'st thou what am I? I know

My father, grandsire, and great grandsire too:

If farther I derive my pedigree,
I can but guess beyond the fourth degree.
The rest of my forgotten ancestors Were sons of earth, like him, or sons of whores. ¹⁴⁰

Yet why shouldst thou, old covetous wretch, aspire

To be my heir, who mightst have been my sire?

In nature's race, shouldst thou demand of me

My torch,¹² when I in course run after thee?

Think I approach thee like the God of Gain,

With wings on head and heels, as poets feign:

Thy mod'rate fortune from my gift receive;
Now fairly take it, or as fairly leave;
But take it as it is, and ask no more.

"What, when thou hast embezzled all thy store?" ¹⁵⁰

Where's all thy father left?" 'Tis true, I grant,

Some I have mortgag'd, to supply my want:
The legacies of Tadius too are flown;

All spent, and on the selfsame errand gone.

"How little then to my poor share will fall!"

Little indeed; but yet that little's all.

Nor tell me, in a dying father's tone:

"Be careful still of the main chance, my son;

Put out the principal in trusty hands:
Live of the use; and never dip thy lands." ¹⁶⁰

"But yet what's left for me?" What's left, my friend!

Ask that again, and all the rest I spend.

Is not my fortune at my own command?

Pour oil, and pour it with a plenteous hand,

Upon my salads, boy: shall I be fed

With sodden nettles, and a sing'd sow's head?

'Tis holiday; provide me better cheer;

'Tis holiday, and shall be round the year.

Shall I my household gods and genius cheat,

To make him rich, who grudges me my meat, ¹⁷⁰

That he may loll at ease; and, pamper'd high,

When I am laid, may feed on gible pie?

And, when his throbbing lust extends the vein,

Have wherewithal his whores to entertain?

Shall I in homespun cloth be clad, that he
His paunch in triumph may before him see?

Go, miser, go; for lucre sell thy soul;

Truck wares for wares, and trudge from pole to pole,

That men may say, when thou art dead and gone:

"See what a vast estate he left his son! ¹⁸⁰

How large a family of brawny knaves,

Well fed, and fat as Cappadocian slaves!" ¹⁸

Encrease thy wealth, and double all thy store.

'Tis done: now double that and swell the score;

To ev'ry thousand add ten thousand more.

Then say, Chrysippus,¹⁴ thou who wouldst confine

Thy heap, where I shall put an end to mine.

EXPLANATORY NOTES ON THE SIXTH SATIRE

1 And seek, in Sabine air, &c. All the studious, and particularly the poets, about the end of August, began to set themselves on work, refraining from writing during the heats of the summer. They wrote by night, and sate up the greatest part of it; for which reason the product of their studies was call'd their elucubrations, or nightly labors. They who had country seats retir'd to them while they studied, as Persius did to his, which was near the Port of the Moon in Etruria; and Bassus to his, which was in the country of the Sabines, nearer Rome.

2 Now sporting on thy lyre, &c. This proves

Cæsius Bassus to have been a lyric poet. 'Tis said of him that by an eruption of the flaming mountain Vesuvius, near which the greatest part of his fortune lay, he was burnt himself, together with all his writings.

3 Who, in a drunken dream, &c. I call it a drunken dream of Ennius; not that my author in this place gives me any encouragement for the epithet, but because Horace and all who mention Ennius say he was an excessive drinker of wine. In a dream, or vision, call you it which you please, he thought it was reveal'd to him that the soul of Pythagoras was transmigrated into him; as Pythagoras before him believ'd that himself had been Euphorbus in the wars of Troy. Commentators differ in placing the order of this soul, and who had it first. I have here given it to the peacock, because it looks more according to the order of nature that it should lodge in a creature of an inferior species, and so by gradation rise to the informing of a man. And Persius favors me, by saying that Ennius was the fifth from the Pythagorean peacock.

4 My friend is shipwreck'd on, &c. Perhaps this is only a fine transition of the poet, to introduce the business of the satire; and not that any such accident had happen'd to one of the friends of Persius. But, however, this is the most poetical description of any in our author; and since he and Lucan were so great friends, I know not but Lucan might help him in two or three of these verses, which seem to be written in his style: certain it is, that besides this description of a shipwreck, and two lines more, which are at the end of the Second Satire, our poet has written nothing elegantly. I will therefore transcribe both the passages, to justify my opinion. The following are the last verses, saving one, of the Second Satire:

*Compositum jus, fuscque animi; sanctusque recessus
Mentis, et incoctum generoso pectus honesto.*

The others are those in this present satire, which are subjoin'd:

— *trabe rupta, Bruttii saxa
Prendit amicus inops: remque omnem, surdague vota Condidit Ionio, jacet ipse in littore, et una Ingentes de puppe Dei, jamque obvia mergis
Costa ratis lacere.*

5 From thy new hope, &c. The Latin is, Nunc et de cespite vivo frange aliquid. Casaubon only opposes the cespes vives, which, word for word, is the living turf, to the harvest, or annual income; I suppose the poet rather means, sell a piece of land already sown, and give the money of it to my friend, who has lost all by shipwreck; that is, do not stay till thou hast reap'd, but help him immediately, as his wants require.

6 Not beg with a blue table, &c. Holyday translates it a green table. The sense is the same, for the table was painted of the sea-color, which the shipwreck'd person carried on his back, expressing his losses thereby, to excite the charity of the spectators.

7 Or without spices, &c. The bodies of the rich, before they were burnt, were imbalmd with spices; or rather spices were put into the urn with the relics of the ashes. Our author here names cinnamon and cassia, which cassia was sophisticated with cherry gum, and probably enough by the Jews, who adulterate all things which they sell. But whether the ancients were acquainted with the spices of the Molucca Islands, Ceylon, and other parts of the Indies, or whether their pepper and cinnamon, &c., were the same with ours, is another question. As for nutmegs and mace, 't is plain that the Latin names of them are modern.

8 Cæsar salutes, &c. The Cæsar here mention'd is Caius Caligula, who affected to triumph over the Germans, whom he never conquer'd, as he did over the Britains; and accordingly sent letters, wrapp'd about with laurels, to the senate and the Empress Cæsonia, whom I here call queen, tho' I know that name was not us'd amongst the Romans; but the word empress would not stand in that verse, for which reason I adjourn'd it to another. The dust which was to be swept away from the altars, was either the ashes which were left there after the last sacrifice for victory, or might perhaps mean the dust or ashes which were left on the altars since some former defeat of the Romans by the Germans; after which overthrow the altars had been neglected.

9 Cæsonia, wife to Caius Caligula, who afterwards, in the reign of Claudius, was propos'd, but ineffectually, to be married to him, after he had executed Messalina for adultery.

10 The captive Germans, &c. He means only such as were to pass for Germans in the triumph, large-bodied men, as they are still, whom the empress cloth'd new, with coarse garments, for the greater ostentation of the victory.

11 Now, I have vow'd two hundred gladiators. A hundred pair of gladiators were beyond the purse of a private man to give; therefore this is only a threat'ning to his heir, that he could do what he pleas'd with his estate.

12 Shouldst thou demand of me my torch, &c. Why shouldst thou, who art an old fellow, hope to outlive me, and be my heir, who am much younger? He who was first in the course, or race, deliver'd the torch which he carried to him who was second.

13 Well fed, and fat as Cappadocian slaves !'' Who were famous for their lustiness, and being, as we call it, in good liking. They were set on a stall when they were expos'd to sale, to shew the good habit of their body; and made to play tricks before the buyers, to shew their activity and strength.

14 Then say, Chrysippus, &c. Chrysippus, the Stoic, invented a kind of argument, consisting of more than three propositions, which is call'd sorites, or a heap. But as Chrysippus could never bring his propositions to a certain stint, so neither can a covetous man bring his craving desires to any certain measure of riches, beyond which he could not wish for any more.

POEMS INCLUDED IN EXAMEN POETICUM (THE THIRD MISCELLANY), 1693

Hæc potior soboles: hinc cæli tempore certo, Dulcia mella premes. — VIRGIL, Geor. IV.

In medium quesita reponunt. — Ibid.

Dryden's translations from the Metamorphoses occupy the place of honor in the volume. Besides the material printed below, the collection contains the first edition of some minor pieces by Dryden, which have been printed above in their probable chronological order (see pp. 20, 102, 104, 106, 252, 267, above); and reprints of some of his earlier work, notably his Ode to Mrs. Anne Killigrew (see p. 211, above). Among the other contributors to the volume were the Earl of Mulgrave, Prior, Congreve, Granville, Henry Cromwell, and Yalden.

Two slightly different issues of this first edition are known; the variations apparently do not affect Dryden's work. A second edition, with title unchanged, appeared in 1706; and a third, with title-page reading, The Third Part of Miscellany Poems . . . Publish'd by Mr. Dryden, in 1716. The second edition omits nearly all Dryden's poetical contributions; the third has a still different table of contents.]

TO THE

RIGHT HONORABLE MY LORD
RADCLIFFE

MY LORD,

THESE Miscellany Poems are by many titles yours. The first they claim from your acceptance of my promise to present them to you, before some of them were yet in being. The rest are deriv'd from your own merit, the exactness of your judgment in poetry, and the candor of your nature; easy to forgive some trivial faults, when they come accompanied with countervailing beauties. But, after all, tho' these are your equitable claims to a dedication from other poets, yet I must acknowledge a bribe in the case, which is your particular liking of my verses. 'Tis a vanity common to all writers, to overvalue their own productions; and 't is better for me to own this failing in myself, than the world to do it for me. For what other reason have I spent my life in so unprofitable a study? Why am I grown old in seeking so barren a reward as fame? The same parts and application which have made me a poet might have rais'd me to any honors of the gown, which are often given to men of as little learning and less honesty than myself. No government has ever been, or ever can be, wherein timeservers and blockheads will not be uppermost. The persons are only chang'd, but the same jugglings in state, the same hypocrisy in religion, the same self-interest and mismanagement, will remain for ever. Blood and money will be lavish'd in all ages, only for the preferment of new faces, with old consciences. There is too often a jaundice in the eyes of great men; they see not those whom they raise in the same colors with other men. All whom they affect look golden to them, when the gilding is only in their own distemper'd sight. These considerations have given me a kind of contempt for those who have risen by unworthy ways. I am not asham'd to be little, when I see them so infamously great; neither do I know why the name of poet should be dishonorable to me, if I am truly one, as I hope I am; for I will never do anything that shall dishonor it. The notions of morality are known to all men; none can pretend ignorance of those ideas which are inborn in mankind: and if I see one thing and practice the contrary, I must be disingenuous, not to acknowledge a clear truth; and base, to act against the light of my own conscience. For the reputation of my honesty, no man can question it, who has any of his own; for that of my poetry, it shall either stand by its own merit, or fall for want of it. Ill writers are usually the sharpest censors; for they, as the best poet and the best patron said:

When in the full perfection of decay,
Turn vinegar, and come again in play.

Thus the corruption of a poet is the generation of a critic: I mean of a critic in the general acceptance of this age, for formerly they were quite another species of men. They were defenders of poets, and commentators on their works; to illustrate obscure beauties; to place some passages in a better light; to redeem others from malicious interpretations; to help out an author's modesty, who is not ostentatious of his wit, and, in short, to shield him from the ill nature of those fellows, who were then call'd Zoili and Morni, and now take upon themselves the venerable name of censors. But neither Zoilius, nor he who endeavor'd to defame Virgil, were ever adopted into the name of critics by the ancients: what their reputation was then, we know; and their successors in this age deserve no better. Are our auxiliary forces turn'd our enemies? Are they, who at best are but wits of the second order, and whose only credit amongst readers is what they obtain'd by being subservient to the fame of writers; are these become rebels of slaves, and usurpers of subjects? or, to speak in the most honorable terms of them, are they from our seconds become principals against us? Does the ivy undermine the oak, which supports its weakness? What labor would it cost them to put in a better line than the worst of those which they expunge in a true poet! Petronius, the greatest wit perhaps of all the Romans, yet when his envy prevail'd upon his judgment to fall on Lucan, he fell himself in his attempt: he perform'd worse in his Essay of the Civil War, than the author of the Pharsalia; and, avoiding his errors, has made greater of his own. Julius Scaliger would needs turn down Homer, and abdicate him after the possession of three thousand years. Has he succeeded in his attempt? He has indeed shown us some of those imperfections in him, which are incident to human-kind; but who had not rather be that Homer than this Scaliger? You see the same hyper-critic, when he endeavors to mend the beginning of Claudian (a faulty poet, and living in a barbarous age), yet how short he comes of him, and substitutes such verses of his own as deserve the ferula. What a censure has he made of Lucan, that he rather seems to bark than sing! Would any but a dog have made so snarling a comparison? One would have thought he had learn'd Latin, as late as they tell us he did Greek. Yet he came off with a pace tua, by your good leave, Lucan; he call'd him not by those outrageous names, of fool, booby, and blockhead: he had somewhat more of good manners than his successors, as he had much more knowledge. We have two sorts of those gentlemen in our nation: some of them, proceeding with a seeming moderation and pretense of respect to the dramatic writers of the last age, only scorn and vilify the present poets, to set up their predecessors. But this is only in appearance; for their real design is nothing less than to do honor to any man besides themselves. Horace took notice of such men in his age:

— Non ingenuis favet ille sepultis;

Nostra sed impugnat; nos nostraque lividus odit.

'Tis not with an ultimate intention to pay reverence to the manes of Shakespeare, Fletcher, and Ben Jonson, that they commend their writings, but to throw dirt on the writers of this age: their declaration is one thing, and their practice is another. By a seeming veneration to our fathers, they would thrust out us, their lawful issue, and govern us themselves, under a specious pretense of reformation. If they could compass their intent, what would wit and learning get by such a change? If we are bad poets, they are worse; and when any of their woful pieces come abroad, the difference is so great betwixt them and good writers, that there need no criticisms on our part to decide it. When they describe the writers of this age, they draw such monstrous figures of them, as resemble none of us; our pretended pictures are so unlike, that 'tis evident we never sate to them: they are all grotesque; the products of their wild imaginations, things out of nature, so far from being copied from us, that they resemble nothing that ever was, or ever can be. But there is another sort of insects, more venomous than the former: those who manifestly aim at the destruction of our poetical Church and State; who allow nothing to their countrymen, either of this or of the former age. These attack the living by raking up the ashes of the dead; well knowing that if they can subvert their original title to the stage, we who claim under them must fall of course. Peace be to the venerable shades of Shakespeare and Ben Jonson! None of the living will presume to have any competition with them: as they were our predecessors, so they were our masters. We trail our plays under them, but (as at the funerals of a Turkish emperor) our ensigns are furl'd or dragg'd upon the ground, in honor to the dead; so we may lawfully advance our own, afterwards, to show that we succeed: if less in dignity, yet on the same foot and title, which we think too we can maintain against the insolence of our own janizaries. If I am the man, as I have reason to believe, who am seemingly courted, and secretly undermin'd, I think I shall be able to defend myself, when I am openly attack'd; and to shew besides that the Greek writers only gave us the rudiments of a stage, which they never finish'd; that many of the tragedies in the former age amongst us were without comparison beyond those of Sophocles and Euripides. But at present, I have neither the leisure nor the means for such an undertaking. 'Tis ill going to law for an estate with him who is in possession of it and enjoys the present profits to feed his cause. But the quantum mutatus may be remember'd in due time. In the mean while, I leave the world to judge who gave the provocation.

This, my Lord, is, I confess, a long digression, from Miscellaneous Poems to Modern Tragedies; but I have the ordinary excuse of an

injur'd man, who will be telling his tale unseasonably to his betters: tho', at the same time, I am certain you are so good a friend, as to take a concern in all things which belong to one who so truly honors you. And besides, being yourself a critic of the genuine sort, who have read the best authors in their own languages, who perfectly distinguish of their several merits, and in general prefer them to the moderns, yet, I know, you judge for the English tragedies against the Greek and Latin, as well as against the French, Italian, and Spanish, of these latter ages. Indeed there is a vast difference betwixt arguing like Perrault in behalf of the French poets, against Homer and Virgil, and betwixt giving the English poets their undoubted due of excell'g Æschylus, Euripides, and Sophocles. For if we, or our greater fathers, have not yet brought the drama to an absolute perfection, yet at least we have carried it much farther than those ancient Greeks: who, beginning from a chorus, could never totally exclude it, as we have done, who find it an unprofitable incumbrance, without any necessity of entertaining it amongst us; and without the possibility of establishing it here, unless it were supported by a public charge. Neither can we accept of those lay bishops, as some call them, who, under pretense of reforming the stage, would intrude themselves upon us as our superiors, being indeed incompetent judges of what is manners, what religion, and, least of all, what is poetry and good sense. I can tell them, in behalf of all my fellows, that when they come to exercise a jurisdiction over us, they shall have the stage to themselves, as they have the laurel. As little can I grant that the French dramatic writers excel the English: our authors as far surpass them in genius, as our soldiers excel theirs in courage. 'Tis true, in conduct they surpass us either way; yet that proceeds not so much from their greater knowledge, as from the difference of tastes in the two nations. They content themselves with a thin design, without episodes, and manag'd by few persons. Our audience will not be pleas'd but with variety of accidents, an underplot, and many actors. They follow the ancients too servilely in the mechanic rules, and we assume too much license to ourselves, in keeping them only in view at too great a distance. But if our audience had their tastes, our poets could more easily comply with them than the French writers could come up to the sublimity of our thoughts, or to the difficult variety of our designs. However it be, I dare establish it for a rule of practice on the stage, that we are bound to please those whom we pretend to entertain; and that at any price, religion and good manners only excepted; and I care not much if I give this handle to our bad illiterate poetasters, for the defense of their scriptions, as they call them. There is a sort of merit in delighting the spectators; which is a name more proper for them than that of auditors; or else Horace is in the wrong, when he commends Lucilius for it. But these commonplaces I mean to treat at greater leisure: in the mean time, submitting that little I have said to your Lordship's approbation, or your censure, and choosing rather to entertain you this way, as you are a judge of writing, than to oppress your modesty with other commendations; which, tho' they are your due, yet would not be equally receiv'd in this satirical and censorious age. That which cannot without injury be denied to you is the easiness of your conversation, far from affectation or pride, not denying even to enemies their just praises. And this, if I would dwell on any theme of this nature, is no vulgar commendation to your Lordship. Without flattery, my Lord, you have it in your nature to be a patron and encourager of good poets, but your fortune has not yet put into your hands the opportunity of expressing it. What you will be hereafter, may be more than guess'd by what you are at present. You maintain the character of a nobleman, without that haughtiness which generally attends too many of the nobility; and when you converse with gentlemen, you forget not that you have been of their order. You are married to the daughter of a king, who, amongst her other high perfections, has deriv'd from him a charming behavior, a winning goodness, and a majestic person. The Muses and the Graces are the ornaments of your family. While the Muse sings, the Grace accompanies her voice: even the servants of the Muse have sometimes had the happiness to hear her, and to receive their inspirations from her.

I will not give myself the liberty of going farther; for 'tis so sweet to wander in a pleasing way, that I should never arrive at my journey's end. To keep myself from being belated in my letter, and tiring your attention, I must return to the place where I was setting out. I humbly dedicate to your Lordship my own labors in this Miscellany; at the same time, not arrogating to myself the privilege of inscribing to you the works of others who are join'd with me in this undertaking, over which I can pretend no right. Your Lady and you have done me the favor to hear me read my translations of Ovid, and you both seem'd not to be displeas'd with them. Whether it be the partiality of an old man to his youngest child, I know not; but they appear to me the best of all my endeavors in this kind. Perhaps this poet is more easy to be translated than some others whom I have lately attempted; perhaps, too, he was more according to my genius. He is certainly more palatable to the reader than any of the Roman wits, tho' some of them are more lofty, some more instructive, and others more correct. He had learning enough to make him equal in the best. But, as his verse came easily, he wanted the toil of application to amend it. He is often luxuriant both in his fancy and expressions, and, as it has lately been observ'd, not always natural. If wit be pleasantry, he has it to excess; but if it be propriety, Lucretius, Horace, and, above all, Virgil are his superiors. I have said so much of him already, in my preface to his Heroical Epistles, that there remains little to be added in this place. For my own part, I have endeavor'd to copy his character what I could in this translation, even, perhaps, farther than I should have done; to his very faults. Mr. Chapman, in his translation of Homer, professes to have done it somewhat paraphrastically, and that on set purpose; his opinion being that a good poet is to be translated in that manner. I remember not the reason which he gives for it; but I suppose it is, for fear of omitting any of his excellencies: sure I am, that if it be a fault, 't is much more pardonable than that of those who run into the other extreme of a literal and close translation, where the poet is confin'd so straitly to his author's words that he wants elbowroom to express his elegancies. He leaves him obscure; he leaves him prose, where he found him verse: and no better than thus has Ovid been serv'd by the so much admir'd Sandys. This is at least the idea which I have remaining of his translation; for I never read him since I was a boy. They who take him upon content, from the praises which their fathers gave him, may inform their judgment by reading him again, and see (if they understand the original) what is become of Ovid's poetry, in his version; whether it be not all, or the greatest part of it, evaporated. But this proceeded from the wrong judgment of the age in which he liv'd. They neither knew good verse nor lov'd it; they were scholars, 't is true, but they were pedants. And for a just reward of their pedantic pains, all their translations want to be translated into English.

If I flatter not myself, or if my friends have not flatter'd me, I have given my author's sense for the most part truly: for to mistake sometimes is incident to all men, and not to follow the Dutch commentators always may be forgiven to a man who thinks them, in the general, heavy gross-witted fellows, fit only to gloss on their own dull poets. But I leave a farther satire on their wit, till I have a better opportunity to shew how much I love and honor them. I have likewise attempted to restore Ovid to his native sweetness, easiness, and smoothness; and to give my poetry a kind of cadence, and, as we call it, a run of verse, as like the original, as the English can come up to the Latin. As he seldom uses any synalephas, so I have endeavor'd to avoid them, as often as I could: I have likewise given him his own turns, both on the words and on the thought, which I cannot say are inimitable, because I have copied them; and so may others, if they use the same diligence: but certainly they are wonderfully graceful in this poet. Since I have nam'd the synalepha, which is the cutting off one vowel immediately before another, I will give an example of it from Chapman's Homer, which lies before me; for the benefit of those who understand not the Latin prosodia. 'T is in the first line of the argument to the first Iliad:

Apollo's priest to th' Argive fleet doth bring, &c.

There we see he makes it not the Argive, but th' Argive, to shun the shock of the two vowels immediately following each other. But in his second argument, in the same page, he gives a bad example of the quite contrary kind:

Alpha the pray'r of Chryses sings;
The army's plague, the strife of kings.

In these words the army's, the ending with a vowel, and army's beginning with another vowel, without cutting off the first, which by it had been th' army's, there remains a most horrible ill-sounding gap betwixt those words. I cannot say that I have everywhere observ'd the rule of this synalepha in my translation; but wheresoever I have not, 't is a fault in sound. The French and Italians have made it an inviolable precept in their versification, therein following the severe example of the Latin poets. Our countrymen have not yet reform'd their poetry so far, but content themselves with following the licentious practice of the Greeks; who, tho' they sometimes use synalephas, yet make no difficulty very often, to sound one vowel upon another; as Homer does in the very first line of Alpha:

Μῆνιν ἄειδε, θεά, Πηληϊάδεω Ἀχιλῆος.

'T is true, indeed, that in the second line, in these words μυρί' Ἀχαιοῖς, and ἄλγε' ἔθηκεν, the synalepha in revenge is twice observ'd. But it becomes us, for the sake of euphony, rather Musas colere severiores, with the Romans, than to give into the looseness of the Grecians.

I have tir'd myself, and have been summon'd by the press to send away this dedication; otherwise I had expos'd some other faults which are daily committed by our English poets; which, with care and observation, might be amended. For, after all, our language is both copious, significant, and majestic, and might be reduc'd into a more harmonious sound. But, for want of public encouragement, in this iron age, we are so far from making any progress in the improvement of our tongue, that in few years we shall speak and write as barbarously as our neighbors.

Notwithstanding my haste, I cannot forbear to tell your Lordship that there are two fragments of Homer translated in this Miscellany: one by Mr. Congreve (whom I cannot mention without the honor which is due to his excellent parts, and that entire affection which I bear him), and the other by myself. Both the subjects are pathetic, and I am sure my friend has added to the tenderness which he found in the original, and, without flattery, surpass'd his author. Yet I must needs say this in reference to Homer, that he is much more capable of exciting the manly passions than those of grief and pity. To cause admiration is indeed the proper and adequate design of an epic poem, and in that he has excell'd even Virgil; yet, without presuming to arraign our master, I may venture to affirm that he is somewhat too talkative, and more than somewhat too digressive. This is so manifest that it cannot be denied, in that little parcel which I have translated, perhaps too literally: there Andromache, in the midst of her concernment and fright for Hector, runs off her bias, to tell him a story of her pedigree, and of the lamentable death of her father, her mother, and her seven brothers. The devil was in Hector if he knew not all this matter, as well as she who told it him, for she had been his bedfellow for many years together; and if he knew it, then it must be confess'd that Homer, in this long digression, has rather given us his own character than that of the fair lady whom he paints. His dear friends the commentators, who never fail him at a pinch, will needs excuse him, by making the present sorrow of Andromache to occasion the remembrance of all the past; but others think that she had enough to do with that grief which now oppress'd her, without running for assistance to her family. Virgil, I am confident, would have omitted such a work of supererogation. But Virgil had the gift of expressing much in little, and sometimes in silence; for tho' he yielded much to Homer in invention, he more excell'd him in his admirable judgment. He drew the passion of Dido for Æneas in the most lively and most natural colors that are imaginable. Homer was ambitious enough of moving pity, for he has attempted twice on the same subject of Hector's death: first, when Priam and Hecuba beheld his corpse, which was dragg'd after the chariot of Achilles; and then in the lamentation which was made over him, when his body was redeem'd by Priam; and the same persons again bewail his death, with a chorus of others to help the cry. But if this last excite compassion in you, as I doubt not but it will, you are more oblig'd to the translator than the poet. For Homer, as I observ'd before, can move rage better than he can pity: he stirs up the irascible appetite, as our philosophers call it; he provokes to murder, and the destruction of God's images; he forms and equips those ungodly man-killers, whom we poets, when we flatter them, call heroes; a race of men who can never enjoy quiet in themselves, till they have taken it from all the world. This is Homer's commendation, and such as it is, the lovers of peace, or at least of more moderate heroism, will never envy him. But let Homer and Virgil contend for the prize of honor betwixt themselves, I am satisfied they will never have a third concurrent. I wish Mr. Congreve had the leisure to translate him, and the world the good nature and justice to encourage him in that noble design, of which he is more capable than any man I know. The Earl of Mulgrave and Mr. Waller, two the best judges of our age, have assur'd me that they could never read over the translation of Chapman without incredible pleasure and extreme transport. This admiration of theirs must needs proceed from the author himself; for the translator has thrown him down as low as harsh numbers, improper English, and a monstrous length of verse could carry him. What then would he appear in the harmonious version of one of the best writers, living in a much better age than was the last? I mean for versification, and the art of numbers; for in the drama we have not arriv'd to the pitch of Shakespeare and Ben Jonson. But here, my Lord, I am forc'd to break off abruptly, without endeavoring at a compliment in the close. This Miscellany is, without dispute, one of the best of the kind which has hitherto been extant in our tongue. At least, as Sir Samuel Tuke has said before me, a modest man may praise what's not his own. My fellows have no need of any protection, but I humbly recommend my part of it, as much as it deserves, to your patronage and acceptance, and all the rest to your forgiveness.

I am,

My Lord,

Your Lordship's most Obedient Servant,
JOHN DRYDEN.

THE FIRST BOOK

OF

OVID'S METAMORPHOSES

Of bodies chang'd to various forms I sing:
Ye gods, from whom these miracles did
spring,

Inspire my numbers with celestial heat;
Till I my long laborious work complete,
And add perpetual tenor to my rhymes,
Deduc'd from nature's birth to Cæsar's
times.

Before the seas, and this terrestrial ball,
And heav'n's high canopy, that covers all,
One was the face of nature, if a face;
Rather a rude and indigested mass; 10
A lifeless lump, unfashion'd, and unfram'd,
Of jarring seeds, and justly Chaos nam'd.
No sun was lighted up, the world to view;
No moon did yet her blunted horns renew:
Nor yet was earth suspended in the sky;
Nor, pois'd, did on her own foundations lie:
Nor seas about the shores their arms had
thrown,

But earth and air and water were in one.
Thus air was void of light, and earth unstable,

And water's dark abyss unnavigable. 20
No certain form on any was impress'd;
All were confus'd, and each disturb'd the
rest:

For hot and cold were in one body fix'd,
And soft with hard, and light with heavy
mix'd.

But God, or Nature, while they thus
contend,
To these intestine discords put an end.
Then earth from air, and seas from earth
were driv'n,

And grosser air sunk from ethereal heav'n.
Thus disembroil'd, they take their proper place;

The next of kin contiguously embrace, 30
And foes are sunder'd by a larger space. }
The force of fire ascended first on high,
And took its dwelling in the vaulted sky.
Then air succeeds, in lightness next to fire;
Whose atoms from unactive earth retire.
Earth sinks beneath, and draws a numerous throng

Of ponderous, thick, unwieldy seeds along.
About her coasts unruly waters roar,
And, rising on a ridge, insult the shore.
Thus when the God, whatever God was
he, 40

Had form'd the whole, and made the parts
agree,

That no unequal portions might be found,
He mold'd earth into a spacious round;
Then, with a breath, he gave the winds to
blow,
And bade the congregated waters flow.

He adds the running springs and standing lakes,
And bounding banks for winding rivers
makes.

Some part in earth are swallow'd up, the most

In ample oceans, disimbogued, are lost.

He shades the woods, the valleys he re-
strains 50

With rocky mountains, and extends the
plains.

And as five zones th' ethereal regions
bind,

Five, correspondent, are to earth assign'd:
The sun, with rays directly darting down,
Fires all beneath, and fries the middle zone:

The two beneath the distant poles com-
plain

Of endless winter, and perpetual rain.

Betwixt th' extremes, two happier climates
hold

The temper that partakes of hot and cold.
The fields of liquid air, inclosing all, 60

Surround the compass of this earthly ball;
The lighter parts lie next the fires above,
The grosser near the wat'ry surface move:

Thick clouds are spread, and storms engender there,

And thunder's voice, which wretched
mortals fear,

And winds that on their wings cold winter bear.

Nor were those blust'ring brethren left at large,

On seas and shores their fury to discharge:
Bound as they are, and circumscrib'd in
place,

They rend the world, resistless, where they
pass, 70

And mighty marks of mischief leave behind;

Such is the rage of their tempestuous kind.
First Eurus to the rising morn is sent,
(The regions of the balmy continent.)

And eastern realms, where early Persians
run

To greet the blest appearance of the sun.
Westward the wanton Zephyr wings his
flight,

Pleas'd with the remnants of departing
light:

Fierce Boreas with his offspring issues
forth,

T' invade the frozen Wagon of the North; &c

While frowning Auster seeks the southern
sphere,
And rots, with endless rain, th' unwholesome year.

High o'er the clouds, and empty realms
of wind,
The God a clearer space for heav'n design'd;
Where fields of light, and liquid ether flow,
Purg'd from the pond'rous dregs of earth
below.

Scarce had the pow'r distinguish'd these,
when straight
The stars, no longer overlaid with weight, Exert their heads from underneath the
mass,
And upward shoot, and kindle as they
pass,
And with diffusive light adorn their heav'nly place.

Then, every void of nature to supply,
With forms of gods he fills the vacant sky:
New herds of beasts he sends, the plains
to share;
New colonies of birds, to people air;
And to their oozy beds the finny fish repair.

A creature of a more exalted kind
Was wanting yet, and then was Man de-
sign'd;
Conscious of thought, of more capacious
breast,

For empire form'd, and fit to rule the rest:
Whether with particles of heav'nly fire
The God of Nature did his soul inspire;
Or earth, but new divided from the sky,
And pliant still, retain'd the ethereal energy;
Which wise Prometheus temper'd into paste,

And, mix'd with living streams, the god-
like image cast.

Thus, while the mute creation downward
bend

Their sight, and to their earthy mother
tend,

Man looks aloft, and with erected eyes
Beholds his own hereditary skies.
From such rude principles our form began,
And earth was metamorphos'd into man.

THE GOLDEN AGE

The Golden Age was first; when man, yet new,
No rule but uncorrupted reason knew;
And, with a native bent, did good pursue.

Unforc'd by punishment, unaw'd by fear,
His words were simple, and his soul sincere:
Needless was written law, where none op-
press'd;

The law of man was written in his breast;
No suppliant crowds before the judge ap-
pear'd;
No court erected yet, nor cause was
hear'd;
But all was safe, for conscience was their guard.

The mountain trees in distant prospect
please,

Ere yet the pine descended to the seas;
Ere sails were spread, new oceans to explore;

And happy mortals, unconcern'd for more,
Confin'd their wishes to their native
shore.

No walls were yet, nor fence, nor moat, nor mound;

Nor drum was heard, nor trumpet's angry
sound:

Nor swonies were forg'd; but, void of care
and crime,

The soft creation slept away their time.
The teeming earth, yet guiltless of the plow,

And unprovok'd, did fruitful stores allow:
Content with food, which nature freely
bred,

On wildings and on strawberries they fed;
Cornels and bramble berries gave the rest,
And falling acorns furnish'd out a feast.

The flow'rs, unsown, in fields and meadows
reign'd,

And western winds immortal spring main-
tain'd.

In following years the bearded corn ensued
From earth unask'd, nor was that earth
renew'd;

From veins of valleys milk and nectar
broke,

And honey sweating thro' the pores of oak.

THE SILVER AGE

But when good Saturn, banish'd from
above,
Was driv'n to hell, the world was under Jove.

Succeeding times a Silver Age behold,
Excelling brass, but more excell'd by gold.
Then Summer, Autumn, Winter did ap-
pear;

And Spring was but a season of the year.
 The sun his annual course obliquely made,
 Good days contracted, and enlarg'd the bad. ¹⁵¹
 Then air with sultry heats began to glow;
 The wings of winds were clogg'd with ice and snow;
 And shivering mortals, into houses driv'n, Sought shelter from th' inclemency of
 heav'n.
 Those houses, then, were caves, or homely sheds,
 With twining osiers fenc'd, and moss their beds.
 Then plows, for seed, the fruitful furrows
 broke,
 And oxen labor'd first beneath the yoke.

THE BRAZEN AGE

To this next came in course the Brazen
 Age: ¹⁶⁰
 A warlike offspring, prompt to bloody rage,
 Not impious yet —

THE IRON AGE

— Hard Steel succeeded then;
 And stubborn as the metal were the men.
 Truth, Modesty, and Shame, the world
 forsook;
 Fraud, Avarice, and Force, their places
 took.
 Then sails were spread to every wind that blew;
 Raw were the sailors, and the depths were
 new:
 Trees, rudely hollow'd, did the waves sus-
 tain,
 Ere ships in triumph plow'd the wat'ry
 plain.
 Then landmarks limited to each his right: ¹⁷⁰
 For all before was common as the light.
 Nor was the ground alone requir'd to bear
 Her annual income to the crooked share;
 But greedy mortals, rummaging her store,
 Digg'd from her entrails first the precious ore,
 Which next to hell the prudent gods had
 laid,
 And that alluring ill to sight display'd.
 Thus cursed steel, and more accursed gold,
 Gave mischief birth, and made that mischief bold;

And double death did wretched man invade, ¹⁸⁰
 By steel assaulted, and by gold betray'd.
 Now (brandish'd weapons glittering in their hands)
 Mankind is broken loose from moral bands;
 No rights of hospitality remain:
 The guest, by him who harbor'd him, is
 slain;
 The son-in-law pursues the father's life;
 The wife her husband murders, he the wife;
 The stepdame poison for the son prepares;
 The son inquires into his father's years.
 Faith flies, and Piety in exile mourns; ¹⁹⁰
 And Justice, here oppress'd, to heav'n returns.

THE GIANTS' WAR

Nor were the gods themselves more safe
 above:
 Against beleaguer'd heav'n the giants move.
 Hills pil'd on hills, on mountains mountains
 lie,
 To make their mad approaches to the sky.
 Till Jove, no longer patient, took his time
 T' avenge with thunder their audacious
 crime:
 Red lightning play'd along the firmament,
 And their demolish'd works to pieces rent.
 Sing'd with the flames, and with the bolts
 transfix'd, ²⁰⁰
 With native earth their blood the monsters
 mix'd;
 The blood, indued with animating heat,
 Did in th' impregnant earth new sons be-
 get:
 They, like the seed from which they sprung,
 accurst,
 Against the gods immortal hatred nurs'd:
 An impious, arrogant, and cruel brood;
 Expressing their original from blood.
 Which when the King of Gods beheld
 from high,
 (Withal revolving in his memory
 What he himself had found on earth of late, ²¹⁰
 Lycaon's guilt, and his inhuman treat.)
 He sigh'd, nor longer with his pity strove,
 But kindled to a wrath becoming Jove:
 Then call'd a general council of the gods;
 Who, summon'd, issue from their blest
 abodes,
 And fill th' assembly with a shining train.
 A way there is in heaven's expanded plain,

Which, when the skies are clear, is seen be-
low,
And mortals by the name of Milky know.
The groundwork is of stars; thro' which the road 220
Lies open to the Thunderer's abode.
The gods of greater nations dwell around,
And on the right and left the palace bound;
The commons where they can; the nobler
sort,
With winding doors wide open, front the
court.
This place, as far as earth with heav'n may vie,
I dare to call the Louvre of the sky.
When all were plac'd, in seats distinctly
known,
And he, their father, had assum'd the throne,
Upon his iv'ry scepter first he leant, 230
Then shook his head, that shook the firma-
ment:
Air, earth, and seas, obey'd th' almighty
nod;
And with a gen'ral fear confess'd the god.
At length, with indignation, thus he broke
His awful silence, and the pow'rs bespoke:
"I was not more concern'd in that debate
Of empire, when our universal state
Was put to hazard, and the giant race
Our captive skies were ready to imbrace:
For tho' the foe was fierce, the seeds of all Rebellion sprung from one original; 241
Now, wheresoever ambient waters glide,
All are corrupt, and all must be destroy'd.
Let me this holy protestation make:
By hell, and hell's inviolable lake,
I tried whatever in the godhead lay;
But gangren'd members must be lopp'd
away, }
Before the nobler parts are tainted to decay.
There dwells below a race of demigods, 249
Of nymphs in waters, and of fawns in woods;
Who, tho' not worthy yet in heav'n to live,
Let 'em at least enjoy that earth we give.
Can these be thought securely lodg'd below,
When I myself, who no superior know,
I, who have heav'n and earth at my command,
Have been attempted by Lycaon's hand?"
At this a murmur thro' the synod went,
And with one voice they vote his punishment.
Thus, when conspiring traitors dar'd to doom

The fall of Cæsar, and in him of Rome, 260
The nations trembled with a pious fear;
All anxious for their earthly Thunderer:
Nor was their care, O Cæsar, less esteem'd
By thee, than that of heav'n for Jove was deem'd;
Who, with his hand, and voice, did first restrain
Their murmurs, then resum'd his speech
again.
The gods to silence were compos'd, and
sate
With reverence due to his superior state.
"Cancel your pious cares; already he Has paid his debt to justice, and to me. 270
Yet what his crimes, and what my judgments were,
Remains for me thus briefly to declare.
The clamors of this vile degenerate age,
The cries of orphans, and th' oppressor's
rage,
Had reach'd the stars: 'I will descend,'
said I,
'In hope to prove this loud complaint a lie.'
Disguis'd in human shape, I travel'd round
The world, and more than what I heard
I found.
O'er Mænalus I took my steepy way,
By caverns infamous for beasts of prey; 280
Then cross'd Cyllene, and the piny shade,
More infamous by curst Lycaon made.
Dark night had cover'd heav'n and earth,
before
I enter'd his unhospitable door.
Just at my entrance, I displayed the sign
That somewhat was approaching of divine.
The prostrate people pray: the tyrant grins;
And, adding profanation to his sins,
'I'll try,' said he, 'and if a god appear,
To prove his deity shall cost him dear.' 290
'T was late; the graceless wretch my death prepares,
When I should soundly sleep, oppress'd with
cares:
This dire experiment he chose, to prove
If I were mortal, or undoubted Jove;
But first he had resolv'd to taste my pow'r.
Not long before, but in a luckless hour,
Some legates, sent from the Molossian state,
Were on a peaceful errand come to treat.
Of these he murders one; he boils the flesh,
And lays the mangled morsels in a dish: 300
Some part he roasts; then serves it up,
so dress'd,
And bids me welcome to this human feast.

Mov'd with disdain, the table I o'erturn'd,
And with avenging flames the palace burn'd.
The tyrant, in a fright, for shelter gains
The neighb'ring fields, and scours along the plains.

Howling he fled, and fain he would have spoke,

But human voice his brutal tongue forsook.
About his lips the gather'd foam he churns,

And, breathing slaughters, still with rage he burns,

But on the bleating flock his fury turns.

His mantle, now his hide, with rugged hairs

Cleaves to his back; a famish'd face he bears;

His arms descend, his shoulders sink away,
To multiply his legs for chase of prey.

He grows a wolf, his hoariness remains,
And the same rage in other members reigns.

His eyes still sparkle in a narr'wer space,
His jaws retain the grin, and violence of face.

"This was a single ruin, but not one Deserves so just a punishment alone.

Mankind's a monster, and th'ungodly times,
Confed'rate into guilt, are sworn to crimes.

All are alike involv'd in ill, and all Must by the same relentless fury fall."

Thus ended he; the greater gods as-
sent,

By clamors urging his severe intent;
The less fill up the cry for punishment.

Yet still with pity they remember man,
And mourn as much as heav'nly spirits can.

They ask, when those were lost of human birth,

What he would do with all this waste of earth;

If his dispeopled world he would resign
To beasts, a mute, and more ignoble line:

Neglected altars must no longer smoke,
If none were left to worship and invoke.

To whom the Father of the Gods replied:
"Lay that unnecessary fear aside:

Mine be the care new people to provide.
I will from wondrous principles ordain

A race unlike the first, and try my skill again."

Already had he toss'd the flaming brand
And roll'd the thunder in his spacious

hand,
Preparing to discharge on seas and land;

But stopp'd, for fear, thus violently driven,
The sparks should catch his axletree of heav'n:

Rememb'ring, in the Fates, a time when fire

Should to the battlements of heav'n aspire,
And all his blazing worlds above should burn,

And all th' inferior globe to cinders turn.

His dire artill'ry thus dismiss'd, he bent
His thoughts to some securer punishment;

Concludes to pour a wat'ry deluge down,
And, what he durst not burn, resolves to drown.

The northern breath, that freezes floods, he binds,

With all the race of cloud-dispelling winds:
The South he loos'd, who night and horror brings;

And fogs are shaken from his flaggy wings.
From his divided beard two streams he pours;

His head and rheumy eyes distil in showers;

With rain his robe and heavy mantle flow,
And lazy mists are low'ring on his brow.

Still as he swept along, with his clench'd fist

He squeez'd the clouds; th' imprison'd clouds resist:

The skies, from pole to pole, with peals re-
sound;

And show'rs enlarg'd come pouring on the ground.

Then, clad in colors of a various dye,
Junoian Iris breeds a new supply,

To feed the clouds: impetuous rain descends;
The bearded corn beneath the burthen bends;

Defrauded clowns deplore their perish'd grain,

And the long labors of the year are vain.

Nor from his patrimonial heav'n alone
Is Jove content to pour his vengeance down:

Aid from his brother of the seas he craves,
To help him with auxiliary waves.

The wat'ry tyrant calls his brooks and floods;

Who roll from mossy caves, their moist abodes,

And with perpetual urns his palace fill:

To whom, in brief, he thus imparts his will:

"Small exhortation needs: your pow'rs employ,

And this bad world (so Jove requires) destroy.

Let loose the reins to all your wat'ry store;
Bear down the dams, and open every door."

The floods, by nature enemies to land,
And proudly swelling with their new command,

Remove the living stones that stopp'd
their way,

And, gushing from their source, augment
the sea.

Then, with his mace, their monarch
struck the ground:

With inward trembling earth receiv'd the
wound, 390

And rising streams a ready passage found.

Th' expanded waters gather on the plain,
They float the fields, and overtop the grain;

Then rushing onwards, with a sweepy sway,
Bear flocks, and folds, and lab'ring hinds
away.

Nor safe their dwellings were; for, sapp'd
by floods,

Their houses fell upon their household gods.

The solid piles, too strongly built to fall,
High o'er their heads behold a wat'ry
wall: 399

Now seas and earth were in confusion lost;
A world of waters, and without a coast.

One climbs a cliff; one in his boat is
borne,

And plows above, where late he sow'd his corn.

Others o'er chimney tops and turrets row,
And drop their anchors on the meads below;
Or downward driv'n, they bruise the tender
vine,

Or toss'd aloft, are knock'd against a pine;
And where of late the kids had cropp'd the grass,

The monsters of the deep now take their
place.

Insulting Nereids on the cities ride, 410
And wond'ring dolphins o'er the palace
glide;

On leaves and masts of mighty oaks they
browse,

And their broad fins entangle in the boughs.
The frighted wolf now swims amongst the sheep;

The yellow lion wanders in the deep:
His rapid force no longer helps the boar;
The stag swims faster than he ran before:
The fowls, long beating on their wings in
vain,

Despair of land, and drop into the main.
Now hills and vales no more distinction
know, 420

And level'd nature lies oppress'd below.
The most of mortals perish in the flood,
The small remainder dies for want of food.

A mountain of stupendous height there
stands

Betwixt th' Athenian and Boeotian lands,
The bound of fruitful fields, while fields
they were,

But then a field of waters did appear:
Parnassus is its name; whose forky rise Mounts thro' the clouds, and mates the lofty skies. 429

High on the summit of this dubious cliff,
Deucalion, wafting, moor'd his little skiff.

He with his wife were only left behind
Of perish'd man; they two were human-
kind.

The mountain nymphs and Themis they
adore,

And from her oracles relief implore.

The most upright of mortal men was he;
The most sincere and holy woman, she.

When Jupiter, surveying earth from
high,

Beheld it in a lake of water lie, 439
That, where so many millions lately liv'd,

But two, the best of either sex, surviv'd,
He loos'd the northern wind; fierce Boreas
flies

To puff away the clouds, and purge the
skies:

Serenely, while he blows, the vapors, driven, Discover heav'n to earth, and earth to heav'n.

The billows fall, while Neptune lays his mace

On the rough sea, and smooths its furrow'd
face.

Already Triton, at his call, appears 448

Above the waves; a Tyrian robe he wears,
And in his hand a crooked trumpet bears.
The sovereign bids him peaceful sounds
inspire,

And give the waves the signal to retire.

His writhen shell he takes, whose narrow
vent

Grows by degrees into a large extent;
Then gives it breath: the blast, with doubling sound,

Runs the wide circuit of the world around.
The sun first heard it, in his early east,
And met the rattling echoes in the west. 458

The waters, list'ning to the trumpet's roar,
 Obey the summons, and forsake the shore.

A thin circumference of land appears;
 And Earth, but not at once, her visage rears,
 And peeps upon the seas from upper grounds:
 The streams, but just contain'd within their
 bounds,

By slow degrees into their channels crawl;
 And earth increases as the waters fall.
 In longer time the tops of trees appear,
 Which mud on their dishonor'd branches
 bear.

At length the world was all restor'd to
 view,

But desolate, and of a sickly hue: 470
 Nature beheld herself, and stood aghast;
 A dismal desert, and a silent waste.

Which when Deucalion, with a piteous
 look,
 Beheld, he wept, and thus to Pyrrha
 spoke:

"O wife, O sister, O of all thy kind
 The best and only creature left behind,
 By kindred, love, and now by dangers
 join'd;

(Of multitudes who breath'd the common
 air

We two remain; a species in a pair:
 The rest the seas have swallow'd; nor have
 we

Ev'n of this wretched life a certainty.
 The clouds are still above; and, while I speak,

A second deluge o'er our heads may break.
 Should I be snatch'd from hence, and thou remain,

Without relief, or partner of thy pain,
 How couldst thou such a wretched life
 sustain?

Should I be left, and thou be lost, the sea,
 That buried her I lov'd, should bury me.

O could our father his old arts inspire, 489
 And make me heir of his informing fire,
 That so I might abolish'd man retrieve,
 And perish'd people in new souls might
 live!

But Heav'n is pleas'd, nor ought we to com-
 plain,

That we, th' examples of mankind, remain."
 He said: the careful couple join their tears,
 And then invoke the gods, with pious prayers.

Thus in devotion having eas'd their grief,
 From sacred oracles they seek relief;
 And to Cephisus' brook their way pursue:

The stream was troubled, but the ford they
 knew.

With living waters, in the fountain bred,
 They sprinkle first their garments and
 their head;

Then took the way which to the temple
 led.

The roofs were all defil'd with moss and
 mire,

The desert altars void of solemn fire.
 Before the gradual, prostrate they ador'd;
 The pavement kiss'd, and thus the saint im-
 plor'd:

"O righteous Themis, if the pow'rs above
 By pray'rs are bent to pity, and to love;
 If human miseries can move their mind; 510
 If yet they can forgive, and yet be kind;
 Tell how we may restore, by second birth,
 Mankind, and people desolated earth."

Then thus the gracious goddess, nodding,
 said:

"Depart, and with your vestments veil your
 head;

And stooping lowly down, with loosen'd zones,

Throw each behind your backs your mighty mother's bones."

Amaz'd the pair, and mute with wonder
 stand,

Till Pyrrha first refus'd the dire command.
 "Forbid it Heav'n," said she, "that I should
 tear

Those holy relics from the sepulcher." 520

They ponder'd the mysterious words again,
 For some new sense; and long they sought
 in vain:

At length Deucalion clear'd his cloudy
 brow,

And said: "The dark enigma will allow
 A meaning, which, if well I understand,
 From sacrilege will free the god's command:

This earth our mighty mother is, the stones
 In her capacious body are her bones:

These we must cast behind." With hope and
 fear

The woman did the new solution hear: 530

The man diffides in his own augury,
 And doubts the gods; yet both resolve to
 try.

Descending from the mount, they first un-
 bind

Their vests; and, veil'd, they cast the stones
 behind:

The stones (a miracle to mortal view,
 But long tradition makes it pass for true)

Did first the rigor of their kind expel,
And supplid into softness as they fell;
Then swell'd, and, swelling, by degrees grew
warm;

540

And took the rudiments of human form:
Imperfect shapes — in marble such are seen,
When the rude chisel does the man begin;
While yet the roughness of the stone remains,

Without the rising muscles and the veins.
The sappy parts, and next resembling juice,
Were turn'd to moisture, for the body's use,
Supplying humors, blood, and nourishment:
The rest, too solid to receive a bent,
Converts to bones; and what was once a vein,

550

Its former name and nature did retain.
By help of pow'r divine, in little space,
What the man threw assum'd a manly
face;
And what the wife, renew'd the female
race.

Hence we derive our nature, born to bear
Laborious life, and harden'd into care.

The rest of animals, from teeming earth Produc'd, in various forms receiv'd their birth.

The native moisture, in its close retreat,
Digested by the sun's ethereal heat,
As in a kindly womb, began to breed;
Then swell'd and quicken'd by the vital seed.
And some in less, and some in longer space,
Were ripen'd into form, and took a several
face.

560

Thus when the Nile from Pharian fields is
fled,

And seeks, with ebbing tides, his ancient bed,
The fat manure with heav'nly fire is
warm'd;

And crusted creatures, as in wombs, are form'd:

These, when they turn the glebe, the peasants find;

569

Some rude, and yet unfinish'd in their kind;
Short of their limbs, a lame imperfect birth;
One half alive, and one of lifeless earth.

For heat and moisture, when in bodies
join'd,

The temper that results from either kind Conception makes; and, fighting till they mix,

Their mingled atoms in each other fix.

Thus Nature's hand the genial bed prepares
With friendly discord, and with fruitful wars.

From hence the surface of the ground,
with mud

And slime besmear'd (the fæces of the flood),

580

Receiv'd the rays of heav'n; and, sucking
in

The seeds of heat, new creatures did begin:
Some were of sev'ral sorts produc'd before,
But of new monsters Earth created more.

Unwillingly, but yet she brought to
light
Thee, Python, too, the wond'ring world
to fright;

And the new nations, with so dire a sight:

So monstrous was his bulk, so large a space
Did his vast body and long train embrace.

Whom Phæbus basking on a bank espied:

Ere now the god his arrows had not tried,
But on the trembling deer, or mountain goat:

At this new quarry he prepares to shoot.

593

Tho' every shaft took place, he spent the
store

Of his full quiver; and 't was long before
Th' expiring serpent wallow'd in his gore.

Then, to preserve the fame of such a deed,
For Python slain he Pythian games decreed, Where noble youths for mastership should strive,

To quoit, to run, and steeds and chariots
drive:

600

The prize was fame; in witness of renown
An oaken garland did the victor crown.

The laurel was not yet for triumphs born,
But every green alike by Phæbus worn Did, with promiscuous grace, his flowing locks adorn.

THE TRANSFORMATION OF DAPHNE INTO A LAUREL

The first and fairest of his loves was she Whom not blind Fortune, but the dire decree

Of angry Cupid forc'd him to desire:

Daphne her name, and Peneus was her
sire.

Swell'd with the pride that new success attends,

610

He sees the stripling, while his bow he bends,
And thus insults him: "Thou lascivious boy,
Are arms like these for children to employ?
Know, such achievements are my proper
claim,

Due to my vigor and unerring aim:
Resistless are my shafts, and Python late

In such a feather'd death has found his fate.

Take up thy torch, and lay my weapons by;
With that the feeble souls of lovers fry." ⁶¹⁹
To whom the son of Venus thus replied:

"Phœbus, thy shafts are sure on all beside;
But mine on Phœbus: mine the fame shall be

Of all thy conquests, when I conquer thee."
He said, and soaring, swiftly wing'd his flight;

Nor stopp'd but on Parnassus' airy height.
Two different shafts he from his quiver draws;

One to repel desire, and one to cause.
One shaft is pointed with refulgent gold,
To bribe the love, and make the lover bold:

One blunt, and tipp'd with lead, whose base allay ⁶³⁰

Provokes disdain, and drives desire away.
The blunted bolt against the nymph he dress'd,

But with the sharp tranfix'd Apollo's breast.

Th' enamor'd deity pursues the chase;
The scornful damsel shuns his loath'd embrace;

In hunting beasts of prey her youth employs,

And Phœbe rivals in her rural joys.
With naked neck she goes, and shoulders bare,

And with a fillet binds her flowing hair.

By many suitors sought, she mocks their pains, ⁶⁴⁰

And still her vow'd virginity maintains.
Impatient of a yoke, the name of bride

She shuns, and hates the joys she never tried.

On wilds and woods she fixes her desire,
Nor knows what youth and kindly love inspire.

Her father chides her oft: "Thou ow'st," says he,

"A husband to thyself, a son to me."

She, like a crime, abhors the nuptial bed;
She glows with blushes, and she hangs her head.

Then, casting round his neck her tender arms, ⁶⁵⁰

Soothes him with blandishments, and filial charms.

"Give me, my lord," she said, "to live, and die,

A spotless maid, without the marriage tie.
'Tis but a small request; I beg no more Than what Diana's father gave before."

The good old sire was soften'd to consent,
But said her wish would prove her punishment;

For so much youth, and so much beauty join'd,

Oppos'd the state which her desires design'd. ⁶⁵⁹

The God of Light, aspiring to her bed,
Hopes what he seeks, with flattering fancies fed;

And is by his own oracles misled.
And as in empty fields the stubble burns,

Or nightly travelers, when day returns,
Their useless torches on dry hedges throw,

That catch the flames, and kindle all the row;

So burns the god, consuming in desire,
And feeding in his breast a fruitless fire:

Her well-turn'd neck he view'd (her neck was bare) ⁶⁶⁹

And on her shoulders her dishevel'd hair:
"O were it comb'd," said he, "with what a grace

Would every waving curl become her face!"

He view'd her eyes, like heavenly lamps that shone;

He view'd her lips, too sweet to view alone,

Her taper fingers, and her panting breast;

He praises all he sees, and for the rest,
Believes the beauties yet unseen are best. }

Swift as the wind, the damsel fled away,
Nor did for these alluring speeches stay:

"Stay, nymph," he cried, "I follow, not a foe: ⁶⁸⁰

Thus from the lion trips the trembling doe;

Thus from the wolf the frighten'd lamb removes,

And from pursuing falcons fearful doves; }

Thou shunn'st a god, and shunn'st a god that loves.

Ah, lest some thorn should pierce thy tender foot,

Or thou shouldst fall in flying my pursuit!
To sharp uneven ways thy steps decline;

Abate thy speed, and I will bate of mine.
Yet think from whom thou dost so rashly fly; ⁶⁸⁹

Nor basely born, nor shepherd's swain am I.
Perhaps thou know'st not my superior state,

And from that ignorance proceeds thy hate.
 Me Claros, Delphos, Tenedos obey;
 These hands the Patareian scepter sway.
 The King of Gods begot me: what shall be,
 Or is, or ever was, in fate, I see.
 Mine is th' invention of the charming lyre;
 Sweet notes, and heav'nly numbers I inspire.

Sure is my bow, unerring is my dart;
 But ah! more deadly his, who pierc'd my
 heart.

Med'cine is mine: what herbs and simples }
 grow
 In fields and forests, all their pow'rs I }
 know,

And am the great physician call'd below.
 Alas, that fields and forests can afford
 No remedies to heal their love-sick lord!
 To cure the pains of love no plant avails,
 And his own physic the physician fails."

She heard not half, so furiously she flies,
 And on her ear th' imperfect accent dies.
 Fear gave her wings; and as she fled, the
 wind,

Increasing, spread her flowing hair behind,
 And left her legs and thighs expos'd to
 view;

Which made the god more eager to pursue.
 The god was young, and was too hotly
 bent

To lose his time in empty compliment;
 But led by love, and fir'd by such a sight,
 Impetuously pursued his near delight.

As when th' impatient greyhound, slipp'd from far,

Bounds o'er the glebe, to course the fearful hare,

She in her speed does all her safety lay,
 And he with double speed pursues the prey;
 O'erruns her at the sitting turn, and licks
 His chaps in vain, and blows upon the flix;
 She scapes, and for the neighb'ring covert strives,

And gaining shelter, doubts if yet she lives:
 If little things with great we may compare,
 Such was the god, and such the flying fair:
 She, urg'd by fear, her feet did swiftly
 move,

But he more swiftly, who was urg'd by
 love.

He gathers ground upon her in the chase;
 Now breathes upon her hair, with nearer
 pace,
 And just is fast'ning on the wish'd embrace.

The nymph grew pale, and in a mortal
 fright,

Spent with the labor of so long a flight;
 And now despairing, cast a mournful look Upon the streams of her paternal brook:

"O help," she cried, "in this extremest need,
 If water gods are deities indeed:

Gape, earth, and this unhappy wretch in-
 tomb;

Or change my form whence all my sorrows
 come."

Scarce had she finish'd, when her feet she
 found

Benumb'd with cold, and fasten'd to the
 ground:

A filmy rind about her body grows;
 Her hair to leaves, her arms extend to
 boughs:

The nymph is all into a laurel gone,
 The smoothness of her skin remains alone.
 Yet Phæbus loves her still, and, casting
 round

Her bole his arms, some little warmth he
 found.

The tree still panted in th' unfinish'd part,
 Not wholly vegetive, and heav'd her heart.
 He fix'd his lips upon the trembling rind;
 It swerv'd aside, and his embrace declin'd.
 To whom the god: "Because thou canst not be

My mistress, I espouse thee for my tree:
 Be thou the prize of honor and renown;
 The deathless poet, and the poem, crown.
 Thou shalt the Roman festivals adorn,
 And, after poets, be by victors worn.

Thoushalt returning Cæsar's triumph grace,
 When poms shall in a long procession pass;
 Wreath'd on the post before his palace wait,
 And be the sacred guardian of the gate;
 Secure from thunder, and unharm'd by Jove,
 Unfading as th' immortal pow'rs above:
 And, as the locks of Phæbus are unshorn,
 So shall perpetual green thy boughs adorn."
 The grateful tree was pleas'd with what he
 said,

And shook the shady honors of her head.

THE TRANSFORMATION OF IO INTO A HEIFER

An ancient forest in Thessalia grows, Which Tempe's pleasant valley does in-
 close:

Thro' this the rapid Peneus takes his course,
 From Pindus rolling with impetuous force;

Mists from the river's mighty fall arise,
And deadly damps inclose the cloudy skies;
Perpetual fogs are hanging o'er the wood,
And sounds of waters deaf the neighborhood.
Deep in a rocky cave he makes abode,
A mansion proper for a mourning god.
Here he gives audience, issuing out decrees
To rivers, his dependent deities. 780
On this occasion hither they resort,
To pay their homage, and to make their court;

All doubtful, whether to congratulate
His daughter's honor, or lament her fate.
Spercheus, crown'd with poplar, first appears;
Then old Apidanus came, crown'd with years:

Enipeus turbulent, Amphrysos tame;
And Æas last, with lagging waters, came.
Then of his kindred brooks a numerous throng 789
Condole his loss, and bring their urns along.
Not one was wanting of the wat'ry train
That fill'd his flood, or mingled with the main,

But Inachus, who in his cave, alone,
Wept not another's losses, but his own;
For his dear Io, whether stray'd, or dead,
To him uncertain, doubtful tears he shed.
He sought her thro' the world, but sought in vain;

And, nowhere finding, rather fear'd her slain.

Her, just returning from her father's brook,

Jove had beheld, with a desiring look; 800
And: "O fair daughter of the flood," he said,

"Worthy alone of Jove's imperial bed,
Happy, whoever shall those charms possess!
The King of Gods (nor is thy lover less)
Invites thee to yon cooler shades, to shun
The scorching rays of the meridian sun.
Nor shalt thou tempt the dangers of the grove

Alone, without a guide; thy guide is Jove:
No puny pow'r, but he whose high command

Is unconfin'd, who rules the seas and land, 810

And tempers thunder in his awful hand.
O fly not — " for she fled from his embrace:
O'er Lerna's pastures he pursued the chase,
Along the shades of the Lyrcæan plain.
At length the god, who never asks in vain,

Involv'd with vapors, imitating night,
Both air and earth; and then suppress'd
her flight,
And, mingling force with love, enjoy'd
the full delight.

Meantime the jealous Juno, from on high,

Survey'd the fruitful fields of Arcady; 820
And wonder'd that the mist should overrun
The face of daylight, and obscure the sun.

No nat'ral cause she found, from brooks or bogs,

Or marshy lowlands, to produce the fogs:
Then round the skies she sought for Jupiter,
Her faithless husband; but no Jove was there.

Suspecting now the worst: "Or I," she said,
"Am much mistaken, or am much betray'd."

With fury she precipitates her flight, 829
Dispels the shadows of dissembled night,
And to the day restores his native light.

Th' almighty lecher, careful to prevent
The consequence, foreseeing her descent,
Transforms his mistress in a trice; and now

In Io's place appears a lovely cow.
So slick her skin, so faultless was her make,
Ev'n Juno did unwilling pleasure take
To see so fair a rival of her love;

And what she was, and whence, enquir'd of Jove; 839

Of what fair herd, and from what pedigree.
The god, half-caught, was forc'd upon a lie;

And said she sprung from earth. She took the word,

And begg'd the beauteous heifer of her lord.

What should he do? 'T was equal shame to Jove

Or to relinquish, or betray his love;
Yet to refuse so slight a gift would be

But more t' increase his consort's jealousy:
Thus fear and love by turns his heart assail'd,

And stronger love had sure at length prevail'd;

But some faint hope remain'd, his jealous queen 850

Had not the mistress thro' the heifer seen.
The cautious goddess, of her gift possess'd,
Yet harbor'd anxious thoughts within her breast;

As she who knew the falsehood of her Jove,

And justly fear'd some new relapse of love.
Which to prevent, and to secure her care,
To trusty Argus she commits the fair.

The head of Argus (as with stars the skies)
Was compass'd round, and wore an hundred
eyes.

But two by turns their lids in slumber }
steep; 860

The rest on duty still their station keep; }
Nor could the total constellation sleep.

Thus, ever present to his eyes and mind,
His charge was still before him, tho' behind.
In fields he suffer'd her to feed by day;

But, when the setting sun to night gave way,
The captive cow he summon'd with a call,
And drove her back, and tied her to the stall.

On leaves of trees and bitter herbs she fed,
Heav'n was her canopy, bare earth her bed;
So hardly lodg'd: and, to digest her food, 871

She drank from troubled streams, defil'd
with mud.

Her woful story fain she would have told,
With hands upheld, but had no hands to
hold.

Her head to her ungentle keeper bow'd,
She strove to speak; she spoke not, but she low'd:

Affrighted with the noise, she look'd around,
And seem'd t' inquire the author of the
sound.

Once on the banks where often she had
play'd,

(Her father's banks) she came, and there survey'd 880

Her alter'd visage, and her branching head;
And, starting, from herself she would have
fled.

Her fellow-nymphs, familiar to her eyes,
Beheld, but knew her not in this disguise.

Ev'n Inachus himself was ignorant,
And in his daughter did his daughter want.

She follow'd where her fellows went, as she
Were still a partner of the company:

They stroke her neck; the gentle heifer
stands, 889

And her neck offers to their stroking hands.
Her father gave her grass; the grass she
took,

And lick'd his palms, and cast a piteous
look,

And in the language of her eyes she spoke. }
She would have told her name, and ask'd relief;

But, wanting words, in tears she tells her
grief,

Which with her foot she makes him under-
stand;

And prints the name of Io in the sand.

"Ah wretched me!" her mournful father
cried;

She, with a sigh, to "wretched me" replied:

About her milk-white neck his arms he threw; 900

And wept, and then these tender words
ensue:

"And art thou she, whom I have sought
around

The world, and have at length so sadly found?
So found, is worse than lost: with mutual
words

Thou answer'st not, no voice thy tongue
affords;

But sighs are deeply drawn from out thy
breast,

And speech denied by lowing is express'd.
Unknowing, I prepar'd thy bridal bed,

With empty hopes of happy issue fed;
But now the husband of a herd must be 910

Thy mate, and bell'wing sons thy progeny.
O, were I mortal, death might bring relief!

But now my godhead but extends my grief;
Prolongs my woes, of which no end I see,

And makes me curse my immortality!"
More had he said, but, fearful of her stay,

The starry guardian drove his charge away
To some fresh pasture; on a hilly height

He sate himself, and kept her still in sight.

THE EYES OF ARGUS TRANSFORM'D INTO A PEACOCK'S TRAIN

Now Jove no longer could her suff'rings
bear; 920

But call'd in haste his airy messenger,
The son of Maia, with severe decree

To kill the keeper, and to set her free.
With all his harness soon the god was sped;

His flying hat was fasten'd on his head;
Wings on his heels were hung, and in his
hand

He holds the virtue of the snaky wand.
The liquid air his moving pinions wound,

And, in the moment, shoot him on the ground.
Before he came in sight, the crafty god 930

His wings dismiss'd, but still retain'd his rod:
That sleep-procuring wand wise Hermes
took,

But made it seem to sight a shepherd's hook.
With this he did a herd of goats control;

Which by the way he met, and slyly stole.
Clad like a country swain, he pip'd, and sung;
And, playing, drove his jolly troop along.

With pleasure Argus the musician heeds,
But wonders much at those new vocal reeds;
And: "Whosoe'er thou art, my friend,"

said he, 940
"Up hither drive thy goats, and play by
me:
This hill has browse for them, and shade
for thee."

The god, who was with ease induc'd to climb,
Began discourse to pass away the time;
And still, betwixt, his tuneful pipe he plies;
And watch'd his hour to close the keeper's
eyes.

With much ado, he partly kept awake,
Not suff'ring all his eyes repose to take;
And ask'd the stranger, who did reeds invent, 949
And whence began so rare an instrument.

THE TRANSFORMATION OF SYRINX
INTO REEDS

Then Hermes thus: "A nymph of late there was,
Whose heav'nly form her fellows did sur-
pass:

The pride and joy of fair Arcadia's plains;
Belov'd by deities, ador'd by swains:
Syrinx her name; by Sylvans oft pursued,
As oft she did the lustful gods delude;
The rural and the woodland pow'rs dis-
dain'd;
With Cynthia hunted, and her rites main-
tain'd.

Like Phœbe clad, even Phœbe's self she seems,
So tall, so straight, such well-proportion'd limbs: 960

The nicest eye did no distinction know,
But that the goddess bore a golden bow:
Distinguish'd thus, the sight she cheated
too. 969

Descending from Lycæus, Pan admires
The matchless nymph, and burns with new desires.

A crown of pine upon his head he wore,
And thus began her pity to implore.
But ere he thus began, she took her flight
So swift, she was already out of sight;
Nor stay'd to hear the courtship of the god,
But bent her course to Ladon's gentle
flood: 971

There by the river stopp'd, and, tir'd be-
fore,

Relief from water nymphs her pray'rs
implore.

"Now while the lustful god, with speedy pace,
Just thought to strain her in a strict embrace,
He fills his arms with reeds, new rising
on the place.

And while he sighs, his ill success to find,
The tender canes were shaken by the wind;
And breath'd a mournful air, unheard be-
fore,

That, much surprising Pan, yet pleas'd
him more. 980

Admiring this new music: 'Thou,' he said,
'Who canst not be the partner of my bed,
At least shalt be the consort of my mind;
And often, often, to my lips be join'd.'
He form'd the reeds, proportion'd as they
are:

Unequal in their length, and wax'd with
care,
They still retain the name of his ungrateful fair."

While Hermes pip'd, and sung, and told his tale,

The keeper's winking eyes began to fail, 989
And drowsy slumber on the lids to creep;
Till all the watchman was, at length,
asleep.

Then soon the god his voice and song sup-
press'd,
And with his pow'rful rod confirm'd his
rest;

Without delay his crooked faulchion drew,
And at one fatal stroke the keeper slew.
Down from the rock fell the dis sever'd
head,

Opening its eyes in death, and falling bled;
And mark'd the passage with a crimson trail:

Thus Argus lies in pieces, cold and pale;
And all his hundred eyes, with all their
light, 1000

Are clos'd at once in one perpetual night.
These Juno takes, that they no more may
fail,
And spreads them in her peacock's gaudy
tail.

Impatient to revenge her injur'd bed,
She wreaks her anger on her rival's head;
With furies frights her from her native
home,

And drives her gadding round the world
to roam:

Nor ceas'd her madness and her flight,
before

She touch'd the limits of the Pharian
shore. 1009

At length, arriving on the banks of Nile, Wearied with length of ways, and worn with toil,

She laid her down; and, leaning on her knees,

Invok'd the cause of all her miseries;
And cast her languishing regards above,
For help from heav'n, and her ungrateful
Jove.

She sigh'd, she wept, she low'd; 't was all
she could,

And with unkindness seem'd to tax the god.
Last, with an humble pray'r, she begg'd
repose,

Or death at least, to finish all her woes. 1019
Jove heard her vows, and with a flatt'ring
look,

In her behalf to jealous Juno spoke.
He cast his arms about her neck, and said:

"Dame, rest secure; no more thynuptial bed
This nymph shall violate; by Styx I swear,
And every oath that binds the Thunderer."
The goddess was appeas'd; and at the word
Was lo to her former shape restor'd.

The rugged hair began to fall away;
The sweetness of her eyes did only stay,
Tho' not so large; her crooked horns decrease; 1030

The wideness of her jaws and nostrils cease:
Her hoofs to hands return, in little space;
The five long taper fingers take their place;
And nothing of the heifer now is seen,
Beside the native whiteness of her skin.

Erected on her feet she walks again,
And two the duty of the four sustain.
She tries her tongue, her silence softly breaks,
And fears her former lowings when she speaks:

A goddess now, thro' all th' Egyptian state,
And serv'd by priests, who in white linen
wait. 1041

Her son was Epaphus, at length believ'd
The son of Jove, and as a god receiv'd.
With sacrifice ador'd and public pray'rs,
He common temples with his mother shares.
Equal in years, and rival in renown
With Epaphus, the youthful Phaeton, Like honor claims, and boasts his sire the
Sun. }

His haughty looks, and his assuming air,
The son of Isis could no longer bear: 1050
"Thou tak'st thy mother's word too far,"
said he,

"And hast usurp'd thy boasted pedigree.
Go, base pretender to a borrow'd name!"
Thus tax'd, he blush'd with anger, and with
shame;

But shame repress'd his rage: the daunted
youth

Soon seeks his mother, and enquires the truth.
"Mother," said he, "this infamy was thrown
By Epaphus on you, and me your son.
He spoke in public, told it to my face;
Nor durst I vindicate the dire disgrace: 1060
Ev'n I, the bold, the sensible of wrong, Restrain'd by shame, was forc'd to hold my
tongue.

To hear an open slander is a curse;
But not to find an answer, is a worse.

If I am heav'n-begot, assert your son
By some sure sign; and make my father
known,

To right my honor, and redeem your
own." }

He said, and saying cast his arms about Her neck, and begg'd her to resolve the
doubt. 1069

'T is hard to judge if Clymene were mov'd
More by his pray'r, whom she so dearly lov'd,
Or more with fury fir'd, to find her name
Traduc'd, and made the sport of common
fame.

She stretch'd her arms to heav'n, and fix'd
her eyes

On that fair planet that adorns the skies:
"Now by those beams," said she, "whose holy fires

Consume my breast, and kindle my desires;
By him who sees us both, and cheers our
sight,

By him the public minister of light,
I swear that Sun begot thee: if I lie, 1080
Let him his cheerful influence deny;
Let him no more this perjur'd creature
see,

And shine on all the world but only me.
If still you doubt your mother's innocence,
His eastern mansion is not far from hence;
With little pains you to his levé go,
And from himself your parentage may
know."

With joy th' ambitious youth his mother
heard,

And eager, for the journey soon prepar'd. 1089

He longs the world beneath him to survey;
To guide the chariot, and to give the day:
From Meroe's burning sands he bends his
course,
Nor less in India feels his father's force;
His travel urging, till he came in sight,
And saw the palace by the purple light.

THE FABLE OF IPHIS AND IANTHE

FROM THE NINTH BOOK OF THE METAMORPHOSES

THE fame of this, perhaps, thro' Crete had
flown;
But Crete had newer wonders of her own,
In Iphis chang'd; for near the Gnossian
bounds,
(As loud report the miracle resounds,
At Phæstus dwelt a man of honest blood,
But meanly born, and not so rich as good;
Esteem'd and lov'd by all the neighborhood:
Who to his wife, before the time assign'd
For childbirth came, thus bluntly spoke his
mind:
"If Heav'n," said Lygdus, "will vouchsafe to hear, 10
I have but two petitions to prefer;
Short pains for thee, for me a son and
heir.
Girls cost as many throes in bringing forth;
Beside, when born, the tits are little worth;
Weak puling things, unable to sustain Their share of labor, and their bread to
gain.
If, therefore, thou a creature shalt produce,
Of so great charges, and so little use, (Bear witness, Heav'n, with what reluctancy,
Her hapless innocence I doom to die." 20
He said, and tears the common grief dis-
play
Of him who bade, and her who must obey.
Yet Telethusa still persists, to find
Fit arguments to move a father's mind;
T' extend his wishes to a larger scope,
And in one vessel not confine his hope.
Lygdus continues hard: her time drew
near,
And she her heavy load could scarcely
bear;

When slumb'ring, in the latter shades of
night,
Before th' approaches of returning light, 30
She saw, or thought she saw, before her bed,
A glorious train, and Isis at their head:
Her moony horns were on her forehead
plac'd,
And yellow sheaves her shining temples
grac'd:
A miter, for a crown, she wore on high;
The dog and dappled bull were waiting by;
Osiris, sought along the banks of Nile;
The silent god; the sacred crocodile;
And, last, a long procession moving on,
With timbrels, that assist the lab'ring
moon. 40
Her slumbers seem'd dispell'd, and, broad
awake,
She heard a voice that thus distinctly spake:
"My votary, thy babe from death defend,
Nor fear to save whate'er the gods will send.
Delude with art thy husband's dire decree:
When danger calls, repose thy trust on
me;
And know thou hast not serv'd a thankless deity."
This promise made, with night the goddess
fled:
With joy the woman wakes, and leaves her
bed;
Devoutly lifts her spotless hands on high, 50
And prays the pow'rs their gift to ratify.
Now grinding pains proceed to bearing throes,
Till its own weight the burden did disclose.
'T was of the beauteous kind, and brought to light
With secrecy, to shun the father's sight.
Th' indulgent mother did her care employ,
And pass'd it on her husband for a boy.
The nurse was conscious of the fact alone;
The father paid his vows as for a son;
And call'd him Iphis, by a common name 60
Which either sex with equal right may
claim.
Iphis his grandsire was; the wife was pleas'd,
Of half the fraud by fortune's favor eas'd:
The doubtful name was us'd without deceit,
And truth was cover'd with a pious cheat.
The habit shew'd a boy, the beauteous face
With manly fierceness mingled female
grace.

Now thirteen years of age were swiftly
 run,
 When the fond father thought the time drew on
 Of settling in the world his only son. ⁷⁰
 Ianthé was his choice; so wondrous fair,
 Her form alone with Iphis could compare:
 A neighbor's daughter of his own degree,
 And not more blest with fortune's goods
 than he.

They soon espous'd; for they with ease
 were join'd,

Who were before contracted in the mind:
 Their age the same, their inclinations too;
 And, bred together, in one school they grew.
 Thus, fatally dispos'd to mutual fires,
 They felt, before they knew, the same desires. ⁸⁰

Equal their flame, unequal was their care;
 One lov'd with hope, one languish'd in despair.
 The maid accus'd the ling'ring days alone;
 For whom she thought a man, she thought her own.

But Iphis bends beneath a greater grief;
 As fiercely burns, but hopes for no relief.
 Ev'n her despair adds fuel to her fire:
 A maid with madness does a maid desire.

And, scarce refraining tears: "Alas!"
 said she,

"What issue of my love remains for me! ⁹⁰
 How wild a passion works within my breast!
 With what prodigious flames am I possess'd!
 Could I the care of Providence deserve,
 Heav'n must destroy me, if it would preserve.
 And that's my fate, or sure it would have sent
 Some usual evil for my punishment;
 Not this unkindly curse, to rage and burn,
 Where nature shews no prospect of return.
 Nor cows for cows consume with fruitless fire;
 Nor mares, when hot, their fellow-mares desire: ¹⁰⁰

The father of the fold supplies his ewes;
 The stag through secret woods his hind pursues;

And birds for mates the males of their own species choose.

Her females Nature guards from female
 flame,

And joins two sexes to preserve the game:
 Would I were nothing, or not what I am!
 Crete, fam'd for monsters, wanted of her
 store,

Till my new love produc'd one monster more.
 The daughter of the Sun a bull desir'd,
 And yet, ev'n then, a male a female fir'd: ¹¹⁰

Her passion was extravagantly new,
 But mine is much the madder of the two.
 To things impossible she was not bent,
 But found the means to compass her intent.
 To cheat his eyes she took a different shape;
 Yet still she gain'd a lover, and a leap.
 Should all the wit of all the world conspire,
 Should Dædalus assist my wild desire,
 What art can make me able to enjoy,
 Or what can change Ianthé to a boy? ¹²⁰
 Extinguish then thy passion, hopeless maid,
 And recollect thy reason for thy aid.
 Know what thou art, and love as maidens ought,
 And drive these golden wishes from thy thought.

Thou canst not hope thy fond desires to
 gain;

Where hope is wanting, wishes are in vain.

"And yet no guards against our joys con-
 spire;

No jealous husband hinders our desire:

My parents are propitious to my wish,
 And she herself consenting to the bliss. ¹³⁰

All things concur to prosper our design;

All things to prosper any love but mine.

And yet I never can enjoy the fair;

'Tis past the pow'r of Heav'n to grant my
 pray'r.

Heav'n has been kind, as far as Heav'n can be;
 Our parents with our own desires agree;
 But Nature, stronger than the gods above,
 Refuses her assistance to my love;
 She sets the bar that causes all my pain:
 One gift refus'd makes all their bounty vain.
 And now the happy day is just at hand, ¹⁴⁰
 To bind our hearts in Hymen's holy band —
 Our hearts, but not our bodies: thus, accurst,
 In midst of water I complain of thirst.
 Why com'st thou, Juno, to these barren rites,
 To bless a bed defrauded of delights?
 Or why should Hymen lift his torch on high,
 To see two brides in cold embraces lie?"

Thus love-sick Iphis her vain passion mourns:

With equal ardor fair Ianthé burns, ¹⁵⁰
 Invoking Hymen's name, and Juno's pow'r,
 To speed the work, and haste the happy
 hour.

She hopes, while Telethusa fears the day,
 And strives to interpose some new delay:
 Now feigns a sickness, now is in a fright
 For this bad omen, or that boding sight.
 But having done whate'er she could devise,
 And emptied all her magazine of lies,

The time approach'd; the next ensuing day
 The fatal secret must to light betray. ¹⁶⁰
 Then Telethusa had recourse to pray'r,
 She and her daughter with dishevel'd hair;
 Trembling with fear, great Isis they ador'd,
 Embrac'd her altar, and her aid implor'd:

"Fair queen, whodost on fruitful Egypt
 smile,
 Who sway'st the scepter of the Pharian
 isle,

And sev'nfold falls of disemboing Nile;
 Relieve, in this our last distress," she said,
 "A suppliant mother, and a mournful maid.
 Thou, goddess, thou wert present to my sight; ¹⁷⁰

Reveal'd I saw thee, by thy own fair light:
 I saw thee in my dream, as now I see,
 With all thy marks of awful majesty,
 The glorious train that compass'd thee
 around;

And heard the hollow timbrel's holy sound.
 Thy words I noted, which I still retain;
 Let not thy sacred oracles be vain.

That Iphis lives, that I myself am free
 From shame and punishment, I owe to thee.
 On thy protection all our hopes depend: ¹⁸⁰
 Thy counsel sav'd us, let thy pow'r defend."

Her tears pursued her words, and, while she spoke,

The goddess nodded, and her altar shook:
 The temple doors, as with a blast of wind,
 Were heard to clap; the lunar horns that
 bind

The brows of Isis cast a blaze around;
 The trembling timbrel made a murm'ring
 sound.

Some hopes these happy omens did impart;
 Forth went the mother with a beating
 heart,

Not much in fear, nor fully satisfied; ¹⁹⁰
 But Iphis follow'd with a larger stride:

The whiteness of her skin forsook her face,
 Her looks embolden'd with an awful grace;
 Her features and her strength together
 grew,

And her long hair to curling locks withdrew.

Her sparkling eyes with manly vigor
 shone;

Big was her voice, audacious was her tone.
 The latent parts, at length reveal'd, began To shoot, and spread, and burnish into
 man. ¹⁹⁹

The maid becomes a youth; no more delay
 Your vows, but look, and confidently pay.

Their gifts the parents to the temple bear;
 The votive tables this inscription wear:

"Iphis, the man, has to the goddess paid
 The vows that Iphis offer'd when a maid."

Now when the star of day had shewn
 his face,

Venus and Juno with their presence grace
 The nuptial rites; and, Hymen from above
 Descending to complete their happy love,
 The gods of marriage lend their mutual aid, ²¹⁰

And the warm youth enjoys the lovely
 maid.

THE FABLE OF ACIS, POLYPHEMUS, AND GALATEA

FROM THE THIRTEENTH BOOK OF THE METAMORPHOSES

GALATEA RELATES THE STORY

ACIS, the lovely youth, whose loss I
 mourn,

From Faunus and the nymph Symethis
 born,

Was both his parents' pleasure; but to me
 Was all that love could make a lover be.

The gods our minds in mutual bands did
 join;

I was his only joy, as he was mine.

Now sixteen summers the sweet youth had
 seen,

And doubtful down began to shade his
 chin;

When Polyphemus first disturb'd our joy,
 And lov'd me fiercely, as I lov'd the boy. ¹⁰

Ask not which passion in my soul was high'r,

My last aversion, or my first desire:

Nor this the greater was, nor that the less;
 Both were alike, for both were in excess.

Thee, Venus, thee, both heav'n and earth
 obey;

Immense thy pow'r, and boundless is thy
 sway.

The Cyclops, who defied th' ethereal throne,
 And thought no thunder louder than his
 own;

The terror of the woods, and wilder far
 Than wolves in plains, or bears in forests are; ²⁰

Th' inhuman host, who made his bloody
 feasts

On mangled members of his butcher'd
 guests,
 Yet felt the force of love and fierce desire,
 And burnt for me with unrelenting fire:
 Forgot his caverns, and his woolly care;
 Assum'd the softness of a lover's air;
 And comb'd, with teeth of rakes, his rugged hair. }
 Now with a crooked scythe his beard he sleeks,
 And mows the stubborn stubble of his cheeks;
 Now in the crystal stream he looks, to try
 His simagres, and rolls his glaring eye. 31
 His cruelty and thirst of blood are lost,
 And ships securely sail along the coast.
 The prophet Telemus (arriv'd by chance
 Where Etna's summits to the sea's advance,
 Who mark'd the tracts of every bird that
 flew,
 And sure presages from their flying drew)
 Foretold the Cyclops that Ulysses' hand
 In his broad eye should thrust a flaming brand.
 The giant, with a scornful grin, replied: 40
 "Vain augur, thou hast falsely prophesied;
 Already Love his flaming brand has toss'd;
 Looking on two fair eyes, my sight I lost."
 Thus, warn'd in vain, with stalking pace
 he strode,
 And stamp'd the margin of the briny flood
 With heavy steps; and, weary, sought again
 The cool retirement of his gloomy den.
 A promontory, sharp'ning by degrees,
 Ends in a wedge, and overlooks the seas;
 On either side, below, the water flows: 50
 This airy walk the giant lover chose.
 Here on the midst he sate; his flocks, unled,
 Their shepherd follow'd, and securely fed.
 A pine so burly, and of length so vast,
 That sailing ships requir'd it for a mast,
 He wielded for a staff, his steps to guide;
 But laid it by, his whistle while he tried.
 A hundred reeds, of a prodigious growth, Scarce made a pipe proportion'd to his mouth;
 Which when he gave it wind, the rocks
 around, 60
 And wat'ry plains, the dreadful hiss re-
 sound.
 I heard the ruffian shepherd rudely blow,
 Where, in a hollow cave, I sat below;
 On Acis' bosom I my head reclin'd;
 And still preserve the poem in my mind.

"O lovely Galatea, whiter far
 Than falling snows and rising lilies are;
 More flow'ry than the meads, as crystal
 bright;
 Erect as alders, and of equal height; 69
 More wanton than a kid; more sleek thy skin
 Than orient shells that on the shores are seen;
 Than apples fairer, when the boughs they
 lade;
 Pleasing as winter suns or summer shade;
 More grateful to the sight than goodly plains;
 And softer to the touch than down of swans,
 Or curds new turn'd; and sweeter to the taste
 Than swelling grapes that to the vintage
 haste;
 More clear than ice, or running streams, that
 stray
 Thro' garden plots, but ah! more swift than
 they.
 "Yet, Galatea, harder to be broke 80 Than bullocks, unreclaim'd to bear the
 yoke;
 And far more stubborn than the knotted
 oak:
 Like sliding streams, impossible to hold;
 Like them fallacious; like their fountains,
 cold;
 More warping than the willow, to decline
 My warm embrace; more brittle than the
 vine;
 Immovable, and fix'd in thy disdain;
 Rough as these rocks, and of a harder grain;
 More violent than is the rising flood; 89
 And the prais'd peacock is not half so proud;
 Fierce as the fire, and sharp as thistles are;
 And more outrageous than a mother bear;
 Deaf as the billows to the vows I make;
 And more revengeful than a trodden snake;
 In swiftness fleetier than the flying hind,
 Or driven tempests, or the driving wind:
 All other faults with patience I can bear;
 But swiftness is the vice I only fear.
 "Yet, if you knew me well, you would not shun
 My love, but to my wish'd embraces run;
 Would languish in your turn, and court my
 stay 101
 And much repent of your unwise delay.
 "My palace, in the living rock, is made By Nature's hand; a spacious pleasing
 shade,
 Which neither heat can pierce, nor cold
 invade.
 My garden fill'd with fruits you may behold,

And grapes in clusters, imitating gold;
Some blushing bunches of a purple hue:
And these, and those, are all reserv'd for you.
Red strawberries, in shades, expecting stand,
Proud to be gather'd by so white a hand. ¹¹¹
Autumnal cornels latter fruit provide,
And plums, to tempt you, turn their glossy
side;

Not those of common kinds, but such alone
As in Phœacian orchards might have grown;
Nor chestnuts shall be wanting to your food,
Nor garden fruits, nor wildings of the wood;
The laden boughs for you alone shall bear;
And yours shall be the product of the year.

"The flocks you see, are all my own, beside ¹²⁰
The rest that woods and winding valleys
hide,

And those that folded in the caves abide.
Ask not the numbers of my growing store;
Who knows how many, knows he has no
more.

Nor will I praise my cattle; trust not me,
But judge yourself, and pass your own decree:

Behold their swelling dugs; the sweepy
weight

Of ewes that sink beneath the milky freight;
In the warm folds their tender lambkins lie,
Apart from kids that call with human cry.
New milk in nut-brown bowls is duly serv'd
For daily drink; the rest for cheese reserv'd.
Nor are these household dainties all my store: ¹³³

The fields and forests will afford us more;
The deer, the hare, the goat, the salvage
boar,

All sorts of ven'son; and of birds the best,
A pair of turtles taken from the nest.
I walk'd the mountains, and two cubs I found,
Whose dam had left 'em on the naked ground,
So like, that no distinction could be seen: ¹⁴⁰
So pretty, they were presents for a queen;
And so they shall: I took 'em both away;
And keep, to be companions of your play.

"O raise, fair nymph, your beauteous face above

The waves; nor scorn my presents, and my
love:

Come, Galatea, come, and view my face; }
I late beheld it in the wat'ry glass,
And found it lovelier than I fear'd it was. }
Survey my tow'ring stature, and my size:
Not Jove, the Jove you dream that rules
the skies, ¹⁵⁰

Bears such a bulk, or is so largely spread.
My locks, the plenteous harvest of my head,
Hang o'er my manly face; and, dangling
down,

As with a shady grove my shoulders crown.
Nor think, because my limbs and body bear
A thickset underwood of bristling hair,
My shape deform'd: what fouler sight can
be

Than the bald branches of a leafless tree?
Foul is the steed, without a flowing mane;
And birds, without their feathers, and their train. ¹⁶⁰

Wool decks the sheep; and man receives a
grace

From bushy limbs, and from a bearded face.
My forehead with a single eye is fill'd,
Round as a ball, and ample as a shield.

The glorious lamp of heav'n, the radiant sun,
Is Nature's eye; and she's content with one.
Add, that my father sways your seas, and I,
Like you, am of the wat'ry family.

I make you his, in making you my own;
You I adore, and kneel to you alone: ¹⁷⁰

Jove, with his fabled thunder, I despise,
And only fear the lightning of your eyes.
Frown not, fair nymph; yet I could bear to
be

Disdain'd, if others were disdain'd with me.
But to repulse the Cyclops, and prefer
The love of Acis, heav'n's! I cannot bear.

But let the stripling please himself; nay
more,

Please you, tho' that's the thing I most
abhor;

The boy shall find, if e'er we cope in fight,
These giant limbs endued with giant might.
His living bowels, from his belly torn, ¹⁸¹
And scatter'd limbs, shall on the flood be
borne:

Thy flood, ungrateful nymph; and fate
shall find

That way for thee and Acis to be join'd.
For O! I burn with love, and thy disdain
Augments at once my passion and my pain.
Translated Etna flames within my heart,
And thou, inhuman, wilt not ease my
smart."

Lamenting thus in vain, he rose, and strode

With furious paces to the neighb'ring
wood. ¹⁹⁰

Restless his feet, distracted was his walk; Mad were his motions, and confus'd his
talk:

Mad as the vanquish'd bull, when forc'd to yield

His lovely mistress, and forsake the field.

Thus far unseen I saw: when, fatal chance

His looks directing, with a sudden glance,
Acis and I were to his sight betray'd;
Where, naught suspecting, we securely play'd.

From his wide mouth a bellowing cry he cast:

"I see, I see; but this shall be your last."
A roar so loud made Etna to rebound; ²⁰¹
And all the Cyclops labor'd in the sound.
Affrighted with his monstrous voice, I fled,
And in the neighb'ring ocean plung'd my head.

Poor Acis turn'd his back, and: "Help,"
he cried,

"Help, Galatea! help, my parent gods,
And take me dying to your deep abodes!"
The Cyclops follow'd; but he sent before
A rib, which from the living rock he tore:
Tho' but an angle reach'd him of the stone, ²¹⁰

The mighty fragment was enough alone
To crush all Acis; 't was too late to save,
But what the fates allow'd to give, I gave:
That Acis to his lineage should return;
And roll, among the river gods, his urn.
Straight issued from the stone a stream of blood,

Which lost the purple, mingling with the flood.

Then like a troubled torrent it appear'd:
The torrent, too, in little space was clear'd.
The stone was cleft, and thro' the yawning chink ²²⁰

New reeds arose, on the new river's brink.
The rock, from out its hollow womb, dis-clos'd

A sound like water in its course oppos'd:
When (wondrous to behold) full in the flood

Up starts a youth, and navel high he stood.
Horns from his temples rise; and either horn

Thick wreaths of reeds (his native growth) adorn.

Were not his stature taller than before,
His bulk augmented, and his beauty more,
His color blue, for Acis he might pass: ²³⁰
And Acis chang'd into a stream he was.

But mine no more; he rolls along the plains
With rapid motion, and his name retains.

SONG TO A FAIR YOUNG LADY

GOING OUT OF THE TOWN IN THE SPRING

I

Ask not the cause, why sullen Spring
So long delays her flow'rs to bear;
Why warbling birds forget to sing,
And winter storms invert the year.
Chloris is gone, and fate provides
To make it spring where she resides.

II

Chloris is gone, the cruel fair:
She cast not back a pitying eye;
But left her lover in despair,
To sigh, to languish, and to die. ¹⁰
Ah, how can those fair eyes endure
To give the wounds they will not cure!

III

Great God of Love, why hast thou made
A face that can all hearts command,
That all religions can invade,
And change the laws of ev'ry land?
Where thou hadst plac'd such pow'r before,
Thou shouldst have made her mercy more.

IV

When Chloris to the temple comes,
Adoring crowds before her fall: ²⁰
She can restore the dead from tombs,
And ev'ry life but mine recall.
I only am by Love design'd
To be the victim for mankind.

VENI CREATOR SPIRITUS

TRANSLATED IN PARAPHRASE

CREATOR Spirit, by whose aid
The world's foundations first were laid,
Come visit ev'ry pious mind;
Come pour thy joys on humankind;
From sin and sorrow set us free,
And make thy temples worthy thee.
O source of uncreated light,
The Father's promis'd Paraclite!
Thrice holy fount, thrice holy fire,
Our hearts with heav'nly love inspire; ¹
Come, and thy sacred unction bring
To sanctify us, while we sing!
Plenteous of grace, descend from high,
Rich in thy sev'nfold energy,

Thou strength of his almighty hand,
Whose pow'r does heav'n and earth command !

Proceeding Spirit, our defense,
Who dost the gifts of tongues dis-
pense,

And crown'st thy gift with eloquence !

Réfine and purge our earthy parts ; 20

But, O, inflame and fire our hearts !

Our frailties help, our vice control,

Submit the senses to the soul ;

And when rebellious they are grown,

Then lay thy hand, and hold 'em down.

Chase from our minds th' infernal foe,

And peace, the fruit of love, bestow ;

And lest our feet should step astray,

Protect and guide us in the way.

Make us eternal truths receive, 30

And practice all that we believe :

Give us thyself, that we may see

The Father and the Son, by thee.

Immortal honor, endless fame,

Attend th' Almighty Father's name :

The Savior Son be glorified,

Who for lost man's redemption died ;

And equal adoration be,

Eternal Paraclete, to thee.

RONDELAY

I

CHLOE found Amyntas lying,

All in tears, upon the plain ;

Sighing to himself, and crying :

" Wretched I, to love in vain !

Kiss me, dear, before my dying ;

Kiss me once, and ease my pain ! "

II

Sighing to himself, and crying :

" Wretched I, to love in vain !

Ever scorning, and denying

To reward your faithful swain ;

Kiss me, dear, before my dying ; 10

Kiss me once, and ease my pain.

III

" Ever scorning, and denying

To reward your faithful swain. " —

Chloe, laughing at his crying,

Told him that he lov'd in vain. —

" Kiss me, dear, before my dying ;

Kiss me once, and ease my pain."

IV

Chloe, laughing at his crying,

Told him that he lov'd in vain ; 20

But repenting, and complying,

When he kiss'd, she kiss'd again :

Kiss'd him up before his dying ;

Kiss'd him up, and eas'd his pain.

THE LAST PARTING OF HECTOR AND ANDROMACHE

FROM THE SIXTH BOOK OF HOMER'S ILIADS

ARGUMENT

Hector, returning from the field of battle, to visit Helen his sister-in-law, and his brother Paris, who had fought unsuccessfully hand to hand with Menelaus, from thence goes to his own palace to see his wife Andromache, and his infant son Astyanax. The description of that interview is the subject of this translation.

THUS having said, brave Hector went to
see

His virtuous wife, the fair Andromache.

He found her not at home ; for she was }
gone,

Attended by her maid and infant son, }

To climb the steepy tow'r of Ilion :

From whence, with heavy heart, she might survey

The bloody business of the dreadful day.

Her mournful eyes she cast around the plain,

And sought the lord of her desires in vain.

But he, who thought his peopled palace
bare, 10

When she, his only comfort, was not there,

Stood in the gate, and ask'd of ev'ry one,

Which way she took, and whither she was
gone ;

If to the court, or, with his mother's train,

In long procession to Minerva's fane.

The servants answer'd, neither to the court,

Where Priam's sons and daughters did resort,

Nor to the temple was she gone, to move

With prayers the blue-ey'd progeny of Jove ;

But, more solicitous for him alone, 20

Than all their safety, to the tow'r was
gone,

There to survey the labors of the field,

Where the Greeks conquer, and the Trojans yield;
 Swiftly she pass'd, with fear and fury wild;
 The nurse went lagging after with the child.
 This heard, the noble Hector made no stay;
 Th' admiring throng divide to give him way;
 He pass'd thro' every street by which he came,
 And at the gate he met the mournful dame.
 His wife beheld him, and with eager pace
 Flew to his arms, to meet a dear embrace:
 His wife, who brought in dow'r Cilicia's crown,
 And in herself a greater dow'r alone;
 Aetion's heir, who on the woody plain
 Of Hippoplacus did in Thebe reign.
 Breathless she flew, with joy and passion wild;
 The nurse came lagging after with her child.
 The royal babe upon her breast was laid,
 Who, like the morning star, his beams display'd.
 Scamandrius was his name, which Hector gave,
 From that fair flood which Ilion's wall did lave;
 But him Asryanax the Trojans call,
 From his great father, who defends the wall.
 Hector beheld him with a silent smile;
 His tender wife stood weeping by, the while:
 Press'd in her own, his warlike hand she took,
 Then sigh'd, and thus prophetically spoke:
 "Thy dauntless heart, (which I foresee too late,)
 Too daring man, will urge thee to thy fate:
 Nor dost thou pity, with a parent's mind,
 This helpless orphan, whom thou leav'st behind;
 Nor me, th' unhappy partner of thy bed,
 Who must in triumph by the Greeks be led:
 They seek thy life, and, in unequal fight,
 With many will oppress thy single might:
 Better it were for miserable me
 To die, before the fate which I foresee.
 For ah! what comfort can the world bequeath
 To Hector's widow, after Hector's death?

"Eternal sorrow and perpetual tears
 Began my youth, and will conclude my years:
 I have no parents, friends, nor brothers left;
 By stern Achilles all of life bereft.
 Then when the walls of Thebes he o'er-threw,
 His fatal hand my royal father slew;
 He slew Aetion, but despoil'd him not,
 Nor in his hate the funeral rites forgot;
 Arm'd as he was he sent him whole below,
 And reverenc'd thus the manes of his foe:
 A tomb he rais'd; the mountain nymphs
 around
 Enclos'd with planted elms the holy ground.
 "My sev'n brave brothers in one fatal day
 To Death's dark mansions took the mournful way, Slain by the same Achilles, while they keep
 The bellowing oxen and the bleating sheep.
 My mother, who the royal scepter sway'd,
 Was captive to the cruel victor made,
 And hither led; but, hence redeem'd with gold,
 Her native country did again behold,
 And but beheld; for soon Diana's dart
 In an unhappy chase transfix'd her heart.
 "But thou, my Hector, art thyself alone
 My parents, brothers, and my lord in one.
 O kill not all my kindred o'er again,
 Nor tempt the dangers of the dusty plain;
 But in this tow'r, for our defense, remain.
 Thy wife and son are in thy ruin lost:
 This is a husband's and a father's post.
 The Scæan gate commands the plains below;
 Here marshal all thy soldiers as they go,
 And hence with other hands repel the foe.
 By yon wild fig tree lies their chief ascent,
 And thither all their pow'rs are daily bent:
 The two Ajaces have I often seen,
 And the wrong'd husband of the Spartan queen;
 With him his greater brother; and with these Fierce Diomedes and bold Meriones.
 Uncertain if by augury, or chance,
 But by this easy rise they all advance:
 Guard well that pass, secure of all beside."

To whom the noble Hector thus replied: 101
 "That and the rest are in my daily care;
 But, should I shun the dangers of the war,
 With scorn the Trojans would reward my
 pains,
 And their proud ladies with their sweeping trains.

The Grecian swords and lances I can bear;
 But loss of honor is my only fear.
 Shall Hector, born to war, his birthright
 yield;

Belie his courage, and forsake the field?
 Early in rugged arms I took delight, 110
 And still have been the foremost in the
 fight:

With dangers dearly have I bought re-
 nown,
 And am the champion of my father's
 crown.

"And yet my mind forebodes, with sure
 presage,

That Troy shall perish by the Grecian rage.
 The fatal day draws on, when I must fall,
 And universal ruin cover all.

Not Troy itself, tho' built by hands divine,
 Nor Priam, nor his people, nor his line,
 My mother, nor my brothers of renown, 120
 Whose valor yet defends th' unhappy town;
 Not these, nor all their fates which I fore-
 see,

Are half of that concern I have for thee.
 I see, I see thee in that fatal hour,
 Subjected to the victor's cruel pow'r;
 Led hence a slave to some insulting sword,
 Forlorn, and trembling at a foreign lord;
 A spectacle in Argos, at the loom,
 Gracing with Trojan fights a Grecian room;
 Or from deep wells the living stream to
 take, 130

And on thy weary shoulders bring it back:
 While, groaning under this laborious life,
 They insolently call thee Hector's wife;
 Upbraid thy bondage with thy husband's
 name,

And from my glory propagate thy shame.
 This when they say, thy sorrows will
 encrease

With anxious thoughts of former happiness;
 That he is dead who could thy wrongs redress.

But I, oppress'd with iron sleep before,
 Shall hear thy unavailing cries no more." 140
 He said —

Then, holding forth his arms, he took his boy

(The pledge of love and other hope of Troy).
 The fearful infant turn'd his head away,
 And on his nurse's neck reclining lay,
 His unknown father shunning with affright,
 And looking back on so uncouth a sight;
 Daunted to see a face with steel o'erspread,
 And his high plume that nodded o'er his
 head.

His sire and mother smil'd with silent joy,
 And Hector hasten'd to relieve his boy; 151
 Dismiss'd his burnish'd helm, that shone afar (The pride of warriors, and the pomp of
 war):

Th' illustrious babe, thus reconcil'd, he took;
 Hugg'd in his arms, and kiss'd, and thus he
 spoke:

"Parent of gods and men, propitious Jove,
 And you bright synod of the pow'rs above;
 On this my son your gracious gifts bestow;
 Grant him to live, and great in arms to grow;
 To reign in Troy, to govern with renown,
 To shield the people, and assert the crown:
 That, when hereafter he from war shall come,
 And bring his Trojans peace and triumph
 home, 163

Some aged man, who lives this act to see,
 And who in former times remember'd me,
 May say the son in fortitude and fame
 Outgoes the mark, and drowns his father's
 name:

That at these words his mother may rejoice,
 And add her suffrage to the public voice."

Thus having said, 170
 He first with suppliant hands the gods ador'd,
 Then to the mother's arms the child restor'd:
 With tears and smiles she took her son, and
 press'd

Th' illustrious infant to her fragrant breast.
 He, wiping her fair eyes, indulg'd her grief,
 And eas'd her sorrows with this last relief:

"My wife and mistress, drive thy fears
 away,

Nor give so bad an omen to the day:
 Think not it lies in any Grecian's pow'r,
 To take my life before the fatal hour. 180
 When that arrives, nor good nor bad can
 fly

Th' irrevocable doom of destiny.
 Return, and to divert thy thoughts at
 home,
 There task thy maids, and exercise the
 loom,
 Employ'd in works that womankind be-
 come:

The toils of war and feats of chivalry
Belong to men, and most of all to me."

At this, for new replies he did not stay,
But lac'd his crested helm, and strode away.
His lovely consort to her house return'd,
And looking often back in silence mourn'd.

Home when she came, her secret woe she vents,¹⁹²
And fills the palace with her loud laments:
Those loud laments her echoing maids re-
store,
And Hector, yet alive, as dead deplore.

POEMS WRITTEN BETWEEN 1693 AND 1696

PROLOGUE, EPILOGUE, AND SONGS FROM LOVE TRIUM- PHANT

OR, NATURE WILL PREVAIL

[This tragi-comedy, Dryden's last play, was produced near the close of 1693, or early in 1694 (Malone, I, 1, 213-217, on the authority of Motteux's Gentleman's Journal; and Letter from Dryden to Walsh, in Scott-Saintsbury edition, xviii, 189), and was published in 1694. It was a failure on the stage.]

PROLOGUE

SPOKEN BY MR. BETTERTON

As when some treasurer lays down the stick,
Warrants are sign'd for ready money thick,
And many desperate debentures paid,
Which never had been, had his lordship
stay'd;

So now, this poet, who forsakes the stage,
Intends to gratify the present age.
One warrant shall be sign'd for every man;
All shall be wits that will, and beaux that can:
Provided still, this warrant be not shown,
And you be wits but to yourselves alone;
Provided, too, you rail at one another,¹¹
For there's no one wit will allow a brother;
Provided, also, that you spare this story,
Damn all the plays that e'er shall come before ye.

If one by chance prove good in half a score,
Let that one pay for all, and damn it more.
For if a good one scape among the crew,
And you continue judging as you do,
Every bad play will hope for damning too.
You might damn this, if it were worth your pains;²⁰

Here's nothing you will like; no fustian
scenes,
And nothing, too, of — you know what he means.

No double-entendres, which you sparks allow,
To make the ladies look they know not how;
Simply as 't were, and knowing both together,

Seeming to fan their faces in cold weather.
But here's a story, which no books relate,
Coin'd from our own old poet's addle-pate.
The fable has a moral, too, if sought;
But let that go; for, upon second thought,
He fears but few come hither to be taught.
Yet if you will be profited, you may;³²
And he would bribe you too, to like his play.
He dies, at least to us, and to the stage,
And what he has he leaves this noble age.
He leaves you, first, all plays of his inditing,
The whole estate which he has got by writing.

The beaux may think this nothing but vain praise;
They'll find it something, the testator
says;
For half their love is made from scraps of plays.⁴⁰

To his worst foes he leaves his honesty,
That they may thrive upon 't as much as he.
He leaves his manners to the roaring boys,
Who come in drunk, and fill the house with
noise.

He leaves to the dire critics of his wit,
His silence and contempt of all they writ.
To Shakespeare's critic, he bequeaths the
curse,

To find his faults, and yet himself make
worse;

A precious reader in poetic schools,⁴⁹
Who by his own examples damns his rules.
Last, for the fair, he wishes you may be,
From your dull critics, the lampooners, free.
Tho' he pretends no legacy to leave you,
An old man may at least good wishes give
you.

Your beauty names the play; and may it
prove,
To each, an omen of Triumphant Love!

EPILOGUE

Now, in good manners, nothing should be
said

Against this play, because the poet's dead.
The prologue told us of a moral here:
Would I could find it ! but the Devil knows
where.

If in my part it lies, I fear he means To warn us of the sparks behind our scenes.

For, if you'll take it on Dalinda's word,
'Tis a hard chapter to refuse a lord.
The poet might pretend this moral too,
That, when a wit and fool together woo, 10
The damsel (not to break an ancient rule)
Should leave the wit, and take the wealthy fool.

This he might mean: but there's a truth }
behind,
And, since it touches none of all our kind }
But masks and misses, faith, I'll speak
my mind. }

What if he taught our sex more cautious
carriage,
And not to be too coming before marriage;

For fear of my misfortune in the play,
A kid brought home upon the wedding
day ?

I fear there are few Sanchos in the pit, 20
So good as to forgive, and to forget;
That will, like him, restore us into favor,
And take us after on our good behavior.
Few, when they find the money-bag is
rent,

Will take it for good payment on content.
But in the telling, there the difference is,
Sometimes they find it more than they could wish.

Therefore be warn'd, you misses and you masks,
Look to your hits, nor give the first that asks.

Tears, sighs, and oaths, no truth of passion
prove; 30

True settlement, alone, declares true love.
For him that weds a puss, who kept her
first,

I say but little, but I doubt the worst.
The wife that was a cat may mind her }
house,

And prove an honest, and a careful spouse; }
But, faith, I would not trust her with a mouse. }

SONGS

I

SONG OF JEALOUSY

I

WHAT state of life can be so blest
As love, that warms a lover's breast ?
Two souls in one, the same desire
To grant the bliss, and to require !
But if in heav'n a hell we find,

'Tis all from thee,

O Jealousy !

'Tis all from thee,

O Jealousy !

Thou tyrant, tyrant Jealousy, 10
Thou tyrant of the mind !

II

All other ills, tho' sharp they prove,
Serve to refine, and perfect love:
In absence, or unkind disdain,
Sweet Hope relieves the lover's pain.
But, ah ! no cure but death we find,

To set us free

From Jealousy:

O Jealousy !

Thou tyrant, tyrant Jealousy, 20
Thou tyrant of the mind !

III

False in thy glass all objects are,
Some set too near, and some too far;
Thou art the fire of endless night,
The fire that burns and gives no light.
All torments of the damn'd we find

In only thee,

O Jealousy !

Thou tyrant, tyrant Jealousy, 30
Thou tyrant of the mind !

II

SONG FOR A GIRL

I

YOUNG I am, and yet unskill'd
How to make a lover yield;
How to keep, or how to gain,
When to love, and when to feign.

II

Take me, take me, some of you,
While I yet am young and true;

Ere I can my soul disguise,
Heave my breasts, and roll my eyes.

III

Stay not till I learn the way,
How to lie, and to betray: 10
He that has me first, is blest,
For I may deceive the rest.

IV

Could I find a blooming youth,
Full of love, and full of truth,
Brisk, and of a jaunty mien,
I should long to be fifteen.

TO MY DEAR FRIEND MR.
CONGREVE, ON HIS COMEDY
CALL'D THE DOUBLE-DEALER

[This play by Congreve was first acted in November, 1693 (Malone, I. 1, 229; on the authority of Motteux's Gentleman's Journal). Of it Dryden writes as follows in a letter to Walsh: "His [Congreve's] Double Dealer is much censur'd by the greater part of the Town: and is defended onely by the best judges, who, you know, are commonly the fewest yet it gets ground daily, and has already been acted Eight times." (Scott-Saintsbury edition, xviii, 189, 190.) To the first edition of the play, published in 1694, he prefixed the following fine poem, which shows his critical appreciation of the comedy and his personal affection for its author. Congreve fulfilled the charge laid upon him in the last lines, by editing an edition of Dryden's dramatic works, published in 1717.]

WELL then, the promis'd hour is come at last;

The present age of wit obscures the past:
Strong were our sires, and as they fought
they writ,

Conqu'ring with force of arms, and dint of wit;

Theirs was the giant race, before the flood;
And thus, when Charles return'd, our empire stood.

Like Janus he the stubborn soil manur'd,
With rules of husbandry the rankness cur'd;

Tam'd us to manners, when the stage was rude;

And boist'rous English wit with art induced. 10

Our age was cultivated thus at length,

But what we gain'd in skill we lost in strength.

Our builders were with want of genius
curst;

The second temple was not like the first:
Till you, the best Vitruvius, come at length;
Our beauties equal, but excel our strength.
Firm Doric pillars found your solid base;
The fair Corinthian crowns the higher
space: }

Thus all below is strength, and all above is grace. }

In easy dialogue is Fletcher's praise; 20
He mov'd the mind, but had not power to raise.

Great Jonson did by strength of judgment
please;

Yet, doubling Fletcher's force, he wants his ease.

In differing talents both adorn'd their age;
One for the study, t'other for the stage:
But both to Congreve justly shall submit,

One match'd in judgment, both o'ermatch'd in wit.

In him all beauties of this age we see,
Etherege his courtship, Southerne's purity, }

The satire, wit, and strength of Manly Wycherley. 30 }

All this in blooming youth you have achiev'd,

Nor are your foil'd contemporaries griev'd.
So much the sweetness of your manners
move,

We cannot envy you, because we love.

Fabius might joy in Scipio, when he saw
A beardless consul made against the law;
And join his suffrage to the votes of Rome,
Tho' he with Hannibal was overcome.
Thus old Romano bow'd to Raphael's fame,
And scholar to the youth he taught became. 40

O that your brows my laurel had sus-
tain'd;

Well had I been depos'd, if you had
reign'd!

The father had descended for the son;

For only you are lineal to the throne.

Thus, when the state one Edward did
depose,

A greater Edward in his room arose.

But now, not I, but poetry is curst;

For Tom the Second reigns like Tom the
First.

But let 'em not mistake my patron's part,
Nor call his charity their own desert. 50

Yet this I prophesy: thou shalt be seen (Tho' with some short parenthesis between)

High on the throne of wit; and, seated
there,

Not mine — that's little — but thy laurel
wear.

Thy first attempt an early promise made;
That early promise this has more than
paid.

So bold, yet so judiciously you dare,
That your least praise is to be regular.

Time, place, and action, may with pains be
wrought;

But genius must be born, and never can be
taught. 60

This is your portion; this your native
store;

Heav'n, that but once was prodigal be-
fore,

To Shakespeare gave as much; she could not give him more. }

Maintain your post: that's all the fame
you need;

For 'tis impossible you should proceed.
Already I am worn with cares and age,

And just abandoning th' ungrateful stage;
Unprofitably kept at Heav'n's expense,

I live a rent-charge on his providence:
But you, whom ev'ry Muse and Grace
adorn, 70

Whom I foresee to better fortune born,
Be kind to my remains; and O defend,

Against your judgment, your departed
friend!

Let not the insulting foe my fame pursue,
But shade those laurels which descend to

you;

And take for tribute what these lines express:

You merit more; nor could my love do less.

TO SIR GODFREY KNELLER

[Early in 1694 (see letter from Dryden to Walsh, Scott-Saintsbury edition. xviii. 191) Tonson published a volume entitled. The Annual Miscellany for the Year 1694, being the Fourth Part of Miscellany Poems, which is commonly referred to as the Fourth Miscellany. To this Dryden contributed only a translation of The Third Book of Virgil's Georgics and the following epistle To Sir Godfrey Kneller. Among the other writers for the volume were Addison, Congreve, Prior, Dennis, Yalden, and Charles Dryden, the poet's son. A second edition of the volume, with the same title, but with many changes in the contents, appeared in 1708; and a third, with title-page reading, The Fourth Part of Miscellany Poems . . . Publish'd by Mr. Dryden, and with further changes in the contents, in 1716. Tonson did not carry out his plan of an Annual Miscellany, perhaps because Dryden, now busy with his Virgil, was unable to give him further help. A fifth part of the series appeared, however, in 1704, after Dryden's death; and a sixth in 1709: second editions of these last two volumes were printed in 1716.

Dryden reprinted his version of The Third Book of Virgil's Georgics, with very slight changes, in his complete Virgil. It is therefore omitted at this point.

The epistle To Sir Godfrey Kneller was probably written as an acknowledgment of a painting of Shakespeare, copied from the well-known Chandos portrait, which Kneller had presented to Dryden: see line 73 below. It was reprinted in the folio Poems and Translations, 1701, with the omission of lines 91-94, 115-123, 164, 165 of the Miscellany text, and with some minor changes of reading. It is at least doubtful whether these alterations were due to Dryden himself. The present text follows that of the Miscellany.]

ONCE I beheld the fairest of her kind:
(And still the sweet idea charms my mind:)
True, she was dumb; for Nature gaz'd so
long,

Pleas'd with her work, that she forgot her
tongue,

But, smiling, said: "She still shall gain the
prize;

I only have transferr'd it to her eyes."
Such are thy pictures, Kneller: such thy
skill,

That Nature seems obedient to thy will;
Comes out, and meets thy pencil in the
draught;

Lives there, and wants but words to speak
her thought. 10.

At least thy pictures look a voice; and we Imagine sounds, deceiv'd to that degree, }

We think 'tis somewhat more than just to
see. }

Shadows are but privations of the light;
Yet, when we walk, they shoot before the
sight;

With us approach, retire, arise, and fall;
Nothing themselves, and yet expressing all.

Such are thy pieces, imitating life

So near, they almost conquer'd in the strife;
And from their animated canvas came, ²⁰ Demanding souls, and loosen'd from the frame.

Prometheus, were he here, would cast
away

His Adam, and refuse a soul to clay;
And either would thy noble work inspire,
Or think it warm enough without his fire.

But vulgar hands may vulgar likeness
raise;

This is the least attendant on thy praise:
From hence the rudiments of art began;
A coal, or chalk, first imitated man:
Perhaps the shadow, taken on a wall, ³⁰
Gave outlines to the rude original;
Ere canvas yet was strain'd, before the
grace

Of blended colors found their use and
place,
Or cypress tablets first receiv'd a face.

By slow degrees, the godlike art advanc'd;
As man grew polish'd, picture was inanc'd:
Greece added posture, shade, and perspective;

And then the mimic piece began to live.
Yet perspective was lame, no distance true,
But all came forward in one common view: ⁴⁰
No point of light was known, no bounds of art;
When light was there, it knew not to depart,
But glaring on remoter objects play'd;
Not languish'd and insensibly decay'd.

Rome rais'd not art, but barely kept alive,
And with old Greece unequally did strive;
Till Goths and Vandals, a rude northern race,
Did all the matchless monuments deface.

Then all the Muses in one ruin lie,
And rhyme began t' enervate poetry. ⁵⁰

Thus, in a stupid military state,
The pen and pencil find an equal fate.
Flat faces, such as would disgrace a screen,
Such as in Bantam's embassy were seen,
Unrais'd, unrounded, were the rude delight
Of brutal nations, only born to fight.

Long time the sister arts, in iron sleep,
A heavy sabbath did supinely keep:
At length, in Raphael's age, at once they
rise,

Stretch all their limbs, and open all their eyes. ⁶⁰

Thence rose the Roman and the Lombard
line;

One color'd best, and one did best design.
Raphael's, like Homer's, was the nobler part,
But Titian's painting look'd like Virgil's art.

Thy genius gives thee both; where true
design,

Postures unforc'd, and lively colors join.
Likeness is ever there; but still the best,
Like proper thoughts in lofty language
dress'd:

Where light, to shades descending, plays, not strives,

Dies by degrees, and by degrees revives. ⁷⁰
Of various parts a perfect whole is wrought:
Thy pictures think, and we divine their
thought.

Shakespeare,* thy gift, I * Shakespeare's place before my sight; picture, drawn With awe, I ask his bless- by Sir Godfrey ing ere I write; Kneller and With reverence look on his given to the majestic face; author.

Proud to be less, but of his godlike race.
His soul inspires me, while thy praise I write,
And I, like Tencr, under Ajax fight:
Bids thee, thro' me, be bold; with dauntless
breast

Contemn the bad, and emulate the best. ⁸⁰
Like his, thy critics in th' attempt are lost:
When most they rail, know then, they envy
most.

In vain they snarl aloof; a noisy crowd,
Like women's anger, impotent and loud.
While they their barren industry deplore,
Pass on secure, and mind the goal before.
Old as she is, my Muse shall march behind,
Bear off the blast, and intercept the wind.
Our arts are sisters, tho' not twins in birth;
For hymns were sung in Eden's happy earth
By the first pair, while Eve was yet a saint,
Before she fell with pride, and learn'd to paint. ⁹²

Forgive th' allusion; 't was not meant to bite,
But satire will have room, where'er I write.
For O the painter Muse, tho' last in place,
Has seiz'd the blessing first, like Jacob's race.
Apelles' art an Alexander found,
And Raphael did with Leo's gold abound;
But Homer was with barren laurel crown'd. ⁹²

Thou hadst thy Charles a while, and ¹⁰⁰ had I;

But pass we that unpleasing image by.
Rich in thyself, and of thyself divine,
All pilgrims come and offer at thy shrine.
A graceful truth thy pencil can command;
The fair themselves go mended from thy
hand.

Likeness appears in every lineament;

But likeness in thy work is eloquent.
Tho' Nature there her true resemblance
bears,

A nobler beauty in thy piece appears.
So warm thy work, so glows the gen'rous frame, 110

Flesh looks less living in the lovely dame.
Thou paint'st as we describe, improving
still,

When on wild nature we ingraft our
skill;

But not creating beauties at our will.
Some other hand perhaps may reach a
face,

But none like thee a finish'd figure place:
None of this age; for that's enough for
thee,

The first of these inferior times to be,
Not to contend with heroes' memory.
Due honors to those mighty names we
grant, 120

But shrubs may live beneath the lofty plant;

Sons may succeed their greater parents
gone:

Such is thy lot, and such I wish my own.

But poets are confin'd in narr'wer space,
To speak the language of their native
place:

The painter widely stretcheth his command;
Thy pencil speaks the tongue of ev'ry land.
From hence, my friend, all climates are your own,

Nor can you forfeit, for you hold of none.

All nations all immunities will give 130
To make you theirs, where'er you please
to live;

And not seven cities, but the world would strive.

Sure some propitious planet then did
smile,

When first you were conducted to this
isle:

Our genius brought you here, t' enlarge our fame,

For your good stars are ev'rywhere the
same.

Thy matchless hand, of ev'ry region free,
Adopts our climate, not our climate thee.

Great Rome and Venice * * He travel'd very young into Italy.
early did impart
To thee th' examples of their wondrous art. 140

Those masters then, but seen, not understood,

With generous emulation fir'd thy blood;
For what in nature's dawn the child ad-
mir'd,

The youth endeavor'd, and the man ac-
quir'd.

That yet thou hast not reach'd their high
degree,

Seems only wanting to this age, not thee.

Thy genius, bounded by the times, like
mine,

Drudges on petty draughts, nor dare
design

A more exalted work, and more divine.

For what a song, or senseless opera 150
Is to the living labor of a play;

Or what a play to Virgil's work would be,
Such is a single piece to history.

But we, who life bestow, ourselves must
live;

Kings cannot reign unless their subjects
give;

And they who pay the taxes bear the rule:
Thus thou, sometimes, art forc'd to draw a fool;

But so his follies in thy posture sink,

The senseless idiot seems at least to think.

Good Heav'n! that sots and knaves should be so vain, 160

To wish their vile resemblance may remain!

And stand recorded, at their own request,
To future days, a libel or a jest!

Meantime, while just incouragement you
want,

You only paint to live, not live to paint.

Else should we see your noble pencil
trace

Our unities of action, time, and place;

A whole compos'd of parts, and those the
best,

With ev'ry various character express'd;

Heroes at large, and at a nearer view; 170

Less, and at distance, an ignobler crew;

While all the figures in one action join,

As tending to complete the main design.

More cannot be by mortal art express'd,

But venerable age shall add the rest:

For Time shall with his ready pencil stand;

Retouch your figures with his ripening
hand;

Mellow your colors, and imbrown the teint;

Add every grace, which Time alone can
grant;

To future ages shall your fame convey, 180

And give more beauties than he takes away.

AN ODE ON THE DEATH OF MR. HENRY PURCELL

LATE SERVANT TO HIS MAJESTY, AND ORGANIST OF THE CHAPEL ROYAL,
AND OF ST. PETER'S, WESTMINSTER

[Henry Purcell, the greatest musician of his time, died on November 21, 1695, at the age of thirty-seven. Dryden's ode was published in the next year, in a broadside, where it is twice printed, first by itself, and then with music written for it by Dr John Blow. It also appeared as one of several poems prefixed to Orpheus Britannicus, a collection of Purcell's music published in 1698.]

I

MARK how the lark and linnet sing;
With rival notes
They strain their warbling throats,
To welcome in the spring.
But in the close of night,
When Philomel begins her heav'nly lay,
They cease their mutual spite,
Drink in her music with delight,
And list'ning and silent, and silent and list'ning, and list'ning and silent obey.

II

So ceas'd the rival crew, when Purcell
came;
They sung no more, or only sung his fame;¹⁰
Struck dumb, they all admir'd the godlike
man:
The godlike man,
Alas! too soon retir'd,
As he too late began.
We beg not hell our Orpheus to restore:
Had he been there,
Their sovereigns' fear
Had sent him back before.
The pow'r of harmony too well they know:
He long ere this had tun'd their jarring sphere,²¹
And left no hell below.

III

The heav'nly choir, who heard his notes
from high,
Let down the scale of music from the sky:
They handed him along,
And all the way he taught, and all the way
they sung.
Ye brethren of the lyre, and tuneful voice,
Lament his lot; but at your own rejoice:

Now live secure, and linger out your
days;
The gods are pleas'd alone with Purcell's lays,³⁰
Nor know to mend their choice.

PREFACE AND EPILOGUE TO THE HUSBAND HIS OWN CUCKOLD

[This comedy, by John Dryden, Jr., the poet's second son, was published in July, 1696 (Malone, I, 1, 425, on the authority of an advertisement in the London Gazette), with a prologue by Congreve, and a dedication to Sir Robert Howard, the author's uncle. The play bore the appropriate Virgilian motto:

Et pater Æneus et avunculus excitet Hector. —
(Æneid, III, 343.)

Dryden's preface furnishes a delightful proof of his fatherly kindness. So also, in a different fashion, does the following excerpt from a letter to Tonson (Malone, I, 2, 48):

"Send word, if you please, Sir, what is the most you will give for my sonn's play, that I may take the fairest chapman, as I am bound to do for his benefit."]

PREFACE

I HAVE thought convenient to acquaint the reader with somewhat concerning this comedy, tho' perhaps not worth his knowledge. It was sent me from Italy some years since, by my second son, to try its fortune on the stage; and being the essay of a young unexperienc'd author, to confess the truth, I thought it not worthy of that honor. 'Tis true, I was not willing to discourage him so far as to tell him plainly my opinion, but it seems he guess'd somewhat of my mind, by my long delays of his expectation; and therefore, in my absence from the town last summer, took the boldness to dedicate his play to that person of honor whose name you will find before his epistle. It was receiv'd by that noble gentleman with so much candor and generosity, as neither my son nor I could deserve from him. Then the play was no longer in my power; the patron demanding it in his own right, it was deliver'd to him. And he was farther pleas'd, during my sickness, to put it into that method in which you find it; the loose scenes digested into order, and knit into a tale.

As it is, I think it may pass amongst the rest of our new plays: I know but two authors, and they are both my friends, who have done better since the Revolution. This I dare venture to maintain, that the taste of the age is wretchedly deprav'd in all sorts of poetry; nothing almost but what is abominably bad can please. The young hounds, who ought to come behind, now lead the pack; but they miserably mistake the scent. Their poets, worthy of such an audience, know not how to distinguish their characters; the manners are all alike, inconsistent and interfering with each other. There is scarce a man or woman of God's making in all their farces: yet they raise an unnatural sort of laughter, the common effect of buffoonry; and the rabble, which takes this for wit, will endure no better, because 'tis above their understanding. This account I take from the best judges; for I thank God, I have had the grace hitherto to avoid the seeing or reading of their gallimaufries. But 'tis the latter end of a century, and I hope the next will begin better.

This play, I dare assure the reader, is none of those; it may want beauties, but the faults are neither gross nor many. Perfection in any art is not suddenly obtain'd: the author of this, to his misfortune, left his country at a time when he was to have learn'd the language. The story he has treated was an accident which happen'd at Rome, tho' he has transferr'd the scene to England. If it shall please God to restore him to me, I may perhaps inform him better of the rules of writing; and if I am not partial, he has already shewn that a genius is not wanting to him. All that I can reasonably fear is, that the perpetual good success of ill plays may make him endeavor to please by writing worse, and by accommodating himself to the wretched capacity and liking of the present audience, from which, Heaven defend any of my progeny! A poet, indeed, must live by the many; but a good poet will make it his business to please the few. I will not proceed farther on a subject which arraigns so many of the readers.

For what remains, both my son and I are extremely oblig'd to my dear friend, Mr. Congreve, whose excellent prologue was one of the greatest ornaments of the play. Neither is my epilogue the worst which I have written; tho' it seems, at the first sight, to expose our young clergy with too much freedom. It was on that consideration that I had once begun it otherwise, and deliver'd the copy of it to be spoken, in case the first part of it had given offense. This I will give you, partly in my own justification, and partly too because I think it not unworthy of your sight; only rememb'ring you that the last line connects the sense to the ensuing part of it. — Farewell, reader: if you are a father, you will forgive me; if not, you will when you are a father.

Time was, when none could preach without degrees,
And seven years' toil at universities;
But when the canting saints came once in play,
The spirit did their business in a day:
A zealous cobbler, with the gift of tongue,
If he could pray six hours, might preach as long.
Thus, in the primitive times of poetry,
The stage to none but men of sense was free.
But thanks to your judicious taste, my masters,
It lies in common, now, to poetasters.
You set them up, and till you dare condemn,
The satire lies on you, and not on them.
When mountebanks their drugs at market cry,
Is it their fault to sell, or yours to buy?
'Tis true, they write with ease, and well they may;
Flyblows are gotten every summer's day;
The poet does but buzz, and there's a play.
Wit's not his business, &c.

EPILOGUE

SPOKEN BY MRS. BRACEGIRDLE

LIKE some raw sophister that mounts the pulpit,
So trembles a young poet at a full pit.
Unus'd to crowds, the parson quakes for
fear,
And wonders how the devil he durst come
there;
Wanting three talents needful for the
place,
Some beard, some learning, and some little
grace:
Nor is the puny poet void of care;
For authors, such as our new authors
are,
Have not much learning, nor much wit
to spare;
And as for grace, to tell the truth, there's scarce one
But has as little as the very parson.
Both say, they preach and write for your instruction;
But 'tis for a third day, and for induction.
The difference is, that tho' you like the
play,
The poet's gain is ne'er beyond his day;
But with the parson 'tis another case;
He, without holiness, may rise to grace.
The poet has one disadvantage more,
That if his play be dull, he's damn'd all
o'er,
Not only a damn'd blockhead, but damn'd
poor.
But dulness well becomes the sable gar-
ment;
I warrant that ne'er spoil'd a priest's preferment:

Wit's not his business, and, as wit now
 goes,
 Sirs, 't is not so much yours as you suppose,
 For you like nothing now but nauseous
 beaux.
 You laugh not, gallants, as by proof appears,
 At what his beauship says, but what he
 wears;
 So 't is your eyes are tickled, not your
 ears:
 The tailor and the furrier find the stuff,
 The wit lies in the dress, and monstrous
 muff.

30

The truth on 't is, the payment of the
 pit
 Is like for like, clipp'd money for clipp'd
 wit.
 You cannot from our absent author hope,
 He should equip the stage with such a fop:
 Fools change in England, and new fools
 arise;
 For tho' th' immortal species never dies,
 Yet ev'ry year new maggots make new flies.
 But where he lives abroad, he scarce can
 find
 One fool, for million that he left behind.

TRANSLATION OF VIRGIL

[From the close of 1693 (see letter to Walsh, December 12, 1693, in Scott-Saintsbury edition, xviii, 191) until the summer of 1697, Dryden devoted nearly all his energies to his translation of Virgil. On June 28, 1697, an advertisement in the London Gazette states: "Virgil . . . will be finished this week, and be ready next week to be delivered, as subscribed for, in Quires, upon bringing the Receipt for the first Payment, and paying the second." This first edition is a stately folio, with title-page reading as follows:

THE WORKS OF VIRGIL: Containing His PASTORALS.
 GEORGICS.
 AND ÆNEIS.

Translated into English Verse; By Mr. DRYDEN.

Adorn'd with a Hundred Sculptures.

Sequiturque Patrem non passibus Æquis. Virg. Æn. 2.

LONDON,
 Printed for Jacob Tonson, at the Judges-Head in Fleetstreet, near the Inner-Temple-Gate, MDCXCVII.

The volume contained, besides the work of Dryden here reprinted, a Life of Virgil and a Preface to the Pastorals by Knightly Chetwood, an Essay on the Georgics by Addison, who also wrote "all the arguments in prose to the whole translation" (see p. 519, below, and Notes,

p. 1009, below), and, finally, several complimentary poems, and lists of subscribers to the work. The sculptures were from the plates, somewhat retouched, that had formerly been used for Ogleby's Virgil.

Soon after the volume was published, Dryden undertook a revision of it, which occupied him for only nine days. (See letter from Dryden to Tonson: Malone, I, 2, 61.) The second edition, which is the basis of the present text, was also in folio, and appeared in 1698. The third edition, in three volumes, octavo, was not printed until 1709.]

PASTORALS

HUGH, LORD CLIFFORD

BARON OF CHUDLEIGH

MY LORD,
I HAVE found it not more difficult to translate Virgil, than to find such patrons as I desire for my translation. For, tho' England is not wanting in a learned nobility, yet such are my unhappy circumstances, that they have confin'd me to a narrow choice. To the greater part I have not the honor to be known; and to some of them I cannot shew at present, by any public act, that grateful respect which I shall ever bear them in my heart. Yet I have no reason to complain of fortune, since in the midst of that abundance I could not possibly have chosen better than the worthy son of so illustrious a father. He was the patron of my manhood, when I flourish'd in the opinion of the world; tho' with small advantage to my fortune, till he awaken'd the remembrance of my royal master. He was that Pollio, or that Varus, who introduc'd me to Augustus; and, tho' he soon dismiss'd himself from state affairs, yet in the short time of his administration he shone so powerfully upon me, that, like the heat of a Russian summer, he ripen'd the fruits of poetry in a cold climate, and gave me wherewithal to subsist, at least, in the long winter which succeeded. What I now offer to your Lordship is the wretched remainder of a sickly age, worn out with study, and oppress'd by fortune; without other support than the constancy and patience of a Christian. You, my Lord, are yet in the flower of your youth, and may live to enjoy the benefits of the peace which is promis'd Europe. I can only hear of that blessing; for years, and, above all things, want of health, have shut me out from sharing in the happiness. The poets, who condemn their Tantalus to hell, had added to his torments if they had plac'd him in Elysium, which is the proper emblem of my condition. The fruit and the water may reach my lips, but cannot enter; and, if they could, yet I want a palate as well as a digestion. But it is some kind of pleasure to me, to please those whom I respect. And I am not altogether out of hope that these Pastorals of Virgil may give your Lordship some delight, tho' made English by one who scarce remembers that passion which inspir'd my author when he wrote them. These were his first essay in poetry, (if the Ceiris was not his,) and it was more excusable in him to describe love when he was young, than for me to translate him when I am old. He died at the age of fifty-two; and I began this work in my great climacteric. But having perhaps a better constitution than my author, I have wrong'd him less, considering my circumstances, than those who have attempted him before, either in our own, or any modern language. And, tho' this version is not void of errors, yet it comforts me that the faults of others are not worth finding. Mine are neither gross nor frequent in those eclogues wherein my master has rais'd himself above that humble style in which pastoral delights, and which I must confess is proper to the education and converse of shepherds; for he found the strength of his genius betimes, and was even in his youth preluding to his Georgics and his Aeneis. He could not forbear to try his wings, tho' his pinions were not harden'd to maintain a long laborious flight. Yet sometimes they bore him to a pitch as lofty as ever he was able to reach afterwards. But, when he was admonish'd by his subject to descend, he came down gently circling in the air, and singing, to the ground; like a lark, melodious in her mounting, and continuing her song till she alights, still preparing for a higher flight at her next sally, and tuning her voice to better music. The Fourth, the Sixth, and the Eighth Pastorals are clear evidences of this truth. In the three first he contains himself within his bounds; but, addressing to Pollio, his great patron, and himself no vulgar poet, he no longer could restrain the freedom of his spirit, but began to assert his native character, which is sublimity — putting himself under the conduct of the same Cumæan Sibyl whom afterwards he gave for a guide to his Aeneas. 'Tis true he was sensible of his own boldness; and we know it by the paulo majora which begins his Fourth Eclogue. He remember'd, like young Manlius, that he was forbidden to engage; but what avails an express command to a youthful courage which presages victory in the attempt? Encourag'd with success, he proceeds farther in the Sixth, and invades the province of philosophy. And notwithstanding that Phebus had forewarn'd him of singing wars, as he there confesses, yet he presum'd that the search of nature was as free to him as to Lucretius, who at his age explain'd it according to the principles of Epicurus. In his Eighth Eclogue he has innovated nothing; the former part of it being the complaint and despair of a forsaken lover; the latter, a charm of an enchantress, to renew a lost affection. But the complaint perhaps contains some topics which are above the condition of his persons; and our author seems to have made his herdsmen somewhat too learn'd for their profession: the charms are also of the same nature; but both were copied from Theocritus, and had receiv'd the applause of former ages in their original. There is a kind of rusticity in all those pompous verses; somewhat of a holiday shepherd strutting in his country buskins. The like may be observ'd both in the Pollio and the Silenus, where the similitudes are drawn from the woods and meadows. They seem to me to represent our poet betwixt a farmer and a courtier, when he left Mantua for Rome, and dress'd himself in his best habit to appear before his patron, somewhat too fine for the place from whence he came, and yet retaining part of its simplicity. In the Ninth Pastoral he collects some beautiful passages which were scatter'd in Theocritus, which he could not insert into any of his former eclogues, and yet was unwilling they should be lost. In all the rest he is equal to his Sicilian master, and observes, like him, a just decorum both of the subject and the persons; as particularly in the Third Pastoral, where one of his shepherds describes a bowl, or mazer, curiously carv'd:

In medio duo signa: Conon, et quis fuit alter, Descripsit radio totum qui gentibus orbem;

He remembers only the name of Conon, and forgets the other on set purpose; (whether he means Anaximander, or Endoxus. I dispute not;) but he was certainly forgotten, to shew his country swain was no great scholar.

After all, I must confess that the boorish dialect of Theocritus has a secret charm in it which the Roman language cannot imitate, tho' Virgil has drawn it down as low as possibly he could; as in the cujum pecus, and some other words, for which he was so unjustly blam'd by the bad critics of his age, who could not see the beauties of that merum rus which the poet describ'd in those expressions. But Theocritus may justly be preferr'd as the original, without injury to Virgil, who modestly contents himself with the second place, and glories only in being the first who transplanted pastoral into his own country, and brought it there to bear as happily as the cherry trees which Lucullus brought from Pontus.

Our own nation has produc'd a third poet in this kind, not inferior to the two former. For the Shepherds' Kalendar of Spenser is not to be match'd in any modern language, not even by Tasso's Aminta, which infinitely transcends Guarini's Pastor Fido, as having more of nature in it, and being almost wholly clear from the wretched affectation of learning. I will say nothing of the Piscatory Eclogues, because no modern Latin can bear criticism. 'Tis no wonder that rolling down, thro' so many barbarous ages, from the spring of Virgil, it bears along with it the filth and ordures of the Goths and Vandals. Neither will I mention Monsieur Fontenelle, the living glory of the French. 'Tis enough for him to have excell'd his master Lucian, without attempting to compare our miserable age with that of Virgil or Theocritus. Let me only add, for his reputation:

— *Si Pergama dextra
Defendi possint, etiam hac defensa fuissent.*

But Spenser, being master of our northern dialect, and skill'd in Chaucer's English, has so exactly imitated the Doric of Theocritus that his love is a perfect image of that passion which God infus'd into both sexes, before it was corrupted with the knowledge of arts, and the ceremonies of what we call good manners.

My Lord, I know to whom I dedicate; and could not have been induc'd by any motive to put this part of Virgil, or any other, into unlearned hands. You have read him with pleasure, and, I dare say, with admiration, in the Latin, of which you are a master. You have added to your natural endowments, which, without flattery, are eminent, the superstructures of study, and the knowledge of good authors. Courage, probity, and humanity are inherent in you. These virtues have ever been habitual to the ancient house of Cumberland, from whence you are descended, and of which our chronicles make so honorable mention in the long wars betwixt the rival families of York and Lancaster. Your forefathers have asserted the party which they chose till death, and died for its defense in the fields of battle. You have, besides, the fresh remembrance of your noble father, from whom you never can degenerate.

— Nec inbellum feroces Progenerant aquila columban.

It being almost morally impossible for you to be other than you are by kind, I need neither praise nor incite your virtue. You are acquainted with the Roman history, and know without my information that patronage and clientship always descended from the fathers to the sons, and that the same plebeian houses had recourse to the same patrician line which had formerly protected them, and follow'd their principles and fortunes to the last. So that I am your Lordship's by descent, and part of your inheritance. And the natural inclination which I have to serve you adds to your paternal right; for I was wholly yours from the first moment when I had the happiness and honor of being known to you. Be pleas'd therefore to accept the rudiments of Virgil's poetry, coarsely translated, I confess, but which yet retains some beauties of the author, which neither the barbarity of our language, nor my unskilfulness, could so much sully, but that they appear sometimes in the dim mirror which I hold before you. The subject is not unsuitable to your youth, which allows you yet to love, and is proper to your present scene of life. Rural recreations abroad, and books at home, are the innocent pleasures of a man who is early wise, and gives Fortune no more hold of him than of necessity he must. 'Tis good, on some occasions, to think beforehand as little as we can; to enjoy as much of the present as will not endanger our futurity; and to provide ourselves of the virtuoso's saddle, which will be sure to amble, when the world is upon the hardest trot. What I humbly offer to your Lordship is of this nature. I wish it pleasant, and am sure 't is innocent. May you ever continue your esteem for Virgil, and not lessen it for the faults of his translator; who is, with all manner of respect and sense of gratitude,

My Lord.

Your Lordship's most humble,
and most obedient servant,
JOHN DRYDEN.

THE FIRST PASTORAL

OR, TITYRUS AND MELIBŒUS

THE ARGUMENT

The occasion of the First Pastoral was this. When Augustus had settled himself in the Roman Empire, that he might reward his veteran troops for their past service, he distributed among 'em all the lands that lay about Cremona and Mantua, turning out the right owners for having sided with his enemies. Virgil was a sufferer among the rest, who afterwards recover'd his estate by Maecenas's intercession; and, as an instance of his gratitude, compos'd the following pastoral, where he sets out his own good fortune in the person of Tityrus, and the calamities of his Mantuan neighbors in the character of Melibœus

MELIBŒUS

BENEATH the shade which beechen boughs diffuse,
You, Tit'rus, entertain your sylvan Muse:
Round the wide world in banishment we roam,
Forc'd from our pleasing fields and native home;
While, stretch'd at ease, you sing your happy loves,
And Amaryllis fills the shady groves.

TITYRUS

These blessings, friend, a deity bestow'd;
For never can I deem him less than god.
The tender firstlings of my woolly breed
Shall on his holy altar often bleed.¹⁰
He gave my kine to graze the flow'ry plain,
And to my pipe renew'd the rural strain.

MELIBŒUS

I envy not your fortune, but admire,
That, while the raging sword and wasteful fire
Destroy the wretched neighborhood around,
No hostile arms approach your happy ground.
Far diff'rent is my fate; my feeble goats
With pains I drive from their forsaken cotes:
And this, you see, I scarcely drag along,
Who, yearning, on the rocks has left her young,²⁰
The hope and promise of my failing fold.
My loss, by dire portents, the gods foretold;
For, had I not been blind, I might have seen
Yon riven oak, the fairest of the green;
And the hoarse raven, on the blasted bough,
By croaking from the left, presag'd the coming blow.
But tell me, Tityrus, what heav'nly power
Preserv'd your fortunes in that fatal hour?

TITYRUS

Fool that I was, I thought imperial Rome
Like Mantua, where on market days we come,³⁰
And thither drive our tender lambs from home.
So kids and whelps their sires and dams express,
And so the great I measur'd by the less.

But country towns, compar'd with her,
 appear
 Like shrubs when lofty cypresses are near.

MELIBŒUS

What great occasion call'd you hence to Rome?

TITYRUS

Freedom, which came at length, tho' slow to come.

Nor did my search of liberty begin,
 Till my black hairs were chang'd upon my
 chin;

Nor Amaryllis would vouchsafe a look, 40
 Till Galatea's meaner bonds I broke.

Till then a helpless, hopeless, homely
 swain,

I sought not freedom, nor aspir'd to gain:
 Tho' many a victim from my folds was bought,

And many a cheese to country markets
 brought,

Yet all the little that I got, I spent,
 And still return'd as empty as I went.

MELIBŒUS

We stood amaz'd to see your mistress
 mourn,

Unknowing that she pin'd for your return;

We wonder'd why she kept her fruit so
 long, 50

For whom so late th' ungather'd apples
 hung.

But now the wonder ceases, since I see
 She kept them only, Tityrus, for thee:

For thee the bubbling springs appear'd to
 mourn,

And whisp'ring pines made vows for thy return.

TITYRUS

What should I do! While here I was en-chain'd,

No glimpse of godlike liberty remain'd;
 Nor could I hope, in any place but there,

To find a god so present to my pray'r.
 There first the youth of heav'nly birth I
 view'd, 60

For whom our monthly victims are renew'd.

He heard my vows, and graciously decreed
 My grounds to be restor'd, my former flocks to feed.

MELIBŒUS

O fortunate old man! whose farm remains

For you sufficient, and requites your
 pains;

Tho' rushes overspread the neighb'ring
 plains,

Tho' here the marshy grounds approach
 your fields,

And there the soil a stony harvest yields.
 Your teeming ewes shall no strange meadows try,

Nor fear a rot from tainted company. 70
 Behold! you bord'ring fence of fallow trees
 Is fraught with flow'rs, the flow'rs are fraught with bees:

The busy bees, with a soft murm'ring strain,
 Invite to gentle sleep the lab'ring swain;

While, from the neighb'ring rock, with rural songs,

The pruner's voice the pleasing dream pro-
 longs;

Stockdoves and turtles tell their am'rous
 pain,

And, from the lofty elms, of love complain.

TITYRUS

Th' inhabitants of seas and skies shall change,

And fish on shore and stags in air shall range, 80

The banish'd Parthian dwell on Arar's
 brink,

And the blue German shall the Tigris
 drink,

Ere I, forsaking gratitude and truth,
 Forget the figure of that godlike youth.

MELIBŒUS

But we must beg our bread in climes un-
 known,

Beneath the scorching or the freezing zone;
 And some to far Oasis shall be sold,

Or try the Libyan heat, or Seythian cold;
 The rest among the Britons be confin'd, 80

A race of men from all the world dis-
 join'd.

O! must the wretched exiles ever mourn,
 Nor after length of rolling years return?

Are we condemn'd by fate's unjust decree
 No more our houses and our homes to
 see?

Or shall we mount again the rural throne,
 And rule the country kingdoms, once our
 own?

Did we for these barbarians plant and sow ?
On these, on these, our happy fields bestow ?
Good Heav'n ! what dire effects from civil discord flow !
Now let me graff my pears, and prune the
vine ;
The fruit is theirs, the labor only mine. 100
Farewell, my pastures, my paternal stock,
My fruitful fields, and my more fruitful
flock !
No more, my goats, shall I behold you climb
The steepy cliffs, or crop the flow'ry thyme !
No more, extended in the grot below,
Shall see you browsing on the mountain's
brow
The prickly shrubs ; and after, on the bare, Lean down the deep abyss, and hang in
air.
No more my sheep shall sip the morning dew ;
No more my song shall please the rural
crew : 110
Adieu, my tuneful pipe ! and all the world, adieu !

TITYRUS

This night, at least, with me forget your
care ;
Chestnuts and curds and cream shall be your fare :
The carpet-ground shall be with leaves o'er-
spread,
And boughs shall weave a cov'ring for your
head.
For see yon sunny hill the shade extends,
And curling smoke from cottages ascends.

THE SECOND PASTORAL

OR, ALEXIS

THE ARGUMENT

The commentators can by no means agree on the person of Alexis, but are all of opinion that some beautiful youth is meant by him, to whom Virgil here makes love, in Corydon's language and simplicity. His way of courtship is wholly pastoral : he complains of the boy's coyness ; recommends himself for his beauty and skill in piping ; invites the youth into the country, where he promises him
the diversions of the place, with a suitable present of nuts and apples ; but when he finds nothing will prevail, he resolves to quit his troublesome amour, and betake himself again to his former business.

YOUNG Corydon, th' unhappy shepherd
swain,

The fair Alexis lov'd, but lov'd in vain ;
And underneath the beechen shade, alone,
Thus to the woods and mountains made his moan :

Is this, unkind Alexis, my reward ?
And must I die unpitied, and unheard ?
Now the green lizard in the grove is laid,
The sheep enjoy the coolness of the shade,
And Thestylis wild thyme and garlic beats
For harvest hinds, o'erspent with toil and heats ; 10

While in the scorching sun I trace in vain
Thy flying footsteps o'er the burning plain.
The creaking locusts with my voice con-
spire,
They fried with heat, and I with fierce desire.

How much more easy was it to sustain
Proud Amaryllis and her haughty reign,
The scorns of young Menalcas, once my
care,

Tho' he was black, and thou art heav'nly
fair !

Trust not too much to that enchanting face ;
Beauty's a charm, but soon the charm will
pass. 20

White lilies lie neglected on the plain,
While dusky hyacinths for use remain.
My passion is thy scorn ; nor wilt thou
know

What wealth I have, what gifts I can bestow ;

What stores my dairies and my folds contain —

A thousand lambs, that wander on the
plain ;

New milk, that all the winter never fails,
And all the summer overflows the pails.

Amphion sung not sweeter to his herd,
When summon'd stones the Theban turrets
rear'd. 30

Nor am I so deform'd ; for late I stood
Upon the margin of the briny flood :
The winds were still ; and, if the glass be
true,

With Daphnis I may vie, tho' judg'd by
you.

O leave the noisy town ! O come and see
Our country cots, and live content with me !

To wound the flying deer, and from their cotes

With me to drive afield the browsing goats;
To pipe and sing, and, in our country strain,
To copy, or perhaps contend with Pan. ⁴⁰
Pan taught to join with wax unequal reeds;
Pan loves the shepherds, and their flocks
he feeds.

Nor scorn the pipe: Amyntas, to be taught,
With all his kisses would my skill have bought.

Of seven smooth joints a mellow pipe I
have,

Which with his dying breath Damoetas
gave,

And said: "This, Corydon, I leave to thee;
For only thou deserv'st it after me."

His eyes Amyntas durst not upward lift;
For much he grudg'd the praise, but more the gift. ⁵⁰

Besides, two kids, that in the valley stray'd,
I found by chance, and to my fold convey'd:
They drain two bagging udders every day;
And these shall be companions of thy play;
Both fleck'd with white, the true Arcadian
strain,

Which Thestylis had often begg'd in vain:
And she shall have them, if again she sues,
Since you the giver and the gift refuse.

Come to my longing arms, my lovely care,
And take the presents which the nymphs prepare. ⁶⁰

White lilies in full canisters they bring,
With all the glories of the purple spring.
The daughters of the flood have search'd
the mead

For violets pale, and cropp'd the poppy's
head,

The short narcissus and fair daffodil,
Pansies to please the sight, and cassia
sweet to smell;

And set soft hyacinths with iron blue,
To shade marsh marigolds of shining hue;
Some bound in order, others loosely strow'd,
To dress thy bow'r, and trim thy new abode. ⁷⁰

Myself will search our planted grounds at
home

For downy peaches and the glossy plum;
And thrash the chestnuts in the neighb'ring
grove,

Such as my Amaryllis us'd to love.
The laurel and the myrtle sweets agree,
And both in nosegays shall be bound for thee.
Ah, Corydon! ah, poor unhappy swain!

Alexis will thy homely gifts disdain:

Nor, shouldst thou offer all thy little store,
Will rich Iolas yield, but offer more. ⁸⁰
What have I done, to name that wealthy
swain,

So powerful are his presents, mine so mean!
The boar amidst my crystal streams I bring;
And southern winds to blast my flow'ry
spring.

Ah, cruel creature, whom dost thou despise?
The gods, to live in woods, have left the
skies;

And godlike Paris, in th' Idæan grove,
To Priam's wealth preferr'd (Enone's love.
In cities which she built let Pallas reign;
Tow'rs are for gods, but forests for the swain.
The greedy lioness the wolf pursues, ⁹¹
The wolf the kid, the wanton kid the browse;
Alexis, thou art chas'd by Corydon:

All follow sev'ral games, and each his own.
See, from afar, the fields no longer smoke;
The sweating steers, unharness'd from the
yoke,

Bring, as in triumph, back the crooked plow;
The shadows lengthen as the sun goes low.
Cool breezes now the raging heats remove:
Ah, cruel Heaven, that made no cure for love! ¹⁰⁰

I wish for balmy sleep, but wish in vain;
Love has no bounds in pleasure, or in pain.
What frenzy, shepherd, has thy soul pos-
sess'd?

Thy vineyard lies half prun'd, and half un-
dress'd.

Quench, Corydon, thy long unanswer'd fire;
Mind what the common wants of life require:
On willow twigs employ thy weaving care,
And find an easier love, tho' not so fair.

THE THIRD PASTORAL

OR, PALÆMON

MENALCAS, DAMOETAS, PALÆMON

THE ARGUMENT

Damoetas and Menalcas, after some smart strokes of country raillery, resolve to try who has the most skill at a song; and accordingly make their neighbor Palæmon judge of their performances; who, after a full hearing of both parties, declares himself unfit for the decision of so weighty a controversy, and leaves the victory undetermin'd.

MENALCAS

Ho, swain, what shepherd owns those ragged sheep?

DAMCETAS

Egon's they are: he gave 'em me to keep.

MENALCAS

Unhappy sheep, of an unhappy swain! }
While he Neæra courts, but courts in vain, }
And fears that I the damsel shall obtain; } Thou, varlet, dost thy master's gains de-
vour;
Thou milk'st his ewes, and often twice an
hour;
Of grass and fodder thou defraud'st the dams,
And of their mothers' dugs the starving lambs.

DAMCETAS

Good words, young catamite, at least to men. ¹⁰
We know who did your business, how, and when;
And in what chapel too you play'd your
prize,
And what the goats observ'd with leer-
ing eyes:
The nymphs were kind, and laugh'd; and there your safety lies. }

MENALCAS

Yes, when I cropp'd the hedges of the leys, Cut Micon's tender vines, and stole the stays!

DAMCETAS

Or rather, when, beneath yon ancient oak,
The bow of Daphnis and the shafts you
broke,
When the fair boy receiv'd the gift of
right;
And, but for mischief, you had died for spite. ²⁰

MENALCAS

What nonsense would the fool thy master
prate,
When thou, his knave, canst talk at such a
rate!
Did I not see you, rascal, did I not,
When you lay snug to snap young Damon's goat?
His mungril bark'd; I ran to his relief,

And cried: "There, there he goes! stop,
stop the thief!"

Discover'd, and defeated of your prey,
You skulk'd behind the fence, and sneak'd
away.

DAMCETAS

An honest man may freely take his own;
The goat was mine, by singing fairly won.
A solemn match was made; he lost the prize. ³¹
Ask Damon, ask if he the debt denies.
I think he dares not; if he does, he lies. }

MENALCAS

Thou sing with him, thou booby! Never pipe
Was so profan'd to touch that blubber'd lip.
Dunce at the best! in streets but scarce
allow'd
To tickle, on thy straw, the stupid crowd.

DAMCETAS

To bring it to the trial, will you dare
Our pipes, our skill, our voices, to compare?
My brinded heifer to the stake I lay; ⁴⁰
Two thriving calves she suckles twice a
day,
And twice besides her beestings never fail
To store the dairy with a brimming pail.
Now back your singing with an equal stake.

MENALCAS

That should be seen, if I had one to make.
You know too well, I feed my father's flock;
What can I wager from the common stock?
A stepdame too I have, a cursed she,
Who rules my henpeck'd sire, and orders
me.
Both number twice a day the milky dams;
And once she takes the tale of all the lambs. ⁵¹
But, since you will be mad, and since you
may Suspect my courage, if I should not lay,
The pawn I proffer shall be full as good:
Two bowls I have, well turn'd, of beechen
wood;
Both by divine Alcimedon were made;
To neither of them yet the lip is laid.
The lids are ivy; grapes in clusters lurk
Beneath the carving of the curious work.

Two figures on the sides emboss'd appear — Conon, and what's his name who made the sphere,
 And shew'd the seasons of the sliding
 year,
 Instructed in his trade the lab'ring swain,
 And when to reap, and when to sow the grain?

DAMCETAS

And I have two, to match your pair, at
 home:
 The wood the same; from the same hand
 they come
 (The kimbo handles seem with bear's-foot carv'd),
 And never yet to table have been serv'd;
 Where Orpheus on his lyre laments his love,
 With beasts encompass'd, and a dancing
 grove.
 But these, nor all the proffers you can
 make,
 Are worth the heifer which I set to stake.

MENALCAS

No more delays, vain boaster, but begin!
 I prophesy beforehand I shall win.
 Palæmon shall be judge how ill you rhyme;
 I'll teach you how to brag another time.

DAMCETAS

Rhymer, come on, and do the worst you
 can!
 I fear not you, nor yet a better man.
 With silence, neighbor, and attention, wait;
 For 't is a business of a high debate.

PALÆMON

Sing then; the shade affords a proper
 place:
 The trees are cloth'd with leaves, the fields
 with grass;
 The blossoms blow, the birds on bushes sing,
 And Nature has accomplish'd all the spring.
 The challenge to Damcetas shall belong;
 Menalcas shall sustain his undersong.
 Each in his turn your tuneful numbers
 bring;
 By turns the tuneful Muses love to sing.

DAMCETAS

From the great Father of the Gods above
 My Muse begins; for all is full of Jove:

To Jove the care of heav'n and earth belongs;
 My flocks he blesses, and he loves my songs.

MENALCAS

Me Phœbus loves; for he my Muse inspires,
 And in her songs the warmth he gave requires.
 For him, the god of shepherds and their
 sheep,
 My blushing hyacinths and my bays I keep.

DAMCETAS

My Phyllis me with pelted apples plies;
 Then tripping to the woods the wanton
 hies,
 And wishes to be seen before she flies.

MENALCAS

But fair Amyntas comes unask'd to
 me,
 And offers love, and sits upon my knee:
 Not Delia to my dogs is known so well as he.

DAMCETAS

To the dear mistress of my lovesick mind,
 Her swain a pretty present has design'd:
 I saw two stockdoves billing, and ere long Will take the nest, and hers shall be the young.

MENALCAS

Ten ruddy wildings in the wood I found,
 And stood on tiptoes, reaching from the
 ground:
 I sent Amyntas all my present store;
 And will, to-morrow, send as many more.

DAMCETAS

The lovely maid lay panting in my arms,
 And all she said and did was full of charms.
 Winds, on your wings to heav'n her accents
 bear;
 Such words as heav'n alone is fit to hear.

MENALCAS

Ah! what avails it me, my love's delight,
 To call you mine, when absent from my sight!
 I hold the nets, while you pursue the prey,
 And must not share the dangers of the day.

DAMCETAS

I keep my birthday: send my Phyllis home;
 At shearing time, Iolas, you may come.

MENALCAS

With Phyllis I am more in grace than you;
 Her sorrow did my parting steps pursue:
 "Adieu, my dear," she said, "a long adieu!"

DAMETAS

The nightly wolf is baneful to the fold,
 Storms to the wheat, to buds the bitter
 cold;
 But, from my frowning fair, more ills I
 find,
 Than from the wolves, and storms, and winter wind.

MENALCAS

The kids with pleasure browse the bushy
 plain;
 The show'rs are grateful to the swelling
 grain;
 To teeming ewes the sallow's tender tree; ¹³⁰
 But, more than all the world, my love to me.

DAMETAS

Pollio my rural verse vouchsafes to read:
 A heifer, Muses, for your patron breed.

MENALCAS

My Pollio writes himself: a bull be bred,
 With spurning heels, and with a butting head.

DAMETAS

Who Pollio loves, and who his Muse admires,
 Let Pollio's fortune crown his full desires.
 Let myrrh instead of thorn his fences fill,
 And show'rs of honey from his oaks distil.

MENALCAS

Who hates not living Bavius, let him be, ¹⁴⁰ Dead Mævius, damn'd to love thy works and
 thee!
 The same ill taste of sense would serve to
 join
 Dog-foxes in the yoke, and shear the swine.

DAMETAS

Ye boys, who pluck the flow'rs, and spoil
 the spring,
 Beware the secret snake that shoots a sting.

MENALCAS

Graze not too near the banks, my jolly sheep;
 The ground is false, the running streams are
 deep:

See, they have caught the father of the flock,
 Who dries his fleece upon the neighb'ring rock.

DAMETAS

From rivers drive the kids, and sling your hook;
 Anon I'll wash 'em in the shallow brook. ¹⁵⁰

MENALCAS

To fold, my flock! When milk is dried with heat,
 In vain the milkmaid tugs an empty teat.

DAMETAS

How lank my bulls from plenteous pasture
 come!
 But love, that drains the herd, destroys the groom.

MENALCAS

My flocks are free from love, yet look so
 thin,
 Their bones are barely cover'd with their
 skin.
 What magic has bewitch'd the woolly dams,
 And what ill eyes beheld the tender lambs?

DAMETAS

Say, where the round of heav'n, which all contains, ¹⁶⁰
 To three short ells on earth our sight re-
 strains:
 Tell that, and rise a Phœbus for thy pains.

MENALCAS

Nay, tell me first, in what new region springs
 A flow'r that bears inscrib'd the names of
 kings;
 And thou shalt gain a present as divine
 As Phœbus' self; for Phyllis shall be thine.

PALEMON

So nice a diff'rence in your singing lies,
 That both have won, or both deserv'd the
 prize.
 Rest equal happy both; and all who prove
 The bitter sweets, and pleasing pains, of love. ¹⁷⁰
 Now dam the ditches, and the floods re-
 strain;
 Their moisture has already drench'd the
 plain.

THE FOURTH PASTORAL

OR, POLLIO

THE ARGUMENT

The poet celebrates the birthday of Salonus, the son of Pollio, born in the consulship of his father, after the taking of Salonæ, a city in Dalmatia. Many of the verses are translated from one of the Sibyls, who prophesy of our Savior's birth.

SICILIAN Muse, begin a loftier strain !
Tho' lowly shrubs, and trees that shade the plain,
Delight not all; Sicilian Muse, prepare
To make the vocal woods deserve a consul's care.

The last great age, foretold by sacred rhymes,
Renews its finish'd course: Saturnian times
Roll round again; and mighty years, begun
From their first orb, in radiant circles run.

The base degenerate iron offspring ends;
A golden progeny from heav'n descends. 10
O chaste Lucina, speed the mother's pains,
And haste the glorious birth! thy own Apollo reigns!

The lovely boy, with his auspicious face,
Shall Pollio's consulship and triumph
grace;
Majestic months set out with him to their appointed race. }

The father banish'd virtue shall restore,
And crimes shall threat the guilty world no more.

The son shall lead the life of gods, and be
By gods and heroes seen, and gods and heroes
see.

The jarring nations he in peace shall bind, 20
And with paternal virtues rule mankind.
Unbidden Earth shall wreathing ivy bring,
And fragrant herbs (the promises of
spring),

As her first off'rings to her infant king. }
The goats with strutting dugs shall homeward speed,

And lowing herds secure from lions feed.
His cradle shall with rising flow'rs be
crown'd:

The serpent's brood shall die; the sacred
ground

Shall weeds and pois'nous plants refuse to
bear;

Each common bush shall Syrian roses wear. 30

But when heroic verse his youth shall raise,
And form it to hereditary praise,
Unlabor'd harvests shall the fields adorn,
And cluster'd grapes shall blush on every thorn;

The knotted oaks shall show'rs of honey weep,

And thro' the matted grass the liquid gold shall creep.

Yet of old fraud some footsteps shall re-
main:

The merchant still shall plow the deep for
gain;

Great cities shall with walls be compass'd
round,

And sharpen'd shares shall vex the fruitful
ground; 40

Another Tiphys shall new seas explore;

Another Argo land the chiefs upon th' Iberian shore;

Another Helen other wars create,
And great Achilles urge the Trojan fate.

But when to ripen'd manhood he shall
grow,

The greedy sailer shall the seas forego;
No keel shall cut the waves for foreign
ware,

For every soil shall every product bear.

The laboring hind his oxen shall disjoin; }

No plow shall hurt the glebe, no pruning hook the vine; 50

Nor wool shall in dissembled colors
shine. }

But the luxurious father of the fold,
With native purple, or unborrow'd gold,
Beneath his pompous fleece shall proudly
sweat;

And under Tyrian robes the lamb shall bleat.

The Fates, when they this happy web have spun,

Shall bless the sacred clew, and bid it smoothly run.

Mature in years, to ready honors move,
O of celestial seed! O foster son of Jove!

See, lab'ring Nature calls thee to sustain 60
The nodding frame of heav'n, and earth,

and main!

See to their base restor'd, earth, seas, and
air;

And joyful ages, from behind, in crowding ranks appear.

To sing thy praise, would Heav'n my breath prolong,

Infusing spirits worthy such a song,

Not Thracian Orpheus should transcend my lays,
 Nor Linus crown'd with never-fading bays;
 Tho' each his heav'nly parent should in-
 spire;
 The Muse instruct the voice, and Phœbus tune the lyre.
 Should Pan contend in verse, and thou my
 theme,
 Arcadian judges should their god condemn.
 Begin, auspicious boy, to cast about Thy infant eyes, and, with a smile, thy mother single out:
 Thy mother well deserves that short de-
 light,
 The nauseous qualms of ten long months
 and travel to requite.
 Then smile: the frowning infant's doom is
 read;
 No god shall crown the board, nor goddess
 bless the bed.

THE FIFTH PASTORAL

OR, DAPHNIS

THE ARGUMENT

Mopsus and Menalcas, two very expert shepherds at a song, begin one by consent to the memory of Daphnis, who is suppos'd by the best critics to represent Julius Cæsar. Mop-sus laments his death; Menalcas proclaims his divinity; the whole eclogue consisting of an elegy and an apotheosis.

MENALCAS

SINCE on the downs our flocks together
 feed,
 And since my voice can match your tune-
 ful reed,
 Why sit we not beneath the grateful
 shade
 Which hazels, intermix'd with elms, have made?

MOPSUS

Whether you please that sylvan scene to
 take,
 Where whistling winds uncertain shadows
 make;
 Or will you to the cooler cave succeed,
 Whose mouth the curling vines have over-spread?

MENALCAS

Your merit and your years command the choice;
 Amyntas only rivals you in voice. 10

MOPSUS

What will not that presuming shepherd
 dare,
 Who thinks his voice with Phœbus may compare?

MENALCAS

Begin you first: if either Alcon's praise,
 Or dying Phyllis, have inspir'd your lays;
 If her you mourn, or Codrus you commend,
 Begin, and Tityrus your flock shall tend.

MOPSUS

Or shall I rather the sad verse repeat,
 Which on the beech's bark I lately writ?
 I writ, and sung betwixt. Now bring the
 swain
 Whose voice you boast, and let him try the strain. 20

MENALCAS

Such as the shrub to the tall olive shows,
 Or the pale sallow to the blushing rose;
 Such is his voice, if I can judge aright, Compar'd to thine, in sweetness and in height.

MOPSUS

No more, but sit and hear the promis'd
 lay;
 The gloomy grotto makes a doubtful day.
 The nymphs about the breathless body wait
 Of Daphnis, and lament his cruel fate.
 The trees and floods were witness to their
 tears;
 At length the rumor reach'd his mother's ears. 30
 The wretched parent, with a pious haste, Came running, and his lifeless limbs embrace'd.
 She sigh'd, she sobb'd; and, furious with
 despair,
 She rent her garments, and she tore her
 hair,
 Accusing all the gods, and every star.
 The swains forgot their sheep, nor near the brink
 Of running waters brought their herds to drink.
 The thirsty cattle, of themselves, abstain'd

From water, and their grassy fare dis-
dain'd.

The death of Daphnis woods and hills
deplore; 40

They cast the sound to Libya's desert
shore;

The Libyan lions hear, and hearing roar.
Fierce tigers Daphnis taught the yoke to
bear,

And first with curling ivy dress'd the spear:
Daphnis did rites to Bacchus first ordain,
And holy revels for his reeling train.

As vines the trees, as grapes the vines
adorn,

As bulls the herds, and fields the yellow
corn;

So bright a splendor, so divine a grace,
The glorious Daphnis cast on his illustrious
race. 50

When envious Fate the godlike Daphnis
took,

Our guardian gods the fields and plains
forsook;

Pales no longer swell'd the teeming grain,
Nor Phœbus fed his oxen on the plain;

No fruitful crop the sickly fields return,
But oats and darnel choke the rising corn;

And where the vales with violets once were
crown'd,

Now knotty burs and thorns disgrace the
ground.

Come, shepherds, come, and strow with leaves the plain;

Such funeral rites your Daphnis did or-
dain. 60

With cypress boughs the crystal fountains
hide,

And softly let the running waters glide.
A lasting monument to Daphnis raise,

With this inscription to record his praise:
"Daphnis, the fields' delight, the shepherd's

love,
Renown'd on earth, and deified above;

Whose flock excell'd the fairest on the plains,
But less than he himself surpass'd the swains."

MENALCAS

O heavenly poet! such thy verse appears,
So sweet, so charming to my ravish'd ears,
As to the weary swain, with cares oppress'd,
Beneath the sylvan shade, refreshing rest;
As to the feverish traveler, when first 73
He finds a crystal stream to quench his thirst.
In singing, as in piping, you excel;

And scarce your master could perform so
well.

O fortunate young man, at least your lays
Are next to his, and claim the second praise.

Such as they are, my rural songs I join,
To raise our Daphnis to the pow'rs divine; 80

For Daphnis was so good, to love what-e'er was mine.

MOPSUS

How is my soul with such a promise rais'd!
For both the boy was worthy to be prais'd,

And Stimichon has often made me long
To hear, like him, so soft, so sweet a song.

MENALCAS

Daphnis, the guest of heav'n, with wond'ring
eyes,

Views, in the Milky Way, the starry skies,
And far beneath him, from the shining sphere,

Beholds the moving clouds, and rolling year.
For this, with cheerful cries the woods

resound, 90
The purple spring arrays the various
ground,

The nymphs and shepherds dance, and Pan himself is crown'd.

The wolf no longer prowls for nightly spoils,
Nor birds the springes fear, nor stags the toils;

For Daphnis reigns above, and deals from thence

His mother's milder beams, and peaceful influence.

The mountain tops unshorn, the rocks rejoice;

The lowly shrubs partake of human voice.
Assenting Nature, with a gracious nod,

Proclaims him, and salutes the new-admitted god. 100

Be still propitious, ever good to thine!
Behold, four hallow'd altars we design;

And two to thee, and two to Phœbus rise;
On both are offer'd annual sacrifice.

The holy priests, at each returning year,
Two bowls of milk, and two of oil shall

bear;
And I myself the guests with friendly
bowls will cheer.

Two goblets will I crown with sparkling
wine,

The gen'rous vintage of the Chian vine;
These will I pour to thee, and make the nectar thine. 110

In winter shall the genial feast be made
Before the fire; by summer, in the shade.
Damœtas shall perform the rites divine,
And Lyctian Ægon in the song shall join.
Alphesibœus, tripping, shall advance,
And mimic Satyrs in his antic dance.
When to the nymphs our annual rites we
pay,

And when our fields with victims we survey;
While savage boars delight in shady woods,
And finny fish inhabit in the floods; ¹²⁰
While bees on thyme, and locusts feed on
dew,
Thy grateful swains these honors shall renew.

Such honors as we pay to pow'rs divine,
To Bacchus and to Ceres, shall be thine.
Such annual honors shall be giv'n; and thou Shalt hear, and shalt condemn thy suppliants to their vow.

MOPSUS

What present worth thy verse can Mop-sus find!
Not the soft whispers of the southern
wind,
That play thro' trembling trees, delight
me more;
Nor murm'ring billows on the sounding shore; ¹³⁰
Nor winding streams, that thro' the valley
glide,
And the scarce-cover'd pebbles gently chide.

MENALCAS

Receive you first this tuneful pipe, the
same
That play'd my Corydon's unhappy flame;
The same that sung Neëra's conqu'ring
eyes,
And, had the judge been just, had won the prize.

MOPSUS

Accept from me this sheephook in exchange;
The handle brass, the knobs in equal range.
Antigenes, with kisses, often tried
To beg this present, in his beauty's pride,
When youth and love are hard to be denied. ¹⁴¹
But what I could refuse to his request,
Is yours unask'd, for you deserve it best.

THE SIXTH PASTORAL

OR, SILENUS

THE ARGUMENT

Two young shepherds, Chromis and Mnasyllus, having been often promis'd a song by Silenus, chance to catch him asleep in this pastoral; where they bind him hand and foot, and then claim his promise. Silenus, finding they would be put off no longer, begins his song, in which he describes the formation of the universe, and the original of animals, according to the Epicurean philosophy; and then runs thro' the most surprising transformations which have happen'd in Nature since her birth. This pastoral was design'd as a compliment to Syro the Epicurean, who instructed Virgil and Varus in the principles of that philosophy. Silenus acts as tutor, Chromis and Mnasyllus as the two pupils.

I FIRST transferr'd to Rome Sicilian strains; Nor blush'd the Doric Muse to dwell on Mantuan plains.

But when I tried her tender voice, too
young,
And fighting kings and bloody battles sung,
Apollo check'd my pride, and bade me feed
My fatt'ning flocks, nor dare beyond the reed.

Admonish'd thus, while every pen prepares
To write thy praises, Varus, and thy wars,
My past'ral Muse her humble tribute brings,
And yet not wholly uninspir'd she sings. ¹⁰
For all who read, and, reading, not disdain
These rural poems, and their lowly strain,
The name of Varus oft inscrib'd shall see
In every grove, and every vocal tree,
And all the sylvan reign shall sing of
thee:

Thy name, to Phœbus and the Muses
known,
Shall in the front of every page be shown;
For he who sings thy praise secures his
own.

Proceed, my Muse! — Two Satyrs, on
the ground,
Stretch'd at his ease, their sire Silenus
found.

Doz'd with his fumes, and heavy with his load, ²⁰
They found him snoring in his dark abode,
And seiz'd with youthful arms the drunken
god.

His rosy wreath was dropp'd not long before,

Borne by the tide of wine, and floating on the floor.

His empty can, with ears half worn away,
Was hung on high, to boast the triumph of the day.

Invaded thus, for want of better bands,
His garland they unstring, and bind his hands;

For, by the fraudulent god deluded long, ³⁰
They now resolve to have their promis'd song.

Ægle came in, to make their party good —
The fairest Nais of the neighboring flood —
And, while he stares around with stupid eyes,

His brows with berries, and his temples, dyes.

He finds the fraud, and, with a smile, demands

On what design the boys had bound his hands.

"Loose me," he cried, "'t was impudence to find

A sleeping god; 't is sacrilege to bind.
To you the promis'd poem I will pay; ⁴⁰
The nymph shall be rewarded in her way."
He rais'd his voice; and soon a num'rous throng

Of tripping Satyrs crowded to the song;
And sylvan Fauns and savage beasts advanced,

And nodding forests to the numbers danc'd.
Not by Hæmonian hills the Thracian bard, }
Nor awful Phœbus was on Pindus heard }
With deeper silence, or with more regard. }

He sung the secret seeds of nature's frame;
How seas, and earth, and air, and active flame, ⁵⁰

Fell thro' the mighty void, and, in their fall,
Were blindly gather'd in this goodly ball.
The tender soil then, stiff'ning by degrees,
Shut from the bounded earth the bounding seas.

Then earth and ocean various forms disclose,
And a new sun to the new world arose;
And mists, condens'd to clouds, obscure the sky;

And clouds, dissolv'd, the thirsty ground supply;

The rising trees the lofty mountains grace;

The lofty mountains feed the savage race, ⁶⁰

Yet few, and strangers, in th' unpeopled place.

From thence the birth of man the song pursued,

And how the world was lost, and how renew'd;

The reign of Saturn, and the Golden Age;
Prometheus' theft, and Jove's avenging rage;
The cries of Argonauts for Hylas drown'd,
With whose repeated name the shores resound;

Then mourns the madness of the Cretan queen —

Happy for her if herds had never been.
What fury, wretched woman, seiz'd thy breast! ⁷⁰

The maids of Argos (tho', with rage possess'd,

Their imitated lowings fill'd the grove)
Yet shunn'd the guilt of thy prepost'rous love,

Nor sought the youthful husband of the herd;

Tho' lab'ring yokes on their own necks they fear'd,

And felt for budding horns on their smooth foreheads rear'd.

Ah, wretched queen, you range the pathless wood,

While on a flow'ry bank he chaws the cud,
Or sleeps in shades, or thro' the forest roves,

And roars with anguish for his absent loves. — ⁸⁰

"Ye nymphs, with toils his forest walk surround,

And trace his wand'ring footsteps on the ground.

But, ah! perhaps my passion he disdains,
And courts the milky mothers of the plains.

We search th' ungrateful fugitive abroad,
While they at home sustain his happy load." —

He sung the lover's fraud; the longing maid,

With golden fruit, like all the sex, betray'd;

The sisters mourning for their brother's loss;
Their bodies hid in barks, and furr'd with moss; ⁹⁰

How each a rising alder now appears,
And o'er the Po distils her gummy tears:

Then sung, how Gallus, by a Muse's hand,
Was led and welcom'd to the sacred strand;

The senate rising to salute their guest;
And Linus thus their gratitude express'd:

"Receive this present, by the Muses made,
The pipe on which th' Ascræan pastor
play'd;

With which of old he charm'd the savage
train,

And call'd the mountain ashes to the plain.
Sing thou on this thy Phœbus, and the
wood 101

Where once his fane of Parian marble stood;
On this his ancient oracles rehearse,
And with new numbers grace the God of Verse."

Why should I sing the double Scylla's fate?
(The first by love transform'd, the last by
hate —

A beauteous maid above; but magic arts
With barking dogs deform'd her nether parts:)

What vengeance on the passing fleet she
pour'd,

The master frighted, and the mates devour'd. 110

Then ravish'd Philomel the song express'd;
The crime reveal'd; the sister's cruel feast;
And how in fields the lapwing Tereus reigns,
The warbling nightingale in woods com-
plains;

While Progne makes on chimney tops her
moan,

And hovers o'er the palace once her own.
Whatever songs besides the Delphian god
Had taught the laurels, and the Spartan
flood,

Silenus sung: the vales his voice rebound,
And carry to the skies the sacred sound. 120

And now the setting sun had warn'd the
swain

To call his counted cattle from the plain:
Yet still th' unwearied sire pursues the tuneful strain,

Till, unperceiv'd, the heav'ns with stars
were hung,

And sudden night surpris'd the yet un-finish'd song.

THE SEVENTH PASTORAL

OR, MELIBŒUS

THE ARGUMENT

Melibœus here gives us the relation of a sharp poetical contest between Thyrsis and Cory-don, at which he himself and Daphnis were present; who both declar'd for Corydon.

BENEATH a holm repair'd two jolly swains (Their sheep and goats together graz'd the plains),

Both young Arcadians, both alike inspir'd
To sing, and answer as the song requir'd.
Daphnis, as umpire, took the middle seat,
And fortune thether led my weary feet;
For, while I fenc'd my myrtles from the cold,
The father of my flock had wander'd from the fold.

Of Daphnis I enquir'd: he, smiling, said:
"Dismiss your fear;" and pointed where he fed; 10

"And, if no greater cares disturb your mind,
Sit here with us, in covert of the wind.

Your lowing heifers, of their own accord,
At wat'ring time will seek the neighb'ring ford.

Here wanton Mincius winds along the meads,
And shades his happy banks with bending reeds.

And see, from yon old oak that mates the
skies,

How black the clouds of swarming bees
arise."

What should I do! Nor was Alcippe nigh,
Nor absent Phyllis could my care supply, 20
To house, and feed by hand my weaning
lambs,

And drain the strutting udders of their dams.

Great was the strife betwixt the singing
swains;

And I preferr'd my pleasure to my gains.
Alternate rhyme the ready champions chose:
These Corydon rehears'd, and Thyrsis those.

CORYDON

Ye Muses, ever fair, and ever young,
Assist my numbers, and inspire my song.
With all my Codrus, O inspire my breast!
For Codrus, after Phœbus, sings the best. 30
Or, if my wishes have presum'd too high,
And stretch'd their bounds beyond mortality,

The praise of artful numbers I resign,
And hang my pipe upon the sacred pine.

THYRSIS

Arcadian swains, your youthful poet crown
With ivy wreaths; tho' surly Codrus frown:
Or, if he blast my Muse with envious praise,
Then fence my brows with amulets of bays,
Lest his ill arts, or his malicious tongue, 39
Should poison, or bewitch my growing song.

CORYDON

These branches of a stag, this tusky boar
(The first essay of arms untried before)
Young Micon offers, Delia, to thy shrine:
But speed his hunting with thy pow'r di-
vine;

Thy statue then of Parian stone shall stand;
Thy legs in buskins with a purple band.

THYRSIS

This bowl of milk, these cakes (our country fare),
For thee, Priapus, yearly we prepare,
Because a little garden is thy care;
But, if the falling lambs increase my fold,
Thy marble statue shall be turn'd to gold. 51

CORYDON

Fair Galatea, with thy silver feet,
O, whiter than the swan, and more than Hybla sweet,
Tall as a poplar, taper as the bole,
Come, charm thy shepherd, and restore my
soul!
Come, when my lated sheep at night return,
And crown the silent hours, and stop the rosy morn!

THYRSIS

May I become as abject in thy sight
As seaweed on the shore, and black as night;
Rough as a bur; deform'd like him who chaws 60
Sardinian herbage to contract his jaws;
Such and so monstrous let thy swain ap-
pear,
If one day's absence looks not like a year.
Hence from the field, for shame: the flock deserves
No better feeding while the shepherd starves.

CORYDON

Ye mossy springs, inviting easy sleep,
Ye trees, whose leafy shades those mossy fountains keep,
Defend my flock! The summer heats are
near,
And blossoms on the swelling vines appear.

THYRSIS

With heapy fires our cheerful hearth is
crown'd; 70
And firs for torches in the woods abound:

We fear not more the winds and wintry
cold,
Than streams the banks, or wolves the bleating fold.

CORYDON

Our woods, with juniper and chestnuts
crown'd,
With falling fruits and berries paint the
ground;
And lavish Nature laughs, and strows
her stores around:
But, if Alexis from our mountains fly,
Ev'n running rivers leave their channels
dry.

THYRSIS

Parch'd are the plains, and frying is the
field,
Nor with'ring vines their juicy vintage
yield; 80
But, if returning Phyllis bless the plain,
The grass revives, the woods are green
again,
And Jove descends in show'rs of kindly rain.

CORYDON

The poplar is by great Alcides worn;
The brows of Phœbus his own bays adorn;
The branching vine the jolly Bacchus loves;
The Cyprian queen delights in myrtle groves;
With hazel Phyllis crowns her flowing
hair;
And, while she loves that common wreath
to wear,
Nor bays, nor myrtle boughs, with hazel shall compare. 90

THYRSIS

The tow'ring ash is fairest in the woods;
In gardens pines, and poplars by the floods:
But, if my Lycidas will ease my pains,
And often visit our forsaken plains,
To him the tow'ring ash shall yield in woods,
In gardens pines, and poplars by the floods.

MELIBŒUS

These rhymes I did to memory commend,
When vanquish'd Thyrsis did in vain con-
tend;
Since when 'tis Corydon among the swains,
Young Corydon without a rival reigns. 100

THE EIGHTH PASTORAL

OR, PHARMACEUTRIA

THE ARGUMENT

This pastoral contains the songs of Damon and Alphesibœus. The first of 'em bewails the loss of his mistress, and repines at the success of his rival Mopsus. The other repeats the charms of some enchantress, who endeavor'd by her spells and magic to make Daphnis in love with her.

THE mournful Muse of two despairing swains,

The love rejected, and the lovers' pains;
To which the salvage lynxes list'ning stood,

The rivers stood on heaps, and stopp'd the running flood;

The hungry herd their needful food refuse —

Of two despairing swains, I sing the mournful Muse.

Great Pollio! thou, for whom thy Rome prepares

The ready triumph of thy finish'd wars,
Whether Tinavus or th' Illyrian coast,
Whatever land or sea thy presence boast; 10
Is there an hour in fate reserv'd for me,
To sing thy deeds in numbers worthy thee?

In numbers like to thine could I rehearse

Thy lofty tragic scenes, thy labor'd verse,
The world another Sophocles in thee,
Another Homer should behold in me.
Amidst thy laurels let this ivy twine:
Thine was my earliest Muse; my latest shall be thine.

Scarce from the world the shades of night withdrew,

Scarce were the flocks refresh'd with morning dew, 20

When Damon, stretch'd beneath an olive shade,

And wildly staring upwards, thus inveigh'd Against the conscious gods, and curs'd
the cruel maid:

"Star of the morning, why dost thou delay?

Come, Lucifer, drive on the lagging day,
While I my Nisa's perjur'd faith deplore —

Witness, ye pow'rs, by whom she falsely swore!

The gods, alas! are witnesses in vain;
Yet shall my dying breath to Heav'n complain.

Begin with me, my flute, the sweet Mæ-
nalian strain. 30

"The pines of Mænalus, the vocal grove,
Are ever full of verse, and full of love:
They hear the hinds, they hear their god complain,

Who suffer'd not the reeds to rise in vain.
Begin with me, my flute, the sweet Mæ-
nalian strain.

"Mopsus triumphs; he weds the willing
fair:

When such is Nisa's choice, what lover can
despair!

Now griffons join with mares; another age
Shall see the hound and hind their thirst assuage,

Promiscuous at the spring. Prepare the lights, 40

O Mopsus, and perform the bridal rites.
Scatter thy nuts among the scrambling
boys:

Thine is the night, and thine the nuptial
joys.

For thee the sun declines: O happy swain!
Begin with me, my flute, the sweet Mæna-
lian strain.

"O, Nisa, justly to thy choice condemn'd!
Whom hast thou taken, whom hast thou condemn'd!

For him, thou hast refus'd my browsing herd,
Scorn'd my thick eyebrows, and my shaggy
beard.

Unhappy Damon sighs and sings in vain, 50
While Nisa thinks no god regards a lover's
pain.

Begin with me, my flute, the sweet Mæ-
nalian strain.

"I view'd thee first, (how fatal was the view!)

And led thee where the ruddy wildings
grew,

High on the planted hedge, and wet with morning dew.

Then scarce the bending branches I could win;

The callow down began to clothe my chin.
I saw; I perish'd; yet indulg'd my pain.

Begin with me, my flute, the sweet Mæna-
lian strain.

"I know thee, Love! in deserts thou
wert bred, 60

And at the dugs of salvage tigers fed;

Alien of birth, usurper of the plains !
Begin with me, my flute, the sweet Mænalian strains.

"Relentless Love the cruel mother led
The blood of her unhappy babes to shed.
Love lent the sword; the mother struck
the blow;

Inhuman she; but more inhuman thou:
Alien of birth, usurper of the plains !
Begin with me, my flute, the sweet Mænalian strains.

"Old doting Nature, change thy course
anew,
And let the trembling lamb the wolf pursue;

Let oaks now glitter with Hesperian fruit,
And purple daffodils from alder shoot;
Fat amber let the tamarisk distil,
And hooting owls contend with swans in skill;

Hoarse Tit'rus strive with Orpheus in the woods,

And challenge fam'd Arion on the floods.
Or, O ! let Nature cease, and Chaos reign !
Begin with me, my flute, the sweet Mænalian strain.

"Let earth be sea; and let the whelming tide
The lifeless limbs of luckless Damon hide:

Farewell, ye secret woods, and shady groves,
Haunts of my youth, and conscious of my loves !

From yon high cliff I plunge into the main:

Take the last present of thy dying swain;
And cease, my silent flute, the sweet Mænalian strain."

Now take your turns, ye Muses, to rehearse
His friend's complaints, and mighty magic verse:

"Bring running water; bind those altars round
With fillets, and with vervain strow the ground:

Make fat with frankincense the sacred fires,

To re-inflame my Daphnis with desires.
'Tis done: we want but verse. — Restore,
my charms,

My ling'ring Daphnis to my longing arms.

"Pale Phœbe, drawn by verse, from heav'n descends;

And Circe chang'd with charms Ulysses' friends.

Verse breaks the ground, and penetrates the brake,

And in the winding cavern splits the snake:
Verse fires the frozen veins. — Restore, my charms,

My ling'ring Daphnis to my longing arms.

"Around his waxen image first I wind
Three woolen fillets, of three colors join'd;
Thrice bind about his thrice-devoted head,
Which round the sacred altar thrice is led.

Unequal numbers please the gods. — My charms,

Restore my Daphnis to my longing arms.

"Knit with three knots the fillets; knit
'em straight;

And say: 'These knots to love I consecrate.'

Haste, Amaryllis, haste. — Restore, my charms,

My lovely Daphnis to my longing arms.

"As fire this figure hardens, made of clay,

And this of wax with fire consumes away;
Such let the soul of cruel Daphnis be,
Hard to the rest of women, soft to me.

Crumble the sacred mole of salt and corn:

Next in the fire the bays with brimstone burn;

And, while it crackles in the sulphur, say,

'This I for Daphnis burn; thus Daphnis burn away !

This laurel is his fate.' — Restore, my charms,

My lovely Daphnis to my longing arms.

"As when the raging heifer, thro' the grove,

Stung with desire, pursues her wand'ring love;

Faint at the last, she seeks the weedy pools,

To quench her thirst, and on the rushes rolls,

Careless of night, unmindful to return;
Such fruitless fires perfidious Daphnis burn,

While I so scorn his love ! — Restore, my charms,

My ling'ring Daphnis to my longing arms.

"These garments once were his, and left to me.

The pledges of his promis'd loyalty, ¹³⁰
Which underneath my threshold I bestow:

These pawns, O sacred earth, to me my Daphnis owe.

As these were his, so mine is he. — My
charms,
Restore their ling'ring lord to my deluded
arms.

"These pois'nous plants, for magic use
design'd,
(The noblest and the best of all the baneful
kind,)

Old Mæris brought me from the Pontic
strand,
And cull'd the mischief of a bounteous
land.

Smear'd with these pow'rful juices, on the
plain,

He howls a wolf among the hungry train;
And oft the mighty negromancer boasts, ¹⁴¹
With these, to call from tombs the stalking ghosts,

And from the roots to tear the standing
corn,

Which, whirl'd aloft, to distant fields is
borne.

Such is the strength of spells. — Restore, my
charms,

My ling'ring Daphnis to my longing arms.
"Bear out these ashes; cast 'em in the
brook;

Cast backwards o'er your head; nor turn your look:

Since neither gods nor godlike verse can
move,

Break out, ye smother'd fires, and kindle
smother'd love. ¹⁵⁰

Exert your utmost pow'r, my ling'ring
charms;

And force my Daphnis to my longing
arms.

"See, while my last endeavors I delay,
The waking ashes rise, and round our altars play!

Run to the threshold, Amaryllis, hark!
Our Hylas opens, and begins to bark.

Good Heav'n, may lovers what they wish believe!

Or dream their wishes, and those dreams deceive!

No more — my Daphnis comes: no more,
my charms!

He comes, he runs, he leaps to my desiring
arms."

THE NINTH PASTORAL

OR, LYCIDAS AND MÆRIS

THE ARGUMENT

When Virgil, by the favor of Augustus, had recover'd his patrimony near Mantua, and went in hope to take possession, he was in danger to be slain by Arius the centurion, to whom those lands were assign'd by the Emperor, in reward of his service against Brutus and Cassius. This pastoral, therefore, is fill'd with complaints of his hard usage;
and the persons introduc'd are the bailiff of Virgil, Mæris, and his friend Lycidas.

LYCIDAS

Ho, Mæris! whether on thy way so fast?
This leads to town.

MÆRIS

O Lycidas, at last
The time is come I never thought to see,
(Strange revolution for my farm and me!)
When the grim captain in a surly tone Cries out: "Pack up, ye rascals, and be gone."

Kick'd out, we set the best face on 't we
could;
And these two kids, t' appease his angry
mood,
I bear — of which the Furies give him
good!

LYCIDAS

Your country friends were told another
tale;
That, from the sloping mountain to the ¹⁰
vale,
And dodder'd oak, and all the banks
along,
Menalcas sav'd his fortune with a song.

MÆRIS

Such was the news, indeed; but songs and
rhymes
Prevail as much in these hard iron times,
As would a plump of trembling fowl, that
rise
Against an eagle sousing from the skies.
And, had not Phæbus warn'd me, by the
croak
Of an old raven from a hollow oak,
To shun debate, Menalcas had been slain, ²⁰
And Mæris not surviv'd him, to complain.

LYCIDAS

Now Heav'n defend ! Could barb'rous rage induce
 The brutal son of Mars t' insult the sacred Muse !
 Who then should sing the nymphs, or who rehearse
 The waters gliding in a smoother verse !
 Or Amaryllis praise — that heav'nly lay,
 That shorten'd, as we went, our tedious
 way:
 " O Tit'rus, tend my herd, and see them
 fed;
 To morning pastures, evening waters, led;
 And 'ware the Libyan ridgil's butting
 head." 30

MÆRIS

Or what unfinish'd he to Varus read:
 "Thy name, O Varus, (if the kinder pow'rs Preserve our plains, and shield the Mantuan tow'rs,
 Obnoxious by Cremona's neighb'ring crime,)
 The wings of swans, and stronger-pinion'd
 rhyme,
 Shall raise aloft, and soaring bear above,
 Th' immortal gift of gratitude to Jove."

LYCIDAS

Sing on, sing on; for I can ne'er be cloy'd:
 So may thy swarms the baleful yew avoid;
 So may thy cows their burden'd bags dis-
 tend, 40
 And trees to goats their willing branches
 bend.
 Mean as I am, yet have the Muses made
 Me free, a member of the tuneful trade:
 At least the shepherds seem to like my
 lays;
 But I discern their flatt'ry from their
 praise:
 I nor to Cinna's ears, nor Varus', dare aspire,
 But gabble, like a goose, amidst the swan-like choir.

MÆRIS

"Tis what I have been conning in my mind;
 Nor are they verses of a vulgar kind.
 "Come, Galatea, come, the seas forsake: 50 What pleasures can the tides with their hoarse murmurs make ?
 See, on the shore inhabits purple spring,
 Where nightingales their love-sick ditty
 sing:

See, meads with purling streams, with flow'rs the ground,
 The grottoes cool, with shady poplars
 crown'd;
 And creeping vines on arbors weav'd
 around.
 Come then, and leave the waves' tumultuous roar;
 Let the wild surges vainly beat the shore."

LYCIDAS

Or that sweet song I heard with such de-
 light;
 The same you sung alone one starry night. 60
 The tune I still retain, but not the words.

MÆRIS

"Why, Daphnis, dost thou search in old records,
 To know the seasons when the stars arise ?
 See, Cæsar's lamp is lighted in the skies:
 The star whose rays the blushing grapes
 adorn,
 And swell the kindly ripening ears of corn.
 Under this influence, graft the tender shoot:
 Thy children's children shall enjoy the fruit."
 The rest I have forgot; for cares and time Change all things, and untune my soul to
 rhyme. 70
 I could have once sung down a summer's
 sun;
 But now the chime of poetry is done:
 My voice grows hoarse; I feel the notes
 decay,
 As if the wolves had seen me first to-day.
 But these, and more than I to mind can bring,
 Menalcas has not yet forgot to sing.

LYCIDAS

Thy faint excuses but inflame me more:
 And now the waves roll silent to the shore;
 Hush'd winds the topmost branches scarcely
 bend,
 As if thy tuneful song they did attend: 80
 Already we have half our way o'ercome;
 Far off I can discern Bianor's tomb.
 Here, where the laborer's hands have form'd
 a bow'r
 Of wreathing trees, in singing waste an hour.
 Rest here thy weary limbs; thy kids lay
 down:
 We 've day before us yet to reach the town;
 Or if, ere night, the gath'ring clouds we
 fear,
 A song will help the beating storm to bear.

And, that thou may'st not be too late
abroad,
Sing, and I'll ease thy shoulders of thy load. 90

MÆRIS

Cease to request me; let us mind our way:
Another song requires another day.
When good Menalcas comes, if he rejoice,
And find a friend at court, I'll find a voice.

THE TENTH PASTORAL

OR, GALLUS

THE ARGUMENT

Gallus, a great patron of Virgil, and an excellent poet, was very deeply in love with one Cytheris, whom he calls Lycoris, and who had forsaken him for the company of a soldier. The poet therefore supposes his friend Gallus retir'd, in his height of melancholy, into the solitudes of Arcadia (the celebrated scene of pastorals), where he represents him in a very languishing condition, with all the rural deities about him, pitying his hard usage, and condoling his misfortune.

THY sacred succor, Arethusa, bring,
To crown my labor ('tis the last I sing),
Which proud Lycoris may with pity view:
The Muse is mournful, tho' the numbers
few.
Refuse me not a verse, to grief and Gallus due:
So may thy silver streams beneath the
tide,
Unmix'd with briny seas, securely glide.
Sing then my Gallus, and his hopeless vows;
Sing, while my cattle crop the tender
browse.
The vocal grove shall answer to the sound,
And echo, from the vales, the tuneful voice rebound. 11
What lawns or woods withheld you from his aid,
Ye nymphs, when Gallus was to love be-
tray'd;
To love, unpitied by the cruel maid?
Not steepy Pindus could retard your course,
Nor cleft Parnassus, nor th' Aonian source:
Nothing that owns the Muses could suspend
Your aid to Gallus — Gallus is their friend.

For him the lofty laurel stands in tears,
And hung with humid pearls the lowly shrub appears. 20

Mænalian pines the godlike swain be-
moan,
When, spread beneath a rock, he sigh'd
alone;
And cold Lycæus wept from every dropping stone. }

The sheep surround their shepherd, as he
lies:

Blush not, sweet poet, nor the name despise —

Along the streams, his flock Adonis fed;
And yet the Queen of Beauty bless'd his bed.

The swains and tardy neatherds came, and
last,

Menalcas, wet with beating winter mast.
Wond'ring, they ask'd from whence arose
thy flame; 30

Yet more amaz'd, thy own Apollo came.
Flush'd were his cheeks, and glowing were his eyes:

"Is she thy care? is she thy care?" he
cries.

"Thy false Lycoris flies thy love and
thee, }

And, for thy rival, tempts the raging sea,
The forms of horrid war, and heav'n's inclemency."

Silvanus came: his brows a country crown
Of fennel, and of nodding lilies, down.
Great Pan arriv'd; and we beheld him
too,

His cheeks and temples of vermilion hue.
"Why, Gallus, this immoderate grief?" he
cried. 41

"Think'st thou that love with tears is satisfied?

The meads are sooner drunk with morning
dews,

The bees with flow'ry shrubs, the goats with browse."

Unmov'd, and with dejected eyes, he
mourn'd:

He paus'd, and then these broken words
return'd:

"'Tis past; and pity gives me no relief;
But you, Arcadian swains, shall sing my
grief,

And on your hills my last complaints renew:
So sad a song is only worthy you. 50

How light would lie the turf upon my
breast,

If you my suff'rings in your songs express'd !

Ah ! that your birth and bus'ness had been mine;

To pen the sheep, and press the swelling vine !

Had Phyllis or Amyntas caus'd my pain,
Or any nymph, or shepherd on the plain, (Tho' Phyllis brown, tho' black Amyntas were,

Are violets not sweet, because not fair ?)
Beneath the shallows, and the shady vine,
My loves had mix'd their pliant limbs with mine:

Phyllis with myrtle wreaths had crown'd my hair,

And soft Amyntas sung away my care.
Come, see what pleasures in our plains abound;

The woods, the fountains, and the flow'ry ground.

As you are beauteous, were you half so true,

Here could I live, and love, and die with only you.

Now I to fighting fields am sent afar,
And strive in winter camps with toils of war;

While you, (alas, that I should find it so !)

To shun my sight, your native soil forego,
And climb the frozen Alps, and tread th' eternal snow.

Ye frosts and snows, her tender body spare !

Those are not limbs for icicles to tear.
For me, the wilds and desarts are my choice;
The Muses, once my care; my once harmonious voice.

There will I sing, forsaken and alone:
The rocks and hollow caves shall echo to my moan.

The rind of ev'ry plant her name shall know;
And, as the rind extends, the love shall grow.
Then on Arcadian mountains will I chase
(Mix'd with the woodland nymphs) the savage race;

Nor cold shall hinder me, with horns and hounds

To thrud the thickets, or to leap the mounds.
And now methinks o'er steepy rocks I go,
And rush thro' sounding woods, and bend the Parthian bow;

As if with sports my sufferings I could ease,
Or by my pains the God of Love appease.

My frenzy changes; I delight no more
On mountain tops to chase the tusky boar:
No game but hopeless love my thoughts pursue —

Once more, ye nymphs, and songs, and sounding woods, adieu !

Love alters not for us his hard decrees,
Not tho' beneath the Thracian clime we freeze,

Or Italy's indulgent heav'n forego,
And in midwinter tread Sithonian snow;
Or, when the barks of elms are scorch'd, we keep

On Meroe's burning plains the Libyan sheep.
In hell, and earth, and seas, and heav'n above,
Love conquers all; and we must yield to Love."

My Muses, here your sacred raptures end:

The verse was what I ow'd my suff'ring friend.

This while I sung, my sorrows I deceiv'd,
And bending osiers into baskets weav'd.

The song, because inspir'd by you, shall shine;
And Gallus will approve, because 't is mine —

Gallus, for whom my holy flames renew
Each hour, and ev'ry moment rise in view;
As alders, in the spring, their boles extend,

And heave so fiercely that the bark they rend.
Now let us rise; for hoarseness oft invades
The singer's voice, who sings beneath the shades.

From juniper unwholesome dews distil,
That blast the sooty corn, the with'ring herbage kill.

Away, my goats, away ! for you have brows'd your fill.

GEORGICS

RIGHT HONORABLE PHILIP, EARL OF CHESTERFIELD, &c.

MY LORD,

I CANNOT begin my address to your Lordship better than in the words of Virgil :

— *Quod optanti divum promittere nemo
Auderet, volenda dies, en, attulit ultro.*

Seven years together I have conceal'd the longing which I had to appear before you : a time as tedious as Æneas pass'd in his wand'ring voyage, before he reach'd the promis'd Italy. But I consider'd that nothing which my meanness could produce was worthy of your patronage. At last this happy occasion offer'd, of presenting to you the best poem of the best poet. If I balk'd this opportunity, I was in despair of finding such another; and, if I took it, I was still uncertain whether you would vouchsafe to accept it from my hands. 'T was a bold venture which I made, in desiring your permission to lay my unworthy labors at your feet. But my rashness has succeeded beyond my hopes; and you have been pleas'd not to suffer an old man to go discontented out of the world, for want of that protection of which he had been so long ambitious. I have known a gentleman in disgrace, and not daring to appear before King Charles the Second, tho' he much desir'd it: at length he took the confidence to attend a fair lady to the court, and told his Majesty that, under her protection, he had presum'd to wait on him. With the same humble confidence I present myself before your Lordship, and, attending on Virgil, hope a gracious reception. The gentleman succeeded, because the powerful lady was his friend; but I have too much injur'd my great author, to expect he should intercede for me. I would have translated him; but, according to the literal French and Italian phrases, I fear I have traduc'd him. 'T is the fault of many a well-meaning man, to be officious in a wrong place, and do a prejudice where he had endeavor'd to do a service. Virgil wrote his Georgics in the full strength and vigor of his age, when his judgment was at the height, and before his fancy was declining. He had (according to our homely saying) his full swing at this poem, beginning it about the age of thirty-five, and scarce concluding it before he arriv'd at forty. 'T is observ'd both of him and Horace, (and I believe it will hold in all great poets,) that, tho' they wrote before with a certain heat of genius which inspir'd them, yet that heat was not perfectly digested. There is requir'd a continuance of warmth to ripen the best and noblest fruits. Thus Horace, in his First and Second Book of Odes, was still rising, but came not to his meridian till the Third; after which his judgment was an overpoise to his imagination: he grew too cautious to be bold enough; for he descended in his Fourth by slow degrees, and, in his Satires and Epistles, was more a philosopher and a critic than a poet. In the beginning of summer the days are almost at a stand, with little variation of length or shortness, because at that time the diurnal motion of the sun partakes more of a right line than of a spiral. The same is the method of nature in the frame of man. He seems at forty to be fully in his summer tropic; somewhat before, and somewhat after, he finds in his soul but small increases or decays. From fifty to three-score, the balance generally holds even, in our colder climates: for he loses not much in fancy; and judgment, which is the effect of observation, still increases. His succeeding years afford him little more than the stubble of his own harvest: yet, if his constitution be healthful, his mind may still retain a decent vigor; and the gleanings of that Ephraim, in comparison with others, will surpass the vintage of Abiezer. I have call'd this somewhere, by a bold metaphor, a green old age; but Virgil has given me his authority for the figure:

Jam senior; sed cruda Deo, viridisque senectus.

Amongst those few who enjoy the advantage of a latter spring your Lordship is a rare example; who, being now arriv'd at your great climacteric, yet give no proof of the least decay in your excellent judgment and comprehension of all things which are within the compass of human understanding. Your conversation is as easy as it is instructive; and I could never observe the least vanity, or the least assuming, in anything you said, but a natural unaffected modesty, full of good sense, and well digested; a clearness of notion, express'd in ready and unstudied words. No man has complain'd, or ever can, that you have discours'd too long on any subject: for you leave us in an eagerness of learning more; pleas'd with what we hear, but not satisfied, because you will not speak so much as we could wish. I dare not excuse your Lordship from this fault; for, tho' 't is none in you, 't is one to all who have the happiness of being known to you. I must confess, the critics make it one of Virgil's beauties, that, having said what he thought convenient, he always left somewhat for the imagination of his readers to supply; that they might gratify their fancies by finding more in what he had written than at first they could; and think they had added to his thought, when it was all there beforehand, and he only sav'd himself the expense of words. However it was, I never went from your Lordship but with a longing to return, or without a hearty curse to him who invented ceremonies in the world, and put me on the necessity of withdrawing, when it was my interest, as well as my desire, to have given you a much longer trouble. I cannot imagine (if your Lordship will give me leave to speak my thoughts) but you have had a more than ordinary vigor in your youth; for too much of heat is requir'd at first, that there may not too little be left at last. A prodigal fire is only capable of large remains; and yours, my Lord, still burns the clearer in declining. The blaze is not so fierce as at the first; but the smoke is wholly vanish'd; and your friends who stand about you are not only sensible of a cheerful warmth, but are kept at an awful distance by its force. In my small observations of mankind,

I have ever found that such as are not rather too full of spirit when they are young, degenerate to dullness in their age. Sobriety in our riper years is the effect of a well-concocted warmth; but, where the principles are only phlegm, what can be expected from the waterish matter but an insipid manhood and a stupid old infancy; discretion in leading strings, and a confirm'd ignorance on crutches? Virgil, in his Third Georgic, when he describes a colt who promises a courser for the race, or for the field of battle, shews him the first to pass the bridge which trembles under him, and to stem the torrent of the flood. His beginnings must be in rashness — a noble fault; but time and experience will correct that error, and tame it into a deliberate and well-weigh'd courage, which knows both to be cautious and to dare, as occasion offers. Your Lordship is a man of honor, not only so unstain'd, but so unquestion'd, that you are the living standard of that heroic virtue; so truly such, that if I would flatter you, I could not. It takes not from you, that you were born with principles of generosity and probity; but it adds to you, that you have cultivated nature, and made those principles the rule and measure of all your actions. The world knows this, without my telling; yet poets have a right of recording it to all posterity:

Dignum laude virum Musa vetat mori.

Epaminondas, Lucullus, and the two first Cæsars were not esteem'd the worse commanders for having made philosophy and the liberal arts their study. Cicero might have been their equal, but that he wanted courage. To have both these virtues, and to have improv'd them both with a softness of manners and a sweetness of conversation — few of our nobility can fill that character. One there is, and so conspicuous by his own light, that he needs not

Digilo monstrari, et dici, "Hic est."

To be nobly born, and of an ancient family, is in the extremes of fortune, either good or bad; for virtue and descent are no inheritance. A long series of ancestors shews the native with great advantage at the first; but if he any way degenerate from his line, the least spot is visible on ermine. But, to preserve this whiteness in its original purity, you, my Lord, have, like that ermine, forsaken the common track of business, which is not always clean: you have chosen for yourself a private greatness, and will not be polluted with ambition. It has been observ'd in former times that none have been so greedy of employments, and of managing the public, as they who have least deserv'd their stations. But such only merit to be call'd patriots, under whom we see their country flourish. I have laugh'd sometimes (for who would always be a Heraclitus?) when I have reflected on those men who from time to time have shot themselves into the world. I have seen many successions of them; some bolting out upon the stage with vast applause, and others hiss'd off, and quitting it with disgrace. But, while they were in action, I have constantly observ'd that they seem'd desirous to retreat from business: greatness, they said, was nauseous, and a crowd was troublesome; a quiet privacy was their ambition. Some few of them, I believe, said this in earnest, and were making a provision against future want, that they might enjoy their age with ease: they saw the happiness of a private life, and promis'd to themselves a blessing which every day it was in their power to possess. But they deferr'd it, and linger'd still at court, because they thought they had not yet enough to make them happy: they would have more, and laid in, to make their solitude luxurious — a wretched philosophy, which Epicurus never taught them in his garden. They lov'd the prospect of this quiet in reversion, but were not willing to have it in possession: they would first be old, and made as sure of health and life as if both of them were at their dispose. But put them to the necessity of a present choice, and they prefer'd continuance in power; like the wretch who call'd Death to his assistance, but refus'd it when he came. The great Scipio was not of their opinion, who indeed sought honors in his youth, and incur'd the fatigues with which he purchas'd them. He serv'd his country when it was in need of his courage and his conduct, till he thought it was time to serve himself; but dismounted from the saddle when he found the beast which bore him began to grow restive and ungovernable. But your Lordship has given us a better example of moderation. You saw betimes that ingratitude is not confin'd to commonwealths; and therefore, tho' you were form'd alike for the greatest of civil employments and military commands, yet you push'd not your fortune to rise in either, but contented yourself with being capable, as much as any whosoever, of defending your country with your sword, or assisting it with your counsel, when you were call'd. For the rest, the respect and love which was paid you, not only in the province where you live, but generally by all who had the happiness to know you, was a wise exchange for the honors of the court — a place of forgetfulness, at the best, for well-deservers. 'Tis necessary, for the polishing of manners, to have breath'd that air; but 'tis infectious, even to the best morals, to live always in it. 'Tis a dangerous commerce, where an honest man is sure at the first of being cheated, and he recovers not his losses but by learning to cheat others. The undermining smile becomes at length habitual; and the drift of his plausible conversation is only to flatter one, that he may betray another. Yet 't is good to have been a looker-on, without venturing to play; that a man may know false dice another time, tho' he never means to use them. I commend not him who never knew a court, but him who forsakes it because he knows it. A young man deserves no praise, who, out of melancholy zeal, leaves the world before he has well tried it, and runs headlong into religion. He who carries a maidenhead into a cloister is sometimes apt to lose it there, and to repent of his repentance. He only is like to endure austerities who has already found the inconvenience of pleasures. For almost every man will be making experiments in one part or another of his life, and the danger is the less when we are young; for, having tried it early, we shall not be apt to repeat it afterwards. Your Lordship therefore may properly be said to have chosen a retreat, and not to have chosen it till you had maturely weigh'd the advantages of rising higher, with the hazards of the fall. Res, non parata labore, sed relicta, was thought by a poet to be one of the requisites to a happy life. Why should a reasonable man put it into the power of Fortune to make him miserable, when his ancestors have taken care to release him from her? Let him venture, says Horace, qui zonam perdidit. He who has nothing plays securely; for he may win, and cannot be poorer if he loses. But he who is born to a plentiful estate, and is ambitious of offices at court, sets a stake to Fortune which she can seldom answer: if he gains nothing, he loses all, or part of what was once his own; and if he gets, he cannot be certain but he may refund. In short, however he succeeds, 't is covetousness that induc'd him first to play; and covetousness is the undoubted sign of ill sense at bottom. The odds are against him that he loses; and one loss may be of more consequence to him than all his former winnings. 'Tis like the present war of the Christians against the Turk: every year they gain a victory, and by that a town; but, if they are once defeated, they lose a province at a blow, and endanger the safety of the whole empire. You, my Lord, enjoy your quiet in a garden, where you have not only the leisure of thinking, but the pleasure to think of nothing which can discompose your mind. A good conscience is a port which is landlock'd on every side; and where no winds can possibly invade, no tempests can arise. There a man may stand upon the shore, and not only see his own image, but that of his Maker, clearly reflected from the undisturb'd and silent waters. Reason was intended for a blessing; and such it is to men of honor and integrity, who desire no more than what they are able to give themselves; like the happy old Corycian whom my author describes in his Fourth Georgic, whose fruits and salads, on which he liv'd contented, were all of his own growth, and his own plantation. Virgil seems to think that the blessings of a country life are not complete without an improvement of knowledge by contemplation and reading:

O fortunatos nimium, bona si sua norint, Agricolas!

'Tis but half possession not to understand that happiness which we possess. A foundation of good sense and a cultivation of learning are requir'd to give a seasoning to retirement, and make us taste the blessing. God has bestow'd on your Lordship the first of these; and you have bestow'd on yourself the second. Eden was not made for beasts, tho' they were suffer'd to live in it, but for their master, who studied God in the works of his creation. Neither could the Devil have been happy there with all his knowledge; for he wanted innocence to make him so. He brought envy, malice, and ambition into Paradise, which sour'd to him the sweetness of the place. Wherever inordinate affections are, 't is hell. Such only can enjoy the country, who are capable of thinking when they are there, and have left their passions behind them in the town. Then they are prepar'd for solitude: and in that solitude is prepar'd for them:

Et secura quies, et nescia fallere vîa.

As I began this dedication with a verse of Virgil, so I conclude it with another. The continuance of your health, to enjoy that happiness which you so well deserve, and which you have provided for yourself, is the sincere and earnest wish of

Your Lordship's most devoted
And most obedient Servant,
JOHN DRYDEN.

THE FIRST BOOK OF THE GEORGICS

THE ARGUMENT

The poet, in the beginning of this book, propounds the general design of each Georgic; and, after a solemn invocation of all the gods who are any way related to his subject, he addresses himself in particular to Angustus, whom he compliments with divinity; and after strikes into his business. He shews the different kinds of tillage proper to different soils; traces out the original of agriculture; gives a catalogue of the husbandman's tools; specifies the employments peculiar to each season; describes the changes of the weather, with the signs in heaven and earth that forebode them; instances many of the prodigies that happen'd near the time of Julius Cæsar's death; and shuts up all with a supplication to the gods for the safety of Augustus, and the preservation of Rome.

WHAT makes a plenteous harvest, when to turn

The fruitful soil, and when to sow the corn;
The care of sheep, of oxen, and of kine,
And how to raise on elms the teeming vine;
The birth and genius of the frugal bee,
I sing, Mæcenas, and I sing to thee.

Ye deities, who fields and plains protect,
Who rule the seasons, and the year direct,
Bacchus and fost'ring Ceres, pow'rs divine,
Who gave us corn for mast, for water,
wine; ¹⁰

Ye Fauns, propitious to the rural swains, Ye nymphs, that haunt the mountains and
the plains,

Join in my work, and to my numbers bring
Your needful succor; for your gifts I sing.
And thou, whose trident struck the teeming
earth,

And made a passage for the courser's birth;
And thou, for whom the Cæan shore sustains

Thy milky herds, that graze the flow'ry
plains;

And thou, the shepherds' tutelary god,
Leave, for a while, O Pan, thy lov'd abode; ²⁰

And, if Arcadian fleeces be thy care,
From fields and mountains to my song
repair.

Inventor, Pallas, of the fatt'ning oil,
Thou founder of the plow, and plowman's
toil;

And thou, whose hands the shroud-like cypress rear,
Come, all ye gods and goddesses, that
wear

The rural honors, and increase the year:
You, who supply the ground with seeds of
grain;

And you, who swell those seeds with kindly
rain;

And chiefly thou, whose undetermin'd state

Is yet the business of the gods' debate, ³¹
Whether in after times to be declar'd

The patron of the world, and Rome's peculiar guard,

Or o'er the fruits and seasons to preside,
And the round circuit of the year to guide —

Pow'rful of blessings, which thou strew'st
around,

And with thy goddess-mother's myrtle
crown'd.

Or wilt thou, Cæsar, choose the wat'ry
reign,

To smooth the surges, and correct the
main?

Then mariners, in storms, to thee shall pray; ⁴⁰

Ev'n utmost Thule shall thy pow'r obey,
And Neptune shall resign the fasces of
the sea;

The wat'ry virgins for thy bed shall strive,
And Tethys all her waves in dowry give.

Or wilt thou bless our summers with thy
rays,

And, seated near the Balance, poise the
days,

Where, in the void of heav'n, a space is free, Betwixt the Scorpion and the Maid, for
thee?

The Scorpion, ready to receive thy laws, Yields half his region, and contracts his claws. ⁵⁰

Whatever part of heav'n thou shalt obtain —

For let not hell presume of such a reign;
Nor let so dire a thirst of empire move Thy mind, to leave thy kindred gods
above —

Tho' Greece admires Elysium's blest retreat;

Tho' Proserpine affects her silent seat,
And, importun'd by Ceres to remove,
Prefers the fields below to those above, —
But thou, propitious Cæsar, guide my
course,

And to my bold endeavors add thy force: ⁶⁰
Pity the poet's and the plowman's cares;
Int'rest thy greatness in our mean affairs,
And use thyself betimes to hear and grant
our pray'rs.

While yet the spring is young, while Earth unbinds

Her frozen bosom to the western winds;
While mountain snows dissolve against the
sun,

And streams, yet new, from precipices run;
 Ev'n in this early dawning of the year,
 Produce the plow, and yoke the sturdy steer,

And goad him till he groans beneath his
 toil, 70

Till the bright share is buried in the soil.
 That crop rewards the greedy peasant's
 pains,

Which twice the sun, and twice the cold sustains,

And bursts the crowded barns with more than promis'd gains.

But, ere we stir the yet unbroken ground,
 The various course of seasons must be
 found;

The weather, and the setting of the winds,
 The culture suiting to the sev'ral kinds
 Of seeds and plants, and what will thrive
 and rise,

And what the genius of the soil denies. 80
 This ground with Bacchus, that with Ceres suits;

That other loads the trees with happy fruits;
 A fourth with grass, unbidden, decks the
 ground.

Thus Tmolus is with yellow saffron crown'd:
 India black ebony and white ivory bears;
 And soft Idume weeps her od'rous tears.

Thus Pontus sends her beaver stones from
 far;

And naked Spaniards temper steel for war:
 Epirus for th' Elean chariot breeds,
 In hopes of palms, a race of running steeds.
 This is the original contract; these the
 laws 91

Impos'd by Nature, and by Nature's
 cause,

On sundry places, when Deucalion hurl'd
 His mother's entrails on the desert world;
 Whence men, a hard laborious kind,
 were born.

Then borrow part of winter for thy corn,
 And early with thy team the glebe in furrows turn;

That, while the turf lies open and un-
 bound,

Succeeding suns may bake the mellow
 ground.

But, if the soil be barren, only scar 100
 The surface, and but lightly print the
 share,

When cold Arcturus rises with the sun;
 Lest wicked weeds the corn should overrun
 In wat'ry soils, or lest the barren sand

Should suck the moisture from the thirsty
 land.

Both these unhappy soils the swain for-
 bears,

And keeps a sabbath of alternate years,
 That the spent earth may gather heart
 again,

And, better'd by cessation, bear the grain.
 At least where vetches, pulse, and tares have stood, 110

And stalks of lupines grew (a stubborn
 wood),

Th' ensuing season, in return, may bear
 The bearded product of the golden year.
 For flax and oats will burn the tender
 field,

And sleepy poppies harmful harvests yield;
 But sweet vicissitudes of rest and toil
 Make easy labor, and renew the soil.

Yet sprinkle sordid ashes all around,
 And load with fatt'ning dung thy fallow
 ground.

Thus change of seeds for meager soils is
 best; 120

And earth manur'd, not idle, tho' at rest.

Long practice has a sure improvement
 found,

With kindled fires to burn the barren
 ground,

When the light stubble, to the flames re-
 sign'd,

Is driv'n along, and crackles in the wind:
 Whether from hence the hollow womb of
 Earth

Is warm'd with secret strength for better
 birth;

Or, when the latent vice is cur'd by fire,
 Redundant humors thro' the pores expire;
 Or that the warmth distends the chinks, and makes 130

New breathings, whence new nourishment
 she takes;

Or that the heat the gaping grounds con-
 strains,

New knits the surface, and new strings the
 veins;

Lest soaking show'rs should pierce her secret seat,

Or freezing Boreas chill her genial heat,
 Or scorching suns too violently beat.

Nor is the profit small the peasant makes,
 Who smooths with harrows, or who pounds
 with rakes

The crumbling clods; nor Ceres from on
 high

Regards his labors with a grudging eye; ¹⁴⁰
 Nor his, who plows across the furrow'd grounds,
 And on the back of earth inflicts new wounds;
 For he with frequent exercise commands
 Th' unwilling soil, and tames the stubborn lands.

Ye swains, invoke the pow'rs who rule
 the sky,
 For a moist summer, and a winter dry;
 For winter drought rewards the peasant's
 pain,
 And broods indulgent on the buried grain.
 Hence Mysia boasts her harvests, and the tops
 Of Gargarus admire their happy crops. ¹⁵⁰
 When first the soil receives the fruitful
 seed,
 Make no delay, but cover it with speed:
 So fenc'd from cold, the pliant furrows
 break

Before the surly clod resists the rake.
 And call the floods from high, to rush
 amain
 With pregnant streams, to swell the teeming grain.

Then, when the fiery suns too fiercely play,
 And shrivel'd herbs on with'ring stems decay,

The wary plowman, on the mountain's
 brow,

Undams his wat'ry stores — huge torrents flow, ¹⁶⁰

And, rattling down the rocks, large moisture yield,

Temp'ring the thirsty fever of the field —
 And lest the stem, too feeble for the freight,

Should scarce sustain the head's unwieldy
 weight,

Sends in his feeding flocks betimes, t' in-
 vade

The rising bulk of the luxuriant blade,
 Ere yet th' aspiring offspring of the grain
 O'ertops the ridges of the furrow'd plain;
 And drains the standing waters, when they
 yield

Too large a bev'rage to the drunken field:
 But most in autumn, and the show'ry spring, ¹⁷¹

When dubious months uncertain weather
 bring;

When fountains open, when impetuous
 rain

Swells hasty brooks, and pours upon the
 plain;

When earth with slime and mud is cover'd
 o'er,

Or hollow places spew their wat'ry store.
 Nor yet the plowman, nor the lab'ring
 steer,

Sustain alone the hazards of the year:
 But glutton geese, and the Strymonian
 crane,

With foreign troops invade the tender
 grain; ¹⁸⁰

And tow'ring weeds malignant shadows
 yield;

And spreading succ'ry chokes the rising
 field.

The sire of gods and men, with hard decrees,

Forbids our plenty to be bought with ease,
 And wills that mortal men, inur'd to toil,
 Should exercise, with pains, the grudging soil.

Himself invented first the shining share,
 And whetted human industry by care;
 Himself did handicrafts and arts ordain,
 Nor suffer'd sloth to rust his active reign.
 Ere this, no peasant vex'd the peaceful ground, ¹⁹¹

Which only turfs and greens for altars
 found:

No fences parted fields, nor marks nor bounds

Distinguish'd acres of litigious grounds;
 But all was common, and the fruitful Earth
 Was free to give her unexacted birth.

Jove added venom to the viper's brood,
 And swell'd with raging storms the peaceful flood;

Commission'd hungry wolves t' infest the
 fold,

And shook from oaken leaves the liquid
 gold; ²⁰⁰

Remov'd from human reach the cheerful
 fire,

And from the rivers bade the wine retire;
 That studious need might useful arts explore,

From furrow'd fields to reap the foodful
 store,

And force the veins of clashing flints t'
 expire

The lurking seeds of their celestial fire.
 Then first on seas the hollow'd alderswam;
 Then sailors quarter'd heav'n, and found a
 name

For ev'ry fix'd and ev'ry wand'ring star:
 The Pleiads, Hyads, and the Northern
 Car. ²¹⁰
 Then toils for beasts, and lime for birds
 were found,
 And deep-mouth dogs did forest walks sur-
 round;
 And casting nets were spread in shallow
 brooks,
 Drags in the deep, and baits were hung on hooks.
 Then saws were tooth'd, and sounding axes
 made,
 (For wedges first did yielding wood invade;)
 And various arts in order did succeed:
 What cannot endless labor, urg'd by
 need?
 First Ceres taught the ground with grain
 to sow,
 And arm'd with iron shares the crooked plow; ²²⁰
 When now Dodonian oaks no more supplied
 Their mast, and trees their forest fruit denied.
 Soon was his labor doubled to the swain,
 And blasting mildews blacken'd all his
 grain;
 Tough thistles chok'd the fields, and kill'd
 the corn,
 And an unthrifty crop of weeds was born:
 Then burs and brambles, an unbidden crew
 Of graceless guests, th' unhappy field sub-
 due;
 And oats unblest, and darnel domineers,
 And shoots its head above the shining ears;
 So that, unless the land with daily care ²³¹
 Is exercis'd, and with an iron war
 Of rakes and harrows the proud foes ex-
 pell'd,
 And birds with clamors frighted from the
 field;
 Unless the boughs are lopp'd that shade
 the plain,
 And Heav'n invok'd with vows for fruitful
 rain,
 On other crops you may with envy look,
 And shake for food the long-abandon'd oak.
 Nor must we pass untold what arms they
 wield,
 Who labor tillage and the furrow'd field; ²⁴⁰
 Without whose aid the ground her corn denies,
 And nothing can be sown, and nothing rise:

The crooked plow, the share, the tow'ring
 height
 Of wagons, and the cart's unwieldy weight;
 The sled, the tumbrel, hurdles, and the flail,
 The fan of Bacchus, with the flying sail —
 These all must be prepar'd, if plowmen hope
 The promis'd blessing of a bounteous crop.
 Young elms, with early force, in copses
 bow,
 Fit for the figure of the crooked plow. ²⁵⁰
 Of eight foot long a fasten'd beam prepare; }
 On either side the head produce an ear, }
 And sink a socket for the shining share: }
 Of beech the plow-tail and the bending
 yoke,
 Or softer linden harden'd in the smoke.
 I could be long in precepts; but I fear
 So mean a subject might offend your ear.
 Delve of convenient depth your thrashing
 floor:
 With temper'd clay then fill and face it
 o'er;
 And let the weighty roller run the round,
 To smooth the surface of th' unequal ground; ²⁶¹
 Lest, crack'd with summer heats, the flooring flies,
 Or sinks, and thro' the crannies weeds
 arise.
 For sundry foes the rural realm surround;
 The field mouse builds her garner under
 ground
 For gather'd grain; the blind laborious mole
 In winding mazes works her hidden hole;
 In hollow caverns vermin make abode —
 The hissing serpent, and the swelling toad;
 The corn-devouring weasel here abides, ²⁷⁰
 And the wise ant her wintry store provides.
 Mark well the flow'ring almonds in the
 wood:
 If od'rous blooms the bearing branches
 load,
 The glebe will answer to the sylvan reign;
 Great heats will follow, and large crops of
 grain.
 But if a wood of leaves o'ershade the tree,
 Such and so barren will thy harvest be:
 In vain the hind shall vex the thrashing
 floor;
 For empty chaff and straw will be thy
 store.

Some steep their seed, and some in caldrons
boil, 280

With vigorous niter and with lees of oil, O'er gentle fires, th' exuberant juice to drain,

And swell the flatt'ring husks with fruitful
grain.

Yet is not the success for years assur'd,
Tho' chosen is the seed, and fully cur'd,
Unless the peasant, with his annual pain,
Renews his choice, and culls the largest
grain.

Thus all below, whether by Nature's curse,
Or Fate's decree, degen'rate still to worse.
So the boat's brawny crew the current stem, 290

And, slow advancing, struggle with the stream;

But if they slack their hands, or cease to strive,

Then down the flood with headlong haste
they drive.

Nor must the plowman less observe the
skies,

When the Kids, Dragon, and Arcturus rise, Than sailors homeward bent, who cut their
way

Thro' Helle's stormy straits, and oyster-breeding sea.

But, when Astraea's Balance, hung on high,
Betwixt the nights and days divides the sky,
Then yoke your oxen, sow your winter
grain, 300

Till cold December comes with driving
rain.

Linseed and fruitful poppy bury warm,
In a dry season, and prevent the storm.

Sow beans and clover in a rotten soil,
And millet rising from your annual toil;

When with his golden horns, in full career,

The Bull beats down the barriers of the
year,

And Argos and the Dog forsake the northern sphere.

But if your care to wheat alone extend,
Let Maia with her sisters first descend,
And the bright Gnosian diadem downward bend, 311

Before you trust in earth your future hope;
Or else expect a listless lazy crop.

Some swains have sown before; but most
have found

A husky harvest from the grudging ground.
Vile vetches would you sow, or lentils lean,

The growth of Egypt, or the kidney bean?
Begin when the slow wagoner descends,
Nor cease your sowing till midwinter ends:
For this, thro' twelve bright signs Apollo
guides 320

The year, and earth in sev'ral climes divides.

Five girdles bind the skies: the torrid zone
Glow with the passing and repassing sun;
Far on the right and left, th' extremes of
heav'n

To frosts and snows and bitter blasts are
giv'n;

Betwixt the midst and these, the gods as-
sign'd

Two habitable seats for humankind,
And cross their limits cut a sloping way,
Which the twelve signs in beauteous order
sway.

Two poles turn round the globe; one seen to rise 330

O'er Scythian hills, and one in Libyan
skies;

The first sublime in heav'n, the last is whirl'd

Below the regions of the nether world.

Around our pole the spiry Dragon glides,
And, like a winding stream, the Bears divides —

The less and greater, who, by Fate's decree,
Abhor to dive beneath the southern sea.

There, as they say, perpetual night is found
In silence brooding on th' unhappy ground:

Or, when Aurora leaves our northern sphere,
She lights the downward heav'n, and rises
there; 341

And, when on us she breathes the living
light,

Red Vesper kindles there the tapers of the
night.

From hence uncertain seasons we may know,
And when to reap the grain, and when to
sow;

Or when to fell the furzes; when 't is meet
To spread the flying canvas for the fleet.

Observe what stars arise, or disappear;

And the four quarters of the rolling year.

But, when cold weather and continued rain
The lab'ring husband in his house restrain,
Let him forecast his work with timely
care, 352

Which else is huddled when the skies
are fair:

Then let him mark the sheep, or whet
the shining share,

Or hollow trees for boats, or number o'er
His sacks, or measure his increasing store,
Or sharpen stakes, or head the forks, or twine

The fallow twigs to tie the straggling vine;
Or wicker baskets weave, or air the corn,
Or grinded grain betwixt two marbles
turn. 360

No laws, divine or human, can restrain
From necessary works the lab'ring swain.
Ev'n holidays and feasts permission yield
To float the meadows, or to fence the field,
To fire the brambles, snare the birds, and
steep

In wholesome waterfalls the woolly sheep.
And oft the drudging ass is driv'n, with
toil,
To neighb'ring towns with apples and with
oil;

Returning late, and loaden, home with gain
Of barter'd pitch, and handmills for the
grain. 370

The lucky days, in each revolving moon,
For labor choose: the fifth be sure to shun;
That gave the Furies and pale Pluto birth,
And arm'd, against the skies, the sons of
earth.

With mountains pil'd on mountains, thrice
they strove

To scale the steepy battlements of Jove;
And thrice his lightning and red thunder
play'd,

And their demolish'd works in ruin laid.
The sev'nth is, next the tenth, the best to
join

Young oxen to the yoke, and plant the
vine: 380

Then, weavers, stretch your stays upon the weft.

The ninth is good for travel, bad for theft.
Some works in dead of night are better
done,

Or when the morning dew prevents the sun.
Parch'd meads and stubble mow by Phœbe's
light,

Which both require the coolness of the
night;

For moisture then abounds, and pearly rains

Descend in silence to refresh the plains.
The wife and husband equally conspire
To work by night, and rake the winter
fire: 390

He sharpens torches in the glimm'ring
room;

She shoots the flying shuttle thro' the loom,
Or boils in kettles must of wine, and skims
With leaves the dregs that overflow the brims;

And, till the watchful cock awakes the
day,

She sings, to drive the tedious hours away.
But in warm weather, when the skies are clear,

By daylight reap the product of the year;
And in the sun your golden grain display,
And thrash it out, and winnow it by day.
Plow naked, swain, and naked sow the
land; 401

For lazy winter numbs the lab'ring hand.
In genial winter, swains enjoy their store,
Forget their hardships, and recruit for
more;

The farmer to full bowls invites his friends,
And, what he got with pains, with pleasure spends.

So sailors, when escap'd from stormy seas,
First crown their vessels, then indulge their ease.

Yet that's the proper time to thrash the
wood

For mast of oak, your fathers' homely
food; 410

To gather laurel berries, and the spoil
Of bloody myrtles, and to press your oil;
For stalking cranes to set the guileful
snare;

T' inclose the stags in toils, and hunt the hare;

With Balearic slings, or Gnosian bow,
To persecute from far the flying doe —
Then, when the fleecy skies new clothe the
wood,

And cakes of rustling ice come rolling down the flood.

Now sing we stormy stars, when autumn weighs

The year, and adds to nights, and shortens
days, 420

And suns declining shine with feeble rays:
What cares must then attend the toiling
swain;

Or when the low'ring spring, with lavish
rain,

Beats down the slender stem and bearded
grain,

While yet the head is green, or, lightly
swell'd

With milky moisture, overlooks the field.
Ev'n when the farmer, now secure of fear,

Sends in the swains to spoil the finish'd
 year;
 Ev'n while the reaper fills his greedy
 hands,
 And binds the golden sheafs in brittle
 bands; 430
 Oft have I seen a sudden storm arise
 From all the warring winds that sweep the
 skies:
 The heavy harvest from the root is torn,
 And whirl'd aloft the lighter stubble
 borne;
 With such a force the flying rack is driv'n,
 And such a winter wears the face of heav'n:
 And oft whole sheets descend of sluicy
 rain, Suck'd by the spongy clouds from off the
 main;
 The lofty skies at once come pouring down,
 The promis'd crop and golden labors
 drown. 440
 The dykes are fill'd, and with a roaring
 sound
 The rising rivers float the nether ground;
 And rocks the bellowing voice of boiling seas rebound. }
 The Father of the Gods his glory shrouds,
 Involv'd in tempests, and a night of clouds;
 And, from the middle darkness flashing
 out,
 By fits he deals his fiery bolts about.
 Earth feels the motions of her angry god;
 Her entrails tremble, and her mountains
 nod, }
 And flying beasts in forests seek abode: }
 Deep horror seizes ev'ry human breast; 451
 Their pride is humbled and their fear confess'd,
 While he from high his rolling thunder
 throws,
 And fires the mountains with repeated
 blows.
 The rocks are from their old foundations
 rent;
 The winds redouble, and the rains aug-
 ment:
 The waves on heaps are dash'd against the
 shore;
 And now the woods, and now the billows
 roar.
 In fear of this, observe the starry signs,
 Where Saturn houses, and where Hermes
 joins. 460
 But first to Heav'n thy due devotions pay,
 And annual gifts on Ceres' altars lay.

When winter's rage abates, when cheerful hours
 Awake the spring, and spring awakes the flow'rs,
 On the green turf thy careless limbs dis-
 play,
 And celebrate the Mighty Mother's day:
 For then the hills with pleasing shades are
 crown'd,
 And sleeps are sweeter on the silken ground;
 With milder beams the sun securely shines;
 Fat are the lambs, and luscious are the wines. 470
 Let ev'ry swain adore her pow'r divine,
 And milk and honey mix with sparkling
 wine:
 Let all the choir of clowns attend the show
 In long procession, shouting as they go;
 Invoking her to bless their yearly stores,
 Inviting plenty to their crowded floors.
 Thus in the spring, and thus in summer's
 heat,
 Before the sickles touch the ripening wheat,
 On Ceres call; and let the lab'ring hind With oaken wreaths his hollow temples
 bind: 480
 On Ceres let him call, and Ceres praise,
 With uncouth dances, and with country lays.
 And that by certain signs we may presage
 Of heats and rains, and wind's impetuous
 rage,
 The sov'reign of the heav'ns has set on
 high
 The moon, to mark the changes of the sky;
 When southern blasts should cease, and when the swain
 Should near their folds his feeding flocks
 restrain.
 For, ere the rising winds begin to roar,
 The working seas advance to wash the
 shore; 490
 Soft whispers run along the leavy woods,
 And mountains whistle to the murm'ring
 floods.
 Ev'n then the doubtful billows scarce abstain
 From the toss'd vessel on the troubled
 main;
 When crying cormorants forsake the sea,
 And stretching to the covert wing their
 way;
 When sportful coots run skimming o'er
 the strand;
 When watchful herons leave their wat'ry
 stand,

And mounting upward, with erected flight, Gain on the skies, and soar above the
sight. 500

And oft, before tempest'ous winds arise,
The seeming stars fall headlong from the
skies,

And, shooting thro' the darkness, gild the
night

With sweeping glories, and long trails of
light;

And chaff with eddy-winds is whirl'd
around,

And dancing leaves are lifted from the
ground;

And floating feathers on the waters play.
But when the winged thunder takes his
way

From the cold North, and East and West
ingage,

And at their frontiers meet with equal
rage, 510

The clouds are crush'd; a glut of gather'd
rain

The hollow ditches fills, and floats the
plain;

And sailors furl their dropping sheets
amain. }

Wet weather seldom hurts the most un-
wise;

So plain the signs, such prophets are the
skies.

The wary crane foresees it first, and sails
Above the storm, and leaves the lowly vales;

The cow looks up, and from afar can find
The change of heav'n, and snuffs it in the
wind;

The swallow skins the river's wat'ry face;
The frogs renew the croaks of their loquacious race; 521

The careful ant her secret cell forsakes,
And drags her eggs along the narrow
tracks:

At either horn the rainbow drinks the
flood;

Huge flocks of rising rooks forsake their
food,

And, crying, seek the shelter of the wood. }

Besides, the sev'ral sorts of wat'ry fowls
That swim the seas, or haunt the standing pools.

The swans that sail along the silver flood,
And dive with stretching necks to search their food, 530

Then lave their backs with sprinkling dews
in vain,

And stem the stream to meet the pro-
mis'd rain.

The crow with clam'rous cries the show'r demands,

And single stalks along the desert sands.
The nightly virgin, while her wheel she plies,

Foresees the storm impending in the skies,
When sparkling lamps their sputt'ring light
advance,

And in the sockets oily bubbles dance.

Then, after show'rs, 't is easy to descry
Returning suns, and a serener sky: 540

The stars shine smarter; and the moon
adorns,

As with unborrow'd beams, her sharpen'd horns.

The filmy gossamer now flits no more,
Nor haleyons bask on the short sunny
shore;

Their litter is not toss'd by sows unclean:
But a blue droughty mist descends upon
the plain;

And owls, that mark the setting sun, declare

A starlight evening, and a morning fair.
Tow'ring aloft, avenging Nisus flies,

While, dar'd below, the guilty Scylla lies.
Wherever frightened Scylla flies away, 551

Swift Nisus follows, and pursues his prey;
Where injur'd Nisus takes his airy course,

Thence trembling Scylla flies, and shuns
his force:

This punishment pursues th' unhappy maid,
And thus the purple hair is dearly paid.

Then, thrice the ravens rend the liquid air,
And croaking notes proclaim the settled
fair;

Then, round their airy palaces they fly,
To greet the sun; and, seiz'd with secret
joy, 560

When storms are overblown, with food
repair

To their forsaken nests and callow care.
Not that I think their breasts with heav'nly souls

Inspir'd, as man, who destiny controls;
But with the changeful temper of the
skies,

As rains condense, and sunshine rarefies,
So turn the species in their alter'd minds,

Compos'd by calms, and discompos'd by
winds:

From hence proceeds the birds' harmonious
voice;

From hence the cows exult, and frisking
lambs rejoice. 570

Observe the daily circle of the sun,
And the short year of each revolving
moon:

By them thou shalt foresee the following
day,

Nor shall a starry night thy hopes betray.
When first the moon appears, if then she shrouds

Her silver crescent, tipp'd with sable clouds,
Conclude she bodes a tempest on the main,
And brews for fields impetuous floods of
rain;

Or, if her face with fiery flushing glow,
Expect the rattling winds aloft to blow. 580
But, four nights old, (for that's the surest sign,)

With sharpen'd horns if glorious then she shine,

Next day, nor only that, but all the moon,
Till her revolving race be wholly run,
Are void of tempests, both by land and sea,
And sailors in the port their promis'd vow shall pay.

Above the rest, the sun, who never lies,
Foretells the change of weather in the
skies:

For if he rise unwilling to his race,
Clouds on his brows, and spots upon his
face, 590

Or if thro' mists he shoots his sullen beams, Frugal of light, in loose and straggling streams;

Suspect a drizzling day, with southern rain,
Fatal to fruits, and flocks, and promis'd
grain.

Or if Aurora, with half-open'd eyes,
And a pale sickly cheek, salute the skies;
How shall the vine, with tender leaves, defend

Her teeming clusters, when the storms descend,

When ridgy roofs and tiles can scarce avail
To bar the ruin of the rattling hail? 600

But, more than all, the setting sun survey,
When down the steep of heav'n he drives
the day;

For oft we find him finishing his race
With various colors erring on his face.

If fiery red his glowing globe descends,
High winds and furious tempests he por-
tends;

But if his cheeks are swoln with livid blue,
He bodes wet weather by his wat'ry hue.

If dusky spots are varied on his brow,
And, streak'd with red, a troubled color
show; 610

That sullen mixture shall at once declare Winds, rain, and storms, and elemental
war:

What desp'rate madman then would venture o'er

The frith, or haul his cables from the shore?
But if with purple rays he brings the light,
And a pure heav'n resigns to quiet night,
No rising winds or falling storms are
nigh;

But northern breezes thro' the forest fly,
And drive the rack, and purge the ruffled
sky. 619

Th' unerring sun by certain signs declares
What the late ev'n or early morn prepares,
And when the south projects a stormy day,
And when the clearing north will puff the clouds away.

The sun reveals the secrets of the sky;
And who dares give the source of light the
lie?

The change of empires often he declares,
Fierce tumults, hidden treasons, open wars.
He first the fate of Cæsar did foretell,
And pitied Rome, when Rome in Cæsar
fell;

In iron clouds conceal'd the public light, 630
And impious mortals fear'd eternal night.

Nor was the fact foretold by him alone:
Nature herself stood forth, and seconded
the sun.

Earth, air, and seas with prodigies were
sign'd;

And birds obscene, and howling dogs divin'd.
What rocks did Etna's bellowing mouth
expire

From her torn entrails! and what floods of
fire!

What clanks were heard, in German skies
afar,

Of arms and armies, rushing to the war!
Dire earthquakes rent the solid Alps be-
low, 640

And from their summets shook th' eternal
snow;

Pale specters in the close of night were
seen,

And voices heard of more than mortal men;
In silent groves dumb sheep and oxen
spoke;

And streams ran backward, and their beds
forsook;

The yawning earth disclos'd th' abyss of
hell;

The weeping statues did the wars foretell,
And holy sweat from brazen idols fell.

Then, rising in his might, the king of floods
Rush'd thro' the forests, tore the lofty woods;

650

And, rolling onward, with a sweepy sway,
Bore houses, herds, and lab'ring hinds away.
Blood sprang from wells, wolfs howl'd in towns by night,

And boding victims did the priests affright;
Such peals of thunder never pour'd from
high,

Nor forky lightnings flash'd from such a sullen sky.

Red meteors ran across th' ethereal space;
Stars disappear'd, and comets took their
place.

For this, th' Emathian plains once more were strow'd

With Roman bodies, and just Heav'n thought good

660

To fatten twice those fields with Roman
blood.

Then, after length of time, the lab'ring swains
Who turn the turfs of those unhappy plains
Shall rusty piles from the plow'd furrows
take,

And over empty helmets pass the rake;

Amaz'd at antic titles on the stones,

And mighty relics of gigantic bones.

Ye home-born deities, of mortal birth!

Thou Father Romulus, and Mother Earth, Goddess unmov'd! whose guardian arms extend

670

O'er Tuscan Tiber's course, and Roman tow'rs defend;

With youthful Cæsar your joint pow'rs
ingage,

Nor hinder him to save the sinking age.

O let the blood already spilt atone

For the past crimes of curst Laomedon!

Heav'n wants thee there; and long the gods, we know,

Have grudg'd thee, Cæsar, to the world
below,

Where fraud and rapine right and wrong
confound,

Where impious arms from ev'ry part re-
sound,

And monstrous crimes in ev'ry shape are crown'd.

680

The peaceful peasant to the wars is press'd;
The fields lie fallow in inglorious rest;
The plain no pasture to the flock affords;
The crooked scythes are straighten'd into swords:

And there Euphrates her soft offspring
arms,

And here the Rhine rebellows with alarms;
The neighb'ring cities range on sev'ral
sides,

Perfidious Mars long-plighted leagues
divides,

And o'er the wasted world in triumph
rides.

So four fierce coursers, starting to the race,

690

Scour thro' the plain, and lengthen ev'ry
pace;

Nor reins, nor curbs, nor threat'ning cries
they fear,

But force along the trembling charioteer.

THE SECOND BOOK OF THE GEORGICS

THE ARGUMENT

The subject of the following book is planting :
in handling of which argument the poet shews all the different methods of raising trees, describes their variety, and gives rules for the management of each in particular.
He then points out the soils in which the several plants thrive best, and thence takes occasion to run out into the praises of Italy : after which he gives some directions for discovering the nature of every soil, prescribes rules for the dressing of vines, olives, &c., and concludes the Georgic with a panegyric on a country life.

THUS far of tillage, and of heav'nly signs:
Now sing, my Muse, the growth of gen'rous
vines,

The shady groves, the woodland progeny,
And the slow product of Minerva's tree.

Great Father Bacchus! to my song re-
pair;

For clust'ring grapes are thy peculiar care:
For thee, large bunches load the bending
vine,

And the last blessings of the year are thine.
To thee his joys the jolly Autumn owes,

When the fermenting juice the vat o'er-flows.

10

Come, strip with me, my god ! come, drench
 all o'er Thy limbs in must of wine, and drink at ev'ry pore.
 Some trees their birth to bounteous Nature owe;
 For some without the pains of planting
 grow.
 With osiers thus the banks of brooks
 abound,
 Sprung from the wat'ry genius of the
 ground.
 From the same principles gray willows
 come,
 Herculean poplar, and the tender broom.
 But some from seeds inclos'd in earth
 arise;
 For thus the mastful chestnut mates the skies. ²⁰
 Hence rise the branching beech and vocal
 oak,
 Where Jove of old oraculously spoke.
 Some from the root a rising wood disclose:
 Thus elms, and thus the salvage cherry
 grows;
 Thus the green bay, that binds the poet's
 brows,
 Shoots, and is shelter'd by the mother's boughs.
 These ways of planting Nature did or-
 dain
 For trees and shrubs, and all the sylvan
 reign.
 Others there are, by late experience found:
 Some cut the shoots, and plant in furrow'd ground; ³⁰
 Some cover rooted stalks in deeper mold;
 Some, cloven stakes; and (wondrous to behold !)
 Their sharpen'd ends in earth their footing
 place,
 And the dry poles produce a living race.
 Some bow their vines, which buried in the
 plain,
 Their tops in distant arches rise again.
 Others no root require; the lab'rer cuts
 Young slips, and in the soil securely puts.
 Ev'n stumps of olives, bar'd of leaves, and
 dead,
 Revive, and oft redeem their wither'd head.
 'Tis usual now an inmate graff to see ⁴¹
 With insolence invade a foreign tree:
 Thus pears and quinces from the crab tree
 come,
 And thus the ruddy cornel bears the plum.

Then let the learned gard'ner mark with
 care
 The kinds of stocks, and what those kinds will bear;
 Explore the nature of each sev'ral tree,
 And, known, improve with artful industry:
 And let no spot of idle earth be found,
 But cultivate the genius of the ground; ⁵⁰
 For open Ismarus will Bacchus please;
 Taburnus loves the shade of olive trees.
 The virtues of the sev'ral soils I sing —
 Mæcenas, now thy needful succor bring !
 O thou ! the better part of my renown,
 Inspire thy poet, and thy poem crown;
 Embark with me, while I new tracts explore,
 With flying sails, and breezes from the
 shore:
 Not that my song, in such a scanty space,
 So large a subject fully can embrace — ⁶⁰
 Not tho' I were supplied with iron lungs,
 A hundred months, fill'd with as many
 tongues —
 But steer my vessel with a steady hand,
 And coast along the shore in sight of land.
 Nor will I tire thy patience with a train
 Of preface, or what ancient poets feign.
 The trees which of themselves advance in
 air
 Are barren kinds, but strongly built and
 fair;
 Because the vigor of the native earth Maintains the plant, and makes a manly birth. ⁷⁰
 Yet these, receiving graffs of other kind,
 Or thence transplanted, change their salvage mind,
 Their wildness lose, and, quitting nature's
 part,
 Obey the rules and discipline of art.
 The same do trees that, sprung from bar-ren roots,
 In open fields transplanted bear their fruits;
 For, where they grow, the native energy
 Turns all into the substance of the tree,
 Starves and destroys the fruit, is only made
 For brawny bulk, and for a barren shade.
 The plant that shoots from seed, a sullen tree, ⁸¹
 At leisure grows, for late posterity;
 The gen'rous flavor lost, the fruits decay,
 And salvage grapes are made the birds'
 ignoble prey.
 Much labor is requir'd in trees, to tame
 Their wild disorder, and in ranks reclaim.

Well must the ground be digg'd, and better
dress'd,
New soil to make, and meliorate the rest.
Old stakes of olive trees in plants revive;
By the same methods Paphian myrtles
live; 90
But nobler vines by propagation thrive.
From roots hard hazels; and from cions rise Tall ash, and taller oak that mates the
skies;
Palm, poplar, fir, descending from the
steep
Of hills, to try the dangers of the deep.
The thin-leav'd arbuté hazel graffs receives;
And planes huge apples bear, that bore but
leaves.
Thus mastful beech the bristly chestnut
bears,
And the wild ash is white with blooming
pears,
And greedy swine from grafted elms are
fed 100
With falling acorns, that on oaks are bred.
But various are the ways to change the
state
Of plants, to bud, to graff, t' inoculate.
For, where the tender rinds of trees disclose
Their shooting gems, a swelling knot there
grows;
Just in that space a narrow slit we make,
Then other buds from bearing trees we take;
Inserted thus, the wounded rind we close,
In whose moist womb th' admitted infant
grows.
But, when the smoother bole from knots is
free, 110
We make a deep incision in the tree,
And in the solid wood the slip inclose:
The batt'ning bastard shoots again and
grows;
And in short space the laden boughs arise,
With happy fruit advancing to the skies.
The mother plant admires the leaves un-
known
Of alien trees, and apples not her own.
Of vegetable woods are various kinds,
And the same species are of sev'ral minds.
Lotes, willows, elms, have diff'rent forms
allow'd; 120
So fun'ral cypress, rising like a shroud:
Fat olive trees of sundry sorts appear,
Of sundry shapes their unctuous berries
bear.

Radii long olives, Orchits round produce,
And bitter Pausia, pounded for the juice.
Alcinoüs' orchard various apples bears;
Unlike are bergamotes and pounder pears.
Nor our Italian vines produce the shape,
Or taste, or flavor, of the Lesbian grape.
The Thasian vines in richer soils abound; 130
The Mareotic grow in barren ground.
The Psythian grape we dry; Lagæan juice
Will stamm'ring tongues and staggr'ring feet produce.
Rathe ripe are some, and some of later
kind;
Of golden some, and some of purple rind.
How shall I praise the Ræthean grape di-
vine,
Which yet contends not with Falernian
wine?
Th' Aminean many a consulship survives,
And longer than the Lydian vintage lives,
Or high Phanæus, king of Chian growth; 140
But for large quantities and lasting, both,
The less Argitis bears the prize away.
The Rhodian, sacred to the solemn day,
In second services is pour'd to Jove,
And best accepted by the gods above.
Nor must Bumastus his old honors lose,
In length and largeness like the dugs of cows.
I pass the rest, whose ev'ry race, and name,
And kinds, are less material to my theme;
Which who would learn, as soon may tell the sands, 150
Driv'n by the western wind on Libyan
lands;
Or number, when the blust'ring Eurys
roars,
The billows beating on Ionian shores.
Nor ev'ry plant on ev'ry soil will grow:
The sallow loves the wat'ry ground, and low;
The marshes, alders; nature seems t' ordain
The rocky cliff for the wild ash's reign;
The baleful yew to northern blasts assigns,
To shores the myrtles, and to mounts the vines.
Regard th' extremest cultivated coast, 160
From hot Arabia to the Scythian frost:
All sort of trees their sev'ral countries
know;
Black ebony only will in India grow,
And od'rous frankincense on the Sabæan
bough.
Balm slowly trickles thro' the bleeding
veins
Of happy shrubs in Idumæan plains.

The green Egyptian thorn, for med'cine
 good,
 With Ethiops' hoary trees and woolly wood,
 Let others tell; and how the Seres spin
 Their fleecy forests in a slender twine; ¹⁷⁰
 With mighty trunks of trees on Indian
 shores,
 Whose height above the feather'd arrow
 soars,
 Shot from the toughest bow, and by the brawn
 Of expert archers with vast vigor drawn.
 Sharp-tasted citrons Median climes produce,
 (Bitter the rind, but gen'rous is the juice,)
 A cordial fruit, a present antidote Against the direful stepdam's deadly
 draught,
 Who, mixing wicked weeds with words impure, ¹⁷⁹
 The fate of envied orphans would procure.
 Large is the plant, and like a laurel grows,
 And, did it not a diff'rent scent disclose,
 A laurel were: the fragrant flow'rs condemn
 The stormy winds, tenacious of their stem.
 With this the Medes to lab'ring age bequeath
 New lungs, and cure the sourness of the
 breath.
 But neither Median woods (a plenteous
 land),
 Fair Ganges, Hermus rolling golden sand,
 Nor Bactria, nor the richer Indian fields,
 Nor all the gummy stores Arabia yields, ¹⁸⁰
 Nor any foreign earth of greater name,
 Can with sweet Italy contend in fame. }
 No bulls whose nostrils breathe a living
 flame
 Have turn'd our turf; no teeth of serpents
 here
 Were sown, an armed host and iron crop to
 bear.
 But fruitful vines, and the fat olive's freight,
 And harvests heavy with their fruitful
 weight,
 Adorn our fields; and on the cheerful green
 The grazing flocks and lowing herds are
 seen.
 The warrior horse, here bred, is taught to train; ²⁰⁰
 There flows Clitumnus thro' the flow'ry
 plain;
 Whose waves, for triumphs after pros-
 p'rous war,
 The victim ox and snowy sheep prepare.

Perpetual spring our happy climate sees: } Twice breed the cattle, and twice bear }
 the trees;
 And summer suns recede by slow degrees. }
 Our land is from the rage of tigers freed,
 Nor nourishes the lion's angry seed;
 Nor pois'nous aconite is here produc'd,
 Or grows unknown, or is, when known, re-fus'd; ²¹⁰
 Nor in so vast a length our serpents glide,
 Or rais'd on such a spiry volume ride.
 Next add our cities of illustrious name,
 Their costly labor, and stupendous frame;
 Our forts on steepy hills, that far below
 See wanton streams in winding valleys
 flow;
 Our twofold seas, that, washing either side,
 A rich recruit of foreign stores provide;
 Our spacious lakes; thee, Larius, first; and next
 Benacus, with tempest'ous billows vex'd. ²²⁰
 Or shall I praise thy ports, or mention
 make
 Of the vast mound that binds the Lucrine
 lake?
 Or the disdainful sea, that, shut from thence,
 Roars round the structure, and invades the
 fence,
 There, where secure the Julian waters glide,
 Or where Avernus' jaws admit the Tyrrhene
 tide?
 Our quarries, deep in earth, were fam'd of
 old
 For veins of silver, and for ore of gold.
 Th' inhabitants themselves their country
 grace:
 Hence rose the Marsian and Sabellian race,
 Strong-limb'd and stout, and to the wars
 inclin'd, ²³¹
 And hard Ligurians, a laborious kind,
 And Volscians arm'd with iron-headed
 darts.
 Besides, an offspring of undaunted hearts,
 The Decii, Marii, great Camillus, came From hence, and greater Scipio's double
 name;
 And mighty Cæsar, whose victorious arms
 To farthest Asia carry fierce alarms,
 Avert unwarlike Indians from his Rome,
 Triumph abroad, secure our peace at home.
 Hail, sweet Saturnian soil! of fruitful grain ²⁴¹
 Great parent, greater of illustrious men!
 For thee my tuneful accents will I raise,

And treat of arts disclos'd in ancient days;
Once more unlock for thee the sacred
spring,
And old Ascræan verse in Roman cities
sing.

The nature of their sev'ral soils now
see,

Their strength, their color, their fertility:
And first for heath, and barren hilly
ground,

Where meager clay and flinty stones
abound; 250

Where the poor soil all succor seems to want—

Yet this suffices the Palladian plant.

Undoubted signs of such a soil are found;
For here wild olive shoots o'erspread
the ground,

And heaps of berries strew the fields
around.

But where the soil, with fatt'ning moisture
fill'd,

Is cloth'd with grass, and fruitful to be till'd,

Such as in cheerful vales we view from
high,

Which dripping rocks with rolling streams
supply,

And feed with ooze; where rising hillocks
run 260

In length, and open to the southern sun;
Where fern succeeds, ungrateful to the plow—

That gentle ground to gen'rous grapes allow.

Strong stocks of vines it will in time produce,

And overflow the vats with friendly juice,
Such as our priests in golden goblets pour
To gods, the givers of the cheerful hour, Then when the bloated Tuscan blows his horn,

And reeking entrails are in chargers
borne.

If herds or fleecy flocks be more thy
care, 270

Or goats that graze the field, and burn it
bare,

Then seek Tarentum's lawns, and farthest
coast,

Or such a field as hapless Mantua lost,
Where silver swans sail down the wat'ry
road,

And graze the floating herbage of the flood.
There crystal streams perpetual tenor keep,

Nor food nor springs are wanting to thy
sheep;

For, what the day devours, the nightly dew
Shall to the morn in pearly drops renew.

Fat crumbling earth is fitter for the plow,
Putrid and loose above, and black below;

For plowing is an imitative toil, 282
Resembling nature in an easy soil.

No land for seed like this; no fields afford
So large an income to the village lord:

No toiling teams from harvest labor come
So late at night, so heavy-laden home.

The like of forest land is understood,
From whence the surly plowman grubs
the wood,

Which had for length of ages idle stood:
Then birds forsake the ruins of their seat,

And, flying from their nests, their callow
young forget. 292

The coarse lean gravel, on the mountain
sides,

Scarce dewy bev'rage for the bees provides;
Nor chalk nor crumbling stones, the food
of snakes,

That work in hollow earth their winding tracks.

The soil exhaling clouds of subtile dews, Imbibing moisture which with ease she spews,

Which rusts not iron, and whose mold is clean,

Well cloth'd with cheerful grass, and ever green, 300

Is good for olives, and aspiring vines,
Embracing husband elms in am'rous twines;

Is fit for feeding cattle, fit to sow,
And equal to the pasture and the plow.

Such is the soil of fat Campanian fields;
Such large increase the land that joins Vesuvius yields;

And such a country could Acerra boast,
Till Clanius overflow'd th' unhappy coast.

I teach thee next the diff'ring soils to
know,

The light for vines, the heavier for the plow. 310

Choose first a place for such a purpose fit:
There dig the solid earth, and sink a pit;

Next fill the hole with its own earth again,
And trample with thy feet, and tread it in:

Then, if it rise not to the former height
Of superfluous, conclude that soil is light,

A proper ground for pasture and vines.
But if the sullen earth, so press'd, repines

Within its native mansion to retire,

And stays without, a heap of heavy mire,
 'Tis good for arable, a glebe that asks ³²¹
 Tough teams of oxen, and laborious tasks.

Salt earth and bitter are not fit to sow,
 Nor will be tam'd or mended with the plow.
 Sweet grapes degen'rate there; and fruits, declin'd

From their first flav'rous taste, renounce their kind.

This truth by sure experiment is tried;
 For first an osier colander provide Of twigs thick wrought (such toiling peasants twine,

When thro' strait passages they strain their wine): ³³⁰

In this close vessel place that earth ac-
 curst,

But fill'd brimful with wholesome water
 first;

Then run it thro': the drops will rope
 around,

And by the bitter taste disclose the ground.
 The fatter earth by handling we may find,
 With ease distinguish'd from the meager
 kind:

Poor soil will crumble into dust; the rich
 Will to the fingers cleave like clammy pitch:

Moist earth produces corn and grass, but both

Too rank and too luxuriant in their growth. ³⁴⁰

Let not my land so large a promise boast, Lest the lank ears in length of stem be
 lost.

The heavier earth is by her weight be-
 tray'd;

The lighter in the poising hand is weigh'd.
 'Tis easy to distinguish by the sight

The color of the soil, and black from white;
 But the cold ground is difficult to know;
 Yet this the plants that prosper there will show:

Black ivy, pitch trees, and the baleful
 yew.

These rules consider'd well, with early care ³⁵⁰

The vineyard destin'd for thy vines prepare;

But, long before the planting, dig the
 ground

With furrows deep that cast a rising mound:
 The clods, expos'd to winter winds, will bake;

For putrid earth will best in vineyards take,

And hoary frosts, after the painful toil
 Of delving hinds, will rot the mellow soil.

Some peasants, not t' omit the nicest
 care,

Of the same soil their nursery prepare ³⁵⁹
 With that of their plantation; lest the tree,
 Translated, should not with the soil agree.

Beside, to plant it as it was, they mark
 The heav'n's four quarters on the tender bark,

And to the north or south restore the side
 Which at their birth did heat or cold abide.

So strong is custom; such effects can use
 In tender souls of pliant plants produce.

Choose next a province for thy vineyard's
 reign,

On hills above, or in the lowly plain.

If fertile fields or valleys be thy choice, ³⁷⁰
 Plant thick; for bounteous Bacchus will rejoice

In close plantations there; but if the vine
 On rising ground be plac'd, or hills supine,

Extend thy loose battalions largely wide,
 Opening thy ranks and files on either side,

But marshal'd all in order as they stand;
 And let no soldier straggle from his band.

As legions in the field their front display,
 To try the fortune of some doubtful day,

And move to meet their foes with sober pace, ³⁸⁰

Strict to their figure, tho' in wider space,
 Before the battle joins, while from afar

The field yet glitters with the pomp of
 war,

And equal Mars, like an impartial lord, Leaves all to fortune, and the dint of

sword;

So let thy vines in intervals be set,

But not their rural discipline forget:

Indulge their width, and add a roomy
 space,

That their extremest lines may scarce embrace:

Nor this alone t' indulge a vain delight, ³⁹⁰
 And make a pleasing prospect for the sight;

But, for the ground itself, this only way
 Can equal vigor to the plants convey,

Which, crowded, want the room their branches to display.

How deep they must be planted, wouldst
 thou know?

In shallow furrows vines securely grow.

Not so the rest of plants; for Jove's own
 tree,

That holds the woods in awful sov'reignty,

Requires a depth of lodging in the ground,
And, next the lower skies, a bed profound:
High as his topmost boughs to heav'n ascend, 401

So low his roots to hell's dominion tend.
Therefore, nor winds, nor winter's rage o'er-
throws

His bulky body, but unmov'd he grows;
For length of ages lasts his happy reign,
And lives of mortal man contend in vain:
Full in the midst of his own strength he
stands,

Stretching his brawny arms, and leafy
hands;

His shade protects the plains, his head
the hills commands.

The hurtful hazel in thy vineyard shun;
Nor plant it to receive the setting sun; 411
Nor break the topmost branches from the
tree;

Nor prune, with blunted knife, the progeny.

Root up wild olives from thy labor'd lands;
For sparkling fire, from hinds' unwary
hands,

Is often scatter'd o'er their unctuous rinds,
And after spread abroad by raging winds:
For first the smould'ring flame the trunk
receives;

Ascending thence, it crackles in the leaves;
At length victorious to the top aspires, 420
Involving all the wood in smoky fires;
But most, when, driv'n by winds, the flaming storm

Of the long files destroys the beauteous form.

In ashes then th' unhappy vineyard lies;
Nor will the blasted plants from ruin rise;
Nor will the wither'd stock be green again;
But the wild olive shoots, and shades th'
ungrateful plain.

Be not seduc'd with wisdom's empty shows,
To stir the peaceful ground when Boreas
blows.

When winter frosts constrain the field with
cold, 430

The fainty root can take no steady hold;
But when the golden spring reveals the
year,

And the white bird returns, whom serpents
fear,

That season deem the best to plant thy
vines:

Next that, is when autumnal warmth declines,

Ere heat is quite decay'd, or cold begun,
Or Capricorn admits the winter sun.

The spring adorns the woods, renews the
leaves;

The womb of Earth the genial seed receives:
For then almighty Jove descends, and pours 440

Into his buxom bride his fruitful show'rs;
And, mixing his large limbs with hers, he feeds

Her births with kindly juice, and fosters teeming seeds.

Then joyous birds frequent the lonely grove,
And beasts, by nature stung, renew their
love.

Then fields the blades of buried corn dis-
close;

And, while the balmy western spirit
blows,

Earth to the breath her bosom dares expose.

With kindly moisture then the plants
abound;

The grass securely springs above the ground;
The tender twig shoots upward to the
skies, 451

And on the faith of the new sun relies.

The swerving vines on the tall elms prevail,

Unhurt by southern show'rs, or northern hail;

They spread their gems, the genial warmth
to share,

And boldly trust their buds in open air.

In this soft season (let me dare to sing)

The world was hatch'd by heav'n's imperial king:

In prime of all the year, and holidays of
spring.

Then did the new creation first appear;

Nor other was the tenor of the year, 461
When laughing heav'n did the great birth
attend,

And eastern winds their wintry breath
suspend:

Then sheep first saw the sun in open fields,
And salvage beasts were sent to stock the wolds,

And golden stars flew up to light the skies,
And man's relentless race from stony quarries rise.

Nor could the tender, new creation bear

Th' excessive heats or coldness of the year;

But, chill'd by winter, or by summer fir'd,
The middle temper of the spring requir'd,

When warmth and moisture did at once abound,⁴⁷²
And heav'n's indulgence brooded on the
ground.
For what remains, in depth of earth secure
Thy cover'd plants, and dung with hot manure,
And shells and gravel in the ground inclose;
For thro' their hollow chinks the water
flows,
Which, thus imbib'd, returns in misty dews,
And, steaming up, the rising plant renews.
Some husbandmen, of late, have found the way,⁴⁸⁰
A hilly heap of stones above to lay,
And press the plants with sherds of potters' clay.
This fence against immod'rate rain they
found,
Or when the Dog-star cleaves the thirsty
ground.
Be mindful, when thou hast intomb'd the
shoot,
With store of earth around to feed the root;
With iron teeth of rakes and prongs to
move
The crusted earth, and loosen it above.
Then exercise thy sturdy steers to plow
Betwixt thy vines, and teach thy feeble row⁴⁹⁰
To mount on reeds and wands, and, upward led,
On ashen poles to raise their forky head.
On these new crutches let them learn to walk,
Till, swerving upwards, with a stronger
stalk,
They brave the winds, and, clinging to their guide,
On tops of elms at length triumphant ride.
But, in their tender nonage, while they
spread
Their springing leafs, and lift their infant
head,
And upward while they shoot in open air,
Indulge their childhood, and the nursing spare.⁵⁰⁰
Nor exercise thy rage on newborn life;
But let thy hand supply the pruning knife,
And crop luxuriant stragglers, nor be loth
To strip the branches of their leafy growth:
But when the rooted vines, with steady
hold,

Can clasp their elms, then, husbandman, be
bold
To lop the disobedient boughs, that stray'd Beyond their ranks; let crooked steel invade
The lawless troops, which discipline dis-
claim,
And their superfluous growth with rigor
tame.⁵¹⁰
Next, fenc'd with hedges and deep ditches
round,
Exclude th' incroaching cattle from thy
ground,
While yet the tender gems but just ap-
pear,
Unable to sustain th' uncertain year;
Whose leaves are not alone foul winter's
prey,
But oft by summer suns are scorch'd away,
And, worse than both, become th' unworthy browse
Of buffaloes, salt goats, and hungry cows.
For not December's frost, that burns the
boughs,
Nor dog days' parching heat, that splits
the rocks,⁵²⁰
Are half so harmful as the greedy flocks,
Their venom'd bite, and scars indented on the stocks.
For this, the malefactor goat was laid
On Bacchus' altar, and his forfeit paid.
At Athens thus Old Comedy began,
When round the streets the reeling actors ran,
In country villages, and crossing ways,
Contending for the prizes of their plays;
And, glad with Bacchus, on the grassy
soil,
Leapt o'er the skins of goats besmear'd with oil.⁵³⁰
Thus Roman youth, deriv'd from ruin'd
Troy,
In rude Saturnian rhymes express their joy;
With taunts, and laughter loud, their audience please,
Deform'd with vizards, cut from barks of
trees.
In jolly hymns they praise the God of
Wine,
Whose earthen images adorn the pine,
And there are hung on high, in honor of the vine:
A madness so devout the vineyard fills.
In hollow valleys and on rising hills,⁵³⁹
On whate'er side he turns his honest face,

And dances in the wind, those fields are in his grace.

To Bacchus therefore let us tune our lays,
And in our mother tongue resound his
praise.

Thin cakes in chargers, and a guilty goat,
Dragg'd by the horns, be to his altars
brought;

Whose offer'd entrails shall his crime reproach,

And drip their fatness from the hazel broach.

To dress thy vines, new labor is requir'd;
Nor must the painful husbandman be tir'd:
For thrice, at least, in compass of the year, ⁵⁵⁰

Thy vineyard must employ the sturdy steer
To turn the glebe, besides thy daily pain
To break the clods, and make the surface
plain,

T' unload the branches, or the leaves to
thin,

That suck the vital moisture of the vine.

Thus in a circle runs the peasant's pain,

And the year rolls within itself again.

Ev'n in the lowest months, when storms have shed

From vines the hairy honors of their head,
Not then the drudging hind his labor ends,
But to the coming year his care extends: ⁵⁶¹

Ev'n then the naked vine he persecutes;
His pruning knife at once reforms and cuts.

Be first to dig the ground; be first to burn
The branches lopp'd; and first the props
return

Into thy house, that bore the burden'd
vines;

But last to reap the vintage of thy wines.
Twice in the year luxuriant leaves o'er-
shade

The incumber'd vine; rough brambles twice
invade:

Hard labor both! Commend the large excess ⁵⁷⁰

Of spacious vineyards; cultivate the less.
Besides, in woods the shrubs of prickly
thorn,

Sallows and reeds, on banks of rivers born,
Remain to cut; for vineyards useful
found,

To stay thy vines, and fence thy fruitful
ground.

Nor, when thy tender trees at length are
bound,

When peaceful vines from pruning hooks
are free,

When husbands have survey'd the last
degree,

And utmost files of plants, and order'd
ev'ry tree;

Ev'n when they sing at ease in full content, ⁵⁸⁰

Insulting o'er the toils they underwent,
Yet still they find a future task remain,
To turn the soil, and break the clods again:
And, after all, their joys are unsincere, While falling rains on ripening grapes they
fear.

Quite opposite to these are olives found:
No dressing they require, and dread no
wound,

Nor rakes nor harrows need; but, fix'd be-
low,

Rejoice in open air, and unconcern'dly grow.

The soil itself due nourishment supplies: ⁵⁹⁰

Plow but the furrows, and the fruits arise;

Content with small endeavors, till they
spring.

Soft peace they figure, and sweet plenty
bring:

Then olives plant, and hymns to Pallas
sing.

Thus apple trees, whose trunks are strong
to bear

Their spreading boughs, exert themselves
in air,

Want no supply, but stand secure alone,
Not trusting foreign forces, but their
own,

Till with the ruddy freight the bending branches groan.

Thus trees of nature, and each common bush, ⁶⁰⁰

Uncultivated thrive, and with red berries blush.

Vile shrubs are shorn for browse; the tow'ring height

Of unctuous trees are torches for the night.

And shall we doubt (indulging easy sloth),
To sow, to set, and to reform their growth?

To leave the lofty plants — the lowly kind
Are for the shepherd or the sheep design'd.

Ev'n humble broom and osiers have their
use,

And shade for sleep, and food for flocks
produce;

Hedges for corn, and honey for the bees, ⁶¹⁰

Besides the pleasing prospect of the trees.

How goodly looks Cytorus, ever green

With boxen groves ! with what delight are seen Narycian woods of pitch, whose gloomy
 shade
 Seems for retreat of heav'nly Muses made !
 But much more pleasing are those fields to
 see,
 That need not plows, nor human industry.
 Ev'n cold Caucasian rocks with trees are
 spread,
 And wear green forests on their hilly head.
 Tho' bending from the blast of eastern
 storms, 620
 Tho' shent their leaves, and shatter'd are their arms,
 Yet Heav'n their various plants for use designs;
 For houses, cedars; and, for shipping, pines;
 Cypress provides for spokes and wheels of wains,
 And all for keels of ships, that scour the wat'ry plains.
 Willows in twigs are fruitful, elms in leaves;
 The war from stubborn myrtle shafts receives;
 From cornels, jav'lins; and the tougher
 yew
 Receives the bending figure of a bow.
 Nor box, nor limes, without their use are made; 630
 Smooth-grain'd, and proper for the turner's trade;
 Which curious hands may kerve, and steel with ease invade.
 Light alder stems the Po's impetuous tide,
 And bees in hollow oaks their honey hide.
 Now balance with these gifts the funny joys
 Of wine, attended with eternal noise.
 Wine urg'd to lawless lust the Centaurs'
 train;
 Thro' wine they quarrel'd, and thro' wine were slain.
 O happy, if he knew his happy state,
 The swain, who, free from business and
 debate, 640
 Receives his easy food from Nature's hand,
 And just returns of cultivated land !
 No palace, with a lofty gate, he wants,
 T' admit the tides of early visitants,
 With eager eyes devouring, as they pass,
 The breathing figures of Corinthian brass.
 No statues threaten from high pedestals;
 No Persian arras hides his homely walls
 With antic vests, which thro' their shady
 fold

Betray the streaks of ill-dissembled gold.
 He boasts no wool whose native white is
 died 651
 With purple poison of Assyrian pride;
 No costly drugs of Araby defile,
 With foreign scents, the sweetness of his
 oil;
 But easy quiet, a secure retreat,
 A harmless life that knows not how to
 cheat,
 With home-bred plenty the rich owner
 bless,
 And rural pleasures crown his happiness.
 Unvex'd with quarrels, undisturb'd with
 noise,
 The country king his peaceful realm enjoys:
 Cool grot, and living lakes, the flow'ry
 pride 661
 Of meads, and streams that thro' the valley
 glide,
 And shady groves that easy sleep invite,
 And, after toilsome days, a soft repose at
 night.
 Wild beasts of nature in his woods abound;
 And youth, of labor patient, plow the
 ground,
 Inur'd to hardship, and to homely fare.
 Nor venerable age is wanting there
 In great examples to the youthful train;
 Nor are the gods ador'd with rites profane.
 From hence Astraea took her flight; and
 here 671
 The prints of her departing steps appear.
 Ye sacred Muses ! with whose beauty
 fir'd
 My soul is ravish'd, and my brain inspir'd;
 Whose priest I am, whose holy fillets wear;
 Would you your poet's first petition hear;
 Give me the ways of wand'ring stars to
 know,
 The depths of heav'n above, and earth be-
 low:
 Teach me the various labors of the moon,
 And whence proceed th' eclipses of the
 sun; 680
 Why flowing tides prevail upon the main,
 And in what dark recess they shrink again;
 What shakes the solid earth; what cause delays
 The summer nights, and shortens winter
 days.
 But, if my heavy blood restrain the flight
 Of my free soul, aspiring to the height
 Of nature, and unclouded fields of light,
 My next desire is, void of care and strife,

To lead a soft, secure, inglorious life —
A country cottage near a crystal flood, ⁶⁹⁰
A winding valley, and a lofty wood.

Some god conduct me to the sacred shades
Where Bacchanals are sung by Spartan maids,

Or lift me high to Hæmus' hilly crown,
Or in the plains of Tempe lay me down,
Or lead me to some solitary place,
And cover my retreat from human race !

Happy the man, who, studying nature's
laws,

Thro' known effects can trace the secret
cause;

His mind possessing in a quiet state, ⁷⁰⁰
Fearless of fortune, and resign'd to fate !

And happy too is he who decks the bow'rs
Of Sylvens, and adores the rural pow'rs;
Whose mind, unmov'd, the bribes of courts
can see,

Their glitt'ring baits, and purple slavery;
Nor hopes the people's praise, nor fears their frown,

Nor, when contending kindred tear the
crown,

Will set up one, or pull another down.

Without concern he hears, but hears from
far,

Of tumults, and descents, and distant war;
Nor with a superstitious fear is aw'd ⁷¹¹

For what befalls at home, or what abroad.
Nor envies he the rich their heapy store,
Nor his own peace disturbs with pity for the poor.

He feeds on fruits, which, of their own accord,

The willing ground and laden trees afford.
From his lov'd home no lucre him can
draw;

The senate's mad decrees he never saw;
Nor heard, at bawling bars, corrupted
law.

Some to the seas, and some to camps resort, ⁷²⁰

And some with impudence invade the court:
In foreign countries others seek renown;
With wars and taxes others waste their
own,

And houses burn, and household gods de-
face,

To drink in bowls which glitt'ring gems
enchase,

To loll on couches, rich with citron steads,
And lay their guilty limbs in Tyrian beds.

This wretch in earth intombs his golden ore,

Hov'ring and brooding on his buried store.
Some patriot fools to pop'lar praise aspire, ⁷³⁰
Or public speeches, which worse fools admire,

While from both benches, with redoubled
sounds,

Th' applause of lords and commoners abounds.

Some thro' ambition, or thro' thirst of gold,
Have slain their brothers, or their country
sold;

And, leaving their sweet homes, in exile run
To lands that lie beneath another sun.

The peasant, innocent of all these ills, }
With crooked plows the fertile fallows
tills,

And the round year with daily labor fills. }
From hence the country markets are supplied; ⁷⁴¹

Enough remains for household charge be-
side,

His wife and tender children to sustain,
And gratefully to feed his dumb deserving
train.

Nor cease his labors till the yellow field
A full return of bearded harvest yield:
A crop so plenteous, as the land to load, O'ercome the crowded barns, and lodge on ricks abroad.

Thus ev'ry sev'ral season is employ'd,
Some spent in toil, and some in ease enjoy'd. ⁷⁵⁰

The yeanning ewes prevent the springing
year;

The laded boughs their fruits in autumn
bear:

'T is then the vine her liquid harvest yields,
Bak'd in the sunshine of ascending fields.

The winter comes; and then the falling mast

For greedy swine provides a full repast;
Then olives, ground in mills, their fatness
boast,

And winter fruits are mellow'd by the frost.
His cares are eas'd with intervals of bliss:

His little children, climbing for a kiss, ⁷⁶⁰
Welcome their father's late return at night;
His faithful bed is crown'd with chaste de-
light.

His kine with swelling udders ready stand,
And, lowing for the pail, invite the milker's
hand.

His wanton kids, with budding horns pre-
par'd,

Fight harmless battles in his homely yard:

Himself, in rustic pomp, on holidays,
 To rural pow'rs a just oblation pays,
 And on the green his careless limbs displays. }
 The hearth is in the midst; the herdsmen,
 round }
 The cheerful fire, provoke his health in } goblets crown'd. }
 He calls on Bacchus, and propounds the }
 prize: }
 The groom his fellow-groom at butts defies, }
 And bends his bow, and levels with his }
 eyes; }
 Or, stripp'd for wrestling, smears his limbs } with oil, }
 And watches with a trip his foe to foil.
 Such was the life the frugal Sabines led;
 So Remus and his brother god were bred,
 From whom th' austere Etrurian virtue rose;
 And this rude life our homely fathers chose.
 Old Rome from such a race deriv'd her }
 birth }
 (The seat of empire, and the conquer'd } earth), }
 Which now on sev'n high hills triumphant reigns,
 And in that compass all the world contains.
 Ere Saturn's rebel son usurp'd the skies,
 When beasts were only slain for sacrifice, While peaceful Crete enjoy'd her ancient
 lord,
 Ere sounding hammers forg'd th' inhuman
 sword,
 Ere hollow drums were beat, before the
 breath }
 Of brazen trumpets rung the peals of death, }
 The good old god his hunger did assuage }
 With roots and herbs, and gave the Golden }
 Age. }
 But, overlabor'd with so long a course,
 'Tis time to set at ease the smoking horse.

THE THIRD BOOK OF THE GEORGICS

THE ARGUMENT

This book begins with an invocation of some rural deities, and a compliment to Augustus; after which Virgil directs himself to Mæcenæ, and enters on his subject. He lays down rules for the breeding and management of horses, oxen, sheep, goats, and dogs; and interweaves several pleasant descriptions of a chariot race, of the battle of the bulls, of the force of love, and of the Scythian winter. In the latter part of the book he relates the diseases incident to cattle; and ends with the description of a fatal murrain that formerly rag'd among the Alps.

THY fields, propitious Pales, I rehearse;
 And sing thy pastures in no vulgar verse,
 Amphrysian shepherd; the Lycæan woods,
 Arcadia's flow'ry plains, and pleasing floods.
 All other themes that careless minds invite
 Are worn with use, unworthy me to write.
 Busiris' altars, and the dire decrees
 Of hard Eurystheus, ev'ry reader sees;
 Hylas the boy, Latona's erring isle,
 And Pelops' iv'ry shoulder, and his toil }
 For fair Hippodame, with all the rest }
 Of Grecian tales, by poets are express'd:
 New ways I must attempt, my groveling
 name
 To raise aloft, and wing my flight to fame.
 I, first of Romans, shall in triumph come From conquer'd Greece and bring her trophies home,
 With foreign spoils adorn my native place,
 And with Idume's palms my Mantua grace.
 Of Parian stone a temple will I raise,
 Where the slow Mincius thro' the valley strays, }
 Where cooling streams invite the flocks to } drink, }
 And reeds defend the winding water's }
 brink. }
 Full in the midst shall mighty Cæsar stand,
 Hold the chief honors, and the dome command.
 Then I, conspicuous in my Tyrian gown,
 (Submitting to his godhead my renown,)
 A hundred coursers from the goal will
 drive:
 The rival chariots in the race shall strive.
 All Greece shall flock from far, my games to see; }
 The whorlbat and the rapid race shall }
 be }
 Reserv'd for Cæsar, and ordain'd by me. } Myself, with olive crown'd, the gifts will }
 bear: }
 Ev'n now methinks the public shouts I }
 hear; }
 The passing pageants and the pomps ap- }
 pear. }
 I to the temple will conduct the crew,

The sacrifice and sacrificers view,
From thence return, attended with my
train,
Where the proud theaters disclose the
scene,
Which interwoven Britons seem to raise,
And shew the triumph which their shame displays. 40

High o'er the gate in elephant and gold,
The crowd shall Cæsar's Indian war behold:
The Nile shall flow beneath; and, on the
side,

His shatter'd ships on brazen pillars ride.
Next him Niphates, with inverted urn,
And dropping sedge, shall his Armenia
mourn;

And Asian cities in our triumph borne.
With backward bows the Parthians shall be
there,

And, spurring from the fight, confess their
fear.

A double wreath shall crown our Cæsar's
brows: 50

Two differing trophies, from two different
foes.

Europe with Afric in his fame shall join;
But neither shore his conquest shall confine.

The Parian marble there shall seem to
move

In breathing statues, not unworthy Jove,
Resembling heroes, whose ethereal root
Is Jove himself, and Cæsar is the fruit.

Tros and his race the sculptor shall employ;

And he, the god, who built the walls of Troy.

Envy herself at last, grown pale and dumb,
(By Cæsar combated and overcome,) 61

Shall give her hands, and fear the curling snakes

Of lashing Furies, and the burning lakes;
The pains of famish'd Tantalus shall feel,
And Sisyphus, that labors up the hill
The rolling rock in vain; and curst Ix-ion's wheel.

Meantime we must pursue the sylvan
lands,

(Th' abode of nymphs,) untouch'd by former hands;

For such, Mæcenas, are thy hard commands.

Without thee, nothing lofty can I sing: 70
Come then, and with thyself thy genius
bring,

With which inspir'd, I brook no dull delay:

Cithæron loudly calls me to my way;
Thy hounds, Taygetus, open, and pursue their prey. }

High Epidaurus urges on my speed,
Fam'd for his hills, and for his horses'
breed:

From hills and dales the cheerful cries re-
bound;

For Echo hunts along, and propagates the
sound.

A time will come, when my maturer Muse
In Cæsar's wars a nobler theme shall choose,
And thro' more ages bear my sovereign's
praise, 81

Than have from Tithon pass'd to Cæsar's
days.

The generous youth, who, studious of the
prize,

The race of running coursers multiplies,
Or to the plow the sturdy bullock breeds,
May know that from the dam the worth of each proceeds.

The mother cow must wear a low'ring look,
Sour-headed, strongly neck'd, to bear the yoke.

Her double dewlap from her chin descends,
And at her thighs the pond'rous burthen ends. 90

Long are her sides and large; her limbs are great;

Rough are her ears, and broad her horny
feet;

Her color shining black, but fleck'd with white.

She tosses from the yoke; provokes the fight:
She rises in her gait, is free from fears,

And in her face a bull's resemblance bears.
Her ample forehead with a star is crown'd,
And with her length of tail she sweeps the
ground.

The bull's insult at four she may sustain;
But, after ten, from nuptial rites refrain. 100

Six seasons use; but then release the cow,
Unfit for love, and for the lab'ring plow.

Now, while their youth is fill'd with kindly fire,

Submit thy females to the lusty sire:
Watch the quick motions of the frisking
tail;

Then serve their fury with the rushing male,

Indulging pleasure, lest the breed should fail. }

In youth alone, unhappy mortals live;
 But, ah! the mighty bliss is fugitive: 109
 Discolor'd sickness, anxious labors, come,
 And age, and death's inexorable doom.
 Yearly thy herds in vigor will impair.
 Recruit and mend 'em with thy yearly care:
 Still propagate, for still they fall away;
 'Tis prudence to prevent th' entire decay.

Like diligence requires the courser's race,
 In early choice, and for a longer space.
 The colt that for a stallion is design'd
 By sure presages shows his generous }
 kind;
 Of able body, sound of limb and wind. 120 Upright he walks, on pasterns firm and straight;

His motions easy; prancing in his gait;
 The first to lead the way, to tempt the
 flood,
 To pass the bridge unknown, nor fear the trembling wood;
 Dauntless at empty noises; lofty neck'd,
 Sharp-headed, barrel-bellied, broadly
 back'd;

Brawny his chest, and deep; his color }
 gray;
 For beauty, dappled, or the brightest bay:
 Faint white and dun will scarce the rearing pay.

The fiery courser, when he hears from far
 The sprightly trumpets and the shouts of
 war, 131

Pricks up his ears; and, trembling with
 delight,
 Shifts place, and paws, and hopes the promis'd fight.

On his right shoulder his thick mane, re-
 clin'd,

Ruffles at speed, and dances in the wind.
 His horny hoofs are jetty black and
 round;

His chine is double; starting, with a bound

He turns the turf, and shakes the solid
 ground.

Fire from his eyes, clouds from his nostrils
 flow:

He bears his rider headlong on the foe. 140
 Such was the steed in Grecian poets
 fam'd,

Proud Cyllarus, by Spartan Pollux tam'd:
 Such couriers bore to fight the god of Thrace;

And such, Achilles, was thy warlike race.

In such a shape, grim Saturn did restrain
 His heav'nly limbs, and flow'd with such a mane,

When, half-surpris'd, and fearing to be
 seen,

The lecher gallop'd from his jealous queen,
 Ran up the ridges of the rocks amain,
 And with shrill neighings fill'd the neigh-b'ring plain. 150

But, worn with years, when dire diseases
 come,
 Then hide his not ignoble age at home,
 In peace t' enjoy his former palms and
 pains;

And gratefully be kind to his remains.

For, when his blood no youthful spirits
 move,

He languishes and labors in his love;

And, when the sprightly seed should swiftly
 come,

Dribbling he drudges, and defrauds the
 womb:

In vain he burns, like hasty stubble fires,
 And in himself his former self requires. 160

His age and courage weigh; nor those
 alone,

But note his father's virtues and his own:
 Observe if he disdains to yield the prize,
 Of loss impatient, proud of victories.

Hast thou beheld, when from the goal
 they start,

The youthful charioteers with heaving
 heart

Rush to the race; and, panting, scarcely
 bear

Th' extremes of feverish hope and chilling
 fear;

Stoop to the reins, and lash with all their force?

The flying chariot kindles in the course; 170
 And now aloof, and now aloft they fly,
 As borne thro' air, and seem to touch the
 sky.

No stop, no stay; but clouds of sand arise,
 Spurn'd, and cast backward on the follower's
 eyes.

The hindmost blows the foam upon the
 first:

Such is the love of praise, an honorable
 thirst.

Bold Erichthonius was the first who
 join'd

Four horses for the rapid race design'd,

And o'er the dusty wheels presiding sate:

The Lapithæ to chariots add the state 180

Of bits and bridles; taught the steed to bound,

To run the ring, and trace the mazy round;
To stop, to fly, the rules of war to know;
T' obey the rider, and to dare the foe.

To choose a youthful steed with courage fir'd,

To breed him, break him, back him, are requir'd

Experienc'd masters, and in sundry ways;
Their labors equal, and alike their praise.

But, once again, the batter'd horse beware:
The weak old stallion will deceive thy care,

Tho' famous in his youth for force and speed,

Or was of Argos or Epirian breed,
Or did from Neptune's race, or from himself proceed.

These things premis'd, when now the nuptial time

Approaches for the stately steed to climb,
With food inable him to make his court;
Distend his chine, and pamper him for sport.

Feed him with herbs, whatever thou canst find,

Of generous warmth, and of salacious kind;
Then water him, and (drinking what he can)

Encourage him to thirst again, with bran.
Instructed thus, produce him to the fair,
And join in wedlock to the longing mare.
For, if the sire be faint, or out of case,
He will be copied in his famish'd race,
And sink beneath the pleasing task assign'd
(For all's too little for the craving kind).

As for the females, with industrious care
Take down their mettle; keep 'em lean and bare:

When conscious of their past delight, and keen

To take the leap, and prove the sport again,
With scanty measure then supply their food;

And, when athirst, restrain 'em from the flood:

Their bodies harass; sink 'em when they run;

And fry their melting marrow in the sun.
Starve 'em, when barns beneath their burthen groan,

And winnow'd chaff by western winds is blown;

For fear the rankness of the swelling womb

Should scant the passage, and confine the room;

Lest the fat furrows should the sense destroy

Of genial lust, and dull the seat of joy.

But let 'em suck the seed with greedy force,

And close involve the vigor of the horse.

The male has done: thy care must now proceed

To teeming females, and the promis'd breed.
First let 'em run at large, and never know

The taming yoke, or draw the crooked plow.

Let 'em not leap the ditch, or swim the flood,

Or lumber o'er the meads, or cross the wood;

But range the forest, by the silver side
Of some cool stream, where nature shall provide

Green grass and fatt'ning clover for their fare,

And mossy caverns for their noontide lair,
With rocks above, to shield the sharp nocturnal air.

About th' Alburnian groves, with holly green,

Of winged insects mighty swarms are seen.
This flying plague (to mark its quality)

(Estros the Grecians call; Asylus, we;
A fierce loud-buzzing breeze: their stings

draw blood,

And drive the cattle gadding thro' the wood.
Seiz'd with unusual pains, they loudly cry:

Tanagrus hastens thence, and leaves his channel dry.

This curse the jealous Juno did invent,
And first employ'd for Io's punishment.

To shun this ill, the cunning leech ordains,
In summer's sultry heats (for then it reigns)

To feed the females ere the sun arise,
Or late at night, when stars adorn the skies.

When she has calv'd, then set the dam aside,

And for the tender progeny provide.

Distinguish all betimes with branding fire,
To note the tribe, the lineage, and the sire;

Whom to reserve for husband of the herd,
Or who shall be to sacrifice preferr'd;

Or whom thou shalt to turn thy glebe allow,
To smooth the furrows, and sustain the plow:

The rest, for whom no lot is yet decreed,
May run in pastures, and at pleasure feed.

The calf, by nature and by genius made
To turn the glebe, breed to the rural trade.
Set him betimes to school; and let him be Instructed there in rules of husbandry, ²⁶²
While yet his youth is flexible and green,
Nor bad examples of the world has seen.
Early begin the stubborn child to break:
For his soft neck a supple collar make
Of bending osiers; and (with time and care Enur'd that easy servitude to bear)
Thy flattering method on the youth pursue.
Join'd with his schoolfellows by two and two, ²⁷⁰

Persuade 'em first to lead an empty wheel,
That scarce the dust can raise, or they can feel:

In length of time produce the lab'ring yoke,
And shining shares, that make the furrow
smoke.

Ere the licentious youth be thus restrain'd,
Or moral precepts on their minds have
gain'd,

Their wanton appetites not only feed
With delicacies of leaves, and marshy weed,
But with thy sickle reap the rankest land,
And minister the blade with bounteous hand; ²⁸⁰

Nor be with harmful parsimony won
To follow what our homely sires have done,
Who fill'd the pail with beestings of the cow,

But all her udder to the calf allow.

If to the warlike steed thy studies bend,
Or for the prize in chariots to contend,
Near Pisa's flood the rapid wheels to guide,
Or in Olympian groves aloft to ride,
The generous labors of the courser, first,
Must be with sight of arms and sounds of trumpets nurs'd; ²⁹⁰

Inur'd the groaning axletree to bear —
And let him clashing whips in stables hear.
Soothe him with praise, and make him understand

The loud applauses of his master's hand:
This, from his weaning, let him well be
taught;

And then betimes in a soft snaffle wrought,
Before his tender joints with nerves are knit,
Untried in arms, and trembling at the bit.

But when to four full springs his years advance,

Teach him to run the round, with pride to prance, ³⁰⁰

And (rightly manag'd) equal time to beat,
To turn, to bound in measure, and curvet.
Let him to this, with easy pains, be brought,
And seem to labor, when he labors not.

Thus, form'd for speed, he challenges the
wind,

And leaves the Scythian arrow far behind;
He scours along the field, with loosen'd reins,

And treads so light, he scarcely prints the
plains.

Like Boreas in his race, when, rushing
forth,

He sweeps the skies, and clears the cloudy
north — ³¹⁰

The waving harvest bends beneath his blast,
The forest shakes, the groves their honors
cast;

He flies aloft, and with impetuous roar
Pursues the foaming surges to the shore —
Thus, o'er th' Elean plains, thy well-breath'd
horse

Impels the flying car, and wins the course;
Or, bred to Belgian wagons, leads the way,
Untir'd at night, and cheerful all the day.

When once he's broken, feed him full and
high;

Indulge his growth, and his gaunt sides supply. ³²⁰

Before his training, keep him poor and low;
For his stout stomach with his food will
grow:

The pumper'd colt will discipline disdain, Impatient of the lash, and restiff to the rein.

Wouldst thou their courage and their strength improve?

Too soon they must not feel the stings of
love.

Whether the bull or courser be thy care,
Let him not leap the cow, nor mount the mare.

The youthful bull must wander in the wood
Behind the mountain, or beyond the flood,
Or in the stall at home his fodder find, ³³¹
Far from the charms of that alluring kind.
With two fair eyes his mistress burns his
breast:

He looks, and languishes, and leaves his
rest;

Forsakes his food, and, pining for the lass,
Is joyless of the grove, and spurns the growing grass.

The soft seducer, with enticing looks,
The bellowing rivals to the fight provokes.

A beauteous heifer in the woods is bred:
 The stooping warriors, aiming head to head,
 Engage their clashing horns; with dreadful sound ³⁴¹
 The forest rattles, and the rocks rebound.
 They fence, they push, and, pushing, loudly
 roar:
 Their dewlaps and their sides are bath'd in
 gore.
 Nor, when the war is over, is it peace;
 Nor will the vanquish'd bull his claim release;
 But, feeding in his breast his ancient fires,
 And cursing fate, from his proud foe retires.
 Driv'n from his native land to foreign grounds, ³⁴⁹
 He with a gen'rous rage resents his wounds,
 His ignominious flight, the victor's boast,
 And, more than both, the loves, which unreveng'd he lost.
 Often he turns his eyes, and, with a groan, Surveys the pleasing kingdoms, once his
 own;
 And therefore to repair his strength he tries,
 Hard'n'ing his limbs with painful exercise,
 And rough upon the flinty rock he lies. } On prickly leaves and on sharp herbs he feeds,
 Then to the prelude of a war proceeds.
 His horns, yet sore, he tries against a tree,
 And meditates his absent enemy. ³⁶¹
 He snuffs the wind; his heels the sand } excite;
 But when he stands collected in his might,
 He roars, and promises a more successful
 fight. }
 Then, to redeem his honor at a blow,
 He moves his camp, to meet his careless
 foe.
 Not with more madness, rolling from afar,
 The spumy waves proclaim the wat'ry war;
 And mounting upwards, with a mighty roar,
 March onwards, and insult the rocky shore.
 They mate the middle region with their height, ³⁷¹
 And fall no less than with a mountain's
 weight;
 The waters boil, and, belching, from below
 Black sands as from a forceful engine
 throw.
 Thus every creature, and of every kind,

The secret joys of sweet coition find:
 Not only man's imperial race, but they
 That wing the liquid air, or swim the sea,
 Or haunt the desert, rush into the flame;
 For Love is lord of all, and is in all the same. ³⁸⁰
 'Tis with this rage the mother lion stung
 Scours o'er the plain, regardless of her
 young:
 Demanding rites of love, she sternly stalks,
 And hunts her lover in his lonely walks.
 'Tis then the shapeless bear his den forsakes;
 In woods and fields a wild destruction
 makes:
 Boars whet their tusks; to battle tigers
 move, Enrag'd with hunger, more enrag'd with
 love:
 Then woe to him that in the desert land
 Of Libya travels, o'er the burning sand!
 The stallion snuffs the well-known scent
 afar, ³⁹¹
 And snorts and trembles for the distant
 mare;
 Nor bits nor bridles can his rage restrain,
 And rugged rocks are interpos'd in vain:
 He makes his way o'er mountains, and contemns
 Unruly torrents, and unforded streams.
 The bristled boar, who feels the pleasing
 wound,
 New grinds his arming tusks, and digs the
 ground.
 The sleepy lecher shuts his little eyes;
 About his churning chaps the frothy bubbles rise: ⁴⁰⁰
 He rubs his sides against a tree; prepares
 And hardens both his shoulders for the wars.
 What did the youth, when Love's unerring
 dart
 Transfix'd his liver, and inflam'd his heart?
 Alone, by night, his wat'ry way he took:
 About him, and above, the billows broke;
 The sluices of the sky were open spread,
 And rolling thunder rattled o'er his head.
 The raging tempest call'd him back in vain,
 And every boding omen of the main; ⁴¹⁰
 Nor could his kindred, nor the kindly force
 Of weeping parents, change his fatal course:
 No, not the dying maid, who must deplore
 His floating carcass on the Sestian shore.
 I pass the wars that spotted lynxes make
 With their fierce rivals, for the females'
 sake;

The howling wolves', the mastiffs' amorous
rage;

When ev'n the fearful stag dares for his hind engage.

But, far above the rest, the furious mare,
Barr'd from the male, is frantic with
despair: 420

For, when her pouting vent declares her
pain,

She tears the harness, and she rends the rein.

For this (when Venus gave them rage and pow'r)

Their masters' mangled members they devour,

Of love defrauded in their longing hour.

For love, they force thro' thickets of the
wood;

They climb the steepy hills, and stem the
flood.

When, at the spring's approach, their marrow burns,

(For with the spring their genial warmth returns,)

The mares to cliffs of rugged rocks repair,
And with wide nostrils snuff the western
air: 431

When (wondrous to relate!) the parent
wind,

Without the stallion, propagates the kind.

Then, fir'd with amorous rage, they take their flight

Thro' plains, and mount the hills' unequal
height;

Nor to the north, nor to the rising sun,

Nor southward to the rainy regions run,

But boring to the west, and hov'ring there,

With gaping mouths they draw prolific air;

With which impregnate, from their groins
they shed 440

A slimy juice, by false conception bred.

The shepherd knows it well, and calls by
name

Hippomanes, to note the mother's flame.

This, gather'd in the planetary hour,

With noxious weeds, and spell'd with words
of pow'r,

Dire stepdames in the magic bowl infuse,

And mix, for deadly draughts, the pois'nous
juice.

But time is lost, which never will renew,

While we too far the pleasing path
pursue,

Surveying nature with too nice a view.

Let this suffice for herds: our following
care 451

Shall woolly flocks and shaggy goats declare.

Nor can I doubt what oil I must bestow,
To raise my subject from a ground so low;
And the mean matter which my theme
affords

T' embellish with magnificence of words.
But the commanding Muse my chariot
guides,

Which o'er the dubious cliff securely rides;
And pleas'd I am, no beaten road to take,
But first the way to new discoveries make.

Now, sacred Pales, in a lofty strain 461
I sing the rural honors of thy reign.

First, with assiduous care from winter keep,
Well fodder'd in the stalls, thy tender
sheep:

Then spread with straw the bedding of thy
fold,

With fern beneath, to fend the bitter cold;
That free from gouts thou mayst preserve
thy care,

And clear from scabs, produc'd by freezing
air.

Next, let thy goats officiously be nurs'd,
And led to living streams, to quench their
thirst. 470

Feed 'em with winter browse; and, for their lair,

A cote that opens to the south prepare;

Where basking in the sunshine they may lie,

And the short remnants of his heat enjoy.

This during winter's drizzly reign be done,

Till the new Ram receives th' exalted sun;

For hairy goats of equal profit are

With woolly sheep, and ask an equal care.

'T is true, the fleece, when drunk with Tyrian juice,

Is dearly sold; but not for needful use: 480

For the salacious goat increases more,

And twice as largely yields her milky store.

The still distended udders never fail,

But, when they seem exhausted, swell the pail.

Meantime the pastor shears their hoary
beards,

And eases of their hair the loaden herds.

Their camelots, warm in tents, the soldier
hold,

And shield the shiv'ring mariner from cold.

On shrubs they browse, and on the bleaky top

Of rugged hills the thorny bramble crop.

Attended with their bleating kids they come ⁴⁹¹
 At night, unask'd, and mindful of their
 home;
 And scarce their swelling bags the threshold overcome.
 So much the more thy diligence bestow
 In depth of winter, to defend the snow,
 By how much less the tender helpless kind
 For their own ills can fit provision find.
 Then minister the browse with bounteous
 hand,
 And open let thy stacks all winter stand.
 But, when the western winds with vital pow'r ⁵⁰¹
 Call forth the tender grass and budding
 flow'r;
 Then, at the last, produce in open air
 Both flocks, and send 'em to their summer
 fare.
 Before the sun, while Hesperus appears,
 First let 'em sip from herbs the pearly tears
 Of morning dews, and after break their
 fast
 On greensward ground — a cool and grateful taste.
 But, when the day's fourth hour has drawn
 the dews,
 And the sun's sultry heat their thirst re-
 news;
 When creaking grasshoppers on shrubs complain, ⁵¹⁰
 Then lead 'em to their wat'ring troughs
 again.
 In summer's heat, some bending valley
 find,
 Clos'd from the sun, but open to the wind;
 Or seek some ancient oak, whose arms
 extend
 In ample breadth, thy cattle to defend,
 Or solitary grove, or gloomy glade,
 To shield 'em with its venerable shade.
 Once more to wat'ring lead; and feed
 again
 When the low sun is sinking to the main,
 When rising Cynthia sheds her silver dews,
 And the cool evening breeze the meads renews, ⁵²¹
 When linnets fill the woods with tuneful
 sound,
 And hollow shores the halcyon's voice re-
 bound.
 Why should my Muse enlarge on Libyan
 swains,
 Their scatter'd cottages, and ample plains,

Where oft the flocks without a leader
 stray,
 Or thro' continued deserts take their way,
 And, feeding, add the length of night to
 day?
 Whole months they wander, grazing as they
 go;
 Nor folds nor hospitable harbor know: ⁵³⁰
 Such an extent of plains, so vast a space
 Of wilds unknown, and of untasted grass, Allures their eyes: the shepherd last appears,
 And with him all his patrimony bears;
 His house and household gods, his trade of
 war,
 His bow and quiver, and his trusty cur.
 Thus, under heavy arms, the youth of Rome
 Their long laborious marches overcome;
 Cheerly their tedious travels undergo,
 And pitch their sudden camp before the
 foe. ⁵⁴⁰
 Not so the Scythian shepherd tends his
 fold,
 Nor he who bears in Thrace the bitter
 cold,
 Nor he who treads the bleak Mæotian
 strand,
 Or where proud Ister rolls his yellow sand.
 Early they stall their flocks and herds; for
 there
 No grass the fields, no leaves the forests
 wear:
 The frozen earth lies buried there, below
 A hilly heap, sev'n cubits deep in snow;
 And all the west allies of stormy Boreas
 blow.
 The sun from far peeps with a sickly face, ⁵⁵⁰
 Too weak the clouds and mighty fogs to
 chase,
 When up the skies he shoots his rosy head,
 Or in the ruddy ocean seeks his bed.
 Swift rivers are with sudden ice constrain'd;
 And studded wheels are on its back sus-
 tain'd,
 An hostry now for wagons, which before
 Tall ships of burthen on its bosom bore.
 The brazen caldrons with the frost are flaw'd;
 The garment, stiff with ice, at hearths is thaw'd;
 With axes first they cleave the wine; and thence, ⁵⁶⁰
 By weight, the solid portions they dispense.

From locks uncomb'd, and from the frozen
beard,
Long icicles depend, and crackling sounds
are heard.

Meantime perpetual sleet, and driving snow,
Obscure the skies, and hang on herds below.
The starving cattle perish in their stalls;
Huge oxen stand enclos'd in wintry walls
Of snow congeal'd; whole herds are buried
there

Of mighty stags, and scarce their horns appear.

The dext'rous huntsman wounds not these afar 570

With shafts or darts, or makes a distant
war

With dogs, or pitches toils to stop their
flight,

But close engages in unequal fight;
And, while they strive in vain to make their
way

Thro' hills of snow, and pitifully bray, Assaults with dint of sword, or pointed spears,

And homeward, on his back, the joyful burthen bears.

The men to subterranean caves retire,
Secure from cold, and crowd the cheerful
fire:

With trunks of elms and oaks the hearth
they load, 580

Nor tempt th' inclemency of heav'n abroad.
Their jovial nights in frolics and in play
They pass, to drive the tedious hours away,
And their cold stomachs with crown'd goblets cheer

Of windy cider, and of barmy beer.
Such are the cold Riphæan race, and such
The savage Scythian, and unwarlike Dutch,
Where skins of beasts the rude barbarians
wear,

The spoils of foxes, and the furry bear.

Is wool thy care? Let not thy cattle go Where bushes are, where burs and thistles
grow; 591

Nor in too rank a pasture let 'em feed;
Then of the purest white select thy breed.
Ev'n tho' a snowy ram thou shalt behold,
Prefer him not in haste for husband to thy
fold:

But search his mouth; and, if a swarthy
tongue

Is underneath his humid palate hung,
Reject him, lest he darken all the flock,
And substitute another from thy stock.

'T was thus, with fleeces milky white, (if we May trust report,) Pan, god of Arcady, 601 Did bribe thee, Cynthia; nor didst thou disdain,

When call'd in woody shades, to cure a lover's pain.

If milk be thy design, with plenteous
hand

Bring clover grass; and from the marshy
land

Salt herbage for the fodd'ring rack provide,
To fill their bags, and swell the milky tide.
These raise their thirst, and to the taste
restore

The savor of the salt on which they fed before.

Some, when the kids their dams too deeply drain, 610

With gags and muzzles their soft mouths
restrain.

Their morning milk the peasants press at
night;

Their evening meal, before the rising light,
To market bear; or sparingly they steep
With seas'ning salt, and stor'd for winter
keep.

Nor, last, forget thy faithful dogs; but feed

With fatt'ning whey the mastiffs' gen'rous
breed,

And Spartan race, who, for the fold's relief,
Will prosecute with cries the nightly thief,
Repulse the prowling wolf, and hold at bay
The mountain robbers rushing to the prey.
With cries of hounds, thou mayst pursue the fear 622

Of flying hares, and chase the fallow deer;
Rouse from their desert dens the bristled
rage

Of boars, and beamy stags in toils engage.
With smoke of burning cedar scent thy walls,

And fume with stinking galbanum thy stalls,
With that rank odor from thy dwelling
place

To drive the viper's brood, and all the venom'd race;

For often under stalls unmov'd they lie,
Obscure in shades, and shunning heav'n's broad eye; 631

And snakes, familiar, to the hearth succeed, Disclose their eggs, and near the chimney
breed:

Whether to rooify houses they repair,
Or sun themselves abroad in open air,

In all abodes, of pestilential kind
To sheep and oxen and the painful hind.
Take, shepherd, take a plant of stubborn
oak,

And labor him with many a sturdy stroke,
Or with hard stones demolish from afar ⁶⁴⁰
His haughty crest, the seat of all the war;
Invade his hissing throat and winding spires;

Till, stretch'd in length, th' unfolded foe retires.

He drags his tail, and for his head provides,

And in some secret cranny slowly glides;
But leaves expos'd to blows his back and batter'd sides.

In fair Calabria's woods a snake is bred,
With curling crest, and with advancing
head:

Waving he rolls, and makes a winding track;

His belly spotted, burnish'd is his back. ⁶⁵⁰
While springs are broken, while the southern air

And dropping heav'ns the moisten'd earth
repair,

He lives on standing lakes and trembling
bogs,

And fills his maw with fish, or with loquacious frogs:

But when in muddy pools the water sinks,
And the chapp'd earth is furrow'd o'er with chinks,

He leaves the fens, and leaps upon the
ground,

And, hissing, rolls his glaring eyes around.
With thirst inflam'd, impatient of the heats,
He rages in the fields, and wide destruction threats. ⁶⁶⁰

O let not sleep my closing eyes invade
In open plains, or in the secret shade,
When he, renew'd in all the speckled pride
Of pompous youth, has cast his slough aside,
And in his summer liv'ry rolls along,
Erect, and brandishing his forked tongue, }
Leaving his nest and his imperfect young; } And, thoughtless of his eggs, forgets to rear

The hopes of poison for the fall'wing year.
The causes and the signs shall next be told ⁶⁷⁰

Of ev'ry sickness that infects the fold.
A scabby tetter on their pelts will stick,
When the raw rain has pierc'd them to the quick,

Or searching frosts have eaten thro' the
skin,

Or burning icicles are lodg'd within;
Or, when the fleece is shorn, if sweat remains

Unwash'd, and soaks into their empty veins;
When their defenseless limbs the brambles
tear,

Short of their wool, and naked from the shear.

Good shepherds, after shearing, drench }
their sheep; ⁶⁸⁰

And their flock's father (forc'd from high to leap)

Swims down the stream, and plunges in the deep.

They oint their naked limbs with mother'd
oil;

Or, from the founts where living sulphurs
boil,

They mix a med'cine to foment their limbs,
With scum that on the molten silver swims.

Fat pitch and black bitumen add to these; }
Besides, the waxen labor of the bees,
And hellebore, and squills deep-rooted in
the seas.

Receipts abound; but, searching all thy store, ⁶⁹⁰

The best is still at hand, to launch the sore,
And cut the head; for, till the core be found,
The secret vice is fed, and gathers ground;

While, making fruitless moan, the shepherd stands,

And, when the launching-knife requires
his hands,

Vain help, with idle pray'rs, from heav'n demands.

Deep in their bones when fevers fix their
seat,

And rack their limbs, and lick the vital
heat,

The ready cure to cool the raging pain
Is underneath the foot to breathe a vein. ⁷⁰⁰

This remedy the Scythian shepherds found:
Th' inhabitants of Thracia's hilly ground
And Gelons use it, when for drink and food
They mix their cruddled milk with horses'
blood.

But where thou seest a single sheep remain

In shades aloof, or couch'd upon the plain,
Or listlessly to crop the tender grass,
Or late to lag behind, with truant pace;
Revenge the crime, and take the traitor's
head,

Ere in the faultless flock the dire contagion spread. ⁷¹⁰

On winter seas we fewer storms behold,
Than foul diseases that infect the fold.
Nor do those ills on single bodies prey,
But oft'ner bring the nation to decay,
And sweep the present stock and future
hope away. }

A dire example of this truth appears,
When, after such a length of rolling years,
We see the naked Alps, and thin remains
Of scatter'd cots, and yet unpeopled
plains, }

Once fill'd with grazing flocks, the shepherds' happy reigns. ⁷²⁰

Here, from the vicious air and sickly skies,
A plague did on the dumb creation rise:
During th' autumnal heats th' infection
grew,

Tame cattle and the beasts of nature slew,
Pois'ning the standing lakes, and pools im-
pure;

Nor was the foodful grass in fields secure.
Strange death ! for, when the thirsty fire had drunk

Their vital blood, and the dry nerves were shrunk,

When the contracted limbs were cramp'd, ev'n then

A wat'rish humor swell'd and ooz'd again,
Converting into bane the kindly juice ⁷³¹
Ordain'd by nature for a better use.

The victim ox, that was for altars press'd,
Trimm'd with white ribbons, and with gar-
lands dress'd,

Sunk of himself, without the god's command,

Preventing the slow sacrificer's hand.

Or, by the holy butcher if he fell,

Th' inspected entrails could no fates fore-
tell;

Nor, laid on altars, did pure flames arise;
But clouds of smold'ring smoke forbade
the sacrifice: ⁷⁴⁰

Scarcely the knife was redden'd with his
gore,

Or the black poison stain'd the sandy floor.
The thriven calves in meads their food for-
sake,

And render their sweet souls before the plenteous rack.

The fawning dog runs mad; the wheezing
swine

With coughs is chok'd, and labors from the chine.

The victor horse, forgetful of his food,
The palm renounces, and abhors the flood;
He paws the ground; and on his hanging
ears

A doubtful sweat in clammy drops appears: ⁷⁵⁰

Parch'd is his hide, and rugged are his hairs.

Such are the symptoms of the young disease;

But, in time's process, when his pains en-
crease,

He rolls his mournful eyes; he deeply groans

With patient sobbing, and with manly moans.

He heaves for breath; which, from his lungs supplied,

And fetch'd from far, distends his lab'ring
side.

To his rough palate his dry tongue suc-
ceeds;

And rosy gore he from his nostrils bleeds.
A drench of wine has with success been us'd, ⁷⁶⁰

And thro' a horn the gen'rous juice infus'd;
Which, timely taken, op'd his closing jaws,
But, if too late, the patient's death did
cause:

For the too vig'rous dose too fiercely
wrought,

And added fury to the strength it brought.
Recruited into rage, he grinds his teeth
In his own flesh, and feeds approaching
death.

Ye gods, to better fate good men dispose,
And turn that impious error on our foes !

The steer, who to the yoke was bred to bow, ⁷⁷⁰

(Studious of tillage, and the crooked plow,) Falls down and dies; and, dying, spews a flood

Of foamy madness, mix'd with clotted
blood.

The clown, who, cursing Providence, re-
pines,

His mournful fellow from the team dis-
joins;

With many a groan forsakes his fruitless
care,

And in th' unfinish'd furrow leaves the
share.

The pining steer no shades of lofty woods
Nor flow'ry meads can ease, nor crystal
floods

Roll'd from the rock: his flabby flanks decrease; 780

His eyes are settled in a stupid peace;
His bulk too weighty for his thighs is grown,
And his unwieldy neck hangs drooping down.

Now what avails his well-deserving toil
To turn the glebe, or smooth the rugged soil!

And yet he never supp'd in solemn state,
Nor undigested feasts did urge his fate,
Nor day to night luxuriously did join,
Nor surfeited on rich Campanian wine.
Simple his bev'rage, homely was his food,
The wholesome herbage, and the running flood: 791

No dreadful dreams awak'd him with affright;

His pains by day secur'd his rest by night.
'Twas then that buffaloes, ill pair'd, were seen

To draw the car of Jove's imperial queen,
For want of oxen; and the lab'ring swain
Scratch'd, with a rake, a furrow for his grain,
And cover'd with his hand the shallow seed again.

He yokes himself, and up the hilly height
With his own shoulders draws the wagon's weight. 800

The nightly wolf, that round th' enclosure prowld

To leap the fence, now plots not on the fold,

Tam'd with a sharper pain. The fearful doe

And flying stag amidst the greyhounds go,

And round the dwellings roam of man,
their fiercer foe.

The scaly nations of the sea profound,
Like shipwreck'd carcasses, are driv'n aground,

And mighty phocæ, never seen before
In shallow streams, are stranded on the shore. 809

The viper dead within her hole is found:
Defenseless was the shelter of the ground.

The water snake, whom fish and paddocks fed,

With staring scales lies poison'd in his bed:
To birds their native heav'ns contagious prove;

From clouds they fall, and leave their souls above.

Besides, to change their pasture 'tis in vain,

Or trust to physic; physic is their bane.
The learned leeches in despair depart,
And shake their heads, desponding of their art. 819

Tisiphone, let loose from under ground,
Majestically pale, now treads the round,
Before her drives diseases and affright,
And every moment rises to the sight,
Aspiring to the skies, encroaching on the light.

The rivers, and their banks, and hills around,
With lowings and with dying bleats resound.
At length, she strikes an universal blow;
To death at once whole herds of cattle go;
Sheep, oxen, horses, fall; and, heap'd on high,

The diff'ring species in confusion lie, 830
Till, warn'd by frequent ills, the way they found

To lodge their loathsome carrion underground:

For useless to the currier were their hides;
Nor could their tainted flesh with ocean tides

Be freed from filth; nor could Vulcanian flame

The stench abolish, or the savor tame.
Nor safely could they shear their fleecy store,

(Made drunk with pois'nous juice, and stiff with gore,)

Or touch the web: but, if the vest they wear,

Red blisters rising on their paps appear, 840
And flaming carbuncles, and noisome sweat,
And clammy dews, that loathsome lice beset;

Till the slow-creeping evil eats his way,
Consumes the parching limbs, and makes the life his prey.

THE FOURTH BOOK OF THE GEORGICS

THE ARGUMENT

Virgil has taken care to raise the subject of each Georgic. In the first, he has only dead matter on which to work. In the second, he just steps on the world of life, and describes that degree of it which is to be found in vegetables. In the third, he advances to animals; and, in the last, singles out the bee, which may be reckon'd the most sagacious of 'em, for his subject.

In this Georgic he shews us what station is most proper for the bees, and when they begin to gather honey; how to call 'em home when they swarm; and how to part 'em when they are engag'd in battle. From hence he takes occasion to discover their different kinds; and, after an excursion, relates their prudent and politic administration of affairs, and the several diseases that often rage in their hives, with the proper symptoms and remedies of each disease. In the last place, he lays down a method of repairing their kind, supposing their whole breed lost; and gives at large the history of its invention.

THE gifts of heav'n my foll'wing song pursues,

Aërial honey, and ambrosial dews.

Mæcenas, read this other part, that sings }
Embattled squadrons, and advent'rous }
kings:

A mighty pomp, tho' made of little things. }
Their arms, their arts, their manners, I } disclose,

And how they war, and whence the people rose:

Slight is the subject, but the praise not small,

If Heav'n assist, and Phœbus hear my call.

First, for thy bees a quiet station find, 10
And lodge 'em under covert of the wind,
(For winds, when homeward they return,
will drive

The loaded carriers from their ev'ning hive,)
Far from the cows' and goats' insulting crew,

That trample down the flow'rs, and brush the dew.

The painted lizard, and the birds of prey,
Foes of the frugal kind, be far away;
The titmouse, and the peckers' hungry brood,

And Progne, with her bosom stain'd in blood:

These rob the trading citizens, and bear 20
The trembling captives thro' the liquid air,

And for their callow young a cruel feast prepare.

But near a living stream their mansion place,

Edg'd round with moss and tufts of matted grass;

And plant (the winds' impetuous rage to stop)

Wild olive trees, or palms, before the busy shop;

That, when the youthful prince, with proud alarm,

Calls out the vent'rous colony to swarm;

When first their way thro' yielding air they wing,

New to the pleasures of their native spring;
The banks of brooks may make a cool retreat

For the raw soldiers from the scalding heat,

And neighb'ring trees with friendly shade invite

The troops, unus'd to long laborious flight.
Then o'er the running stream, or standing lake,

A passage for thy weary people make;
With osier floats the standing water strow;

Of massy stones make bridges, if it flow;
That basking in the sun thy bees may lie,

And, resting there, their flaggy pinions dry,

When, late returning home, the laden host
By raging winds is wreck'd upon the coast.

Wild thyme and sav'ry set around their cell,

Sweet to the taste, and fragrant to the smell;

Set rows of rosemary with flow'ring stem,
And let the purple vi'lets drink the stream.

Whether thou build the palace of thy bees

With twisted osiers, or with barks of trees,
Make but a narrow mouth; for, as the cold

Congeals into a lump the liquid gold, 50
So 't is again dissolv'd by summer's heat,

And the sweet labors both extremes defeat.

And therefore, not in vain, th' industrious kind

With dauby wax and flow'rs the chinks have lin'd,

And, with their stores of gather'd glue, contrive

To stop the vents and crannies of their hive.

Not birdlime, or Idæan pitch, produce
A more tenacious mass of clammy juice.

Nor bees are lodg'd in hives alone, but found

In chambers of their own, beneath the ground;

Their vaulted roofs are hung in pumices,
And in the rotten trunks of hollow trees.

But plaister thou the chinky hives with
clay,

And leafy branches o'er their lodgings lay:
Nor place them where too deep a water
flows,

Or where the yew, their pois'nous neighbor, grows;

Nor roast red crabs, t' offend the nice-
ness of their nose;

Nor near the steaming stench of muddy
ground;

Nor hollow rocks that render back the
sound,

And doubled images of voice rebound. 70

For what remains, when golden suns ap-
pear,

And under earth have driv'n the winter
year,

The winged nation wanders thro' the skies,
And o'er the plains and shady forest flies;

Then, stooping on the meads and leafy bow'rs,

They skim the floods, and sip the purple
flow'rs.

Exalted hence, and drunk with secret joy,
Their young succession all their cares employ:

They breed, they brood, instruct, and educate,

And make provision for the future state; 80

They work their waxen lodgings in their hives,

And labor honey to sustain their lives.
But when thou seest a swarming cloud arise,

That sweeps aloft, and darkens all the
skies,

The motions of their hasty flight attend;
And know, to floods or woods their airy march they bend.

Then melfoil beat, and honeysuckles
pound;

With these alluring savors strew the
ground,

And mix with tinkling brass the cymbals'
droning sound.

Straight to their ancient cells, recall'd from
air, 90

The reconcil'd deserters will repair.
But if intestine broils alarm the hive,

(For too pretenders oft for empire strive,)
The vulgar in divided factions jar;

And murm'ring sounds proclaim the civil
war.

Inflam'd with ire, and trembling with dis-
dain,

Scarce can their limbs their mighty souls contain.

With shouts the cowards' courage they excite,

And martial clangors call 'em out to fight;
With hoarse alarms the hollow camp rebounds, 100

That imitates the trumpets' angry sounds;
Then to their common standard they re-
pair;

The nimble horsemen scour the fields of
air;

In form of battle drawn, they issue forth,
And ev'ry knight is proud to prove his worth.

Press'd for their country's honor, and their king's,

On their sharp beaks they whet their pointed stings,

And exercise their arms, and tremble
with their wings.

Full in the midst the haughty monarchs
ride;

The trusty guards come up, and close the
side; 110

With shouts the daring foe to battle is defied.

Thus, in the season of unclouded spring,
To war they follow their undaunted king,

Crowd thro' their gates, and in the fields of
light

The shocking squadrons meet in mortal
fight.

Headlong they fall from high, and,
wounded, wound,

And heaps of slaughter'd soldiers bite the
ground.

Hard hailstones lie not thicker on the plain,
Nor shaken oaks such show'rs of acorns rain.

With gorgeous wings, the marks of sov'reign
sway, 120

The two contending princes make their
way;

Intrepid thro' the midst of danger go,
Their friends encourage, and amaze the foe.

With mighty souls in narrow bodies press'd,
They challenge, and encounter breast to
breast;

So fix'd on fame, unknowing how to fly,
And obstinately bent to win or die,

That long the doubtful combat they main-
tain,

Till one prevails — for one can only reign.

Yet all those dreadful deeds, this deadly
 fray, 130
 A cast of scatter'd dust will soon allay,
 And undecided leave the fortune of the
 day.
 When both the chiefs are sunder'd from
 the fight,
 Then to the lawful king restore his right;
 And let the wasteful prodigal be slain,
 That he who best deserves alone may reign.
 With ease distinguish'd is the regal race:
 One monarch wears an honest open face;
 Shap'd to his size, and godlike to behold,
 His royal body shines with specks of gold,
 And ruddy scales; for empire he design'd,
 Is better born, and of a nobler kind. 142
 That other looks like nature in disgrace:
 Gaunt are his sides, and sullen is his face;
 And like their grisly prince appears his gloomy race,
 Grim, ghastly, rugged, like a thirsty train
 That long have travel'd thro' a desert
 plain,
 And spet from their dry chaps the gather'd dust again.
 The better brood, unlike the bastard crew,
 Are mark'd with royal streaks of shining
 hue; 150
 Glitt'ring and ardent, tho' in body less:
 From these, at pointed seasons, hope to
 press
 Huge heavy honeycombs, of golden juice,
 Not only sweet, but pure, and fit for use,
 T' allay the strength and hardness of the
 wine,
 And with old Bacchus new metheglin join.
 But when the swarms are eager of their
 play,
 And loathe their empty hives, and idly
 stray,
 Restrain the wanton fugitives, and take
 A timely care to bring the truants back. 160
 The task is easy — but to clip the wings
 Of their high-flying arbitrary kings.
 At their command, the people swarm away:
 Confine the tyrant, and the slaves will stay.
 Sweet gardens, full of saffron flow'rs,
 invite
 The wand'ring gluttons, and retard their
 flight:
 Besides, the god obscene, who frights away,
 With his lath sword, the thieves and birds of
 prey.
 With his own hand, the guardian of the bees

For slips of pines may search the mountain
 trees, 170
 And with wild thyme and sav'ry plant the
 plain,
 Till his hard horny fingers ache with
 pain;
 And deck with fruitful trees the fields
 around,
 And with refreshing waters drench the
 ground.
 Now, did I not so near my labors end,
 Strike sail, and hast'ning to the harbor
 tend,
 My song to flow'ry gardens might extend:
 To teach the vegetable arts, to sing
 The Pæstan roses, and their double spring;
 How succ'ry drinks the running streams,
 and how 180
 Green beds of parsley near the river grow;
 How cucumers along the surface creep
 With crooked bodies, and with bellies deep;
 The late narcissus, and the winding trail
 Of bear's-foot, myrtles green, and ivy pale.
 For, where with stately tow'rs Tarentum
 stands,
 And deep Galæsus soaks the yellow sands,
 I chanc'd an old Corycian swain to know,
 Lord of few acres, and those barren too,
 Unfit for sheep or vines, and more unfit
 to sow: 190
 Yet, lab'ring well his little spot of ground,
 Some scatt'ring pot-herbs here and there he
 found,
 Which, cultivated with his daily care,
 And bruis'd with vervain, were his frugal
 fare.
 Sometimes white lilies did their leaves
 afford,
 With wholesome poppy flow'rs, to mend his homely board;
 For, late returning home, he supp'd at
 ease,
 And wisely deem'd the wealth of monarchs less:
 The little of his own, because his own,
 did please.
 To quit his care, he gather'd, first of all, 200
 In spring the roses, apples in the fall;
 And, when cold winter split the rocks in twain,
 And ice the running rivers did restrain,
 He stripp'd the bear's-foot of its leafy
 growth,
 And, calling western winds, accus'd the spring of sloth.

He therefore first among the swains was
found
To reap the product of his labor'd ground,
And squeeze the combs with golden liquor crown'd.
His limes were first in flow'rs; his lofty
pines,
With friendly shade, secur'd his tender
vines.
For ev'ry bloom his trees in spring afford,
An autumn apple was by tale restor'd.
He knew to rank his elms in even rows,
For fruit the grafted pear tree to dispose,
And tame to plums the sourness of the sloes.
With spreading planes he made a cool retreat,
To shade good fellows from the summer's
heat.
But, straiten'd in my space, I must forsake
This task, for others afterwards to take.
Describe we next the nature of the bees,
Bestow'd by Jove for secret services,
When, by the tinkling sound of timbrels
led,
The King of Heav'n in Cretan caves they
fed.
Of all the race of animals, alone,
The bees have common cities of their own;
And, common sons, beneath one law they
live,
And with one common stock their traffic
drive.
Each has a certain home, a sev'ral stall;
All is the State's, the State provides for all.
Mindful of coming cold, they share the
pain,
And hoard, for winter's use, the summer's
gain.
Some o'er the public magazines preside,
And some are sent new forage to provide;
These drudge in fields abroad, and those
at home
Lay deep foundations for the labor'd comb,
With dew, narcissus leaves, and clammy gum.
To pitch the waxen flooring some contrive;
Some nurse the future nation of the hive;
Sweet honey some condense; some purge
the grout;
The rest, in cells apart, the liquid nectar shut:
All, with united force, combine to drive
The lazy drones from the laborious hive;

With envy stung, they view each other's
deeds;
With diligence the fragrant work proceeds.
As when the Cyclops, at th' almighty nod,
New thunder hasten for their angry god,
Subdued in fire the stubborn metal lies;
One brawny smith the puffing bellows plies,
And draws and blows reciprocating air:
Others to quench the hissing mass prepare;
With lifted arms they order ev'ry blow,
And chime their sounding hammers in a row;
With labor'd anvils Ætna groans be-
low:
Strongly they strike; huge flakes of flames
expire;
With tongs they turn the steel, and vex it in the fire.
If little things with great we may compare,
Such are the bees, and such their busy care;
Studious of honey, each in his degree,
The youthful swain, the grave experienc'd
bee:
That in the field; this, in affairs of state
Employ'd at home, abides within the gate,
To fortify the combs, to build the wall,
To prop the ruins, lest the fabric fall:
But, late at night, with weary pinions come
The lab'ring youth, and heavy laden, home.
Plains, meads, and orchards, all the day
he plies;
The glean of yellow thyme distend his
thighs:
He spoils the saffron flow'rs; he sips the blues
Of va'lets, wilding blooms, and willow dews.
Their toil is common, common is their
sleep;
They shake their wings when morn begins
to peep,
Rush thro' the city gates without delay,
Nor ends their work, but with declining
day.
Then, having spent the last remains of
light,
They give their bodies due repose at night,
When hollow murmurs of their ev'ning
bells
Dismiss the sleepy swains, and toll 'em to their cells.
When once in beds their weary limbs they
steep,
No buzzing sounds disturb their golden
sleep.

'Tis sacred silence all. Nor dare they stray, 280

When rain is promis'd, or a stormy day;
But near the city walls their wat'ring take,
Nor forage far, but short excursions make.

And as, when empty barks on billows float,

With sandy ballast sailors trim the boat;
So bees bear gravel stones, whose poisoning
weight

Steers thro' the whistling winds their steady flight.

But, what's more strange, their modest appetites,

Averse from Venus, fly the nuptial rites.
No lust enervates their heroic mind, 290
Nor wastes their strength on wanton
womankind;

But in their mouths reside their genial
pow'rs:

They gather children from the leaves and flow'rs.

Thus make they kings to fill the regal
seat,

And thus their little citizens create,
And waxen cities build and palaces of
state.

And oft on rocks their tender wings they
tear,

And sink beneath the burthens which they
bear:

Such rage of honey in their bosom beats,
And such a zeal they have for flow'ry sweets. 300

Thus tho' the race of life they quickly
run,

Which in the space of sev'n short years is
done,

Th' immortal line in sure succession
reigns;

The fortune of the family remains,
And grandsires' grandsons the long list contains.

Besides, not Egypt, India, Media, more,
With servile awe their idol king adore:
While he survives, in concord and content

The commons live, by no divisions rent;
But the great monarch's death dissolves
the government. 310

All goes to ruin; they themselves contrive
To rob the honey, and subvert the hive.

The king presides, his subjects' toil surveys;
The servile rout their careful Cæsar praise:
Him they extol; they worship him alone;

They crowd his levees, and support his
throne;

They raise him on their shoulders with a
shout;

And, when their sov'reign's quarrel calls
'em out,

His foes to mortal combat they defy,
And think it honor at his feet to die. 320

Induc'd by such examples, some have taught

That bees have portions of ethereal
thought;

Endued with particles of heavenly fires:
For God the whole created mass inspires;
Thro' heav'n, and earth, and ocean's depth
he throws

His influence round, and kindles as he goes.

Hence flocks, and herds, and men, and beasts, and fowls

With breath are quicken'd and attract their souls;

Hence take the forms his prescience did
ordain,

And into him at length resolve again. 330
No room is left for death: they mount the
sky,

And to their own congenial planets fly.
Now, when thou hast decreed to seize their stores,

And by prerogative to break their doors,
With sprinkled water first the city choke,
And then pursue the citizens with smoke.

Two honey harvests fall in ev'ry year:
First, when the pleasing Pleiades appear,
And, springing upward, spurn the briny
seas; 339

Again, when their affrighted choir surveys
The wat'ry Scorpion mend his pace behind,

With a black train of storms, and winter
wind,

They plunge into the deep, and safe protection find.

Prone to revenge, the bees, a wrathful race,
When once provok'd, assault th' aggressor's
face,

And thro' the purple veins a passage find;
There fix their stings, and leave their souls
behind.

But if a pinching winter thou foresee,
And wouldst preserve thy famish'd family;
With fragrant thyme the city fumigate, 350
And break the waxen walls to save the state.
For lurking lizards often lodge, by stealth,

Within the suburbs, and purloin their wealth;

And worms, that shun the light, a dark retreat

Have found in combs, and undermin'd the seat;

Or lazy drones, without their share of pain,
In winter quarters free, devour the gain;

Or wasps infest the camp with loud alarms,
And mix in battle with unequal arms;

Or secret moths are there in silence fed;³⁶⁰
Or spiders in the vault their snary webs have spread.

The more oppress'd by foes, or famine-pin'd,
The more increase thy care to save the sinking kind:

With greens and flow'rs recruit their empty hives,

And seek fresh forage to sustain their lives.

But, since they share with man one common fate,

In health and sickness, and in turns of state;
Observe the symptoms when they fall away,
And languish with insensible decay.

They change their hue; with haggard eyes they stare;³⁷⁰

Lean are their looks, and slagg'd is their hair;

And crowds of dead, that never must return

To their lov'd hives, in decent pomp are borne:

Their friends attend the hearse; the next relations mourn.

The sick for air before the portal gasp,
Their feeble legs within each other clasp,

Or idle in their empty hives remain,
Benumb'd with cold, and listless of their gain.

Soft whispers then, and broken sounds are heard,

As when the woods by gentle winds are stirr'd;³⁸⁰

Such stifled noise as the close furnace hides,
Or dying murmurs of departing tides.

This when thou seest, galbanecan odors use,
And honey in the sickly hive infuse.

Thro' reeden pipes convey the golden flood,
T' invite the people to their wonted food.

Mix it with thicken'd juice of sodden wines,
And raisins from the grapes of Psythian vines:

To these add pounded galls, and roses dry,
And, with Cecropian thyme, strong-scented centaury.

390

A flow'r there is, that grows in meadow ground,

Amellus call'd, and easy to be found;
For, from one root, the rising stem bestows

A wood of leaves, and violet-purple boughs:
The flow'r itself is glorious to behold,

And shines on altars like refulgent gold;
Sharp to the taste; by shepherds near the stream

Of Mella found; and thence they gave the name.

Boil this restoring root in gen'rous wine,
And set beside the door, the sickly stock to dine.

But, if the lab'ring kind be wholly lost,⁴⁰⁰
And not to be retriev'd with care or cost;

'Tis time to touch the precepts of an art
Th' Arcadian master did of old impart;

And how he stock'd his empty hives again,
Renew'd with putrid gore of oxen slain.

An ancient legend I prepare to sing,
And upward follow Fame's immortal spring:—

For, where with sev'nfold horns mysterious Nile

Surrounds the skirts of Egypt's fruitful isle,⁴¹⁰

And where in pomp the sunburnt people ride

On painted barges o'er the teeming tide,
Which, pouring down from Ethiopian lands,

Makes green the soil with slime, and black prolific sands;

That length of region, and large tract of ground,

In this one art a sure relief have found.

First, in a place by nature close, they build
A narrow flooring, gutter'd, wall'd, and til'd.

In this, four windows are contriv'd, that strike

To the four winds oppos'd their beams oblique.⁴²⁰

A steer of two years old they take, whose head

Now first with burnish'd horns begins to spread;

They stop his nostrils, while he strives in vain

To breathe free air, and struggles with his pain.

Knock'd down, he dies: his bowels, bruis'd within,

Betray no wound on his unbroken skin.
Extended thus, in this obscene abode

They leave the beast; but first sweet flow'rs are strow'd Beneath his body, broken boughs and thyme,
 And pleasing cassia just renew'd in prime.
 This must be done, ere spring makes equal day, ⁴³¹
 When western winds on curling waters play;
 Ere painted meads produce their flow'ry crops,
 Or swallows twitter on the chimney tops.
 The tainted blood, in this close prison pent,
 Begins to boil, and thro' the bones ferment.
 Then, wondrous to behold, new creatures
 rise,
 A moving mass at first, and short of thighs;
 Till, shooting out with legs, and imp'd with
 wings,
 The grubs proceed to bees with pointed stings; ⁴⁴⁰
 And, more and more affecting air, they try
 Their tender pinions, and begin to fly:
 At length, like summer storms from spreading clouds,
 That burst at once, and pour impetuous
 floods;
 Or flights of arrows from the Parthian bows,
 When from afar they gall embattled foes;
 With such a tempest thro' the skies they
 steer,
 And such a form the winged squadrons
 bear.
 What god, O Muse! this useful science
 taught?
 Or by what man's experience was it brought? ⁴⁵⁰
 Sad Aristæus from fair Tempe fled,
 His bees with famine or diseases dead:
 On Peneus' banks he stood, and near his holy head;
 And, while his falling tears the stream
 supplied,
 Thus, mourning, to his mother goddess cried:
 "Mother Cyrene! mother, whose abode
 Is in the depth of this immortal flood!
 What boots it, that from Phœbus' loins I
 spring,
 The third, by him and thee, from heav'n's high king?
 O where is all thy boasted pity gone, ⁴⁶⁰
 And promise of the skies to thy deluded
 son?
 Why didst thou me, unhappy me, create,
 Odious to gods, and born to bitter fate?

Whom scarce my sheep, and scarce my painful plow,
 The needful aids of human life allow:
 So wretched is thy son, so hard a mother
 thou!
 Proceed, inhuman parent, in thy scorn;
 Root up my trees; with blights destroy my corn;
 My vineyards ruin, and my sheepfolds
 burn.
 Let loose thy rage; let all thy spite be shown, ⁴⁷⁰
 Since thus thy hate pursues the praises of thy son."
 But, from her mossy bow'r below the
 ground,
 His careful mother heard the plaintive
 sound,
 Encompass'd with her sea-green sisters
 round.
 One common work they plied; their distaffs full
 With carded locks of blue Milesian wool:
 Spio, with Drymo brown, and Xanthe fair,
 And sweet Phyllocoe with long dishevel'd
 hair;
 Cydippe with Lycorias, one a maid,
 And one that once had call'd Lucina's aid;
 Clio and Beroe, from one father both; ⁴⁸¹
 Both girt with gold, and clad in party-color'd cloth;
 Opis the meek, and Deiopeia proud;
 Nisea softly, with Ligea loud;
 Thalia joyous, Ephyre the sad,
 And Arethusa, once Diana's maid,
 But now (her quiver left) to love betray'd.
 To these Clymene the sweet theft declares
 Of Mars, and Vulcan's unavailing cares;
 And all the rapes of gods, and ev'ry love, ⁴⁹⁰
 From ancient Chaos down to youthful Jove.
 Thus while she sings, the sisters turn the wheel,
 Empty the woolly rock, and fill the reel.
 A mournful sound again the mother hears;
 Again the mournful sound invades the sisters' ears.
 Starting at once from their green seats,
 they rise;
 Fear in their heart, amazement in their
 eyes.
 But Arethusa, leaping from her bed,
 First lifts above the waves her beauteous
 head,
 And, crying from afar, thus to Cyrene said: ⁵⁰⁰

"O sister, not with causeless fear possess'd !

No stranger voice disturbs thy tender breast.
'Tis Aristæus, 'tis thy darling son,
Who to his careless mother makes his moan.
Near his paternal stream he sadly stands,
With downcast eyes, wet cheeks, and folded hands,
Upbraiding heav'n, from whence his lineage came;

And cruel calls the gods, and cruel thee, by name."

Cyrene, mov'd with love, and seiz'd with fear,
Cries out: "Conduct my son, conduct him here: 510

'Tis lawful for the youth, deriv'd from gods,

To view the secrets of our deep abodes."
At once she wav'd her hand on either side;
At once the ranks of swelling streams divide.

Two rising heaps of liquid crystal stand,
And leave a space betwixt of empty sand.
Thus safe receiv'd, the downward track he treads,

Which to his mother's wat'ry palace leads.
With wond'ring eyes he views the secret store

Of lakes, that pent in hollow caverns roar:
He hears the crackling sound of coral woods, 521

And sees the secret source of subterranean floods;

And where, distinguish'd in their sev'ral cells,

The fount of Phasis, and of Lycus, dwells;
Where swift Enipeus in his bed appears,
And Tiber his majestic forehead rears;
Whence Anio flows, and Hypanis, profound,
Breaks thro' th' opposing rocks with raging sound;

Where Po first issues from his dark abodes,
And, awful in his cradle, rules the floods:

Two golden horns on his large front he wears, 531

And his grim face a bull's resemblance bears;

With rapid course he seeks the sacred main,

And fattens, as he runs, the fruitful plain.

Now, to the court arriv'd, th' admiring son

Beholds the vaulted roofs of pory stone;
Now to his mother goddess tells his grief,

Which she with pity hears, and promises relief.

Th' officious nymphs, attending in a ring,
With waters drawn from their perpetual spring, 540

From earthly dregs his body purify,
And rub his temples with fine towels dry;
Then load the tables with a lib'ral feast,
And honor with full bowls their friendly guest.

The sacred altars are involv'd in smoke,
And the bright choir their kindred gods invoke.

Two bowls the mother fills with Lydian wine;

Then thus: "Let these be pour'd, with rites divine,

To the great authors of our wat'ry line:
To Father Ocean, this; and this," she said, 550

"Be to the nymphs his sacred sisters paid,
Who rule the wat'ry plains, and hold the woodland shade."

She sprinkled thrice, with wine, the Vestal fire;

Thrice to the vaulted roof the flames aspire.

Rais'd with so blest an omen, she begun,
With words like these, to cheer her drooping son:

"In the Carpathian bottom makes abode
The shepherd of the seas, a prophet and a god.

High o'er the main in wat'ry pomp he rides;
His azure car and finny coursers guides: 560
Proteus his name — to his Pallenian port
I see from far the weary god resort.

Him not alone we river gods adore,
But aged Nereus hearkens to his lore.

With sure foresight, and with unerring doom,

He sees what is, and was, and is to come.
This Neptune gave him, when he gave to keep

His scaly flocks, that graze the wat'ry deep.
Implore his aid; for Proteus only knows
The secret cause, and cure, of all thy woes.

But first the wily wizard must be caught;
For, unconstrain'd, he nothing tells for naught; 572

Nor is with pray'rs, or bribes, or flatt'ry bought.

Surprise him first, and with hard fetters bind;

Then all his frauds will vanish into wind.

I will myself conduct thee on thy way;
 When next the southing sun inflames the
 day,
 When the dry herbage thirsts for dews in
 vain,
 And sheep, in shades, avoid the parching
 plain:
 Then will I lead thee to his secret seat,
 When, weary with his toil, and scorch'd with heat, ⁵⁸¹
 The wayward sire frequents his cool retreat.
 His eyes with heavy slumber overcast;
 With force invade his limbs, and bind him
 fast.
 Thus surely bound, yet he not over bold:
 The slipp'ry god will try to loose his hold,
 And various forms assume, to cheat thy
 sight,
 And with vain images of beasts affright:
 With foamy tusks will seem a bristly boar,
 Or imitate the lion's angry roar; ⁵⁹⁰ Break out in crackling flames to shun thy snares,
 Or hiss a dragon, or a tiger stares;
 Or, with a wile thy caution to betray,
 In fleeting streams attempt to slide away.
 But thou, the more he varies forms, beware
 To strain his fetters with a stricter care;
 Till, tiring all his arts, he turns again
 To his true shape, in which he first was
 seen."

This said, with nectar she her son anoints,
 Infusing vigor thro' his mortal joints: ⁶⁰⁰
 Down from his head the liquid odors ran;
 He breath'd of heav'n, and look'd above a
 man.

Within a mountain's hollow womb there
 lies

A large recess, conceal'd from human eyes,
 Where heaps of billows, driv'n by wind
 and tide,

In form of war their wat'ry ranks divide,
 And there, like sentries set, without the mouth abide:

A station safe for ships, when tempests roar,
 A silent harbor, and a cover'd shore.

Secure within resides the various god, ⁶¹⁰
 And draws a rock upon his dark abode.

Hether with silent steps, secure from
 sight,

The goddess guides her son, and turns
 him from the light:

Herself, involv'd in clouds, precipitates
 her flight.

'T was noon; the sultry Dog-star from
 the sky
 Scorch'd Indian swains; the riv'd grass
 was dry;

The sun with flaming arrows pierc'd the
 flood,

And, darting to the bottom, bak'd the mud;
 When weary Proteus, from the briny waves,
 Retir'd for shelter to his wonted caves. ⁶²⁰
 His finny flocks about their shepherd play,
 And, rolling round him, spirt the bitter sea;
 Unwieldily they wallow first in ooze,
 Then in the shady covert seek repose.

Himself, their herdsman, on the middle
 mount,

Takes of his muster'd flocks a just account.
 So, seated on a rock, a shepherd's groom
 Surveys his ev'ning flocks returning home,
 When lowing calves and bleating lambs,
 from far, ⁶²⁹

Provoke the prowling wolf to nightly war.
 Th' occasion offers, and the youth complies:
 For scarce the weary god had clos'd his
 eyes,

When, rushing on, with shouts, he binds in chains

The drowsy prophet, and his limbs con-
 strains.

He, not unmindful of his usual art,
 First in dissembled fire attempts to part:
 Then roaring beasts and running streams
 he tries,

And wears all his miracles of lies;
 But, having shifted ev'ry form to scape, Convinc'd of conquest, he resum'd his shape, ⁶⁴⁰

And thus, at length, in human accent spoke:
 "Audacious youth! what madness could provoke

A mortal man t' invade a sleeping god?
 What bus'ness brought thee to my dark abode?"

To this th' audacious youth: "Thou know'st full well

My name and bus'ness, god; nor need I tell.
 No man can Proteus cheat; but, Proteus,
 leave

Thy fraudulent arts, and do not thou deceive.
 Foll'wing the gods' command, I come t'
 implore

Thy help, my perish'd people to restore."
 The seer, who could not yet his wrath
 assuage, ⁶⁵¹

Roll'd his green eyes, that sparkled with his rage,

And gnash'd his teeth, and cried: "No vulgar god Pursues thy crimes, nor with a common rod.

Thy great misdeeds have met a due reward;

And Orpheus' dying pray'rs at length are heard.

For crimes not his the lover lost his life, And at thy hands requires his murder'd wife;

Nor (if the Fates assist not) canst thou scape

The just revenge of that intended rape. 660
To shun thy lawless lust, the dying bride, Unwary, took along the river's side, Nor at her heels perceiv'd the deadly snake That kept the bank, in covert of the brake. But all her fellow-nymphs the mountains

tear
With loud laments, and break the yielding air:

The realins of Mars remurmur'd all around, And echoes to th' Athenian shores rebound. Th' unhappy husband, husband now no more,

Did on his tuneful harp his loss deplore, And sought his mournful mind with music to restore. 671

On thee, dear wife, in desarts all alone, He call'd, sigh'd, sung: his griefs with day begun,

Nor were they finish'd with the setting sun.

Ev'n to the dark dominions of the night He took his way, thro' forests void of light, And dar'd amidst the trembling ghosts to sing,

And stood before th' inexorable king. Th' infernal troops like passing shadows glide,

And, list'ning, crowd the sweet musician's side. 680

Not flocks of birds, when driv'n by storms or night,

Stretch to the forest with so thick a flight: Men, matrons, children, and th' unmarried maid,

The mighty hero's more majestic shade,* And youths on fun'ral piles before their parents laid.

All these Cocytus bounds with squalid reeds,

With muddy ditches, and with deadly weeds;

And baleful Styx encompasses around, With nine slow circling streams, th' unhappy ground.

Ev'n from the depths of hell the damn'd advance; 690

Th' infernal mansions, nodding, seem to dance;

The gaping three-mouth'd dog forgets to snarl;

The Furies hearken, and their snakes uncurl;

Ixion seems no more his pains to feel, But leans attentive on his standing wheel.

"All dangers pass'd, at length the lovely bride

In safety goes, with her melodious guide, Longing the common light again to share, And draw the vital breath of upper air: 699
He first; and close behind him follow'd she; For such was Proserpine's severe decree — When strong desires th' impatient youth invade,

By little caution and much love betray'd: A fault which easy pardon might receive, Were lovers judges, or could Hell forgive. For, near the confines of ethereal light, And longing for the glimm'ring of a sight, Th' unwary lover cast his eyes behind, Forgetful of the law, nor master of his mind.

Straight all his hopes exhal'd in empty smoke, 710

And his long toils were forfeit for a look. Three flashes of blue lightning gave the sign Of cov'nants broke; three peals of thunder join.

Then thus the bride: 'What fury seiz'd on thee,

Unhappy man! to lose thyself and me? Dragg'd back again by cruel destinies, An iron slumber shuts my swimming eyes. And now, farewell! Involv'd in shades of night,

Forever I am ravish'd from thy sight.

In vain I reach my feeble hands, to join 720
In sweet embraces — ah! no longer thine!' She said; and from his eyes the fleeting fair Retir'd like subtle smoke dissolv'd in air, And left her hopeless lover in despair.

In vain, with folding arms, the youth assay'd To stop her flight, and strain the flying shade:

* This whole line is taken from the Marquess of Normanby's translation.

He prays, he raves, all means in vain he tries,
 With rage inflam'd, astonish'd with surprise;
 But she return'd no more, to bless his longing eyes,
 Nor would th' infernal ferryman once more ⁷³⁰
 Be brib'd to waft him to the farther shore.
 What should he do, who twice had lost his
 love?
 What notes invent? what new petitions
 move?
 Her soul already was consign'd to fate,
 And shiv'ring in the leaky sculler sate.
 For sev'n continued months, if fame say
 true,
 The wretched swain his sorrows did renew.
 By Strymon's freezing streams he sate
 alone:
 The rocks were mov'd to pity with his
 moan;
 Trees bent their heads to hear him sing his wrongs; ⁷⁴⁰
 Fierce tigers couch'd around, and loll'd their fawning tongues.
 "So, close in poplar shades, her children
 gone,
 The mother nightingale laments alone,
 Whose nest some prying churl had found,
 and thence
 By stealth convey'd th' unfeather'd innocence.
 But she supplies the night with mournful
 strains;
 And melancholy music fills the plains.
 Sad Orpheus thus his tedious hours employs,
 Averse from Venus, and from nuptial joys.
 Alone he tempts the frozen floods, alone ⁷⁵⁰
 Th' unhappy climes, where spring was never
 known:
 He mourn'd his wretched wife, in vain re-
 stor'd,
 And Pluto's unavailing boon deplor'd.
 "The Thracian matrons, who the youth accus'd
 Of love disdain'd and marriage rites re-
 fus'd,
 With furies and nocturnal orgies fir'd,
 At length against his sacred life conspir'd.
 Whom ev'n the savage beasts had spar'd,
 they kill'd,
 And strew'd his mangled limbs about the
 field.

Then, when his head, from his fair shoulders torn, ⁷⁶⁰
 Wash'd by the waters, was on Hebrus borne, Ev'n then his trembling tongue invok'd his bride;
 With his last voice, 'Eurydice,' he cried.
 'Eurydice,' the rocks and river banks replied."
 This answer Proteus gave; nor more he
 said,
 But in the billows plung'd his hoary head;
 And, where he leap'd, the waves in circles widely spread.
 The nymph return'd, her drooping son to
 cheer,
 And bade him banish his superfluous fear:
 "For now," said she, "the cause is known,
 from whence ⁷⁷⁰
 Thy woe succeeded, and for what offense.
 The nymphs, companions of th' unhappy
 maid,
 This punishment upon thy crimes have laid;
 And sent a plague among thy thriving bees.
 With vows and suppliant pray'rs their pow'rs appease:
 The soft Napean race will soon repent
 Their anger, and remit the punishment.
 The secret in an easy method lies:
 Select four brawny bulls for sacrifice,
 Which on Lycæus graze without a guide; ⁷⁸⁰
 Add four fair heifers yet in yoke untried.
 For these, four altars in their temple rear,
 And then adore the woodland pow'rs with
 pray'r.
 From the slain victims pour the streaming
 blood,
 And leave their bodies in the shady wood:
 Nine mornings thence, Lethæan poppy
 bring,
 T' appease the manes of the poets' king;
 And, to propitiate his offended bride,
 A fatted calf and a black ewe provide.
 This finish'd, to the former woods repair."
 His mother's precepts he performs with care; ⁷⁹¹
 The temple visits, and adores with pray'r;
 Four altars raises; from his herd he culls,
 For slaughter, four the fairest of his bulls:
 Four heifers from his female store he took,
 All fair, and all unknowing of the yoke.
 Nine mornings thence, with sacrifice and pray'rs,
 The pow'rs aton'd, he to the grove repairs.
 Behold a prodigy! for, from within
 The broken bowels and the bloated skin, ⁸⁰⁰

A buzzing noise of bees his ears alarms:
Straight issue thro' the sides assembling swarms.

Dark as a cloud, they make a wheeling
flight,

Then on a neighb'ring tree, descending,
light:

Like a large cluster of black grapes they
show,

And make a large dependence from the bough.

Thus have I sung of fields, and flocks, and
trees,

And of the waxen work of lab'ring bees;
While mighty Caesar, thund'ring from afar,
Seeks on Euphrates' banks the spoils of war;
With conqu'ring arms asserts his country's
cause,

With arts of peace the willing people draws;
On the glad earth the Golden Age renews,
And his great father's path to heav'n pur-
sues;

While I at Naples pass my peaceful days,
Affecting studies of less noisy praise;
And, bold thro' youth, beneath the beechen
shade,

The lays of shepherds, and their loves, have
play'd.

ÆNEIS

TO THE

MOST HONORABLE JOHN, LORD MARQUIS OF NORMANBY

EARL OF MULGRAVE. &C.

AND KNIGHT OF THE MOST NOBLE ORDER OF THE GARTER

A HEROIC poem, truly such, is undoubtedly the greatest work which the soul of man is capable to perform. The design of it is to form the mind to heroic virtue by example.
'Tis convey'd in verse, that it may delight, while it instructs: the action of it is always one, entire, and great. The least and most trivial episodes, or underactions, which are interwoven in it, are parts either necessary or convenient to carry on the main design;
either so necessary, that, without them, the poem must be imperfect, or so convenient, that no others can be imagin'd more suitable to the place in which they are. There is nothing to be left void in a firm building;

even the cavities ought not to be fill'd with rubbish, (which is of a perishable kind, destructive to the strength,) but with brick or stone, tho' of less pieces, yet of the same nature, and fitted to the crannies. Even the least portions of them must be of the epic kind: all things must be grave, majestic, and sublime; nothing of a foreign nature,
like the trifling novels which Ariosto and others have inserted in their poems; by which the reader is misled into another sort of pleasure, opposite to that which is design'd in an epic poem. One raises the soul, and hardens it to virtue; the other softens it again, and unbends it into vice.
One conduces to the poet's aim, the completing of his work, which he is driving on, laboring and hast'ning in every line; the other slackens his pace, diverts him from his way, and locks him up, like a knight-errant, in an enchanted castle, when he should be pursuing his first adventure.
Statius, as Bossu has well observ'd, was ambitious of trying his strength with his master Virgil, as Virgil had before tried his with Homer. The Grecian gave the two Romans an example, in the games which were celebrated at the funerals of Patroclus. Virgil imitated the invention of Homer, but chang'd the sports. But both the Greek and Latin poet took their occasions from the subject; tho', to confess the truth, they were both ornamental, or at best convenient parts of it, rather than of necessity arising from it. Statius, who, thro' his whole poem, is noted for want of conduct and judgment, instead of staying, as he might have done, for the death of Capaneus, Hippomedon, Tydeus, or some other of his seven champions, (who are heroes all alike,) or more properly for the tragical end of the two brothers, whose exequies the next successor had leisure to perform when the siege was rais'd, and in the interval betwixt the poet's first action and his second, went out of his way, as it were on premeditated malice, to commit a fault. For he took his opportunity to kill a royal infant by the means of a serpent (that author of all evil), to make way for those funeral honors which he intended for him. Now if this innocent had been of any relation to his Thebais;
if he had either farther'd or hinder'd the taking of the town; the poet might have found some sorry excuse at least for detaining the reader from the promis'd siege. On these terms, this Capaneus of a poet ingag'd his two immortal predecessors; and his success was answerable to his enterprise.

If this economy must be observ'd in the minutest parts of an epic poem, which, to a common reader, seem to be detach'd from the body, and almost independent of it; what soul, tho' sent into the world with great advantages of nature, cultivated with the liberal arts and sciences, conversant with histories of the dead, and enrich'd with observations on the living, can be sufficient to inform the whole body of so great a work? I touch here but transiently, without any strict method, on some few of those many rules of imitating nature which Aristotle drew from Homer's Iliads and Odyssees, and which he fitted to the drama; furnishing himself also with observations from the practice of the theater when it flourish'd under Æschylus, Euripides, and Sophocles: for the original of the stage was from the epic poem. Narration, doubtless, preceded acting, and gave laws to it; what at first was told artfully, was, in process of time, represented gracefully to the sight and hearing. Those episodes of Homer which were proper for the stage, the poets amplified each into an action; out of his limbs they form'd their bodies; what he had contracted, they enlarg'd; out of one Hercules were made infinite of pigmies, yet all endued with human souls; for from him, their great creator, they have each of them the divinæ particulam aure. They flow'd from him at first, and are at last resolv'd into him. Nor were they only animated by him, but their measure and symmetry was owing to him. His one, entire, and great action was copied by them according to the proportions of the drama. If he finish'd his orb within the year, it suffic'd to teach them, that their action being less, and being also less diversified with incidents, their orb, of consequence, must be circumscrib'd in a less compass, which they reduc'd within the limits either of a natural or an artificial day; so that, as he taught them to amplify what he had shorten'd, by the same rule, applied the contrary way, he taught them to shorten what he had amplified. Tragedy is the miniature of human life; an epic poem is the draught at length. Here, my Lord, I must contract also; for, before I was aware, I was almost running into a long digression, to prove that there is no such absolute necessity that the time of a stage action should so strictly be confin'd to twenty-four hours as never to exceed them, for which Aristotle contends, and the Grecian stage has practic'd. Some longer space, on some occasions, I think, may be allow'd, especially for the English theater, which requires more variety of incidents than the French. Corneille himself, after long practice, was inclin'd to think that the time allotted by the ancients was too short to raise and finish a great action: and better a mechanic rule were stretch'd or broken, than a great beauty were omitted. To raise, and afterwards to calm the passions; to purge the soul from pride, by the examples of human miseries, which befall the greatest; in few words, to expel arrogance, and introduce compassion, are the great effects of tragedy; great, I must confess, if they were altogether as true as they are pompous. But are habits to be introduc'd at three hours' warning? Are radical diseases so suddenly remov'd? A mountebank may promise such a cure, but a skilful physician will not undertake it. An epic poem is not in so much haste: it works leisurely; the changes which it makes are slow; but the cure is likely to be more perfect. The effects of tragedy, as I said, are too violent to be lasting. If it be answer'd that, for this reason, tragedies are often to be seen, and the dose to be repeated, this is tacitly to confess that there is more virtue in one heroic poem than in many tragedies. A man is humbled one day, and his pride returns the next. Chymical medicines are observ'd to relieve oftner than to cure; for 't is the nature of spirits to make swift impressions, but not deep. Galenical decoctions, to which I may properly compare an epic poem, have more of body in them; they work by their substance and their weight. It is one reason of Aristotle's to prove that tragedy is the more noble, because it turns in a shorter compass; the whole action being circumscrib'd within the space of four-and-twenty hours. He might prove as well that a mushroom is to be preferr'd before a peach, because it shoots up in the compass of a night. A chariot may be driven round the pillar in less space than a large machine, because the bulk is not so great. Is the Moon a more noble planet than Saturn, because she makes her revolution in less than thirty days, and he in little less than thirty years? Both their orbs are in proportion to their several magnitudes; and consequently the quickness or slowness of their motion, and the time of their circumvolutions, is no argument of the greater or less perfection. And, besides, what virtue is there in a tragedy which is not contain'd in an epic poem, where pride is humbled, virtue rewarded, and vice punish'd; and those more amply treated than the narrowness of the drama can admit? The shining quality of an epic hero, his magnanimity, his constancy, his patience, his piety, or whatever characteristic virtue his poet gives him, raises first our admiration. We are naturally prone to imitate what we admire; and frequent acts produce a habit. If the hero's chief quality be vicious, as, for example, the choler and obstinate desire of vengeance in Achilles, yet the moral is instructive: and, besides, we are inform'd in the very proposition of the Iliads that this anger was pernicious; that it brought a thousand ills on the Grecian camp. The courage of Achilles is propos'd to imitation, not his pride and disobedience to his general, nor his brutal cruelty to his dead enemy, nor the selling his body to his father. We abhor these actions while we read them; and what we abhor we never imitate. The poet only shews them, like rocks or quicksands, to be shunn'd.

By this example the critics have concluded that it is not necessary the manners of the hero should be virtuous. They are poetically good, if they are of a piece: tho', where a character of perfect virtue is set before us, 't is more lovely; for there the whole hero is to be imitated. This is the Æneas of our author; this is that idea of perfection in an epic poem which painters and statuarys have only in their minds, and which no hands are able to express. These are the beauties of a god in a human body. When the picture of Achilles is drawn in tragedy, he is taken with those warts, and moles, and hard features, by those who represent him on the stage, or he is no more Achilles; for his creator, Homer, has so describ'd him. Yet even thus he appears a perfect hero, tho' an imperfect character of virtue. Horace paints him after Homer, and delivers him to be copied on the stage with all those imperfections. Therefore they are either not faults in a heroic poem, or faults common to the drama. After all, on the whole merits of the cause, it must be acknowledg'd that the epic poem is more for the manners, and tragedy for the passions. The passions, as I have said, are violent; and acute distempers require medicines of a strong and speedy operation. Ill habits of the mind are like chronic diseases, to be corrected by degrees, and cur'd by alteratives; wherein, tho' purges are sometimes necessary, yet diet, good air, and moderate exercise have the greatest part. The matter being thus stated, it will appear that both sorts of poetry are of use for their proper ends. The stage is more active; the epic poem works at greater leisure, yet is active too, when need requires; for dialogue is imitated by the drama from the more active parts of it. One puts off a fit, like the quinquina, and relieves us only for a time; the other roots out the distemper, and gives a healthful habit. The sun enlightens and cheers us, dispels fogs, and warms the ground with his daily beams; but the corn is sow'd, increases, is ripen'd, and is reap'd for use in process of time, and in its proper season. I proceed from the greatness of the action to the dignity of the actors; I mean to the persons employ'd in both poems. There likewise tragedy will be seen to borrow from the epopee; and that which borrows is always of less dignity, because it has not of its own. A subject, 't is true, may lend to his sovereign; but the act of borrowing makes the king inferior, because he wants, and the subject supplies. And suppose the persons of the drama wholly fabulous, or of the poet's invention, yet heroic poetry gave him the examples of that invention, because it was first, and Homer the common father of the stage. I know not of any one advantage which tragedy can boast above heroic poetry, but that it is represented to the view, as well as read, and instructs in the closet, as well as on the theater. This is an uncontended excellence, and a chief branch of its prerogative; yet I may be allow'd to say, without partiality, that herein the actors share the poet's praise. Your Lordship knows some modern tragedies which are beautiful on the stage, and yet I am confident you would not read them. Tryphon the stationer complains they are seldom ask'd for in his shop. The poet who flourish'd in the scene is damn'd in the ruelle; nay more, he is not esteem'd a good poet by those who see and hear his extravagances with delight. They are a sort of stately fustian, and lofty childishness. Nothing but nature can give a sincere pleasure; where that is not imitated, 'tis grotesque painting; the fine woman ends in a fish's tail.

I might also add that many things which not only please, but are real beauties in the reading, would appear absurd upon the stage; and those not only the speciosa miracula, as Horace calls them, of transformations, of Scylla, Antiphates, and the Læstrygons, which cannot be represented even in operas; but the prowess of Achilles or Æneas would appear ridiculous in our dwarf heroes of the theater. We can believe they routed armies, in Homer or in Virgil; but ne Hercules contra duos in the drama. I forbear to instance in many things which the stage cannot, or ought not to represent; for I have said already more than I intended on this subject, and should fear it might be turn'd against me, that I plead for the preëminence of epic poetry because I have taken some pains in translating Virgil, if this were the first time that I had deliver'd my opinion in this dispute. But I have more than once already maintain'd the rights of my two masters against their rivals of the scene, even while I wrote tragedies myself, and had no thoughts of this present undertaking. I submit my opinion to your judgment, who are better qualified than any man I know to decide this controversy. You come, my Lord, instructed in the cause, and needed not that I should open it. Your Essay of Poetry, which was publish'd without a name, and of which I was not honor'd with the confidence, I read over and over with much delight, and as much instruction, and, without flattering you, or making myself more moral than I am, not without some envy. I was loth to be inform'd how an epic poem should be written, or how a tragedy should be contriv'd and manag'd, in better verse, and with more judgment, than I could teach others. A native of Parnas-sus, and bred up in the studies of its fundamental laws, may receive new lights from his contemporaries; but 'tis a grudging kind of praise which he gives his benefactors. He is more oblig'd than he is willing to acknowledge; there is a tincture of malice in his commendations; for where I own I am taught, I confess my want of knowledge. A judge upon the bench may, out of good nature, or at least interest, encourage the pleadings of a puny counselor; but he does not willingly commend his brother sergeant at the bar, especially when he controls his law, and exposes that ignorance which is made sacred by his place. I gave the unknown author his due commendation, I must confess; but who can answer for me and for the rest of the poets who heard me read the poem, whether we should not have been better pleas'd to have seen our own names at the bottom of the title-page? Perhaps we commended it the more, that we might seem to be above the censure. We are naturally displeas'd with an unknown critic, as the ladies are with the lampooner, because we are bitten in the dark, and know not where to fasten our revenge. But great excellencies will work their way thro' all sorts of opposition. I applauded rather out of decency than affection; and was ambitious, as some yet can witness, to be acquainted with a man with whom I had the honor to converse, and that almost daily, for so many years together. Heaven knows if I have heartily forgiven you this deceit. You extorted a praise which I should willingly have given, had I known you. Nothing had been more easy than to commend a patron of a long standing. The world would join with me, if the eucomiums were just; and, if unjust, would excuse a grateful flatterer. But to come anonymous upon me, and force me to commend you against my interest, was not altogether so fair, give me leave to say, as it was politic; for by concealing your quality, you might clearly understand how your work succeeded, and that the general approbation was given to your merit, not your titles. Thus, like Apelles, you stood unseen behind your own Venus, and receiv'd the praises of the passing multitude; the work was commended, not the author; and I doubt not this was one of the most pleasing adventures of your life.

I have detain'd your Lordship longer than I intended in this dispute of preference betwixt the epic poem and the drama, and yet have not formally answer'd any of the arguments which are brought by Aristotle on the other side, and set in the fairest light by Dacier. But I suppose, without looking on the book, I may have touch'd on some of the objections; for, in this address to your Lordship, I design not a treatise of heroic poetry, but write in a loose epistolary way, somewhat tending to that subject, after the example of Horace, in his First Epistle of the Second Book, to Augustus Cæsar, and of that to the Pisos, which we call his Art of Poetry; in both of which he observes no method that I can trace, whatever Scaliger the Father or Heinsius may have seen, or rather think they had seen. I have taken up, laid down, and resum'd as often as I pleas'd, the same subject; and this loose proceeding I shall use thro' all this prefatory dedication. Yet all this while I have been sailing with some side wind or other toward the point I propos'd in the beginning, the greatness and excellency of an heroic poem, with some of the difficulties which attend that work. The comparison, therefore, which I made betwixt the epos and the tragedy was not altogether a digression; for 'tis concluded on all hands that they are both the masterpieces of human wit.

In the mean time, I may be bold to draw this corollary from what has been already said, that the file of heroic poets is very short; all are not such who have assum'd that lofty title in ancient or modern ages, or have been so esteem'd by their partial and ignorant admirers.

There have been but one great Ilias, and one Æneis, in so many ages. The next, but the next with a long interval betwixt, was the Jerusalem: I mean not so much in distance of time, as in excellency. After these three are enter'd, some Lord Chamberlain should be appointed, some critic of authority should be set before the door, to keep out a crowd of little poets, who press for admission, and are not of quality. Mævius would be deaf'ning your Lordship's ears with his

Fortunam Priami cantabo, et nobile bellum — mere fustian, as Horace would tell you from behind, without pressing forward, and more smoke than fire. Pulci, Boiardo, and Ariosto would cry out: "Make room for the Italian poets, the descendants of Virgil in a right line." Father Le Moine, with his Saint Louis; and Seudéry with his Alaric: "for a godly king and a Gothic conqueror;" and Chapelain would take it ill that his Mail should be refus'd a place with Helen and Lavinia. Spenser has a better plea for his Fairy Queen, had his action been finish'd, or had been one; and Milton, if the Devil had not been his hero, instead of Adam; if the giant had not foil'd the knight, and driven him out of his stronghold, to wander thro' the world with his lady errant; and if there had not been more machining persons than human in his poem. After these, the rest of our English poets shall not be mention'd. I have that honor for them which I ought to have; but, if they are worthies, they are not to be rank'd amongst the three whom I have nam'd, and who are establish'd in their reputation.

Before I quitted the comparison betwixt epic poetry and tragedy, I should have acquainted my judge with one advantage of the former over the latter, which I now casually remember out of the preface of Segrais before his translation of the Æneis, or out of Bossu, no matter which. The style of the heroic poem is, and ought to be, more lofty than that of the drama. The critic is certainly in the right, for the reason already urg'd; the work of tragedy is on the passions, and in dialogue; both of them abhor strong metaphors, in which the epos delights. A poet cannot speak too plainly on the stage: for volat irrevocabile verbum; the sense is lost, if it be not taken flying; but what we read alone, we have leisure to digest. There an author may beautify his sense by the boldness of his expression, which if we understand not fully at the first, we may dwell upon it till we find the secret force and excellence. That which cures the manners by alterative physic, as I said before, must proceed by insensible degrees; but that which purges the passions must do its business all at once, or wholly fail of its effect, at least in the present operation, and without repeated doses. We must beat the iron while 't is hot, but we may polish it at leisure. Thus, my Lord, you pay the fine of my forgetfulness; and yet the merits of both causes are where they were, and undecided, till you declare whether it be more for the benefit of mankind to have their manners in general corrected, or their pride and hard-heartedness remov'd.

I must now come closer to my present business, and not think of making more invasive wars abroad, when, like Hannibal, I am call'd back to the defense of my own country. Virgil is attack'd by many enemies; he has a whole confederacy against him; and I must endeavor to defend him as well as I am able. But their principal objections being against his moral, the duration or length of time taken up in the action of the poem, and what they have to urge against the manners of his hero, I shall omit the rest as mere cavils of grammarians; at the worst, but casual slips of a great man's pen, or inconsiderable faults of an admirable poem, which the author had not leisure to review before his death. Macrobius has answer'd what the ancients could urge against him; and some things I have lately read in Tanneguy le Fèvre, Valois, and another whom I name not, which are scarce worth answering. They begin with the moral of his poem, which I have elsewhere confess'd, and still must own, not to be so noble as that of Homer. But let both be fairly stated; and, without contradicting my first opinion, I can shew that Virgil's was as useful to the Romans of his age, as Homer's was to the Grecians of his, in what time soever he may be suppos'd to have liv'd and flourish'd. Homer's moral was to urge the necessity of union, and of a good understanding betwixt confederate states and princes engag'd in a war with a mighty monarch; as also of discipline in an army, and obedience in the several chiefs to the supreme commander of the joint forces. To inculcate this, he sets forth the ruinous effects of discord in the camp of those allies, occasion'd by the quarrel betwixt the general and one of the next in office under him. Agamemnon gives the provocation, and Achilles resents the injury. Both parties are faulty in the quarrel, and accordingly they are both punish'd: the aggressor is forc'd to sue for peace to his inferior on dishonorable conditions; the deserter refuses the satisfaction offer'd, and his obstinacy costs him his best friend. This works the natural effect of choler, and turns his rage against him by whom he was last affronted, and most sensibly. The greater anger expels the less; but his character is still preserv'd. In the mean time, the Grecian army receives loss on loss, and is half destroy'd by a pestilence into the bargain:

Quicquid delirant reges, plectuntur Achivi.

As the poet, in the first part of the example, had shewn the bad effects of discord, so, after the reconciliation, he gives the good effects of unity; for Hector is slain, and then Troy must fall. By this 't is probable that Homer liv'd when the Median monarchy was grown formidable to the Grecians, and that the joint endeavors of his countrymen were little enough to preserve their common freedom from an encroaching enemy. Such was his moral, which all critics have allow'd to be more noble than that of Virgil, tho' not adapted to the times in which the Roman poet liv'd. Had Virgil flourish'd in the age of Ennius, and address'd to Scipio, he had probably taken the same moral, or some other not unlike it. For then the Romans were in as much danger from the Carthaginian commonwealth as the Grecians were from the Assyrian or Median monarchy. But we are to consider him as writing his poem in a time when the old form of government was subverted, and a new one just establish'd by Octavius Cæsar, in effect by force of arms, but seemingly by the consent of the Roman people. The commonwealth had receiv'd a deadly wound in the former civil wars betwixt Marius and Sylla. The commons, while the first prevail'd, had almost shaken off the yoke of the nobility; and Marius and Cinna, like the captains of the mob, under the specious pretense of the public good, and of doing justice on the oppressors of their liberty, reveng'd themselves, without form of law, on their private enemies. Sylla, in his turn, proserib'd the heads of the adverse party: he too had nothing but liberty and reformation in his mouth; for the cause of religion is but a modern motive to rebellion, invented by the Christian priesthood, refining on the heathen. Sylla, to be sure, meant no more good to the Roman people than Marius before him, whatever he declar'd; but sacrific'd the lives and took the estates of all his enemies, to gratify those who brought him into power.

Such was the reformation of the government by both parties. The senate and the commons were the two bases on which it stood, and the two champions of either faction each destroy'd the foundations of the other side; so the fabric, of consequence, must fall betwixt them, and tyranny must be built upon their ruins. This comes of altering fundamental laws and constitutions; like him, who, being in good health, lodg'd himself in a physician's house, and was overpersuaded by his landlord to take physic, of which he died, for the benefit of his doctor. Stavo ben; (was written on his monument,) ma, per star meglio, sto qui.

After the death of those two usurpers, the commonwealth seem'd to recover, and held up its head for a little time. But it was all the while in a deep consumption, which is a flattering disease. Pompey, Crassus, and Cæsar had found the sweets of arbitrary power; and, each being a check to the other's growth, struck up a false friendship amongst themselves, and divided the government betwixt them, which none of them was able to assume alone. These were the public-spirited men of their age; that is, patriots for their own interest. The commonwealth look'd with a florid countenance in their management, spread in bulk, and all the while was wasting in the vitals. Not to trouble your Lordship with the repetition of what you know: after the death of Crassus, Pompey found himself outwitted by Cæsar, broke with him, overpower'd him in the senate, and caus'd many unjust decrees to pass against him. Cæsar, thus injur'd, and unable to resist the faction of the nobles, which was now uppermost, (for he was a Marian,) had recourse to arms; and his cause was just against Pompey, but not against his country, whose constitution ought to have been sacred to him, and never to have been violated on the account of any private wrong. But he prevail'd; and, Heav'n declaring for him, he became a providential monarch, under the title of perpetual dictator. He being murder'd by his own son, whom I neither dare commend, nor can justly blame, (tho' Dante, in his Inferno, has put him and Cassius, and Judas Iscariot betwixt them, into the great devil's mouth,) the commonwealth popp'd up its head for the third time, under Brutus and Cassius, and then sunk for ever.

Thus the Roman people were grossly gull'd, twice or thrice over, and as often enslav'd in one century, and under the same pretense of reformation. At last the two battles of Philippi gave the decisive stroke against liberty; and, not long after, the commonwealth was turn'd into a monarchy by the conduct and good fortune of Augustus. 'Tis true that the despotic power could not have fallen into better hands than those of the first and second Cæsar. Your Lordship well knows what obligations Virgil had to the latter of them: he saw, beside, that the commonwealth was lost without resource; the heads of it destroy'd; the senate, new molded, grown degenerate, and either bought off, or thrusting their own necks into the yoke, out of fear of being forc'd. Yet I may safely affirm for our great author, (as men of good sense are generally honest,) that he was still of republican principles in heart.

Secretisque piis, his dantem jura Catonem.

I think I need use no other argument to justify my opinion, than that of this one line, taken from the Eighth Book of the Æneis. If he had not well studied his patron's temper, it might have ruin'd him with another prince. But Augustus was not discontented, at least that we can find, that Cato was plac'd, by his own poet, in Elysium, and there giving laws to the holy souls who deserv'd to be separated from the vulgar sort of good spirits. For his conscience could not but whisper to the arbitrary monarch, that the kings of Rome were at first elective, and govern'd not without a senate; that Romulus was no hereditary prince; and tho', after his death, he receiv'd divine honors for the good he did on earth, yet he was but a god of their own making; that the last Tarquin was expell'd justly, for overt acts of tyranny and maladministration; for such are the conditions of an elective kingdom: and I meddle not with others, being, for my own opinion, of Montaigne's principles, that an honest man ought to be contented with that form of government, and with those fundamental constitutions of it, which he receiv'd from his ancestors, and under which himself was born; tho' at the same time he confess'd freely, that if he could have chosen his place of birth, it should have been at Venice; which, for many reasons, I dislike, and am better pleas'd to have been born an Englishman.

But, to return from my long rambling, I say that Virgil, having maturely weigh'd the condition of the times in which he liv'd; that an entire liberty was not to be retriev'd; that the present settlement had the prospect of a long continuance in the same family, or those adopted into it; that he held his paternal estate from the bounty of the conqueror, by whom he was likewise enrich'd, esteem'd, and cherish'd; that this conqueror, tho' of a bad kind, was the very best of it; that the arts of peace flourish'd under him; that all men might be happy, if they would be quiet; that, now he was in possession of the whole, yet he shar'd a great part of his authority with the senate; that he would be chosen into the ancient offices of the commonwealth, and rul'd by the power which he deriv'd from them, and prorogued his government from time to time, still, as it were, threat'ning to dismiss himself from public cares, which he exercis'd more for the common good than for any delight he took in greatness—these things, I say, being consider'd by the poet, he concluded it to be the interest of his country to be so govern'd; to infuse an awful respect into the people towards such a prince; by that respect to confirm their obedience to him, and by that obedience to make them happy. This was the moral of his divine poem; honest in the poet; honorable to the emperor, whom he derives from a divine extraction; and reflecting part of that honor on the Roman people, whom he derives also from the Trojans; and not only profitable, but necessary, to the present age, and likely to be such to their posterity. That it was the receiv'd opinion that the Romans were descended from the Trojans, and Julius Cæsar from Julius the son of Æneas, was enough for Virgil; tho' perhaps he thought not so himself, or that Æneas ever was in Italy; which Bochartus manifestly proves. And Homer, where he says that Jupiter hated the house of Priam, and was resolv'd to transfer the kingdom to the family of Æneas, yet mentions nothing of his leading a colony into a foreign country and settling there. But that the Romans valued themselves on their Trojan ancestry is so undoubted a truth that I need not prove it. Even the seals which we have remaining of Julius Cæsar, which we know to be antique, have the star of Venus over them, tho' they were all graven after his death, as a note that he was deified. I doubt not but it was one reason why Augustus should be so passionately concern'd for the preservation of the Æneis, which its author had condemn'd to be burnt, as an imperfect poem, by his last will and testament; was because it did him a real service, as well as an honor; that a work should not be lost where his divine original was celebrated in verse which had the character of immortality stamp'd upon it.

Neither were the great Roman families which flourish'd in his time less oblig'd by him than the emperor. Your Lordship knows with what address he makes mention of them, as captains of ships, or leaders in the war; and even some of Italian extraction are not forgotten. These are the single stars which are sprinkled thro' the Æneis; but there are whole constellations of them in the Fifth Book. And I could not but take notice, when I translated it, of some favorite families to which he gives the victory and awards the prizes, in the person of his hero, at the funeral games which were celebrated in honor of Anchises. I insist not on their names; but am pleas'd to find the Memmii amongst them, deriv'd from Mnesteus, because Lucretius dedicates to one of that family, a branch of which destroy'd Corinth. I likewise either found or form'd an image to myself of the contrary kind; that those who lost the prizes were such as had disoblig'd the poet, or were in disgrace with Augustus, or enemies to Mæcenas; and this was the poetical revenge he took. For genus irritabile vatum, as Horace says. When a poet is thoroughly provok'd, he will do himself justice, however dear it cost him; animamque in vulnere ponit. I think these are not bare imaginations of my own, tho' I find no trace of them in the commentators; but one poet may judge of another by himself. The vengeance we defer is not forgotten. I hinted before that the whole Roman people were oblig'd by Virgil, in deriving them from Troy; an ancestry which they affected. We and the French are of the same humor: they would be thought to descend from a son, I think, of Hector; and we would have our Britain both nam'd and planted by a descendant of Æneas. Spenser favors this opinion what he can. His Prince Arthur, or whoever he intends by him, is a Trojan. Thus the hero of Homer was a Grecian, of Virgil a Roman, of Tasso an Italian.

I have transgress'd my bounds, and gone farther than the moral led me. But, if your Lordship is not tir'd, I am safe enough.

Thus far, I think, my author is defended. But, as Augustus is still shadow'd in the person of Æneas, (of which I shall say more when I come to the manners which the poet gives his hero,) I must prepare that subject by shewing how dextrously he manag'd both the prince and people, so as to displease neither, and to do good to both; which is the part of a wise and an honest man, and proves that it is possible for a courtier not to be a knave. I shall continue still to speak my thoughts like a free-born subject, as I am; tho' such things, perhaps, as no Dutch commentator could, and I am sure no Frenchman durst. I have already told your Lordship my opinion of Virgil, that he was no arbitrary man. Oblig'd he was to his master for his bounty; and he repays him with good counsel, how to behave himself in his new monarchy, so as to gain the affections of his subjects, and deserve to be call'd the father of his country. From this consideration it is that he chose, for the groundwork of his poem, one empire destroy'd, and another rais'd from the ruins of it. This was just the parallel. Æneas could not pretend to be Priam's heir in a lineal succession; for Anchises, the hero's father, was only of the second branch of the royal family; and Helenus, a son of Priam, was yet surviving, and might lawfully claim before him. It may be Virgil mentions him on that account. Neither has he forgotten Priamus, in the Fifth of his Æneis, the son of Polites, youngest son to Priam, who was slain by Pyrrhus, in the Second Book. Æneas had only married Creïssa, Priam's daughter, and by her could have no title while any of the male issue were remaining. In this case the poet gave him the next title, which is that of an elective king. The remaining Trojans chose him to lead them forth, and settle them in some foreign country. Ilieneus, in his speech to Dido, calls him expressly by the name of king. Our poet, who all this while had Augustus in his eye, had no desire he should seem to succeed by any right of inheritance deriv'd from Julius Cæsar, (such a title being but one degree remov'd from conquest,) for what was introduc'd by force, by force may be remov'd. 'Twas better for the people that they should give, than he should take; since that gift was indeed no more at bottom than a trust. Virgil gives us an example of this in the person of Mezentius: he govern'd arbitrarily; he was expell'd, and came to the deserv'd end of all tyrants. Our author shews us another sort of kingship, in the person of Latinus. He was descended from Saturn, and, as I remember, in the third degree. He is describ'd a just and a gracious prince, solicitous for the welfare of his people, always consulting with his senate to promote the common good. We find him at the head of them, when he enters into the council hall, speaking first, but still demanding their advice, and steering by it, as far as the iniquity of the times would suffer him. And this is the proper character of a king by inheritance, who is born a father of his country. Æneas, tho' he married the heiress of the crown, yet claim'd no title to it during the life of his father-in-law. Pater arma Latinus habeto, &c., are Virgil's words. As for himself, he was contented to take care of his country gods, who were not those of Latium; wherein our divine author seems to relate to the after-practice of the Romans, which was to adopt the gods of those they conquer'd, or receiv'd as members of their commonwealth. Yet, withal, he plainly touches at the office of the high-priesthood, with which Augustus was invested, and which made his person more sacred and inviolable than even the tribunitial power. It was not therefore for nothing that the most judicious of all poets made that office vacant by the death of Panthus in the Second Book of the Æneis, for his hero to succeed in it, and consequently for Augustus to enjoy. I know not that any of the commentators have taken notice of that passage. If they have not, I am sure they ought; and if they have, I am not indebted to them for the observation. The words of Virgil are very plain:

Sacra, suosque tibi commendat Troja penates.

As for Augustus, or his uncle Julius, claiming by descent from Æneas, that title is already out of doors. Æneas succeeded not, but was elected. Troy was foredoom'd to fall for ever:

Postquam res Asiæ Priamique evertere regnum Immeritum visum superis.

— Æneis, lib. iii, lin. 1.

Augustus, 'tis true, had once resolv'd to rebuild that city, and there to make the seat of empire; but Horace writes an ode on purpose to deter him from that thought, declaring the place to be accurst, and that the gods would as often destroy it as it should be rais'd. Hereupon the emperor laid aside a project so ungrateful to the Roman people. But by this, my Lord, we may conclude that he had still his pedigree in his head, and had an itch of being thought a divine king, if his poets had not given him better counsel.

I will pass by many less material objections, for want of room to answer them: what follows next is of great importance, if the critics can make out their charge; for 'tis level'd at the manners which our poet gives his hero, and which are the same which were eminently seen in his Augustus. Those manners were piety to the gods and a dutiful affection to his father, love to his relations, care of his people, courage and conduct in the wars, gratitude to those who had oblig'd him, and justice in general to mankind.

Piety, as your Lordship sees, takes place of all, as the chief part of his character; and the word in Latin is more full than it can possibly be express'd in any modern language; for there it comprehends not only devotion to the gods, but filial love and tender affection to relations of all sorts. As instances of this, the deities of Troy and his own Penates are made the companions of his flight: they appear to him in his voyage, and advise him; and at last he replaces them in Italy, their native country. For his father, he takes him on his back; he leads his little son; his wife follows him; but, losing his footsteps thro' fear or ignorance, he goes back into the midst of his enemies to find her, and leaves not his pursuit till her ghost appears, to forbid his farther search. I will say nothing of his duty to his father while he liv'd, his sorrow for his death, of the games

instituted in honor of his memory, or seeking him, by his command, even after death, in the Elysian fields. I will not mention his tenderness for his son, which everywhere is visible — of his raising a tomb for Polydorus, the obsequies for Misenus, his pious remembrance of Deiphobus, the funerals of his nurse, his grief for Pallas, and his revenge taken on his murderer, whom otherwise, by his natural compassion, he had forgiven: and then the poem had been left imperfect; for we could have had no certain prospect of his happiness, while the last obstacle to it was unremov'd. Of the other parts which compose his character, as a king or as a general, I need say nothing; the whole Æneis is one continued instance of some one or other of them; and where I find anything of them tax'd, it shall suffice me, as briefly as I can, to vindicate my divine master to your Lordship, and by you to the reader. But herein Segrain, in his admirable preface to his translation of the Æneis, as the author of the Dauphin's Virgil justly calls it, has prevented me. Him I follow, and what I borrow from him, am ready to acknowledge to him. For, impartially speaking, the French are as much better critics than the English, as they are worse poets. Thus we generally allow that they better understand the management of a war than our islanders; but we know we are superior to them in the day of battle. They value themselves on their generals, we on our soldiers. But this is not the proper place to decide that question, if they make it one. I shall say perhaps as much of other nations and their poets, excepting only Tasso; and hope to make my assertion good, which is but doing justice to my country; part of which honor will reflect on your Lordship, whose thoughts are always just; your numbers harmonious, your words chosen, your expressions strong and manly, your verse flowing, and your turns as happy as they are easy. If you would set us more copies, your example would make all precepts needless. In the mean time, that little you have written is own'd, and that particularly by the poets, (who are a nation not over lavish of praise to their contemporaries,) as a principal ornament of our language; but the sweetest essences are always confin'd in the smallest glasses.

When I speak of your Lordship, 'tis never a digression, and therefore I need beg no pardon for it; but take up Segrais where I left him, and shall use him less often than I have occasion for him; for his preface is a perfect piece of criticism, full and clear, and digested into an exact method; mine is loose, and, as I intended it, epistolary. Yet I dwell on many things which he durst not touch; for 't is dangerous to offend an arbitrary master, and every patron who has the power of Augustus has not his clemency. In short, my Lord, I would not translate him, because I would bring you somewhat of my own. His notes and observations on every book are of the same excellency; and, for the same reason, I omit the greater part.

He takes notice that Virgil is arraign'd for placing piety before valor, and making that piety the chief character of his hero. I have said already from Bossu, that a poet is not oblig'd to make his hero a virtuous man; therefore, neither Homer nor Tasso are to be blam'd for giving what predominant quality they pleas'd to their first character. But Virgil, who design'd to form a perfect prince, and would insinuate that Augustus, whom he calls Æneas in his poem, was truly such, found himself oblig'd to make him without blemish, thoroughly virtuous; and a thorough virtue both begins and ends in piety. Tasso, without question, observ'd this before me, and therefore split his hero in two; he gave Godfrey piety, and Rinaldo fortitude, for their chief qualities or manners. Homer, who had chosen another moral, makes both Agamemnon and Achilles vicious; for his design was to instruct in virtue by shewing the deformity of vice. I avoid repetition of that I have said above. What follows is translated literally from Segrais:

"Virgil had consider'd that the greatest virtues of Augustus consisted in the perfect art of governing his people; which caus'd him to reign for more than forty years in great felicity. He consider'd that his emperor was valiant, civil, popular, eloquent, politic, and religious; he has given all these qualities to Æneas. But, knowing that piety alone comprehends the whole duty of man towards the gods, towards his country, and towards his relations, he judg'd that this ought to be his first character, whom he would set for a pattern of perfection. In reality, they who believe that the praises which arise from valor are superior to those which proceed from any other virtues, have not consider'd (as they ought) that valor, destitute of other virtues, cannot render a man worthy of any true esteem. That quality, which signifies no more than an intrepid courage, may be separated from many others which are good, and accompanied with many which are ill. A man may be very valiant, and yet impious and vicious. But the same cannot be said of piety, which excludes all ill qualities, and comprehends even valor itself, with all other qualities which are good. Can we, for example, give the praise of valor to a man who should see his gods profan'd, and should want the courage to defend them? To a man who should abandon his father, or desert his king in his last necessity?"

Thus far Segrais, in giving the preference to piety before valor. I will now follow him, where he considers this valor, or intrepid courage, singly in itself; and this also Virgil gives to his Æneas, and that in a heroical degree.

Having first concluded that our poet did for the best in taking the first character of his hero from that essential virtue on which the rest depend, he proceeds to tell us that in the ten years' war of Troy he was consider'd as the second champion of his country (allowing Hector the first place); and this, even by the confession of Homer, who took all occasions of setting up his own countrymen the Grecians, and of undervaluing the Trojan chiefs. But Virgil (whom Segrais forgot to cite) makes Diomede give him a higher character for strength and courage. His testimony is this, in the Eleventh Book:

— *Stetimus tela aspera contra,
Contulimusque manus: experto credite, quantus
In clypeum assurgat, quo turbine torqueat hastam.
Si duo præterea tales Idæa tulisset
Terra viros, ultro Inachias venisset ad urbes
Dardanus, et versis lugeret Græcia fati.
Quicquid apud dure cessatum est mœnia Trojæ,
Hectoris Æneæque manu victoria Graium
Hæsit, et in decumum vestigia retulit annum.
Ambo animis, ambo insignes præstantibus armis:
Hic pietate prior.* —

I give not here my translation of these verses, (tho' I think I have not ill succeeded in them,) because your Lordship is so great a master of the original that I have no reason to desire you should see Virgil and me so near together. But you may please, my Lord, to take notice that the Latin author refines upon the Greek, and insinuates that Homer had done his hero wrong in giving the advantage of the duel to his own countryman; tho' Diomedes was manifestly the second champion of the Grecians; and Ulysses preferr'd him before Ajax, when he chose him for the companion of his nightly expedition; for he had a headpiece of his own, and wanted only the fortitude of another to bring him off with safety, and that he might compass his design with honor.

The French translator thus proceeds: "They who accuse Æneas for want of courage, either understand not Virgil, or have read him slightly; otherwise they would not raise an objection so easy to be answer'd." Hereupon he gives so many instances of the hero's valor, that to repeat them after him would tire your Lordship, and put me to the unnecessary trouble of transcribing the greatest part of the three last Æneids. In short, more could not be expected from an Amadis, a Sir Lancelot, or the whole Round Table, than he performs. Proxima quæque metit gladio, is the perfect account of a knight-errant. "If it be replied," continues Segrais, "that it was not difficult for him to undertake and achieve such hardy enterprises, because he wore enchanted armor; that accusation, in the first place, must fall on Homer, ere it can reach Virgil." Achilles was as well provided with them as Æneas, tho' he was invulnerable without them. And Ariosto, the two Tassos (Bernardo and Torquato), even our own Spenser, in a word, all modern poets, have copied Homer as well as Virgil: he is neither the first nor last, but in the midst of them; and therefore is safe, if they are so. "Who knows," says Segrais, "but that his fated armor was only an allegorical defense, and signified no more than that he was under the peculiar protection of the gods? — born, as the astrologers will tell us out of Virgil, (who was well vers'd in the Chaldean mysteries,) under the favorable influence of Jupiter, Venus, and the Sun." But I insist not on this, because I know you believe not there is such an art; tho' not only Horace and Persius, but Augustus himself, thought otherwise. But, in defense of Virgil, I dare positively say that he has been more cautious in this particular than either his predecessor or his descendants; for Æneas was actually wounded in the Twelfth of the Æneis, tho' he had the same godsmith to forge his arms as had Achilles. It seems he was no warluck, as the Scots commonly call such men, who, they say, are iron-free, or lead-free. Yet, after this experiment that his arms were not impenetrable, when he was cur'd indeed by his mother's help, because he was that day to conclude the war by the death of Turnus, the poet durst not carry the miracle too far, and restore him wholly to his former vigor: he was still too weak to overtake his enemy; yet we see with what courage he attacks Turnus, when he faces and renews the combat. I need say no more; for Virgil defends himself without needing my assistance, and proves his hero truly to deserve that name. He was not then a second-rate champion, as they would have him who think fortitude the first virtue in a hero. But, being beaten from this hold, they will not yet allow him to be valiant, because he wept more often, as they think, than well becomes a man of courage.

In the first place, if tears are arguments of cowardice, what shall I say of Homer's hero? Shall Achilles pass for timorous because he wept, and wept on less occasions than Æneas? Herein Virgil must be granted to have excell'd his master. For once both heroes are describ'd lamenting their lost loves: Briseis was taken away by force from the Grecian; Creusa was lost for ever to her husband. But Achilles went roaring along the salt sea-shore, and, like a booby, was complaining to his mother, when he should have reveng'd his injury by arms. Æneas took a nobler course; for, having secur'd his father and his son, he repeated all his former dangers to have found his wife, if she had been above ground. And here your Lordship may observe the address of Virgil; it was not for nothing that this passage was related with all these tender circumstances. Æneas told it; Dido heard it. That he had been so affectionate a husband was no ill argument to the coming dowager that he might prove as kind to her. Virgil has a thousand secret beauties, tho' I have not leisure to remark them.

Segrais, on this subject of a hero's shedding tears, observes that historians commend Alexander for weeping when he read the mighty actions of Achilles; and Julius Cæsar is likewise prais'd, when, out of the same noble envy, he wept at the victories of Alexander. But, if we observe more closely, we shall find that the tears of Æneas were always on a laudable occasion. Thus he weeps out of compassion and tenderness of nature, when, in the temple of Carthage, he beholds the pictures of his friends, who sacrific'd their lives in defense of their country. He deplores the lamentable end of his pilot Palinurus, the untimely death of young Pallas his confederate, and the rest, which I omit. Yet, even for these tears, his wretched critics dare condemn him. They make Æneas little better than a kind of St. Swithen hero, always raining. One of these censors is bold enough to argue him of cowardice, when, in the beginning of the First Book, he not only weeps, but trembles at an approaching storm:

*Extemplo Ænere solvuntur frigore membra :
Ingemit, et duplices tendens ad sidera palmas, &c.*

But to this I have answer'd formerly, that his fear was not for himself, but for his people. And who can give a sovereign a better commendation, or recommend a hero more to the affection of the reader? They were threaten'd with a tempest, and he wept; he was promis'd Italy, and therefore he pray'd for the accomplishment of that promise. All this in the beginning of a storm; therefore he shew'd the more early piety, and the quicker sense of compassion. Thus much I have urg'd elsewhere in the defense of Virgil; and, since, I have been inform'd by Mr. Moyle, a young gentleman whom I can never sufficiently commend, that the ancients accounted drowning an accursed death; so that, if we grant him to have been afraid, he had just occasion for that fear, both in relation to himself and to his subjects. I think our adversaries can carry this argument no farther, unless they tell us that he ought to have had more confidence in the promise of the gods. But how was he assur'd that he had understood their oracles aright? Helenus might be mistaken; Phœbus might speak doubtfully; even his mother might flatter him that he might prosecute his voyage, which if it succeeded happily, he should be the founder of an empire. For that she herself was doubtful of his fortune is apparent by the address she made to Jupiter on his behalf; to which the god makes answer in these words:

Parce metu, Cytherea : manent immota tuorum Fata tibi, &c.

notwithstanding which, the goddess, tho' comforted, was not assur'd; for even after this, thro' the course of the whole Æneis, she still apprehends the interest which Juno might make with Jupiter against her son. For it was a moot point in heaven, whether he could alter fate, or not. And indeed some passages in Virgil would make us suspect that he was of opinion Jupiter might defer fate, tho' he could not alter it. For in the latter end of the Tenth Book he introduces Juno begging for the life of Turnus, and flattering her husband with the power of changing destiny — Tua, qui potes, orsa reflectas! To which he graciously answers:

*Si mora præsentis lethi, tempusque caduco
Oratur jureni, meque hoc ita ponere sentis,
Tolle fuga Turnum, atque instantibus eripe fati.
Hactenus indulsisse vacat. Sin altior istis
Sub precibus venia ulla latet, totumque moveri
Mutarive putas bellum, spes pascis inaneis.*

But that he could not alter those decrees, the King of Gods himself confesses, in the book above cited, when he comforts Hercules for the death of Pallas, who had invoked his aid before he threw his lance at Turnus:

— *Trojæ sub manibus altis
Tot nati cecidere deum : quin occidit una Sarpedon, mea progenies. Etiam sua Turnum Fata manent, mitasque dati pervenit ad ævi* —

where he plainly acknowledges that he could not save his own son, or prevent the death which he foresaw. Of his power to defer the blow I once occasionally discours'd with that excellent person Sir Robert Howard, who is better conversant than any man that I know in the doctrine of the Stoics; and he set me right, from the concurrent testimony of philosophers and poets, that Jupiter could not retard the effects of fate, even for a moment. For, when I cited Virgil as favoring the contrary opinion in that verse,

Tolle fuga Turnum, atque instantibus eripe fatis, &c.

he replied, and, I think, with exact judgment, that, when Jupiter gave Juno leave to withdraw Turnus from the present danger, it was because he certainly foreknew that his fatal hour was not come; that it was in destiny for Juno at that time to save him; and that himself obey'd destiny in giving her that leave.

I need say no more in justification of our hero's courage, and am much deceiv'd if he ever be attack'd on this side of his character again. But he is arraign'd with more shew of reason by the ladies, who will make a numerous party against him, for being false to love, in forsaking Dido. And I cannot much blame them; for, to say the truth, 't is an ill precedent for their gallants to follow. Yet, if I can bring him off with flying colors, they may learn experience at her cost, and, for her sake, avoid a cave, as the worst shelter they can choose from a shower of rain, especially when they have a lover in their company.

In the first place, Segrais observes with much acuteness that they who blame Æneas for his insensibility of love when he left Carthage, contradict their former accusation of him for being always crying, compassionate, and effeminately sensible of those misfortunes which befell others. They give him two contrary characters; but Virgil makes him of a piece, always grateful, always tender-hearted. But they are impudent enough to discharge themselves of this blunder, by laying the contradiction at Virgil's door. He, they say, has shewn his hero with these inconsistent characters, acknowledging and ungrateful, compassionate and hard-hearted, but, at the bottom, fickle and self-interested; for Dido had not only receiv'd his weather-beaten troops before she saw him, and given them her protection, but had also offer'd them an equal share in her dominion:

*Vultis et his mecum pariter considerare regnis?
Urbem quam statuo, vestra est.*

This was an obligation never to be forgotten; and the more to be consider'd, because antecedent to her love. That passion, 't is true, produc'd the usual effects, of generosity, gallantry, and care to please; and thither we refer them. But when she had made all these advances, it was still in his power to have refus'd them; after the intrigue of the cave (call it marriage, or enjoyment only) he was no longer free to take or leave; he had accepted the favor, and was oblig'd to be constant, if he would be grateful.

My Lord, I have set this argument in the best light I can, that the ladies may not think I write booty; and perhaps it may happen to me, as it did to Doctor Cudworth, who has rais'd such strong objections against the being of a God, and Providence, that many think he has not answer'd them. You may please at least to hear the adverse party. Segrais pleads for Virgil, that no less than an absolute command from Jupiter could excuse this insensibility of the hero, and this abrupt departure, which looks so like extreme ingratitude. But, at the same time, he does wisely to remember you, that Virgil had made piety the first character of Æneas; and, this being allow'd, (as I am afraid it must,) he was oblig'd, antecedent to all other considerations, to search an asylum for his gods in Italy — for those very gods, I say, who had promis'd to his race the universal empire. Could a pious man dispense with the commands of Jupiter, to satisfy his passion, or (take it in the strongest sense) to comply with the obligations of his gratitude? Religion, 't is true, must have moral honesty for its groundwork, or we shall be apt to suspect its truth; but an immediate revelation dispenses with all duties of morality. All casuists agree that theft is a breach of the moral law; yet, if I might presume to mingle things sacred with profane, the Israelites only spoil'd the Egyptians, not robb'd them, because the propriety was transferr'd by a revelation to their lawgiver. I confess Dido was a very infidel in this point; for she would not believe, as Virgil makes her say, that ever Jupiter would send Mercury on such an immoral errand. But this needs no answer, at least no more than Virgil gives it:

Fata obstant; placidasque viri deus obstruit aures.

This notwithstanding, as Segrais confesses, he might have shewn a little more sensibility when he left her; for that had been according to his character.

But let Virgil answer for himself. He still lov'd her, and struggled with his inclinations to obey the gods:

— *Curam sub corde premebat,
Multa gemens, magnoque animum labefactus amore.*

Upon the whole matter, and humanly speaking, I doubt there was a fault somewhere; and Jupiter is better able to bear the blame than either Virgil or Æneas. The poet, it seems, had found it out, and therefore brings the deserting hero and the forsaken lady to meet together in the lower regions, where he excuses himself when 't is too late; and accordingly she will take no satisfaction, nor so much as hear him. Now Segrais is forc'd to abandon his defense, and excuses his author by saying that the Æneis is an imperfect work, and that death prevented the divine poet from reviewing it; and for that reason he had condemn'd it to the fire; tho', at the same time, his two translators must acknowledge that the Sixth Book is the most correct of the whole Æneis. O, how convenient is a machine sometimes in a heroic poem! This of Mercury is plainly one; and Virgil was constrain'd to use it here, or the honesty of his hero would be ill defended. And the fair sex, however, if they had the deserter in their power, would certainly have shewn him no more mercy than the Bacchanals did Orpheus: for, if too much constancy may be a fault sometimes, then want of constancy, and ingratitude after the last favor, is a crime that never will be forgiven. But of machines, more in their proper place; where I shall shew with how much judgment they have been us'd by Virgil; and, in the mean time, pass to another article of his defense on the present subject; where, if I cannot clear the hero, I hope at least to bring off the poet; for here I must divide their causes. Let Æneas trust to his machine, which will only help to break his fall; but the address is incomparable. Plato, who borrow'd so much from Homer, and yet concluded for the banishment of all poets, would at least have rewarded Virgil before he sent him into exile. But I go farther, and say that he ought to be acquitted, and deserv'd, beside, the bounty of Augustus and the gratitude of the Roman people. If, after this, the ladies will stand out, let them remember that the jury is not all agreed; for Octavia was of his party, and was of the first quality in Rome; she was also present at the reading of the Sixth Æneid, and we know not that she condemn'd Æneas; but we are sure she presented the poet for his admirable elegy on her son Marcellus.

But let us consider the secret reasons which Virgil had for thus framing this noble episode, wherein the whole passion of love is more exactly describ'd than in any other poet. Love was the theme of his Fourth Book: and, tho' it is the shortest of the whole Æneis, yet there he has given its beginning, its progress, its traverses, and its conclusion; and had exhausted so entirely this subject, that he could resume it but very slightly in the eight ensuing books.

She was warm'd with the graceful appearance of the hero; she smother'd those sparkles out of decency; but conversation blew them up into a flame. Then she was forc'd to make a confidant of her whom she best might trust, her own sister, who approves the passion, and thereby augments it; then succeeds her public owning it; and, after that, the consummation. Of Venus and Juno, Jupiter and Mercury, I say nothing, for they were all machining work; but, possession having cool'd his love, as it increas'd hers, she soon perceiv'd the change, or at least grew suspicious of a change; this suspicion soon turn'd to jealousy, and jealousy to rage; then she disdains and threatens, and again is humble, and intreats, and, nothing availing, despairs, curses, and at last becomes her own executioner. See here the whole process of that passion, to which nothing can be added. I dare go no farther, lest I should lose the connection of my discourse.

To love our native country, and to study its benefit and its glory, to be interested in its concerns, is natural to all men, and is indeed our common duty. A poet makes a farther step; for, endeavoring to do honor to it, 't is allowable in him even to be partial in its cause; for he is not tied to truth, or fetter'd by the laws of history. Homer and Tasso are justly prais'd for choosing their heroes out of Greece and Italy; Virgil indeed made his a Trojan; but it was to derive the Romans and his own Augustus from him. But all the three poets are manifestly partial to their heroes, in favor of their country; for Dares Phrygius reports of Hector that he was slain cowardly: Æneas, according to the best account, slew not Mezentius, but was slain by him; and the chronicles of Italy tell us little of that Rinaldo d' Este who conquers Jerusalem in Tasso. He might be a champion of the Church; but we know not that he was so much as present at the siege. To apply this to Virgil, he thought himself engag'd in honor to espouse the cause and quarrel of his country against Carthage. He knew he could not please the Romans better, or oblige them more to patronize his poem, than by disgracing the foundress of that city. He shews her ungrateful to the memory of her first husband, doting on a stranger; enjoy'd, and afterwards forsaken by him. This was the original, says he, of the immortal hatred betwixt the two rival nations. 'Tis true, he colors the falsehood of Æneas by an express command from Jupiter, to forsake the queen who had oblig'd him; but he knew the Romans were to be his readers, and them he brib'd, perhaps at the expense of his hero's honesty; but he gain'd his cause, however, as pleading before corrupt judges. They were content to see their founder false to love, for still he had the advantage of the amour: it was their enemy whom he forsook, and she might have forsaken him, if he had not got the start of her: she had already forgotten her vows to her Sichæus; and varium et mutabile semper femina is the sharpest satire, in the fewest words, that ever was made on womankind; for both the adjectives are neuter, and animal must be understood, to make them grammar. Virgil does well to put those words into the mouth of Mercury. If a god had not spoken them, neither durst he have written them, nor I translated them. Yet the deity was forc'd to come twice on the same errand; and the second time, as much a hero as Æneas was, he frightened him. It seems he fear'd not Jupiter so much as Dido; for your Lordship may observe that, as much intent as he was upon his voyage, yet he still delay'd it, till the messenger was oblig'd to tell him plainly, that, if he weigh'd not anchor in the night, the queen would be with him in the morning. Notumque furens quid femina possit — she was injur'd; she was revengeful; she was powerful. The poet had likewise before hinted that her people were naturally perfidious; for he gives their character in their queen, and makes a proverb of Punica fides, many ages before it was invented.

Thus I hope, my Lord, that I have made good my promise, and justified the poet, whatever becomes of the false knight. And sure a poet is as much privileg'd to lie as an ambassador, for the honor and interest of his country; at least as Sir Henry Wotton has defin'd.

This naturally leads me to the defense of the famous anachronism, in making Æneas and Dido contemporaries; for 't is certain that the hero liv'd almost two hundred years before the building of Carthage. One who imitates Bocaline says that Virgil was accus'd before Apollo for this error. The god soon found that he was not able to defend his favorite by reason, for the case was clear: he therefore gave this middle sentence, that anything might be allow'd to his son Virgil, on the account of his other merits; that, being a monarch, he had a dispensing power, and pardon'd him. But, that this special act of grace might never be drawn into example, or pleaded by his puny successors in justification of their ignorance, he decreed for the future, no poet should presume to make a lady die for love two hundred years before her birth. To moralize this story, Virgil is the Apollo who has this dispensing power. His great judgment made the laws of poetry; but he never made himself a slave to them: chronology, at best, is but a cobweb law, and he broke thro' it with his weight. They who will imitate him wisely must choose, as he did, an obscure and a remote era, where they may invent at pleasure, and not be easily contradicted. Neither he, nor the Romans, had ever read the Bible, by which only his false computation of times can be made out against him. This Segrain says in his defense, and proves it from his learned friend Bochartus, whose letter on this subject he has printed at the end of the Fourth Æneid, to which I refer your Lordship and the reader. Yet the credit of Virgil was so great that he made this fable of his own invention pass for an authentic history, or at least as credible as anything in Homer. Ovid takes it up after him, even in the same age, and makes an ancient heroine of Virgil's new-created Dido; dictates a letter for her, just before her death, to the ingrateful fugitive; and, very unluckily for himself, is for measuring a sword with a man so much superior in force to him, on the same subject. I think I may be judge of this, because I have translated both. The famous author of the Art of Love has nothing of his own; he borrows all from a greater master in his own profession; and, which is worse, improves nothing which he finds. Nature fails him; and, being forc'd to his old shift, he has recourse to witticism. This passes indeed with his soft admirers, and gives him the preference to Virgil in their esteem. But let them like for themselves, and not prescribe to others; for our author needs not their admiration.

The motives that induc'd Virgil to coin this fable I have shew'd already; and have also begun to shew that he might make this anachronism by superseding the mechanic rules of poetry, for the same reason that a monarch may dispense with or suspend his own laws, when he finds it necessary so to do, especially if those laws are not altogether fundamental. Nothing is to be call'd a fault in poetry, says Aristotle, but what is against the art; therefore a man may be an admirable poet without being an exact chronologer. Shall we dare, continues Segrais, to condemn Virgil for having made a fiction against the order of time, when we commend Ovid and other poets who have made many of their fictions against the order of nature? For what else are the splendid miracles of the Metamorphoses? Yet these are beautiful as they are related, and have also deep learning and instructive mythologies couch'd under them; but to give, as Virgil does in this episode, the original cause of the long wars betwixt Rome and Carthage, to draw truth out of fiction after so probable a manner, with so much beauty, and so much for the honor of his country, was proper only to the divine wit of Maro; and Tasso, in one of his discourses, admires him for this particularly. 'Tis not lawful, indeed, to contradict a point of history which is known to all the world, as, for example, to make Hannibal and Scipio contemporaries with Alexander; but, in the dark recesses of antiquity, a great poet may and ought to feign such things as he finds not there, if they can be brought to embellish that subject which he treats. On the other side, the pains and diligence of ill poets is but thrown away when they want the genius to invent and feign agreeably. But if the fictions be delightful; (which they always are, if they be natural;) if they be of a piece; if the beginning, the middle, and the end be in their due places, and artfully united to each other, such works can never fail of their deserv'd success. And such is Virgil's episode of Dido and Æneas; where the sourest critic must acknowledge that, if he had depriv'd his Æneis of so great an ornament because he found no traces of it in antiquity, he had avoided their unjust censure, but had wanted one of the greatest beauties of his poem. I shall say more of this in the next article of their charge against him, which is want of invention. In the mean time I may affirm, in honor of this episode, that it is not only now esteem'd the most pleasing entertainment of the Æneis, but was so accounted in his own age, and before it was mellow'd into that reputation which time has given it; for which I need produce no other testimony than that of Ovid, his contemporary:

Quam non legitimo fiedere junctus amor.*

Where, by the way, you may observe, my Lord, that Ovid, in those words, non legitimo fiedere junctus amor, will by no means allow it to be a lawful marriage betwixt Dido and Æneas. He was in banishment when he wrote those verses, which I cite from his letter to Augustus: "You, sir," saith he, "have sent me into exile for writing my Art of Love, and my wanton Elegies; yet your own poet was happy in your good graces, tho' he brought Dido and Æneas into a cave, and left them there not over honestly together. May I be so bold to ask your Majesty, is it a greater fault to teach the art of unlawful love, than to shew it in the action?" But was Ovid, the court poet, so bad a courtier as to find no other plea to excuse himself than by a plain accusation of his master? Virgil confess'd it was a lawful marriage betwixt the lovers, that Juno, the goddess of matrimony, had ratified it by her presence; for it was her business to bring matters to that issue. That the ceremonies were short, we may believe; for Dido was not only amorous, but a widow. Mercury himself, tho' employ'd on a quite contrary errand, yet owns it a marriage by an innuendo: pulchramque uxori urbem Exstruis. He calls Æneas not only a husband, but upbraids him for being a fond husband, as the word uxorius implies. Now mark a little, if your Lordship pleases, why Virgil is so much concern'd to make this marriage (for he seems to be the father of the bride himself, and to give her to the bridegroom): it was to make way for the divorce which he intended afterwards; for he was a finer flatterer than Ovid, and I more than conjecture that he had in his eye the divorce which not long before had pass'd betwixt the emperor and Scribonia. He drew this dimple in the cheek of Æneas, to prove Augustus of the same family, by so remarkable a feature in the same place. Thus, as we say in our homespun English proverb, he kill'd two birds with one stone; pleas'd the emperor, by giving him the resemblance of his ancestor, and gave him such a resemblance as was not scandalous in that age. For to leave one wife, and take another, was but a matter of gallantry at that time of day among the Romans. Neque hæc in fœdera veni is the very excuse which Æneas makes, when he leaves his lady: "I made no such bargain with you at our marriage, to live always drudging on at Carthage: my business was Italy; and I never made a secret of it. If I took my pleasure, had not you your share of it? I leave you free, at my departure, to comfort yourself with the next stranger who happens to be shipwreck'd on your coast. Be as kind a hostess as you have been to me, and you can never fail of another husband. In the mean time, I call the gods to witness that I leave your shore unwillingly; for, tho' Juno made the marriage, yet Jupiter commands me to forsake you." This is the effect of what he saith, when it is dishonor'd out of Latin verse into English prose. If the poet argued not aright, we must pardon him for a poor blind heathen, who knew no better morals.

I have detain'd your Lordship longer than I intended on this objection, which would indeed weigh something in a spiritual court; but I am not to defend our poet there. The next, I think, is but a cavil, tho' the cry is great against him, and hath continued from the time of Macrobius to this present age. I hinted it before. They lay no less than want of invention to his charge — a capital crime, I must acknowledge; for a poet is a maker, as the word signifies; and who cannot make, that is, invent, hath his name for nothing. That which makes this accusation look so strange at the first sight, is, that he has borrow'd so many things from Homer, Apollonius Rhodius, and others who preceded him. But in the first place, if invention is to be taken in so strict a sense, that the matter of a poem must be wholly new, and that in all its parts, then Scaliger hath made out, saith Segrais, that the history of Troy was no more the invention of Homer than of Virgil. There was not an old woman, or almost a child, but had it in their mouths, before the Greek poet or his friends digested it into this admirable order in which we read it. At this rate, as Solomon hath told us, there is nothing new beneath the sun. Who then can pass for an inventor, if Homer, as well as Virgil, must be depriv'd of that glory? Is Versailles the less a new building, because the architect of that palace hath imitated others which were built before it? Walls, doors and windows, apartments, offices, rooms of convenience and magnificence, are in all great houses. So descriptions, figures, fables, and the rest, must be in all heroic poems; they are the common materials of poetry, furnish'd from the magazine of nature; every poet hath as much right to them as every man hath to air or water. Quid prohibetis aquas? Usus communis aquarum est. But the argument of the work, that is to say, its principal action, the economy and disposition of it; these are the things which distinguish copies from originals. The poet who borrows nothing from others is yet to be born; he and the Jews' Messias will come together. There are parts of the Æneis which resemble some parts both of the Ilias and of the Odysses; as, for example, Æneas descended into hell, and Ulysses had been there before him; Æneas lov'd Dido, and Ulysses lov'd Calypso: in few words, Virgil hath imitated Homer's Odysses in his first six books, and in his six last the Ilias. But from hence can we infer that the two poets write the same history? Is there no invention in some other parts of Virgil's Æneis? The disposition of so many various matters, is not that his own? From what book of Homer had Virgil his episode of Nisus and Euryalus, of Mezentius and Lausus? From whence did he borrow his design of bringing Æneas into Italy? of establishing the Roman empire on the foundations of a Trojan colony? to say nothing of the honor he did his patron, not only in his descent from Venus, but in making him so like him in his best features, that the goddess might have mistaken Augustus for her son. He had indeed the story from common fame, as Homer had his from the Egyptian priestess. Æneadum genetrix was no more unknown to Lucretius than to him. But Lucretius taught him not to form his hero, to give him piety or valor for his manners, and both in so eminent a degree, that, having done what was possible for man, to save his king and country, his mother was fore'd to appear to him, and restrain his fury, which hurried him to death in their revenge. But the poet made his piety more successful; he brought off his father and his son; and his gods witness'd to his devotion, by putting themselves under his protection, to be replac'd by him in their promis'd Italy. Neither the invention nor the conduct of this great action were owing to Homer or any other poet. 'Tis one thing to copy, and another thing to imitate from nature. The copier is that servile imitator, to whom Horace gives no better a name than that of animal; he will not so much as allow him to be a man. Raphael imitated nature; they who copy one of Raphael's pieces imitate but him, for his work is their original. They translate him, as I do Virgil; and fall as short of him, as I of Virgil. There is a kind of invention in the imitation of Raphael; for, tho' the thing was in nature, yet the idea of it was his own. Ulysses travel'd; so did Æneas: but neither of them were the first travelers; for Cain went into the land of Nod before they were born, and neither of the poets ever heard of such a man. If Ulysses had been kill'd at Troy, yet Æneas must have gone to sea, or he could never have arriv'd in Italy. But the designs of the two poets were as different as the courses of their heroes; one went home, and the other sought a home. To return to my first similitude: suppose Apelles and Raphael had each of them painted a burning Troy, might not the modern painter have succeeded as well as the ancient, tho' neither of them had seen the town on fire? for the draughts of both were taken from the ideas which they had of nature. Cities had been burnt before either of them were in being. But, to close the simile as I began it, they would not have design'd it after the same manner: Apelles would have distinguish'd Pyrrhus from the rest of all the Grecians, and shew'd him forcing his entrance into Priam's palace; there he had set him in the fairest light, and given him the chief place of all his figures; because he was a Grecian, and he would do honor to his country. Raphael, who was an Italian, and descended from the Trojans, would have made Æneas the hero of his piece; and perhaps not with his father on his back, his son in one hand, his bundle of gods in the other, and his wife following; for an act of piety is not half so graceful in a picture as an act of courage: he would rather have drawn him killing Androgeos, or some other, hand to hand; and the blaze of the fires should have darted full upon his face, to make him conspicuous amongst his Trojans. This, I think, is a just comparison betwixt the two poets, in the conduct of their several designs. Virgil cannot be said to copy Homer: the Grecian had only the advantage of writing first. If it be urg'd that I have granted a resemblance in some parts, yet therein Virgil has excell'd him. For what are the tears of Calypso for being left, to the fury and death of Dido? Where is there the whole process of her passion and all its violent effects to be found, in the languishing episode of the Odyssey? If this be to copy, let the critics shew us the same disposition, features, or coloring, in their original. The like may be said of the descent to hell, which was not of Homer's invention neither; he had it from the story of Orpheus and Eurydice. But to what end did Ulysses make that journey? Æneas undertook it by the express commandment of his father's ghost: there he was to shew him all the succeeding heroes of his race, and, next to Romulus (mark, if you please, the address of Virgil,) his own patron, Augustus Cæsar. Anchises was likewise to instruct him how to manage the Italian war, and how to conclude it with his honor; that is, in other words, to lay the foundations of that empire which Augustus was to govern. This is the noble invention of our author; but it hath been copied by so many sign-post daubers, that now 't is grown fulsome, rather by their want of skill than by the commonness.

In the last place, I may safely grant that,

by reading Homer, Virgil was taught to imitate his invention; that is, to imitate like him; which is no more than if a painter studied Raphael, that he might learn to design after his manner. And thus I might imitate Virgil, if I were capable of writing an heroic poem, and yet the invention be my own; but I should endeavor to avoid a servile copying. I would not give the same story under other names, with the same characters, in the same order, and with the same sequel; for every common reader to find me out at the first sight for a plagiarist, and cry: "This I read before in Virgil, in a better language, and in better verse. This is like Merry Andrew on the low rope, copying lubberly the same tricks which his master is so dextrously performing on the high."

I will trouble your Lordship but with one objection more, which I know not whether I found in Le Fèvre, or Valois; but I am sure I have read it in another French critic, whom I will not name, because I think it is not much for his reputation. Virgil, in the heat of action — suppose, for example, in describing the fury of his hero in a battle, when he is endeavoring to raise our concerns to the highest pitch — turns short on the sudden into some similitude, which diverts, say they, your attention from the main subject, and misspends it on some trivial image. He pours cold water into the caldron, when his business is to make it boil.

This accusation is general against all who would be thought heroic poets; but I think it touches Virgil less than any. He is too great a master of his art, to make a blot which may so easily be hit. Similitudes, as I have said, are not for tragedy, which is all violent, and where the passions are in a perpetual ferment; for there they deaden where they should animate; they are not of the nature of dialogue, unless in comedy: a metaphor is almost all the stage can suffer, which is a kind of similitude comprehended in a word. But this figure has a contrary effect in heroic poetry; there 't is employ'd to raise the admiration, which is its proper business; and admiration is not of so violent a nature as fear or hope, compassion or horror, or any concernment we can have for such or such a person on the stage. Not but I confess that similitudes and descriptions, when drawn into an unreasonable length, must needs nauseate the reader. Once, I remember, and but once, Virgil makes a similitude of fourteen lines; and his description of Fame is about the same number. He is blam'd for both; and I doubt not but he would have contracted them, had he liv'd to have review'd his work; but faults are no precedents. This I have observ'd of his similitudes in general, that they are not plac'd, as our unobserving critics tell us, in the heat of any action, but commonly in its declining. When he has warn'd us in his description as much as possibly he can, then, lest that warmth should languish, he renews it by some apt similitude, which illustrates his subject, and yet palls not his audience. I need give your Lordship but one example of this kind, and leave the rest to your observation, when next you review the whole Æneis in the original, unblemish'd by my rude translation. 'T is in the First Book, where the poet describes Neptune composing the ocean, on which Æolus had rais'd a tempest without his permission. He had already chidden the rebellious winds for obeying the commands of their usurping master; he had warn'd them from the seas; he had beaten down the billows with his mace, dispell'd the clouds, restor'd the sunshine, while Triton and Cymothoe were heaving the ships from off the quicksands, before the poet would offer at a similitude for illustration:

*Ac, veluti magno in populo cum sæpe coorta est
Seditio, sævitque animis ignobile vulgus, Jamque faces et sara volant; furor arma ministrat;
Tum, pietate gravem ac meritis si forte virum
quem
Conspexeri, silent, arrectisque auribus adstant;
Ille regit ditis animos, et pectora mulcet:
Sic cunctus pelagi cecidit fragor, atque post-
quam
Prospiciens genitor caloque inirectus aperto
Flectit equos, curruque volans dat lora secundo.*

This is the first similitude which Virgil makes in this poem, and one of the longest in the whole; for which reason I the rather cite it. While the storm was in its fury, any allusion had been improper; for the poet could have compar'd it to nothing more impetuous than itself; consequently he could have made no illustration. If he could have illustrated, it had been an ambitious ornament out of season, and would have diverted our concernment: nunc non erat hisce locus; and therefore he deferr'd it to its proper place.

These are the criticisms of most moment which have been made against the Æneis by the ancients or moderns. As for the particular exceptions against this or that passage, Macrobius and Pontanus have answer'd them already. If I desir'd to appear more learned than I am, it had been as easy for me to have taken their objections and solutions, as it is for a country parson to take the expositions of the fathers out of Junius and Tremellius, or not to have nam'd the authors from whence I had them; for so Ruæus, otherwise a most judicious commentator on Virgil's works, has us'd Pontanus, his greatest benefactor; of whom he is very silent; and I do not remember that he once cites him.

What follows next is no objection; for that implies a fault: and it had been none in Virgil, if he had extended the time of his action beyond a year. At least Aristotle has set no precise limits to it. Homer's, we know, was within two months: Tasso. I am sure, exceeds not a summer; and, if I examin'd him, perhaps he might be reduc'd into a much less compass. Bossu leaves it doubtful whether Virgil's action were within the year, or took up some months beyond it. Indeed, the whole dispute is of no more concernment to the common reader, than it is to a plowman, whether February this year had 28 or 29 days in it. But, for the satisfaction of the more curious, of which number I am sure your Lordship is one, I will translate what I think convenient out of Segrais, whom perhaps you have not read; for he has made it highly probable that the action of the Æneis began in the spring, and was not extended beyond the autumn. And we have known campaigns that have begun sooner and have ended later.

Ronsard, and the rest whom Segrais names, who are of opinion that the action of this poem takes up almost a year and half, ground their calculation thus. Anchises died in Sicily at the end of winter, or beginning of the spring. Æneas, immediately after the interment of his father, puts to sea for Italy. He is surpris'd by the tempest describ'd in the beginning of the First Book; and there it is that the scene of the poem opens, and where the action must commence. He is driven by this storm on the coasts of Afric; he stays at Carthage all that summer, and almost all the winter following, sets sail again for Italy just before the beginning of the spring, meets with contrary winds, and makes Sicily the second time. This part of the action completes the year. Then he celebrates the anniversary of his father's funerals, and shortly after arrives at Cumæ; and from thence his time is taken up in his first treaty with Latinus, the overture of the war, the siege of his camp by Turnus, his going for succors to relieve it, his return, the raising of the siege by the first battle, the twelve days' truce, the second battle, the assault of Laurentum, and the single fight with Turnus; all which, they say, cannot take up less than four or five months more; by which account we cannot suppose the entire action to be contain'd in a much less compass than a year and half.

Segrais reckons another way; and his computation is not condemn'd by the learned Ruæus, who compil'd and publish'd the commentaries on our poet which we call the Dauphin's Virgil.

He allows the time of year when Anchises died to be in the latter end of winter, or the beginning of the spring: he acknowledges that, when Æneas is first seen at sea afterwards, and is driven by the tempest on the coast of Afric, is the time when the action is naturally to begin: he confesses, farther, that Æneas left Carthage in the latter end of winter; for Dido tells him in express terms, as an argument for his longer stay:

Quinetiam hiberno moliris sidere classem.

But, whereas Ronsard's followers suppose that when Æneas had buried his father, he set sail immediately for Italy, (tho' the tempest drove him on the coast of Carthage,) Segrais will by no means allow that supposition, but thinks it much more probable that he remain'd in Sicily till the midst of July, or the beginning of August; at which time he places the first appearance of his hero on the sea, and there opens the action of the poem. From which beginning to the death of Turnus, which concludes the action, there need not be suppos'd above ten months of intermediate time: for, arriving at Carthage in the latter end of summer, staying there the winter following, departing thence in the very beginning of the spring, making a short abode in Sicily the second time, landing in Italy, and making the war, may be reasonably judg'd the business but of ten months. To this the Ronsardians reply, that, having been for seven years before in quest of Italy, and having no more to do in Sicily than to inter his father — after that office was perform'd, what remain'd for him, but, without delay, to pursue his first adventure? To which Segrais answers, that the obsequies of his father, according to the rites of the Greeks and Romans, would detain him for many days; that a longer time must be taken up in the refitting of his ships after so tedious a voyage, and in refreshing his weather-beaten soldiers on a friendly coast. These indeed are but suppositions on both sides; yet those of Segrais seem better grounded. For the feast of Dido, when she entertain'd Æneas first, has the appearance of a summer's night, which seems already almost ended when he begins his story; therefore the love was made in autumn: the hunting follow'd properly, when the heats of that scorching country were declining; the winter was pass'd in jollity, as the season and their love requir'd; and he left her in the latter end of winter, as is already prov'd. This opinion is fortified by the arrival of Æneas at the mouth of Tiber, which marks the season of the spring; that season being perfectly describ'd by the singing of the birds, saluting the dawn, and by the beauty of the place, which the poet seems to have painted expressly in the Seventh Æneid:

*Aurora in roseis fulgebat lutea bigis,
Cum venti posuere; variae circumque supraque
Assuetæ ripis volucres et fluminis alveo
Æthera mulcebant cantu.* —

The remainder of the action requir'd but three months more: for, when Æneas went for succor to the Tuscans, he found their army in a readiness to march, and wanting only a commander; so that, according to this calculation, the Æneis takes not up above a year complete, and may be comprehended in less compass.

This, amongst other circumstances treated more at large by Segrais, agrees with the rising of Orion, which caus'd the tempest describ'd in the beginning of the First Book. By some passages in the Pastorals, but more particularly in the Georgics, our poet is found to be an exact astronomer, according to the knowledge of that age. Now Ilioneus (whom Virgil twice employs in embassies, as the best speaker of the Trojans) attributes that tempest to Orion, in his speech to Dido:

Cum subito assurgens fluctu nimbosus Orion.

He must mean either the heliacal or achronical rising of that sign. The heliacal rising of a constellation is when it comes from under the rays of the sun and begins to appear before daylight. The achronical rising, on the contrary, is when it appears at the close of day, and in opposition of the sun's diurnal course.

The heliacal rising of Orion is at present computed to be about the sixth of July; and about that time it is that he either causes or presages tempests on the seas.

Segrais has observ'd farther, that, when Anna counsels Dido to stay Æneas during the winter, she speaks also of Orion:

Dum pelago desævît hiems, et aquosus Orion.

If therefore Ilioneus, according to our supposition, understand the heliacal rising of Orion, Anna must mean the achronical, which the different epithets given to that constellation seem to manifest. Ilioneus calls him nimbosus; Anna, aquosus. He is tempestuous in the summer, when he rises heliacally, and rainy in the winter, when he rises achronically. Your Lordship will pardon me for the frequent repetition of these cant words, which I could not avoid in this abbreviation of Segrais, who, I think, deserves no little commendation in this new criticism.

I have yet a word or two to say of Virgil's machines, from my own observation of them. He has imitated those of Homer, but not copied them. It was establish'd long before this time, in the Roman religion as well as in the Greek, that there were gods; and both nations, for the most part, worship'd the same deities; as did also the Trojans, from whom the Romans, I suppose, would rather be thought to derive the rites of their religion than from the Grecians; because they thought themselves descended from them. Each of those gods had his proper office, and the chief of them their particular attendants. Thus Jupiter had in propriety Ganymede and Mercury, and Juno had Iris. It was not for Virgil then to create new ministers; he must take what he found in his religion. It cannot therefore be said that he borrow'd them from Homer, any more than Apollo, Diana, and the rest, whom he uses as he finds occasion for them, as the Grecian poet did; but he invents the occasions for which he uses them. Venus, after the destruction of Troy, had gain'd Neptune entirely to her party; therefore we find him busy in the beginning of the Æneis, to calm the tempest rais'd by Æolus, and afterwards conducting the Trojan fleet to Cumæ in safety, with the loss only of their pilot, for whom he bargains. I name those two examples amongst a hundred which I omit, to prove that Virgil, generally speaking, employ'd his machines in performing those things which might possibly have been done without them. What more frequent than a storm at sea, upon the rising of Orion? What wonder, if, amongst so many ships, there should one be overset, which was commanded by Orontes, tho' half the winds had not been there which Æolus employ'd? Might not Palinurus, without a miracle, fall asleep, and drop into the sea, having been overwearied with watching, and secure of a quiet passage, by his observation of the skies? At least Æneas, who knew nothing of the machine of Somnus, takes it plainly in this sense:

*O nimium cælo et pelago confise sereno,
Nudus in ignota, Palinure, jacebis arena.*

But machines sometimes are specious things, to amuse the reader and give a color of probability to things otherwise incredible. And, besides, it sooth'd the vanity of the Romans, to find the gods so visibly concern'd in all the actions of their predecessors. We, who are better taught by our religion, yet own every wonderful accident which befalls us for the best, to be brought to pass by some special providence of Almighty God, and by the care of guardian angels; and from hence I might infer that no heroic poem can be writ on the Epicurean principles; which I could easily demonstrate, if there were need to prove it, or I had leisure.

When Venus opens the eyes of her son

Æneas, to behold the gods who combated against Troy in that fatal night when it was surpris'd, we share the pleasure of that glorious vision (which Tasso has not ill copied in the sacking of Jerusalem). But the Greeks had done their business, tho' neither Neptune, Juno, or Pallas had given them their divine assistance. The most crude machine which Virgil uses is in the episode of Camilla, where Opis, by the command of her mistress, kills Aruns. The next is in the Twelfth Æneid, where Venus cures her son Æneas. But in the last of these the poet was driven to a necessity; for Turnus was to be slain that very day; and Æneas, wounded as he was, could not have engag'd him in single combat, unless his hurt had been miraculously heal'd. And the poet had consider'd that the dittany which she brought from Crete could not have wrought so speedy an effect, without the juice of ambrosia, which she mingled with it. After all, that his machine might not seem too violent, we see the hero limping after Turnus. The wound was skinn'd, but the strength of his thigh was not restor'd. But what reason had our author to wound Æneas at so critical a time? And how came the cuisses to be worse temper'd than the rest of his armor, which was all wrought by Vulcan and his journeymen? These difficulties are not easily to be solv'd, without confessing that Virgil had not life enough to correct his work; tho' he had review'd it, and found those errors which he resolv'd to mend: but, being prevented by death, and not willing to leave an imperfect work behind him, he ordain'd, by his last testament, that his Æneis should be burn'd. As for the death of Aruns, who was shot by a goddess, the machine was not altogether so outrageous as the wounding Mars and Venus by the sword of Diomed. Two divinities, one would have thought, might have pleaded their prerogative of impassibility, or at least not have been wounded by any mortal hand; beside that the εἴχλωρ which they shed was so very like our common blood, that it was not to be distinguish'd from it, but only by the name and color. As for what Horace says in his Art of Poetry, that no machines are to be us'd, unless on some extraordinary occasion:

Nec deus interstit, nisi dignus vindice nodus —

that rule is to be applied to the theater, of which he is then speaking; and means no more than this, that, when the knot of the play is to be untied, and no other way is left for making the discovery; then, and not otherwise, let a god descend upon a rope, and clear the business to the audience. But this has no relation to the machines which are us'd in an epic poem.

In the last place, for the Dira, or flying pest, which, flapping on the shield of Turnus, and fluttering about his head, dishearten'd him in the duel, and presag'd to him his approaching death, I might have plac'd it more properly amongst the objections; for the critics who lay want of courage to the charge of Virgil's hero quote this passage as a main proof of their assertion. They say our author had not only secur'd him before the duel, but also, in the beginning of it, had given him the advantage in impenetrable arms, and in his sword; for that of Turnus was not his own, which was forg'd by Vulcan for his father, but a weapon which he had snatch'd in haste, and by mistake, belonging to his charioteer Metiscus; that, after all this, Jupiter, who was partial to the Trojan, and distrustful of the event, tho' he had hung the balance, and given it a jog of his hand to weigh down Turnus, thought convenient to give the Fates a collateral security, by sending the screech owl to discourage him: for which they quote these words of Virgil :

— *Non me tua turbida virtus
Terret, ait : dii me terrent, et Jupiter hostis.*

In answer to which, I say that this machine is one of those which the poet uses only for ornament, and not out of necessity. Nothing can be more beautiful or more poetical than his description of the three Dira, or the setting of the balance, which our Milton has borrow'd from him, but employ'd to a different end: for, first, he makes God Almighty set the scales for St. Gabriel and Satan, when he knew no combat was to follow; then he makes the good angel's scale descend, and the Devil's mount, quite contrary to Virgil, if I have translated the three verses according to my author's sense:

*Jupiter ipse duas æquato examine lances
Sustinet ; et fata imponit diversa duorum ;
Quem damnet labor, et quo vergat pondere letum.*

For I have taken these words, quem damnet labor, in the sense which Virgil gives them in another place — damnabis tu quoque votis — to signify a prosperous event. Yet I dare not condemn so great a genius as Milton: for I am much mistaken if he alludes not to the text in Daniel, where Belshazzar was put into the balance and found too light. This is digression; and I return to my subject. I said above that these two machines of the balance and the Dira were only ornamental, and that the success of the duel had been the same without them. For, when Æneas and Turnus stood fronting each other before the altar, Turnus look'd dejected, and his color faded in his face, as if he desponded of the victory before the fight; and not only he, but all his party, when the strength of the two champions was judg'd by the proportion of their limbs, concluded it was impar pugna, and that their chief was overmatch'd: whereupon Juturna (who was of the same opinion) took this opportunity to break the treaty and renew the war. Juno herself had plainly told the nymph beforehand that her brother was to fight

Imparibus fatis, nec diis nec viribus æquis ;

so that there was no need of an apparition to fright Turnus: he had the presage within himself of his impending destiny. The Dira only serv'd to confirm him in his first opinion, that it was his destiny to die in the ensuing combat; and in this sense are those words of Virgil to be taken:

— *Non me tua turbida virtus
Terret, ait : dii me terrent, et Jupiter hostis.*

I doubt not but the adverb solum is to be understood: "T is not your valor only that gives me this concernment; but I find also, by this portent, that Jupiter is my enemy." For Turnus fled before, when his first sword was broken, till his sister supplied him with a better; which indeed he could not use, because Æneas kept him at a distance with his spear. I wonder Ræus saw not this, where he charges his author so unjustly, for giving Turnus a second sword to no purpose. How could he fasten a blow, or make a thrust, when he was not suffer'd to approach? Besides, the chief errand of the Dira was to warn Juturna from the field, for she could have brought the chariot again, when she saw her brother worsted in the duel. I might farther add, that Æneas was so eager of the fight that he left the city, now almost in his possession, to decide his quarrel with Turnus by the sword; whereas Turnus had manifestly declin'd the combat, and suffer'd his sister to convey him as far from the reach of his enemy as she could. I say, not only suffer'd her, but consented to it; for 't is plain he knew her, by these words:

*O soror, et dudum agnovi, cum prima per artem
Fœdera turbasti, tegue hæc in bella dedisti;
Et nunc nequicquam fallis dea. —*

I have dwelt so long on this subject, that I must contract what I have to say in reference to my translation, unless I would swell my preface into a volume, and make it formidable to your Lordship, when you see so many pages yet behind. And indeed what I have already written, either in justification or praise of Virgil, is against myself, for presuming to copy, in my coarse English, the thoughts and beautiful expressions of this inimitable poet, who flourish'd in an age when his language was brought to its last perfection, for which it was particularly owing to him and Horace. I will give your Lordship my opinion, that those two friends had consulted each other's judgment, wherein they should endeavor to excel; and they seem to have pitch'd on propriety of thought, elegance of words, and harmony of numbers. According to this model, Horace writ his Odes and Epodes: for his Satires and Epistles, being intended wholly for instruction, requir'd another style:

Ornari res ipsa negat, contenta doceri —

and therefore, as he himself professes, are sermoni propiora, nearer prose than verse. But Virgil, who never attempted the lyric verse, is everywhere elegant, sweet, and flowing in his hexameters. His words are not only chosen, but the places in which he ranks them for the sound; he who removes them from the station wherein their master sets them, spoils the harmony. What he says of the Sibyl's prophecies may be as properly applied to every word of his: they must be read in order as they lie; the least breath discomposes them; and somewhat of their divinity is lost. I cannot boast that I have been thus exact in my verses; but

I have endeavor'd to follow the example of my master, and am the first Englishman, perhaps, who made it his design to copy him in his numbers, his choice of words, and his placing them for the sweetness of the sound. On this last consideration I have shunn'd the cæsura as much as possibly I could: for, wherever that is us'd, it gives a roughness to the verse; of which we can have little need in a language which is overstock'd with consonants. Such is not the Latin, where the vowels and consonants are mix'd in proportion to each other; yet Virgil judg'd the vowels to have somewhat of an overbalance, and therefore tempers their sweetness with cæsuras. Such difference there is in tongues, that the same figure which roughens one, gives majesty to another; and that was it which Virgil studied in his verses. Ovid uses it but rarely; and hence it is that his versification cannot so properly be call'd sweet, as luscious. The Italians are forc'd upon it once or twice in every line, because they have a redundancy of vowels in their language. Their metal is so soft that it will not coin without alloy to harden it. On the other side, for the reason already nam'd, 't is all we can do to give sufficient sweetness to our language: we must not only choose our words for elegance, but for sound; to perform which, a mastery in the language is requir'd; the poet must have a magazine of words, and have the art to manage his few vowels to the best advantage, that they may go the farther. He must also know the nature of the vowels — which are more sonorous, and which more soft and sweet — and so dispose them as his present occasions require: all which, and a thousand secrets of versification beside, he may learn from Virgil, if he will take him for his guide. If he be above Virgil, and is resolv'd to follow his own verve, (as the French call it,) the proverb will fall heavily upon him: "Who teaches himself, has a fool for his master."

Virgil employ'd eleven years upon his Æneis; yet he left it, as he thought himself, imperfect. Which when I seriously consider, I wish that, instead of three years, which I have spent in the translation of his works, I had four years more allow'd me to correct my errors, that I might make my version somewhat more tolerable than it is: for a poet cannot have too great a reverence for his readers, if he expects his labors should survive him. Yet I will neither plead my age nor sickness, in excuse of the faults which I have made: that I wanted time, is all I have to say; for some of my subscribers grew so clamorous that I could no longer defer the publication. I hope, from the candor of your Lordship, and your often experienc'd goodness to me, that, if the faults are not too many, you will make allowances with Horace:

*Si plura nitent in carmine, non ego paucis
Offendar maculis, quas aut incuria fudit,
Aut humana parum cavit natura.*

You may please also to observe, that there is not, to the best of my remembrance, one vowel gaping on another for want of a cæsura, in this whole poem; but, where a vowel ends a word, the next begins either with a consonant, or what is its equivalent; for our W and H aspirate, and our diphthongs, are plainly such. The greatest latitude I take is in the letter Y, when it concludes a word and the first syllable of the next begins with a vowel. Neither need I have call'd this a latitude, which is only an explanation of this general rule, that no vowel can be cut off before another when we cannot sink the pronunciation of it; as he, she, me, I, &c. Virgil thinks it sometimes a beauty to imitate the license of the Greeks, and leave two vowels opening on each other, as in that verse of the Third Pastoral:

Et succus pecori, et lac subducitur agnis.

But, nobis non licet esse tam disertis, at least if we study to refine our numbers. I have long had by me the materials of an English prosodia, containing all the mechanical rules of versification, wherein I have treated with some exactness of the feet, the quantities, and the pauses. The French and Italians know nothing of the two first; at least their best poets have not practis'd them. As for the pauses, Malherbe first brought them into France, within this last century; and we see how they adorn their Alexandrins. But, as Virgil propounds a riddle, which he leaves unsolv'd:

*Dic, quibus in terris, inscripti nomina regum
Nascantur flores; et Phyllida solus habeto;*

so I will give your Lordship another, and leave the exposition of it to your acute judgment. I am sure there are few who make verses have observ'd the sweetness of these two lines in Cooper's Hill:

*Tho' deep, yet clear; tho' gentle, yet not dull;
Strong without rage; without o'erflowing, full.*

And there are yet fewer who can find the reason of that sweetness. I have given it to some of my friends in conversation, and they have allow'd the criticism to be just. But, since the evil of false quantities is difficult to be cur'd in any modern language; since the French and the Italians, as well as we, are yet ignorant what feet are to be us'd in heroic poetry; since I have not strictly observ'd those rules myself which I can teach others; since I pretend to no dictatorship among my fellow poets; since, if I should instruct some of them to make well-running verses, they want genius to give them strength as well as sweetness; and, above all, since your Lordship has advis'd me not to publish that little which I know, I look on your counsel as your command, which I shall observe inviolably, till you shall please to revoke it, and leave me at liberty to make my thoughts public. In the mean time, that I may arrogate nothing to myself, I must acknowledge that Virgil in Latin, and Spenser in English, have been my masters. Spenser has also given me the boldness to make use sometimes of his Alexandrin line, which we call, tho' improperly, the Pindaric, because Mr. Cowley has often employ'd it in his Odes. It adds a certain majesty to the verse, when 'tis us'd with judgment, and stops the sense from overflowing into another line. Formerly the French, like us and the Italians, had but five feet, or ten syllables, in their heroic verse; but since Ronsard's time, as I suppose, they found their tongue too weak to support their epic poetry without the addition of another foot. That indeed has given it somewhat of the run and measure of a trimeter; but it runs with more activity than strength: their language is not strung with sinews, like our English. It has the nimbleness of a greyhound, but not the bulk and body of a mastiff. Our men and our verses overbear them by their weight; and pondere, non numero, is the British motto. The French have set up purity for the standard of their language; and a masculine vigor is that of ours. Like their tongue is the genius of their poets, light and trifling in comparison of the English; more proper for sonnets, madrigals, and elegies, than heroic poetry. The turn on thoughts and words is their chief talent, but the epic poem is too stately to receive those little ornaments. The painters draw their nymphs in thin and airy habits; but the weight of gold and of embroideries is reserv'd for queens and goddesses. Virgil is never frequent in those turns, like Ovid, but much more sparing of them in his Æneis than in his Pastorals and Georgics.

Ignoscenda quidem, scirent si ignoscere manes.

That turn is beautiful indeed; but he employs it in the story of Orpheus and Eurydice, not in his great poem. I have us'd that license in his Æneis sometimes, but I own it as my fault. 'Twas given to those who understand no better. 'Tis like Ovid's Semivirumque bovem, semibovemque virum.

The poet found it before his critics, but it was a darling sin, which he would not be persuaded to reform. The want of genius, of which I have accus'd the French, is laid to their charge by one of their own great authors, tho' I have forgotten his name, and where I read it. If rewards could make good poets, their great master has not been wanting on his part in his bountiful encouragements; for he is wise enough to imitate Augustus, if he had a Maro. The triumvir and proscriber had descended to us in a more hideous form than they now appear, if the emperor had not taken care to make friends of him and Horace. I confess the banishment of Ovid was a blot in his escutcheon: yet he was only banish'd; and who knows but his crime was capital, and then his exile was a favor? Ariosto, who, with all his faults, must be acknowledg'd a great poet, has put these words into the mouth of an evangelist; but whether they will pass for gospel now, I cannot tell:

*Non fu sì santo ni benigno Augusto,
Come la tuba di Virgilio suona.
L' haver havuto in poesia buon gusto,
La proscrittione iniqua gli perdona.*

But heroic poetry is not of the growth of France, as it might be of England, if it were cultivated. Spenser wanted only to have read the rules of Bossu; for no man was ever born with a greater genius, or had more knowledge to support it. But the performance of the French is not equal to their skill; and hitherto we have wanted skill to perform better. Segrain, whose preface is so wonderfully good, yet is wholly destitute of elevation, tho' his version is much better than that of the two brothers, or any of the rest who have attempted Virgil. Hannibal Caro is a great name amongst the Italians; yet his translation of the Æneis is most scandalously mean, tho' he has taken the advantage of writing in blank verse, and freed himself from the shackles of modern rhyme, (if it be modern; for Le Clerc has told us lately, and I believe has made it out, that David's Psalms were written in as errant rhyme as they are translated.) Now, if a Muse cannot run when she is unfetter'd, 'tis a sign she has but little speed. I will not make a digression here, tho' I am strangely tempted to it; but will only say, that he who can write well in rhyme, may write better in blank verse. Rhyme is certainly a constraint even to the best poets, and those who make it with most ease; tho' perhaps I have as little reason to complain of that hardship as any man, excepting Quarles and Withers. What it adds to sweetness, it takes away from sense; and he who loses the least by it may be call'd a gainer. It often makes us swerve from an author's meaning; as, if a mark be set up for an archer at a great distance, let him aim as exactly as he can, the least wind will take his arrow, and divert it from the white. I return to our Italian translator of the Æneis. He is a foot-poet, he lackeys by the side of Virgil at the best, but never mounts behind him. Doctor Morelli, who is no mean critic in our poetry, and therefore may be presum'd to be a better in his own language, has confirm'd me in this opinion by his judgment, and thinks, withal, that he has often mistaken his master's sense. I would say so, if I durst, but am afraid I have committed the same fault more often, and more grossly; for I have forsaken Rueus (whom generally I follow) in many places, and made expositions of my own in some, quite contrary to him. Of which I will give but two examples, because they are so near each other, in the Tenth Æneid :

— Sorti pater æquus utrique.

Pallas says it to Turnus, just before they fight. Ruæus thinks that the word pater is to be referr'd to Evander, the father of Pallas. But how could he imagine that it was the same thing to Evander, if his son were slain, or if he overcame? The poet certainly intended Jupiter, the common father of mankind; who, as Pallas hop'd, would stand an impartial spectator of the combat, and not be more favorable to Turnus than to him. The second is not long after it, and both before the duel is begun. They are the words of Jupiter, who comforts Hercules for the death of Pallas, which was immediately to ensue, and which Hercules could not hinder, (tho' the young hero had address'd his prayers to him for his assistance,) because the gods cannot control destiny. — The verse follows:

Sic ait ; atque oculos Rutulorum rejicit arvis,
